UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO
3 1761 01730763 8

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2010 with funding from University of Toronto

http://www.archive.org/details/miscellaneouswor00dodd

27

I

THE WORKS

OF THE

REV. PHILIP DODDRIDGE, D. D.

1440

THE

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS

OF

PHILIP DODDRIDGE, D. D.

WITH

AN INTRODUCTORY ESSAY,

BY THE REV. T. MORELL,

OF COWARD COLLEGE.

E.L.E.SSLIE & SONS TORONTO, U.C.

309
D 5

LONDON:

WILLIAM BALL, 34, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

PRINTED BY JOHN CHILDS AND SON, BUNGAY.

MDCCCXXXIX.

INTRODUCTORY ESSAY.

THE name of DODDRIDGE must ever be dear to all who cherish a cordial attachment to practical Christianity. His character and writings may be depreciated by the zealot, who can only breathe in the turbid element of theological controversy; or by the sectarist, who cannot look beyond the pale of his own narrow enclosure: but assuredly they will long continue to be revered and honoured by all who prefer Scriptural truth to human systems, and in whom fervent piety is combined with the benignant spirit of the gospel. Though attached, both by education and principle, to one denomination of Christians above the rest, this distinguished philanthropist may be regarded as the property of the universal church, on every portion of which he has conferred incalculable benefits. To estimate correctly the nature and full extent of those benefits, it is requisite not merely to view attentively his individual character, and the varied productions of his pious and enlightened mind, but these must be contemplated in connexion with the moral and religious aspect of the times in which he lived, the then state of our British churches, and the influence exerted by his life and writings, (in conjunction with other causes,) both on his contemporaries and successors —an influence, which perhaps was never greater or more apparent than in the present day. This will be attempted briefly in the present Essay, and the writer hopes that such a sketch, however imperfectly executed, will not be deemed an unappropriate introduction to the new edition of his works, now presented to the public.

Whatever opinion may be formed of the political events of the seventeenth century, it will be admitted on all hands that it constitutes a memorable era in the religious history of our country. During the greater part of that period, there lived, and laboured, and suffered for conscience' sake, an illustrious band, "of whom the world was not worthy;" men whose genius had caught its noblest inspiration from intimate converse with the Deity; who drank copiously and constantly from the hallowed fount of divine revelation; and who devoted energies of no ordinary kind to the instruction and edification of the church of Christ. These mighty champions of the Christian faith pursued their high career with unwearied diligence and unconquerable zeal, amidst tumultuous scenes of political contention, and in defiance of the lawless terrors of arbitrary power. Undismayed, and even invigorated, by long-continued sufferings, they still pressed forward to new and nobler achievements; apparently gathering strength from the opposition they encountered, and the privations they endured. The talents of these modern confessors were various, as had been the circumstances of their birth and education. Some were characterized by original and inventive genius, others by the clearness and comprehension of their reasoning powers; some by profound research into the import of the sacred oracles, and others by a genuine pathos, a holy fervour of spirit, which have seldom been equalled, and perhaps never excelled. But diversified as were their intellectual endowments and literary attainments, one spirit seems to have animated them all. They were inflexible in their adherence to the great principles of evangelical truth, undaunted in their defence, and, above all, most solicitous to bring them to bear upon the consciences and hearts of men. That such was the character of their official instructions, and such the design and tendency of their invaluable writings, is sufficiently evident from the substantial memorials of their piety and talents, with which our libraries are enriched. If those ponderous volumes are not decorated with all the graces of composition which modern refinement may demand, they are confessedly replete with sound learning, scriptural knowledge, and genuine Christian eloquence; qualities which infinitely outweigh mere rhetorical ornaments, and more than compensate for an occasional quaintness of thought and expression.

The moral influence of the labours of these great and holy men was manifest at the time in which they flourished, in no inconsiderable degree. A vigorous stand was made, by the truly pious of that age, against the unparalleled profligacy and licentiousness which then prevailed amongst all classes of society. Not a few persons of elevated rank and noble birth were then numbered with the humble and devoted followers of Christ; men of science and erudition the most profound, were not ashamed of the doctrine of the cross; a leaven of fervent and active piety was widely, though secretly, diffused through the great mass of society; numerous and flourishing churches were gathered, and overspread the face of the land, many of which, though planted amidst the storms of persecution, and afterwards subjected to the yet more withering influence of worldly prosperity, still continue to flourish, and are at once the ornament and bulwarks of our land.

But scarcely had the latest of this illustrious band of Christian advocates, who had so nobly maintained the fight against irreligion, intolerance, and infidelity, ceased from their labours and entered into rest, when a melancholy reaction took place, into the nature and causes of which it is requisite to institute a brief inquiry. The outward condition of the church was tranquil, and, to a mere cursory observer, might even seem prosperous. Liberty of conscience, under the name of religious toleration, was conceded to the various denominations of Protestant Dissenters, though under restrictions, which neither sound policy nor impartial justice could approve. Some liberal and enlightened churchmen, among whom were included several distinguished members of the hierarchy, were prompted, by a spirit of liberality and forbearance that did them the highest credit, to attempt the removal of the causes of separation, by a measure of general comprehension: on the other hand, some influential members of the dissenting body manifested a disposition to meet the wishes and second the exertions of their brethren of the Established Church, by at least equal concessions on their part. A hope began to be cherished by the moderate and liberal of both parties, that the period was not far distant, in which former divisions would be effectually healed, and unity and peace restored to the Protestant Church.

Yet amidst these circumstances of external prosperity, it soon became but too evident, that the glory had departed from our British churches, and that instead of the spiritual vigour by which they were formerly characterized, a moral decay preyed upon their vitals. The truly pious, both within and without the pale of the national church, could not but perceive that the internal symptoms were most alarming. Religious apathy and indifference, under the specious names of liberality and candour, pervaded and paralyzed the far greater portion of the community. A cold system of ethics, scarcely superior to the morality of the pagan world, superseded the faithful and energetic preaching of former times. A spirit of daring speculation, betrayed many into pernicious errors, or disposed them to universal scepticism. The "watchmen on the walls of Zion," instead of sounding an alarm at this perilous crisis, for the most part, either slumbered at their posts, or basely deserted them; and even where the trumpet of alarm was heard, it gave but an uncertain sound. The congregations which had been accustomed to listen, with devout attention, to the evangelical doctrine and truly Christian eloquence of their late pastors, were now either scattered and broken up, as sheep having no shepherd; or they also, being infected with the moral contagion of the time, yielded to the same spiritual torpor and deadly lethargy of soul. While this cold and heartless semblance of Christianity was substituted, by the great majority of its professors, for vital and spiritual religion, there were others, who, justly apprehensive of danger from the latitudinarian spirit which then prevailed, rushed to the contrary extreme, which proved in its results scarcely less injurious. They cherished and diffused around them a controversial spirit; they contended with equal zeal and bitterness for the circumstantials, as for the essentials, of the Christian faith; for dogmas of human invention, and the distinguishing peculiarities of human systems, as for the great principles of revealed truth. The war of words was fiercely carried on, both in the pulpit and from the press; whilst, in the mean time, the spirit of Christianity, which is that of meekness and love, deserted the combatants on either side.

That this is no overcharged representation of the state of religion in our country, at the commencement of the eighteenth century, might be proved by a mass of incontrovertible evidences. Two or three credible witnesses will suffice, who are not only appealed to in confirmation of the preceding statements, but because they address a solemn warning to future ages, and may serve to illustrate the remarks to be made hereafter, on the life and writings of Doddridge.

The venerable Burnet, in the preface to his excellent treatise on "The Pastoral Care," thus bitterly laments the decay of vital religion, in that church of which he was a distinguished ornament. "I cannot look on," says he, "without the deepest concern, when I see imminent ruin hanging over this church, and by consequence over the whole reformation. The outward state of things is black enough, God knows; but that which heightens my fears, rises chiefly from the inward state into which we are unhappily fallen."—Then, after alluding to the gross ignorance of those who applied for ordination, and the want of piety and Scriptural knowledge in those who had already entered upon the sacred office, he adds, "these things pierce one's soul, and make me often cry out, 'O that I had wings like a dove, for then would I fly away and be at rest.' What are we like to grow to? In what a case are we to deal with any adversary, atheist, papist, or dissenters, or in any sort to promote the honour of God, and carry on the great concerns of the gospel, when so gross an ignorance in the fundamentals of religion has spread itself among those who ought to teach others, and yet need that one teach them the first principles of the oracles of God."* In yet more pathetic language, does the seraphic Leighton, in various parts of his invaluable writings, bewail the acrimony, the dissension, the secularity, the apathy, the declension and apostasy, of many both of the clergy and laity, holding communion with the episcopal churches of England and Scotland.

Nor was the condition of the Dissenting Churches at that period much better, as is evident from several tracts, written by distinguished members of that body, in which the fact of a lamentable decay of religion is assumed, and the causes of that general declension are investigated. Within a short period were published, among other treatises on this subject,

* Burnet's Pastoral Care, prel. p. n. w. See also the conclusion of the History of his Own Time, vol. v. p. 170—180, Oxford edit. 1823

"Watts's Humble Attempt towards the Revival of Practical Religion," —"Gough's Inquiry into the Causes of the Decay of the Dissenting Interest," —"Doddridge's Free Thoughts on the most Probable Means of Reviving the Dissenting Interest," —and "Neal's Free and Serious Remonstrance to Protestant Dissenting Ministers, on occasion of the Decay of Religion."—in all of which complaints are made of the declining state of the congregations, and still more of the decay of vital religion throughout the kingdom. A yet more decisive proof of this melancholy fact, together with some important information respecting the causes to which these evils were attributable, may be gathered incidentally from the private correspondence and diaries of some of these eminent men. As one illustration, out of many which might be selected, the following extracts from letters addressed by a learned and eminently pious Dissenting Minister,* resident in the Metropolis, and who possessed ample means of information, to Dr. Doddridge, in the year 1744, graphically describe the state of the Dissenting Churches at that time. "The Dissenting Interest is not like itself. I hardly know it. It used to be famous for faith, holiness, and love. I knew the time, when I had no doubt into whatever place of worship I went among Dissenters, but that my heart would be warmed and comforted, and my edification promoted. Now I hear prayers and sermons which I neither relish nor understand. Evangelical truth and duty are quite old-fashioned things: many pulpits are not so much as chaste: one's ears are so dinned with 'reason,' 'the great law of reason,' and the 'eternal law of reason,' that it is enough to put one out of conceit with the chief excellency of our nature, because it is idolized, and even deified. How prone are men to extremes! What a pity it is, that when people emerge out of an ancient mistake they seldom know when to stop! O! for the purity of our fountains, the wisdom and diligence of our tutors, the humility, piety, and teachableness of our youth," &c. &c. In another letter the same writer adds, "the defection of our younger ministers I greatly lament, and if the people departed from the doctrines of the reformation, as much as the ministers, I should begin to think whether ours were an interest worth serving."†

It is not asserted that the character of the entire body of Churchmen and Dissenters at the period referred to, was such as is represented in the preceding extracts. There were undoubtedly many honourable exceptions: there were not a few, who, like the exemplary prelates, Leighton and Burnet, or like Watts and Doddridge, wept in secret places over the desolations of the church of God, and laboured in season and out of season, to repair its ruins. But it is abundantly evident, that such was the predominant character of the age,—such the moral aspect of the times.

It is always desirable to trace effects to their causes, though the investigation, in moral as in physical science, is frequently attended with great difficulty. The causes are sometimes latent, so as scarcely to be discernible even to the most penetrating observer; sometimes so gradual and silent in their operation, that the effect is produced unexpectedly; sometimes so various, that we feel ourselves at a loss to determine which have produced the phenomenon in question; and sometimes so apparently inadequate, that it is scarcely possible to believe that such effects should result from such causes. These remarks will apply to the present subject. A most remarkable and rapid transition seems to have taken place, from a high tone of piety, to its lowest perceptible degree, from the prevalence, to the almost universal abandonment, of evangelical truth, from a flourishing and vigorous state of the church, to general sterility and decay. How happened this? To what cause, or rather, to what combination of causes, are these lamentable effects to be attributed? This is not merely a curious speculation, but an inquiry of great practical importance, since from the operation of the same causes, should they ever be permitted to exert their withering influence, the same melancholy catastrophe may be anticipated.

* Rev. J. Barker. "Life Letters to and from Dr. Doddridge," edited by Rev. Thomas Stedman, 1790, p. 96.
† Letters to and from Dr. Doddridge, p. 84.

This defection from the doctrine and practice of genuine Christianity, may be traced to the combined influence of external and internal causes. The political events of that age were most remarkable. A bloodless revolution had recently taken place, the consequences of which were such as could not fail to attract and almost absorb public attention. One dynasty of British princes had forfeited the crown, by arbitrary usurpations, and the most determined efforts to subvert the Protestant faith. Another had succeeded, under whose auspices civil and religious liberty had revived, the breaches which had been made in the constitution by the House of Stuart were repaired, and the political rights of the community secured by new legislative enactments. But so great political changes could not be effected without much internal agitation. Two great parties were formed, one of which adhered to the old regime, and espoused the cause of the exiled family; the other was zealously attached to the new order of things, and the House of Orange. These party feelings and principles proved injurious to the interests of religion. The children and descendants of those who had suffered persecution for conscience' sake, now began to pant after worldly honours and distinctions, they became secularized in their views and habits, till, amidst the strife of ambition, their religious principles were gradually undermined, and at length destroyed. There is assuredly no reason why the patriot should be merged in the Christian, nor is an intense solicitude for the welfare of our country incompatible with a high tone of fervent piety: but experience and observation abundantly prove, that in proportion as Christians degenerate into violent political partisans, they become cold and negligent in their religious profession, if it be not finally abandoned. The result will be precisely that which Burnet so pathetically lamented in his day. "Politics and party," says he, "eat out among us not only study and learning, but that which is the only thing that is more valuable, a true sense of religion; with a sincere zeal for advancing that for which the Son of God both lived and died, and to which those who are received into holy orders, have vowed to dedicate their lives and labours." Still more pernicious was the influence of the literature of that age, if the term may be so desecrated, as to apply it to the infamous productions which then disgraced the public press. It is unnecessary to advert particularly to the profligate character and licentious writings of many of the celebrated wits and men of letters, who flourished towards the close of the seventeenth century; suffice it to say, that while they may be admitted to have improved our language, and are monuments of the genius and talents of their authors, they sapped the foundation of morals, and spread around them a deadly contagion, the effects of which are felt to the present day. In proportion as these works acquired a standard reputation, were extensively circulated and generally admired, they exerted a most malignant influence on the entire mass of society, but especially on the younger and more educated classes. To these may be added, a third and no less pestilential agency, — the infidel writings of that day, some of which were decorated with all the graces of eloquence; others were rendered fascinating by the wit and ridicule with which they assailed the Christian revelation, and others imposed on the ignorant and unwary, by the show of learning and critical erudition, with which they were invested. Not a few were induced by the perusal of those insidious writings, if not openly to embrace the cause of infidelity, yet to rest satisfied with a cold, speculative, semi-deistical form of Christianity.

But there were other and perhaps still more pernicious agencies at work within the bosom of the Christian church. While persecution raged, the company of the faithful were comparatively united, that they might combat more successfully the common foe. Agreeing, for the most part, in the vital and essential truths of their holy religion, they consented to merge their lesser differences, and exercise charity towards each other. But when freed from the galling yoke of the oppressor, they began to strive about terms of human invention, modes of worship, and forms of church discipline, and on these grounds alone, formed themselves into numerous sects and parties, which could hold no fellowship with each other. These unhappy divisions generated a controversial spirit, characterized by rancorous asperity, in proportion as the grounds of separation were trifling and unimportant. To "hold fast the form of sound words which we have received" by inspiration from God, is unquestionably a Christian duty; and to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints." But unless religious controversies be carried on, whether from the pulpit or the press, in the spirit of meekness and love, under the hallowed influence of a truly Christian temper, it will be found that their effects are most injurious to the interests of vital and practical piety. The true Christian is uninstructed and unedified, the impenitent and ungodly remain still obdurate and hardened; and error, instead of being checked or eradicated, makes rapid progress, by obtaining more numerous converts. Such was manifestly the result of those unhappy divisions, and theological controversies, which disgraced the period to which the present Essay refers.

In connexion with the controversial spirit of the age, may be noticed, as an additional cause of religious declension, the withdrawment of the attention of the ablest and most learned Christian divines from the essentials of the gospel, to an elaborate vindication of its evidences, in their controversy then carried on with deists and infidels. Grateful as is the recollection, that the same age and country which produced a Shaftesbury and a Bolingbroke, two of the subtlest and most formidable opponents of Christianity, produced also a Butler and a Clarke, two of its mightiest and most successful advocates; yet an attentive review of the treatises written by these champions of the Christian revelation, and still more of the numerous treatises produced by minds of an inferior grade, will sufficiently show the injurious influence of the deistical controversy, even on the most learned and pious of that day. Exclusively occupied with a refutation of the cavils and objections of infidels, they lost sight of those great fundamental truths which constitute the glory of the Christian system, and substituted a speculative form of Christianity, little removed from infidelity itself, for the Scriptural faith of their forefathers, or rather of the apostles and primitive believers; whilst laboriously and zealously defending the outworks, the citadel was almost lost.

But the most fruitful source of the various evils which have been alluded to, was the degenerate character of the Christian ministry. Genuine piety, Scriptural knowledge, ardent zeal, were no longer deemed essential to the sacred office, and were ridiculed as puritanical and degrading. Multitudes pressed into the Christian ministry, who were utterly destitute of all those qualities which can give efficiency and true dignity to that office. That such was the character of the great mass of those who assumed the clerical office within the pale of the national church, appears from the passage already cited from "Burnet's Pastoral Care," to which many other similar testimonies might be added. And that the same charge applies, though perhaps in a less degree, to the Dissenting ministry of that day, is no less evident from the treatises enumerated above, in most, if not all, of which, the lamented decay of religion is attributed to the want of piety and zeal, in those who sustained the pastoral office. "The inquiry," says Neal, in his Free and Serious Remonstrance to Protestant Dissenting Ministers, "the inquiry I humbly beg leave to make is, whether the zeal and assiduity of ministers in general, in qualifying themselves for, and in administering, the ordinances of divine worship, are not considerably abated, as well as the people's piety and regularity in attending them? Whether there is not a lukewarmness, a careless or negligent, a light or worldly, spirit visible amongst those who should cherish the sacred fire of pure and heavenly devotion in the hearts of Christians? Whether the vigilance and circumspection, the concern and ardour, of ministers have arisen in proportion to the danger there confessedly is, that the cause of their great and worthy Master, which they have solemnly undertaken to serve and support, at any temporal pains and hazard, should decline and perish in their hands." (P. 7—9.) When the reciprocal influence of pastors and their people is duly considered, it will excite no surprise, that such lamentable consequences should have followed so degenerate a state of the Christian ministry.

The preceding sketch of ecclesiastical history has been introduced chiefly for the sake of elucidating the various works which compose the present volume. A knowledge of the facts which have been cursorily noticed, is necessary to a just estimate of the character and writings of Doddridge; who entered upon his public career, just when these evils were at their height, and the one great object of whose valuable life and labours appears to have been to counteract their baneful influence. In early youth, indeed, he had not wholly escaped the moral contagion of the times. It is evident, from some of his familiar letters, written, in all the confidence of private friendship, to those who shared his warmest affections, that at that period, while undergoing the process of preparatory education for the Christian ministry, his religious principles had not acquired that stability and decision which they subsequently attained; nor had that deep-toned and fervent piety taken full possession of his mind, which characterized his future life. From early associations, or educational prejudices, he had been led to identify orthodoxy of sentiment with an uncharitable and censorious spirit; and actuated by a just abhorrence of the latter, he stood aloof from the former, till convinced by observation and experience, that the alliance was rather accidental than necessary, arising out of human infirmity, and not originating in the system itself. By the vehemence and ardour of his social affections, too, he was betrayed into occasional habits of worldly conformity, which, though not uncommon in that degenerate age, are neither favourable to the growth of piety in the private Christian, nor consistent with the purity and dignity of the sacred office. But, happily, the friends of his youth, under whose patronage he was introduced into the Christian ministry, and whose counsels and example contributed in no ordinary degree to the formation of his character, were men of exemplary wisdom and piety; who, discerning in him indications of future eminence, watched over him with more than parental solicitude, affectionately warned him of the dangers into which he was likely, from the unguardedness of youth, or the peculiar susceptibility of his feelings, to be betrayed; and corrected the prejudices and errors into which he had fallen. Their efforts were amply rewarded, in perceiving the rapid progress of his religious character, to a maturity of growth, and luxuriance of fruitfulness, which far exceeded their most sanguine hopes. Ere he had proceeded far in his course as a Christian minister, his generous and susceptible mind was awakened to a full sense of the extent and magnitude of the evils which then afflicted and desolated the Christian church, and his determination fixed a resolution from which he never swerved, — to devote all the energies of his mind and body to persevering and unwearied efforts to produce a revival of true religion. This was henceforth the governing principle of his life, the supreme object of his heart's desire, to which all his labours, whether as a pastor, a tutor, or an author, were solemnly consecrated.

In pursuance of this truly philanthropic object, he began with himself, and his personal ministry. Anxious to produce in his own mind a more deep and abiding sense of the responsibilities of his office, he frequently drew up, and recorded in his diary, resolutions and covenant engagements, to which he solemnly subscribed his name, and by which he pledged himself to new and increased exertions. One series of these pastoral resolutions, evidently drawn up with more than ordinary attention, and intended to be a kind of sacred directory for his daily conduct, was transcribed by him in the first page of his interleaved Testament.

that he might be perpetually reminded thereby of his personal and social obligations. In accordance with these oft-repeated vows, he pursued his ministerial course with an ardour and earnestness, of which, in that day of religious apathy, there were but few examples. He adopted a style of preaching at once simple and energetic, impassioned but not declamatory, in which evangelical doctrine was happily blended with the practical enforcement of moral duties. The sermons preached on public occasions, and prepared by him for the press, are by no means to be regarded as the best specimens of his pastoral instructions. What they acquired in precision and accuracy by a careful revision, was lost in ease, and vigour, and genuine pathos. His ordinary sermons,* comparatively few of which have yet been published, furnish delightful specimens of genuine pulpit eloquence: they breathe the very soul of tenderness, and pastoral fidelity. In his selection of topics, he simply aimed at usefulness, and in discussing them, he invariably pursues an easy and natural method, remote from all affectation of singularity and artificial arrangement. There are no puerile attempts at display, no oratorical flourishes, no idle pomp of words, no laboured processes of reasoning, but they abound with earnest and pathetic appeals to the conscience, which the most ignorant might understand, and the most obdurate could scarcely resist. While he avoided the technicalities and tediousness of the puritan divines, it was evident that he drank deeply into their spirit, and most successfully imitated their earnestness and fidelity. Such being the character of his personal ministry, it is not surprising that his preaching should have been eminently successful. His own church and congregation flourished beneath his pastoral care. Wherever he preached, whether in the surrounding villages to the humble peasantry, or on public occasions to more intelligent assemblies, multitudes were attracted to hear, and numerous were the fruits of his ministry.†

These manifest tokens of the divine approbation served but to quicken his zeal, and prompted him to devise more liberal things. Aware that the solitary efforts of an individual can avail little towards effecting a general reformation, his next object was to stir up the members of his own church, and his brethren in the ministry, to increased fervour and activity. With this view, he drew up various plans of Christian benevolence, and engaged those who constituted his pastoral charge, to co-operate in the prosecution of those philanthropic projects; some of which related to the advancement of religion at home, and others to its propagation abroad. A document, illustrative of these remarks, still remains in MS., which is rendered extremely curious and interesting, by circumstances and events that have occurred in the present day.‡ In that paper, to which the name of Dr. Doddridge, and those of about 150 members of the congregation at Northampton, are appended, the parties subscribing pledge themselves to meet at stated periods to pray for the success of the gospel in heathen lands, and to contribute for the support of Christian missionaries; thus exhibiting a model of what was probably the first congregational Missionary Association in our own country, and the first avowedly Missionary Prayer-meeting. Could this great and good man have foreseen, that within fifty years from that time, almost every congregation in the British empire, the United States of America, and many other parts of the world, would be blest with similar associations, and that all denominations of Christians would be either unitedly or separately employed, in

* A small volume containing "The Leading Heads of Twenty-seven Sermons, preached at Northampton, by Dr. Doddridge, in the year 1749," was edited and published by the Rev. J. Hawkes, of Warley, near Halifax, Yorkshire, in 1818; and in 1826, were published four volumes more of brief heads transcribed from his MSS. in short hand, by Dr. Doddridge's direction, and left for publication after his decease. The copyright of these being as yet personal property, they cannot, of course, appear in the present edition of his works.

† An interesting statement as to Dr. Doddridge's manner in the Pulpit is contained in "Letters from the Rev. Mr. Job Orton, and the Rev. Sir James Stonehouse, Bart. M. D. to the Rev. Thomas Stedman, M. A. Vicar of St. Edward's, Shrewsbury," vol. iv. letter lx. p. 341.

‡ Vide infra, p. 498.

zealous efforts to propagate the gospel throughout the world, how would his enlarged soul have exulted in the delightful prospect, and he would have been ready to exclaim, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation!"

From this limited sphere of usefulness, the expansive benevolence of Doddridge extended itself in every direction. Deeply lamenting the disorganized and divided state of the Christian denomination to which he belonged, he applied himself to the development of plans, by which their minor differences might be healed, and their affections cemented together in the bonds of Christian charity. This prompted the following earnest appeal to his brethren, so appropriate to the state of the times, and so calculated to arouse them to a sense of their duty: "Let us therefore, who, under different denominations, are honoured with the ministry of the everlasting gospel, agree for a while to suspend our debates upon less necessary subjects, that we may, with united efforts, concur in prosecuting that great design for which the gospel was revealed, the Spirit given, and our office instituted. And since it is so evident, that irreligion has grown upon us, while we have been attending to other, and, to be sure, smaller matters, let us by a plain, serious, and zealous way of preaching the most vital truths of Christianity, joined with a diligent inspection of the souls committed to our care, try what can be done, towards preventing the progress of this growing apostasy, and recovering the ground we have already lost." At his suggestion, associations of ministers and churches were formed, both in the metropolis, and various parts of the kingdom, not merely for purposes of Christian fellowship, but also for zealous co-operation in measures tending to the revival and advancement of true religion. The detail of these wise and holy projects, emanating from a heart burning with zeal for God, and melting with compassion to the souls of men, will be found in a subsequent part of this volume.* They are now distinctly noticed, as affording a delightful indication of the entire devotedness of spirit, with which this exemplary Christian entered upon and pursued his arduous course; and as exhibiting to future ages a pattern of active unwearied zeal, which cannot be too closely imitated. An impulse was given at this period, which continues to operate with increased force on the whole Christian world.

It has been stated, that the absence or low degree of piety, in those who assumed the character and office of Christian ministers, was a fruitful source of the evils which then desolated the church of God. No one was more fully convinced of the extent, nor more deeply lamented the prevalence, of this evil, than the excellent Doddridge; and it was this conviction, that induced him the more readily to acquiesce in the wishes, and yield to the entreaties, of his numerous friends, that he would undertake the work of tuition. He hoped thereby to be instrumental in purifying those fountains, which had sent forth so many turbid and pestilential streams. Whatever may have been the measure of his success, though painfully disappointed in many of his hopes and expectations, it is evident from his correspondence with those friends, to whom he was accustomed to lay open his inmost soul, that his principal motive in undertaking so arduous and responsible an office, was that he might effectuate a reformation in the character of the Christian ministry of that age. In attempting this, he had to contend with many prejudices, he laboured under difficulties which now are scarcely felt, and perhaps his own views and feelings, as to the best mode of accomplishing his object, were in some degree mistaken. It seemed then to be hardly a recognized principle, that decided piety is an indispensable prerequisite to the sacred office. It was deemed by many sufficient to warrant the introduction of a youth into that office, that his disposition should be amiable, his habits virtuous, and his character hopeful. Nor was it the least injurious of the practical errors of that day, in connexion with academical instruction, that young men who were not intended for the ministry, who made no pretensions to personal religion, and of whom no test of piety could be required, were blended and amalgamated, in the process of education, with those who were solemnly devoted to the ministerial office. The influence of this unhallowed association was but too manifest, in sapping the foundations of religious belief and virtuous conduct, in many who had once inspired the liveliest hopes. Yet notwithstanding these counteracting circumstances, the instructions, the prayers, the counsels, and above all, the holy example, of this devoted servant of Christ, proved eminently successful. Not a few of those, whom he introduced into the ministry, evinced in future life, that they had imbibed the spirit of their distinguished tutor; and followed up, with similar if not equal zeal, his various plans of Christian benevolence. Nor can we wonder that such happy effects should have resulted from the instructions of one, who, according to the testimony of a competent witness, "frequently inculcated on his students the necessity of preaching Christ, if they desired to save souls; of dwelling much on the peculiarities of the gospel scheme, and the doctrines of Christ and the Spirit; of considering their own concern in them, and endeavouring to feel their energy on their own spirits, that they might appear to their hearers, as giving vent to the feeling of their heart on its darling subject." *

* Vide infra, p. 194.

It is not, however, with the personal or the official character of Doddridge, excellent as these may have been, and highly as they may deserve to be appreciated, we have so much to do at present, as with his various and valuable writings. Nor are these so much to be regarded as specimens of the genius, talents, and erudition of their author, as of his fervent and exalted piety. None who have read his earlier correspondence can doubt, that if he had chosen to direct the bent of his genius to works of imagination and taste, he could have rivalled some of the most sprightly wits of that polished age. Nor is it less evident, from his numerous MSS., that if he had preferred to employ the energies of his vigorous mind in philological and literary pursuits, he would have been no unworthy competitor of the Warburtons, the Lowths, and the Lardners, of that day. But his was a nobler aim. Usefulness, in the highest and most appropriate sense of the term; that usefulness which consists in promoting the spiritual and eternal welfare of mankind, was the chief, perhaps it is not too much to say, the exclusive, object of his ambition. For this he studied, and preached, and wrote, and was content, by exertions above measure, and far beyond his strength, to sacrifice his life. Though capable of enjoying, in a high degree, the productions of taste, or the developments of science, and though sincerely desirous of the advancement of literature in all its branches, he considered these but as secondary and subordinate objects; nor would he allow himself to pursue them further than might be rendered subservient to the great business of his life. Whether he published sermons, drew up biographical memoirs of departed friends, wrote academical lectures, practical treatises, or commentaries on the Scriptures, it was still apparent throughout, that not even for an instant could he lose sight of the object to which he had consecrated his existence, and which he was rendered eminently instrumental in promoting — the revival and increase of vital godliness.

The first acknowledged publication of Doddridge appeared in 1730; it was a tract entitled, "Free Thoughts on the most probable means of Reviving the Dissenting Interest," and was occasioned by a pamphlet of Strickland Gough, on the same subject, then recently published. That writer had attributed the decay of the Dissenting Interest to the defect of taste and learning, and mental cultivation, in its ministers; but our author maintains in his reply, that while these qualities are confessedly desirable and important, they would prove but ineffectual remedies to the existing evils, and contends that the preaching of evangelical doctrines, in a plain, Scriptural, and experimental manner, could alone preserve a congregation from religious decay, or revive it when languid and declining. Nothing could be more seasonable and appropriate to the state of the times, than this short but excellent publication. In 1732 he published a series of sermons, addressed to Christian parents, on "the Religious Education of their Children," and in 1735, a second series of "Sermons to Young Persons," in both of which, the tenderness and affection of the parent is happily blended with the fidelity and authority of the pastor. In 1736 his ten invaluable sermons were first published, on "the Power and Grace of Christ, and on the Evidences of his Glorious Gospel." In 1741 a series of "Practical Discourses on Regeneration" appeared, followed by two sermons on the "Scripture Doctrine of Salvation by Grace through Faith," besides several others, preached on special occasions. In 1742 he prefixed an interesting sketch of the "Life and Character of the Rev. Thomas Steffe," to a volume of posthumous discourses of his late excellent pupil; in which, while he yielded to the impulse of affection and friendship, he chiefly aimed at exhibiting a model of ministerial excellence to surviving pastors and students. It is scarcely possible to rise from the perusal of this brief but comprehensive memoir, without having the understanding enlightened, the judgment corrected, the affections quickened, and the heart improved.

* Orton's Life of Doddridge.

Never, perhaps, was there an individual less fitted to act the part of a polemic than Doddridge. His natural disposition, and his mental habits, alike concurred to render him averse from religious controversy; and these impressions were strengthened by the mischievous effects which had resulted, in his day, from theological contentions. Yet, when duty called him into the field, he was not backward to enter the lists, as a champion of the Christian faith. In 1743, he appeared, for the first and only time of his life in which he assumed that character, as a controversialist. A disguised infidel had published, in the preceding year, a pamphlet entitled, "Christianity not Founded on Argument," in which the anonymous author, under pretence of great zeal for religion, had insidiously endeavoured to undermine all the rational and Scriptural evidences, adduced by the advocates of the Christian faith, and contended that nothing could warrant a belief in Christianity, short of an immediate personal inspiration. In this treatise, a species of wild enthusiasm, which was but assumed as a mask for the purpose of concealing his real design, was strangely blended with the latent poison of infidelity. Dr. Doddridge, in three letters, which followed each other in quick succession, effectually unmasked this wily adversary, exposed the folly and absurdity of his positions, and vindicated the fundamental doctrine of the influence and agency of the Holy Spirit, as taught in the Sacred Scriptures, from the charge of enthusiasm. These letters furnish an admirable specimen of the spirit in which all religious controversy should be carried on, and the style of composition best calculated to produce conviction in sceptical minds, as well as to silence gainsayers.

In 1745, the inestimable treatise on the "Rise and Progress of Religion," was first published; a work which, if he had written no other, would have been amply sufficient to embalm the memory of its pious author, and transmit his name with distinguished honour to far distant generations. It was undertaken most reluctantly, at the earnest and oft-repeated solicitations of his illustrious friend and contemporary Dr. Watts; who, justly conceiving that such a treatise was much needed at that period, and that no man then living was so well fitted as Dr. Doddridge to execute the task, pressed it upon him with such affectionate earnestness, that he could no longer resist; and happy is it, both for the church and the world, that those solicitations were ultimately successful. This work is too well known to need any description, and to eulogize it in the present day would be indeed a work of supererogation. Suffice it to say, that it is written with beautiful simplicity; that many passages are exquisitely tender and pathetic; and that the whole train of reasonings and illustrations, commend themselves alike to the most intelligent and the most unlettered mind, to readers of taste and refinement, as well as to the uncultivated and ignorant. Scarcely is it possible to conceive of a work more calculated to awaken religious impressions and emotions in the most thoughtless bosom, or to deepen and render permanent those impressions when excited. Its character of usefulness is sufficiently attested, by the wide and almost unlimited circulation it has obtained, the high reputation it has acquired and preserved amongst all denominations of Christians, and above all, by the numerous instances in which it is known to have been the instrument of conversion and salvation. The fervent supplications poured forth by its devout author, for the blessing of the Most High on this work of his hands, recorded at the conclusion of the introductory chapter, have indeed been most signally answered, though to what extent it were now vain to conjecture. That great day in which the secrets of all hearts will be disclosed, and all the purposes of divine mercy towards our apostate race developed; that day alone can declare, to how many, of almost every nation under heaven, this excellent work shall have been the means of spiritual instruction, improvement, consolation, and salvation.

Whilst these various publications were issuing from the press, their indefatigable author was employed, amidst an incredible multitude of other important avocations, in collecting materials for his principal work, "The Family Expositor;" the first volume of which was published in 1745, the second and third, at intervals of about two years, and the last three, subsequently to his death. From an early period of his life and ministry, he had contemplated this excellent commentary on the New Testament, and all his literary researches had been directed to the prosecution of this great design. This work is partly critical, partly interpretive, and partly devotional and practical. In the two former of these departments of sacred literature, it occupies no mean place, but in the latter it stands unrivalled. As a critical digest, it has long since been superseded by other more erudite and elaborate compositions; yet many of the verbal criticisms it contains, are well deserving the attention of biblical scholars. But it is to be remembered, that the life of Doddridge was too fully occupied with active official duties, to admit of that patient research, which is necessary to form the complete critic. Nor should it be forgotten, that the science of biblical criticism was then in its infancy. Little had then been done, compared with the results of more recent times, in the collation of ancient MSS. and versions, or in the investigation of various readings; the canons of sacred criticism were not as yet fixed; nor had the most valuable of those philological works then appeared, which have since acquired a standard reputation, and with which our libraries are now enriched. Besides which, it is to be borne in mind, that the design of the author, in his philological notes, was not so much to furnish the learned reader, or even the theological student, with a repository of critical science, as to illustrate and justify his own interpretations of Scripture.

The "Paraphrase" and "Harmony," as well as the "New Version" of the sacred text, which this work contains, were evidently the result of much labour and study. Whatever opinion may be formed of their utility, none can doubt that they are the production of an enlightened and well furnished mind; nor can we forbear to admire the fidelity and reverence for Scripture, which prompted him so carefully to detach the language of the sacred writers from his own commentaries. This part of his plan, the execution of which must have cost him no ordinary pains, originated (as he has modestly and piously expressed it in the preface to his first volume) in a desire, "that every one might immediately see, not only the particular clause to which any explication answers, but also what are the words of the sacred original, and what merely the sense of a fallible man, who is liable, though in the integrity of his heart, to mislead his readers, and dares not attribute to himself the singular glory of having put off every prejudice, even while he would deliberately and knowingly allow none."

But the principal charm of this valuable performance, consists in its truly devotional character. The "Improvements" appended to each section, are written with a chaste simplicity, and sometimes an elegance of style, which must render them grateful to the most refined and cultivated understanding, and at the same time with an evangelical unction, that cannot fail to endear them to the pious and devout. The excellent author has contrived with consummate skill, and yet in an easy and natural manner, to embody in his practical reflections, all the thoughts and much of the language of the inspired writers; and has shown, that even the minutest portion is "profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness." The writer of these introductory pages can testify from long experience, and the frequent perusal of these instructive paragraphs, that the more familiar the mind becomes with their contents, the more is it impressed with their exquisite beauty and intrinsic worth.

It was the intention of Dr. Doddridge, if his valuable life had been prolonged, to pursue the same plan with reference to some, if not all, the books of the Old-Testament Scriptures. Amongst his numerous MSS. is found, one which contains a "New Version of the Minor Prophets," in the margin of which are written a few critical notes on the Hebrew text. From the title-page of this MS.* it appears, that some portions of the prophetical writings were to have been paraphrased, and practical "improvements" annexed; but these, as well as many other projects, both literary and religious, devised by this Christian philanthropist, for the good of posterity, were abruptly terminated by his death. It is deeply to be regretted, that the devotions of Christian families are not aided by a similar commentary on the Old-Testament Scriptures, proceeding from the same enlightened mind, and breathing the same spirit of fervent piety, which pervades the "Family Expositor."

The only additional work of Doddridge, published during his life, (if we except some occasional sermons, and a tract of singular excellence and utility, on "the Importance of Family Religion,") was his "Memoirs of Colonel Gardiner," which first appeared in 1747. This biographical sketch glows throughout with all the fervour of Christian friendship, and was evidently intended by the writer, to afford practical evidence, that a high tone of piety and devotion may be preserved amidst pursuits and engagements most unfavourable to their exercise. His academical "Lectures," and "Hymns," were posthumous publications. The former take a wide range, embrace a great variety of topics, and sufficiently indicate the unwearied labour and research of their author. If they were to be regarded as, in themselves, a sufficient directory to theological students, or as containing a complete system of academical instruction, it must be acknowledged, that they are extremely defective and inadequate. But such was not the intention of their author, nor were they employed by him for this purpose. He considered them rather as an outline or syllabus to be filled up by the diligence of the students from other sources, to which he was continually referred. Objections have been made, and not without reason, to the scholastic and technical form in which the materials are arranged,—the blending together in one series of lectures, and a connected train of propositions, metaphysics, ethics, and divinity,—the disproportionate attention given to the evidences of natural and revealed religion, compared with the narrow space allotted to the statement and vindication of Christian doctrines,—and the employment, for the most part, of abstract general reasonings, instead of making a constant and final appeal to the authority of Scripture. Yet it can scarcely be doubted, that some of these defects were remedied in the lecture-room, by the vivâ voce instructions of the tutor; and others would probably have been diminished,

* The following memoranda inserted in the title-page of this MS. are somewhat curious, as indicating the plan of the author, the time occupied by each portion of this unfinished work, and the precise date of its performance. "A New Translation of the Minor Prophets, with a short Paraphrase on those passages which seemed most to require it, divided into proper sections, with a Practical Improvement of each, for the use of Families, and with large contents to each. Began Hosea Oct. 1, 1750. Joel, Oct. 29. Amos, Nov. 9. Obadiah, Dec. 3. Jonah, Dec. 7. Micah, Dec. 20. Nahum, Jan. 7. Habakkuk, Jan. 22. Zephaniah, March 8. Haggai, March 25. Zechariah, April 1. Malachi, May 14. The whole ended June 5, 1751."

if not removed, had the publication issued from the press while the author was yet living, and been subjected to his final revision.

The "Lectures on Preaching, and the several branches of the Ministerial Office," long remained in MS. though they are among the most valuable and useful of our author's compositions. They were left in an unfinished state, as is evident from the broken character of the sentences and paragraphs, and the abrupt transitions made from one subject to another; but they are full of practical wisdom, and, making due allowance for the altered condition of the Dissenting churches, the young pastor can scarcely follow a better guide in the discharge of his official duties. The didactic instructions contained in this short but comprehensive course, illustrated and exemplified as they are by the life and labours of their distinguished author, well deserve the frequent and serious perusal of all candidates for the sacred office.

Having thus cursorily noticed the principal works of this eminent divine, in their chronological order, it only remains in concluding these prefatory remarks, to glance for a moment at the happy change which has taken place in the religious condition of our country, since the date of their first publication; and to which they may unquestionably be considered as having in some degree contributed. It is not indeed asserted, nor is it the intention of the writer to intimate, that these are the only, or even the principal, cause of the happier state of things that now exists. Many circumstances have concurred to give an impulse to public opinion and feeling in modern times, which could scarcely have been anticipated, or hoped for, in the time of Watts and Doddridge, and still less in that of their illustrious predecessor. Yet the increased attention given in the present day to the theological and practical writings of the 17th century, and to those of a similar class and character of yet later date, may be enumerated among the favourable signs of the times, and affords a gratifying pledge that yet brighter and more prosperous days await the church of God. Instead of the general decay of vital religion, which awakened the sympathies and aroused the energies of Doddridge and his pious coadjutors, it is our happiness to have witnessed some symptoms of revival and increase, —symptoms which are not confined to one party or denomination of professing Christians alone, but which may be discerned, in a greater or less degree, in every section of the Christian church. Instead of the indifference to truth, or the widely-spread errors and heresies, which then depopulated and wasted the religious societies of our land, it is grateful now to observe the prevalence and almost universal triumph of evangelical truth. In place of the rancorous spirit of discord and division, that afflicted and grieved the susceptible mind of Doddridge, and others, who, like him, ardently prayed and longed for the peace and prosperity of Zion, it may be hoped, that now all sincere believers are approximating towards a state of catholic union, and breathing more of the spirit of peace and love, than at any former period since the apostolic age. And finally, instead of the isolated, the divided efforts to propagate the gospel, in Christian and heathen lands, to which Doddridge assiduously endeavoured to stimulate his brethren and fellow Christians, and which he deemed himself happy in being the instrument of accomplishing, though in a limited degree; it is our felicity to live in a period and country, in which efforts are making upon an enlarged scale, and with the combined energies of the whole Christian world, to communicate the volume of inspiration, and impart the blessings of the gospel, to the entire family of man. Other men have laboured, amidst a thousand discouragements and difficulties, of which we, who live in more favoured times, can scarcely form a conception, and it is ours to have entered into their labours. We are permitted to reap the fruits of the fervent and unceasing supplications of the pious and devout of former ages. May our zeal and diligence be proportionate to our increased obligations and privileges: so will the holy anticipations of this devoted servant of Christ be abundantly realized, and the joy of his beatified spirit increased by the developments of future years and ages.

CONTENTS.

THE RISE AND PROGRESS OF RELIGION IN THE SOUL.

Page

DEDICATION iii
PREFACE v

CHAP. I. The Introduction to the Work, with some general account of its design . . . 7
II. The careless sinner awakened . . . 11
III. The awakened sinner urged to immediate consideration, and cautioned against delay . 14
IV. The sinner arraigned and convicted . . 17
V. The sinner stripped of his vain pleas . . 21
VI. The sinner sentenced 25
VII. The helpless state of the sinner under condemnation 28
VIII. News of salvation by Christ brought to the convinced and condemned sinner 30
IX. A more particular account of the way by which this salvation is to be obtained . . . 33
X. The sinner seriously urged and entreated to accept of salvation in this way 36
XI. A solemn Address to those who will not be persuaded to fall in with the design of the gospel 39
XII. An Address to a soul so overwhelmed with a sense of the greatness of its sins, that it dares not apply itself to Christ with any hope of salvation 44
XIII. The doubting soul more particularly assisted in its inquiries as to the sincerity of its faith and repentance 47
XIV. A more particular view of the several branches of the Christian temper; by which the reader may be further assisted in judging what he is, and what he should endeavour to be . . 49
XV. The reader reminded how much he needs the assistance of the Spirit of God, to form him to the temper described above, and what encouragement he has to expect it 55
XVI. The Christian convert warned of, and animated against, those discouragements which he must expect to meet with, when entering on a religious course 57
XVII. The Christian urged to, and assisted in, an express act of self-dedication to the service of God 60
XVIII. Of entering into Church-communion by an attendance upon the Lord's Supper . . . 63
XIX. Some more particular Directions for maintaining continual communion with God, or being in his fear all the day long 66
XX. A serious persuasive to such a method of spending our days, as is represented in the former chapter 72
XXI. A caution against various temptations, by which the young convert may be drawn aside from the course recommended above . . . 76
XXII. The case of spiritual decay, and languor in religion 79
XXIII. The sad case of a relapse into known and deliberate sin, after solemn acts of dedication to God, and some progress made in religion . . 83
XXIV. The case of the Christian under the hidings of God's face 87

CHAP. Page

XXV. The Christian struggling under great and heavy afflictions 92
XXVI. The Christian assisted in examining into his growth in grace 98
XXVII. The advanced Christian reminded of the mercies of God, and exhorted to the exercises of habitual love to him, and joy in him . . . 98
XXVIII. The established Christian urged to exert himself for purposes of usefulness 102
XXIX. The Christian rejoicing in the views of death and judgment 106
XXX. The Christian honouring God by his dying behaviour 110

A Plain and Serious Address to the Master of a Family, on the important subject of Family Religion 117
Postscript—Prayers for a Family 126
Life of Colonel Gardiner 131
Appendix I. Relating to the Colonel's person . . 178
II. Poetical Pieces on his death . . . . ib.
III. Remarkable Particulars concerning the Mourns 179
Some Account of the Life and Character of the Rev. Mr. T. Stelle 185

A COURSE OF LECTURES ON PNEUMATOLOGY, ETHICS, AND DIVINITY.

Advertisement, by the first Editor 215
Preface, to the third Edition 216
Introduction 217
PART I. Of the Powers and Faculties of the Human Mind, and the Instinct of Brutes 219
II. Of the Being of a God, and his Natural Perfections 234
III. Of the Nature of Moral Virtue in general, and the Moral Attributes of God; of the several Branches of Virtue, and the Nature of Civil Government 250
IV. Of the Immortality and Immateriality of the Soul; its Original, the general obligation to Virtue; and the State of it in the World . 318
V. Of the Reason to expect and desire a Revelation; and the Internal and External Evidence with which we may suppose it should be attended . 342
VI. The Genuineness and Credibility of the Old and New Testament vindicated 346
VII. An Account of the Scripture Doctrine relating to the Existence and Nature of God, and the Divinity of the Son and Spirit 420
VIII. Of the Fall of Human Nature; and our Recovery by the Mediatorial Undertaking of our Lord Jesus Christ 435
IX. A Survey of the chief Duties required in the Gospel, and more particularly of the Positive Institutions; in which the Doctrine of the Christian Sabbath, the Sacraments, and the Constitution of the Church are particularly considered 468
X. The Scripture Doctrine of good and bad Angels, and of a Future State, including the Doctrine of the Resurrection, with the most remarkable events to precede and attend it . . . 500

Page

Appendix I. 514
II. 537
Catalogue of the Authors mentioned in this Work . 10

SETS OF SERMONS.

On the Religious Education of Children . 545
Serm. I. 549
II. 556
III. 564
IV. 569
To Young Persons . 577
Serm. V. The Importance of the Rising Generation 578
VI. Christ formed in the Soul, the only Foundation of Hope for Eternity 586
VII. A Dissuasive from keeping bad Company . 594
VIII. Religious Youth invited to early Communion . 602
IX. The Orphan's Hope 610
X. The Reflections of a pious Parent on the Death of a wicked Child, considered and improved . 617
XI. Youth reminded of approaching Judgment . 624
On the Power and Grace of Christ, and Evidences of Christianity 632
Ser. XII. The Ability of Christ to save to the Uttermost 633
XIII. The Proofs of Christ's Ability to save . . 639
XIV. Christ's Saving Power argued from his Intercession 645
XV. Coming to God by Christ, the Character of those that shall be saved 651
XVI. An Exhortation to Sinners to come unto God by Christ 656
XVII. The tenderness of Christ to the Lambs of his Flock 661
XVIII. Proofs of Christ's tenderness, and the improvement we should make of it 668
XIX. The Evidences of Christianity briefly stated, and the New Testament proved to be genuine . 673
XX. The Evidences of Christianity deduced from the New Testament allowed to be genuine . 682
XXI. Additional Evidences of Christianity, and Reflections on the whole 689
On Regeneration 697
Ser. XXII. The Character of the Unregenerate . . 701
XXIII. Of the Nature of Regeneration, and particularly of the Change it produces in Men's Apprehensions 708
XXIV. Of the Nature of Regeneration, with respect to the change it produces in Men's Affections, Resolutions, Labours, Enjoyments, and Hopes 714
XXV. The Necessity of Regeneration argued, from the immutable Constitution of God . . 721
XXVI. Of the incapacity of an Unregenerate Person for relishing the enjoyments of the heavenly World 729
XXVII. Of the Importance of entering into the Kingdom of God 736
XXVIII. Of the Necessity of Divine Influences to produce Regeneration in the Soul 743
XXIX. Of the various Methods of the Divine Operation in the Production of this Saving Change . 751
XXX. Directions to Awakened Sinners . . . 760
XXXI. An Address to the Regenerate, founded on the preceding Discourses 766

SINGLE SERMONS, AND DISCOURSES ON PARTICULAR OCCASIONS.

PRACTICAL SERMONS.

Serm. I. The Care of the Soul, the one Thing Needful 775
II. & III. The Scripture Doctrine of Salvation by Grace through Faith 782, 790

LECTURES ON PREACHING.

Page

Serm. IV. Christ's Invitation to Thirsty Souls 796
V. The Guilt and Death of Uncleanness seriously recommended to the Consideration of the Inhabitants of London 806

FUNERAL SERMONS.

Serm. VI. Submission to Divine Providence in the Death of Children, recommended and enforced 815
VII. On the Death of the Rev. Mr. Norris . . 827
VIII. On the Death of the Rev. Mr. Shepherd . 836
IX. On the Death of Colonel Gardiner . . 841
X. On the Death of the Rev. Dr. Clark . . 850

ORDINATION SERMONS.

Serm. XI. The Temper and Conduct of the Primitive Ministers of the Gospel 860
A Charge delivered at the Ordination of Mr. John Jennings 869
A Charge delivered at the Ordination of Mr Abraham Tozer 876
An Appendix relating to the Method of Ordination among the Dissenters . . . 883
XII. Christian Candour and Unanimity stated, illustrated, and urged 886
XIII. The Evil and Danger of Neglecting the Souls of Men 894

OCCASIONAL SERMONS.

Serm. XIV. On Account of the Fire at Wellingborough . 909
XV. Compassion to the Sick recommended and urged 918
XVI. The Necessity of a general Reformation in order to obtain success in War . . 930
XVII. On Account of the Peace concluded with France and Spain 941
XVIII. Thanksgiving Sermon, Preached on Account of the precipitate flight of the Rebels from Stirling 949
XIX. The Absurdity and Iniquity of Persecution for Conscience sake 958

Hymns founded on various texts of the Holy Scriptures . 973
The Principles of the Christian Religion expressed in plain and easy verse 1089

TRACTS, &c

TWO DISSERTATIONS, VIZ

No. I. On Sir Isaac Newton's Scheme for reducing the several Histories contained in the Evangelists to their proper order 1089
No. II. On the Inspiration of the New Testament, as proved from the facts recorded in the Historical Books of it . 1095
Postscript to the above, containing a Sketch of the Arguments by which the Inspiration of the Old Testament may be proved in the easiest Method, and by the most solid and convincing Evidence 1107
Free Thoughts on the most probable means of reviving the Dissenting Interest, occasioned by an Inquiry into the Causes of its Decay; addressed to the Author of that Inquiry 1110
A Friendly Letter to the Private Soldiers in a Regiment of Foot 1128

THREE LETTERS TO THE AUTHOR OF A PAMPHLET, ENTITLED "CHRISTIANITY NOT FOUNDED ON ARGUMENT."

Letter I. 1132
II. 1141
III. 1150
Letters 1161
Rev. Job Orton's Sermon on Dr. Doddridge's Death 1208

THE

RISE AND PROGRESS

OF

RELIGION IN THE SOUL;

ILLUSTRATED IN A COURSE OF SERIOUS AND PRACTICAL ADDRESSES,

SUITED TO

PERSONS OF EVERY CHARACTER AND CIRCUMSTANCE:

WITH A

DEVOUT MEDITATION OR PRAYER ADDED TO EACH CHAPTER.

Qua feret hic gressum, fontem dabit arida vallis,
Inque cavas fossas depluet agmen aquæ;
Instaurabit vires et Numinis ora
Visurus Solymæ figet in æde pedem.

JOHNST. PSAL. lxxxiv. 7, 8.

Testifying—Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ.—ACTS xx. 21.

Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom: that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus.—COL. i. 28.

DEDICATION.

TO THE REVEREND DR. ISAAC WATTS.

Reverend and Dear Sir,

With the most affectionate gratitude and respect, I beg leave to present to you a book, which owes its existence to your request, its copiousness to your plan, and much of its perspicuity to your review, and to the use I made of your remarks on that part of it which your health and leisure would permit you to examine. I address it to you, not to beg your patronage to it, for of that I am already well assured; and much less from any ambition of attempting your character, for which, if I were more equal to the subject, I should think this a very improper place: but chiefly from a secret delight which I find in the thought of being known to those whom this may reach, as one whom you have honoured, not only with your friendship, but with so much of your esteem and approbation too, as must substantially appear in your committing a work to me, which you had yourself projected as one of the most considerable services of your life.

I have long thought the love of popular applause a meanness, which a philosophy far inferior to that of our divine Master might have taught us to conquer. But to be esteemed by eminently great and good men, to whom we are intimately known, appears to me not only one of the most solid attestations of some real worth, but, next to the approbation of God and our own consciences, one of its most valuable rewards. It will, I doubt not, be found so in that world, to which spirits like yours are tending, and for which, through divine grace, you have obtained so uncommon a degree of ripeness. And permit me, Sir, while I write this, to refresh myself with the hope that when that union of hearts, which has so long subsisted between us, shall arrive to its full maturity and endearment there, it will be matter of mutual delight to recollect, that you have assigned me, and that I have in some degree executed, a task, which may perhaps, under the blessing of God, awaken and improve religious sentiments in the minds of those whom we leave behind us, and of others who may arise after us in this vain, transitory, insnaring world.

Such is the improvement you have made of your capacities for service, that I am fully persuaded heaven has received very few, in these latter ages, who have done so much to serve its interests here below: few, who have laboured in this best of causes with equal assiduity, and equal success. And therefore I cannot but join with all who wish well to the Christian interest among us, in acknowledging the goodness of Providence to you and to the church of Christ, in prolonging a life at once so valuable and so tender, to such an advanced period. With them, Sir, I rejoice that God hath given you to possess in so extraordinary a degree, not only the consciousness of intending great benefit to the world, but the satisfaction of having effected it, and of seeing such a harvest already springing up, I hope as an earnest of a much more copious increase from thence. With multitudes more I bless God that you are not, in this evening of so afflicted and yet so laborious a day, rendered entirely incapable of serving the public from the press, and from the pulpit; and that amidst the pain which your active spirit feels, when these pleasing services suffer long interruptions from bodily weakness, it may be so singularly refreshed by reflecting on that sphere of extensive usefulness in which by your writings you continually move.

I congratulate you, dear Sir, that while you are, in a multitude of families and schools of the lower class, condescending to the humble, yet important, work of forming infant minds to the first rudiments of religious knowledge and devout impressions, by your various Catechisms and Divine Songs, you are also daily reading lectures on Logic, and other useful branches of philosophy, to studious youth. And this, not only in private academies, but in the most public and celebrated seats of learning, not merely in Scotland, and in our American colonies, (where, from some peculiar considerations, it might most naturally be expected,) but, through the amiable candour of some excellent men and accomplished tutors, in our English universities too. I congratulate you, that you are teaching, no doubt, hundreds of ministers, and thousands of private Christians, by your sermons, and other theological writings, so happily calculated to diffuse through their minds that light of knowledge, and through their hearts that fervour of piety, which God has been pleased to enkindle in your own. But above all, I congratulate you, that by your sacred poetry, especially by your Psalms, and your Hymns, you are leading the worship, and I trust also animating the devotions of myriads, in our public assemblies, every sabbath, and in their families or closets every day. This, Sir, at least so far as it relates to the service of the sanctuary, is an unparalleled favour, by which God hath been pleased to distinguish you, I may boldly say it, beyond any of his servants now upon earth. Well may it be esteemed a glorious equivalent, and indeed much more than an equivalent, for all those views of ecclesiastical preferment, to which such talents, learning, virtues, and interest might have entitled you in an establishment; and I doubt not, but you joyfully accept it as such.

Nor is it easy to conceive in what circumstances you could, on any supposition, have been easier and happier, than in that pious and truly honourable family, in which, as I verily believe, in special indulgence both to you and to it, Providence has been pleased to appoint that you should spend so considerable a part of your life. It is my earnest prayer, that all the remainder of it may be serene, useful, and pleasant. And as, to my certain knowledge, your compositions have been the singular comfort of many excellent Christians (some of them numbered among my dearest friends) on their dying bed; for I have heard stanzas of them repeated from the lips of several, who were doubtless in a few hours to begin the Song of Moses and the Lamb: so I hope and trust, that when God shall call you to that salvation, for which your faith and patience have so long been waiting, he will shed around you the choicest beams of his favour, and gladden your heart with consolations, like those which you have been the happy instrument of administering to others.

In the mean time, Sir, be assured, that I am not a little animated in the various labours to which Providence has called me, by reflecting that I have such a contemporary, and especially such a friend, whose single presence would be to me as that of a cloud of witnesses here below, to awaken my alacrity in the race that is set before me. And I am persuaded, that while I say this, I speak the sentiment of many of my brethren, even of various denominations: a consideration, which I hope will do something towards reconciling a heart so generous as yours, to the delay of that exceeding and eternal weight of glory which is now so nearly approaching. Yes, my honoured friend, you will, I hope, cheerfully endure a little longer continuance in life amidst all its infirmities; from an assurance, that while God is pleased to maintain the exercise of your reason, it is hardly possible that you should live in vain to the world or yourself. Every day, and every trial, is brightening your crown, and rendering you still more meet for an inheritance among the saints in light. Every word that you drop from the pulpit has now surely its peculiar weight; the eyes of many are on their ascending prophet, eagerly intent that they may catch, if not his mantle, at least some divine sentence from his lips, which may long guide their ways and warm their hearts. This solicitude your friends bring into those happy moments, in which they are favoured with your converse in private, and when you are retired from them, your prayers, I doubt not, largely contribute towards guarding your country, watering the church, and blessing the world. Long may they continue to answer these great ends! and permit me, Sir, to conclude, with expressing my cheerful confidence, that in those best moments you are often particularly mindful of one, who so highly esteems, so greatly needs, and so warmly returns, that remembrance, as,

Reverend and dear Sir,

Your most affectionate brother,

And obliged humble servant,

P. DODDRIDGE.

Northampton, Dec. 13, 1744.

PREFACE.

The several hints given in the Dedication and the first chapter of this treatise, which contains a particular plan of the design, render it unnecessary to introduce it with a long preface. Some of my readers may perhaps remember that several years ago I promised this work to the public, in the preface to the second edition of my sermons on the power and grace of Christ, &c. My much honoured friend, Dr. Watts, had laid the scheme, especially of the former part. But as those indispositions with which (to the unspeakable grief of the churches) God has been pleased to exercise him, had forbid his hopes of being able to add this to his many labours of love to immortal souls, he was pleased in a very affectionate and importunate manner to urge me to undertake it. And I bless God with my whole heart, not only that he hath carried me through this delightful task, (for such indeed I have found it,) but also that he hath spared that worthy and amiable person to see it accomplished, and given him strength and spirit to review so considerable a part of it. His approbation expressed in stronger terms than modesty will permit me to repeat, encourages me to hope that it is executed in such a manner, as may, by the divine blessing, render it of some general service. And I the rather expect it will be so, as it now comes abroad into the world, not only with my own prayers, and his, but also with those of many other pious friends; which I have been particularly careful to engage for its success.

Into whatever hands this work may come, I must desire, that before any pass their judgment upon it, they would please to read it through; that they may discern the connexion between one part of it and another. Which I the rather request, because I have long observed, that Christians of different parties have been eagerly laying hold on particular parts of the system of divine truths, and have been contending about them as if each had been all; or as if the separation of the members from each other, and from the head, were the preservation of the body, instead of its destruction. They have been zealous to espouse the defence, and to maintain the honour and usefulness, of each apart; whereas their honour, as well as usefulness, seems to me to lie much in their connexion: and suspicions have often arisen betwixt the respective defenders of each, which have appeared as unreasonable and absurd, as if all the preparations for securing one part of a ship in a storm were to be censured as a contrivance to sink the rest. I pray God to give to all his ministers and people more and more of the spirit of wisdom, and of love, and of a sound mind; and to remove far from us those mutual jealousies and animosities, which hinder our acting with that unanimity, which is necessary in order to the successful carrying on our common warfare against the enemies of Christianity. We may be sure, these enemies will never fail to make their own advantage of our multiplied divisions, and severe contests with each other; but they must necessarily lose both their ground and their influence, in proportion to the degree in which the energy of Christian principles is felt, to unite and transform the hearts of those by whom they are professed.

I take this opportunity of adding, that as this treatise may be looked upon as the sequel of my Sermons on Regeneration, though in something of a different method; a second edition of those Sermons is now published (in compliance with the request of my friends) in the same form and size with this book. I have been solicitous to make them both as cheap as possible, that I may fall in with the charitable designs of those who may purpose to give them away. There is however an edition of this treatise in octavo, for such as rather choose to have it in a larger character and fairer form.

I have studied the greatest plainness of speech, that the lowest of my readers may, if possible, be able to understand every word; and I hope persons of a more elegant taste and refined education, will pardon what appeared to me so necessary a piece of charity. Such a care in practical writings seems one important instance of that honouring all men, which our amiable and condescending religion teaches us: and I have been particularly obliged to my worthy patron for what he hath done to shorten some of the sentences, and to put my meaning into plainer and more familiar words. Yet I dare say, the world will not suspect it of having contracted any impropriety or inelegance of language, by passing through the hands of Dr. Watts.

I must add one remark here, which I heartily wish I had not omitted in the first edition, viz. that though I do in this book consider my reader as successively in a great variety of supposed circumstances, beginning with those of a thoughtless sinner, and leading him through several stages of conviction, terror, &c. as what may be previous to his sincerely accepting the gospel, and devoting himself to the service of God; yet I would by no means be thought to insinuate, that every one who is brought to that happy resolution, arrives at it through those particular steps, or feels agitations of mind equal in degree to those I have described. Some sense of sin, and some serious and humbling apprehension of our danger and misery in consequence of it, must indeed be necessary, to dispose us to receive the grace of the gospel, and the Saviour who is there exhibited to our faith. But God is pleased sometimes to begin the work of his grace on the heart almost from the first dawning of reason, and to carry it on by such gentle and insensible degrees, that very excellent persons, who have made the most eminent attainments in the divine life, have been unable to recount any remarkable history of their conversion. And so far as I can learn, this is most frequently the case with those of them who have enjoyed the benefit of a pious education, when it has not been succeeded by a vicious and licentious youth. God forbid, therefore, that any such should be so insensible of their own happiness, as to fall into perplexity with relation to their spiritual state, for want of being able to trace such a rise of religion in their minds, as it was necessary on my plan for me to describe and exemplify here. I have spoken my sentiments on this head so fully in the eighth of my Sermons on Regeneration, that I think none who has read and remembers the general contents of it, can be in danger of mistaking my meaning here. But as it is very possible this book may fall into the hands of many who have not read the other, and have no opportunity of consulting it, I thought it proper to insert this caution in the preface to this, and I am much obliged to that worthy and excellent person, who kindly reminded me of the expediency of doing it.

I conclude with desiring my friends to forgive the necessary interruption which this work has given to the third volume of my Family Expositor, which I am now sending to the press as fast as I can, and hope to publish it in less than a year. To this volume I have referred several additional notes, and the indexes, which are necessary to render the former volumes complete; having determined to add nothing to the second edition which should depreciate the former. I do not think it necessary to trouble my friends with a new subscription; taking it for granted, that few who were pleased with the other part of the work, will fail of perfecting the set of the historical books of the New Testament.—When my exposition on the epistolary part may be completed, God only knows. I will proceed in it as fast as the other duties of my station will permit; and I earnestly beg, that if my readers find edification and advantage by any of my writings, they would in return offer a prayer for me, that God may carry me on, in that most important labour of my pen, under the remarkable tokens of his guidance and blessing.

THE

RISE AND PROGRESS

OF

RELIGION IN THE SOUL.

CHAPTER I.

The Introduction to the Work, with some general account of its design.

That true religion is very rare, appears from comparing the nature of it with the lives and characters of men around us, § 1, 2. The want of it, matter of just lamentation, § 3. To remedy this evil, is the design of the ensuing treatise, § 4. To which therefore the author earnestly bespeaks the attention of the reader, as his own heart is deeply interested in it, § 5, 6. A general plan of the work; of which the fifteen first chapters relate chiefly to the rise of religion, and the remaining chapters to its progress, § 7–12. The chapter concludes with a prayer for the success of the work.

§ 1. When we look round about us with an attentive eye, and consider the characters and pursuits of men, we plainly see, that though, in the original constitution of their natures, they only, of all the creatures that dwell on the face of the earth, be capable of religion, yet many of them shamefully neglect it. And whatever different notions people may entertain of what they call religion, all must agree in owning, that it is very far from being an universal thing.

§ 2. Religion, in its most general view, is such a sense of God on the soul, and such a conviction of our obligations to him, and our dependence upon him, as shall engage us to make it our great care to conduct ourselves in a manner which we have reason to believe will be pleasing to him. Now when we have given this plain account of religion, it is by no means necessary that we should search among the savages of the African or American nations, to find instances of those who are strangers to it. When we view the conduct of the generality of people at home, in a Christian and protestant nation, in a nation whose obligations to God have been singular, almost beyond those of any other people under heaven, will any one presume to say that religion has an universal reign among us? Will any one suppose that it prevails in every life? that it reigns in every heart? Alas, the avowed infidelity, the profanation of the name and day of God, the drunkenness, the lewdness, the injustice, the falsehood, the pride, the prodigality, the base selfishness, and stupid insensibility of the spiritual and eternal interests of themselves and others, which so generally appear among us, loudly proclaim the contrary. So that one would imagine upon this view, that thousands and ten thousands thought the neglect, and even the contempt, of religion were a glory, rather than a reproach. And where is the neighbourhood, where is the society, where is the happy family, (consisting of any considerable number,) in which, on a more exact examination, we find reason to say, "Religion fills even this little circle?" There is perhaps a freedom from any gross and scandalous immoralities, an external decency of behaviour, an attendance on the outward forms of worship in public, and (here and there) in the family; yet, amidst all this, there is nothing which looks like the genuine actions of the spiritual and divine life. There is no appearance of love to God, no reverence for his presence, no desire of his favours as the highest good: there is no cordial belief of the gospel of salvation; no eager solicitude to escape that condemnation which we have incurred by sin; no hearty concern to secure that eternal life, which Christ has purchased and secured for his people, and which he freely promises to all who will receive him. Alas! whatever the love of a friend, or even a parent, can do; whatever inclination there may be, to hope all things, and believe all things the most favourable; evidence to the contrary will force itself upon the mind, and extort the unwilling conclusion, that, whatever else may be amiable in this dear friend, in that favourite child, "Religion dwells not in its breast."

§ 3. To a heart that firmly believes the gospel, and views persons and things in the light of eternity, this is one of the most mournful considerations in the world. And indeed, to such a one, all other calamities and evils of human nature appear trifles, when compared with this: the absence of real religion, and that contrariety to it which reigns in so many thousands of mankind. Let this be cured, and all the other evils will easily be borne; nay, good will be extracted out of them. But if this continue, it bringeth forth fruit unto death; and in consequence of it, multitudes, who share the entertainments of an indulgent providence with us, and are at least allied to us by the bond of the same common nature, must in a few years be swept away into utter destruction, and be plunged, beyond redemption, into everlasting burnings.

§ 4. I doubt not but there are many, under those various forms of religious profession which have so unhappily divided us in this nation, who are not only lamenting this in public, if their office in life calls them to an opportunity of doing it; but are likewise mourning before God in secret, under a sense of this sad state of things; and who can appeal to him that searches all hearts, as to the sincerity of their desires to revive the languishing cause of vital Christianity and substantial piety. And, among the rest, the author of this treatise may with confidence say, it is this which animates him to the present attempt, in the midst of so many other cares and labours. For this he is willing to lay aside many of those curious amusements in science which might suit his own private taste, and perhaps open a way for some reputation in the learned world. For this he is willing to save the laboured ornaments of speech, that he may, if possible, descend to the capacity of the lowest part of mankind. For this he would endeavour to convince the judgment, and to reach the heart, of every reader; and, in a word, for this, without any dread of the name of an enthusiast, whoever may at random throw it out upon the occasion, he would, as it were, enter with you into your closet, from day to day; and, with all plainness and freedom, as well as seriousness, would discourse to you of the great things which he has learnt from the Christian revelation, and on which he assuredly knows your everlasting happiness to depend: that if you hitherto have lived without religion, you may be now awakened to the consideration of it, and may be instructed in its nature and importance; or that if you are already, through divine grace, experimentally acquainted with it, you may be assisted to make a further progress.

§ 5. But he earnestly entreats this favour of you, that, as it is plainly a serious business we are entering upon, you would be pleased to give him a serious and an attentive hearing. He entreats that these addresses, and these meditations, may be perused at leisure, and be thought over in retirement; and that you would do him and yourself the justice to believe the representations which are here made, and the warnings which are here given, to proceed from sincerity and love; from a heart, which would not designedly give one moment's unnecessary pain to the meanest creature on the face of the earth, and much less to any human mind. If he be importunate, it is because he at least imagines that there is just reason for it: and fears, lest amidst the multitudes who are undone by the utter neglect of religion, and among those who are greatly damaged for want of a more resolute and constant attendance to it, this may be the case of some into whose hands this treatise may fall.

§ 6. He is a barbarian, and deserves not to be called a man, who can look upon the sorrows of his fellow-creatures without drawing out his soul unto them, and wishing, at least, that it were in the power of his hand to help them. Surely earth would be a heaven to that man, who could go about from place to place scattering happiness wherever he came, though it were only the body that he were capable of relieving, and though he could impart nothing better than the happiness of a mortal life. But the happiness rises in proportion to the nature and degree of the good which he imparts. Happy, are we ready to say, were those honoured servants of Christ, who, in the early days of his church, were the benevolent and sympathizing instruments of conveying miraculous healing to those whose cases seemed desperate; who poured in upon the blind and the deaf the pleasures of light and sound, and called up the dead to the powers of action and enjoyment. But this is an honour and happiness which it is not fit for God commonly to bestow on mortal men. Yet there have been in every age, and, blessed be his name, there still are those, whom he has condescended to make his instruments in conveying nobler and more lasting blessings than these to their fellow-creatures. Death hath long since veiled the eyes, and stopped the ears, of those who were the subjects of miraculous healing, and recovered its empire over those who were once recalled from the grave. But the souls who were prevailed upon to receive the gospel, live for ever. God has owned the labours of his faithful ministers in every age, to produce these blessed effects; and some of them being dead, yet speak with power and success in this important cause. Wonder not then if, living and dying, I be ambitious of this honour; and if my mouth be freely opened where I can truly say, my heart is enlarged.

§ 7. In forming my general plan I have been solicitous that this little treatise might, if possible, be useful to all its readers, and contain something suitable to each. I will therefore take the man and the Christian in a great variety of circumstances. I will first suppose myself addressing one of the vast number of thoughtless creatures, who have hitherto been utterly unconcerned about religion; and will try what can be done, by all plainness and earnestness of address, to awaken him from this fatal lethargy, to a care, (Chap. 2.) an affectionate and an immediate care, about it. (Chap. 3.) I will labour to fix a deep and awful conviction of guilt upon his conscience, (Chap. 4.) and to strip him of his vain excuses and his flattering hopes. (Chap. 5.) I will read to him, Oh! that I could fix on his heart that sentence, that dreadful sentence, which a righteous and an almighty God hath denounced against him as a sinner, (Chap. 6.) and endeavour to show him in how helpless a state he lies under this condemnation, as to any capacity he has of delivering himself. (Chap. 7.) But I do not mean to leave any in so terrible a situation: I will joyfully proclaim the glad tidings of pardon and salvation by Christ Jesus our Lord, which is all the support and confidence of my own soul: (Chap. 8.) and then I will give some general view of the way by which this salvation is to be obtained; (Chap. 9.) urging the sinner to accept of it, as affectionately as I can; (Chap. 10.) though nothing can be sufficiently pathetic, where, as in this matter, the life of an immortal soul is in question.

§ 8. Too probable it is, that some will, after all this, remain insensible; and therefore, that their sad case may not encumber the following articles, I shall here take a solemn leave of them: (Chap. 11.) and then shall turn and address myself, as compassionately as I can, to a most contrary character; I mean, to a soul overwhelmed with a sense of the greatness of its sins, and trembling under the burthen, as if there were no more hope for him in God. (Chap. 12.) And that nothing may be omitted, which may give solid peace to the troubled spirit, I shall endeavour to guide its inquiries as to the evidences of sincere repentance and faith; (Chap. 13.) which will be further illustrated by a more particular view of the several branches of the Christian temper, such as may serve at once to assist the reader in judging what he is, and to show him what he should labour to be. (Chap. 14.) This will naturally lead to a view of the need we have of the influences of the blessed Spirit, to assist us in the important and difficult work of the true Christian; and of the encouragement we have to hope for his divine assistance. (Chap. 15.) In an humble dependence on which, I shall then enter on the consideration of several cases which often occur in the Christian life, in which particular addresses to the conscience may be requisite and useful.

§ 9. As some particular difficulties and discouragements attend the first entrance on a religious course, it will here be our first care to animate the young convert against them. (Chap. 16.) And that it may be done more effectually, I shall urge a solemn dedication of himself to God, (Chap. 17.) to be confirmed by entering into the full communion of the church by an approach to the sacred table. (Chap. 18.) That these engagements may be more happily fulfilled, we shall endeavour to draw a more particular plan of that devout, regular, and accurate course, which ought daily to be attended to: (Chap. 19.) and because the idea will probably rise so much higher than what is the general practice, even of good men, we shall endeavour to persuade the reader to make the attempt, hard as it may seem; (Chap. 20.) and shall caution him against various temptations, which might otherwise draw him aside to negligence and sin. (Chap. 21.)

§ 10. Happy will it be for the reader, if these exhortations and cautions be attended to with becoming regard; but as it is, alas, too probable that, notwithstanding all, the infirmities of nature will sometimes prevail, we shall consider the case of deadness and languor in religion, which often steals upon us by insensible degrees. (Chap. 22.) from whence there is too easy a passage to that terrible one of a return into known and deliberate sin. (Chap. 23.) And as the one or the other of these tends, in a proportionable degree, to provoke the blessed God to hide his face, and his injured Spirit to withdraw, that melancholy condition will be taken into a particular survey. (Chap. 24.) I shall then take notice also of the case of great and heavy afflictions in life; (Chap. 25.) a discipline which the best of men have reason to expect, especially when they backslide from God, and yield to their spiritual enemies.

§ 11. Instances of this kind will, I fear, be too frequent; yet, I trust, there will be many others, whose path, like the dawning light, will shine more and more until the perfect day. And therefore we shall endeavour, in the best manner we can, to assist the Christian in passing a true judgment on the growth of grace in his heart; (Chap. 26.) as we had done before in judging of its sincerity. And as nothing conduces more to the advance of grace, than the lively exercise of love to God, and a holy joy in him, we shall here remind the real Christian of those mercies, which tend to excite that love and joy; (Chap. 27.) and, in the views of them, to animate him to those vigorous efforts of usefulness in life, which so well become his character, and will have so happy an efficacy in brightening his crown. (Chap. 28.) Supposing him to act accordingly, we shall then labour to illustrate and assist the delight with which he may look forward to the awful solemnities of death and judgment; (Chap. 29.) and shall close the scene by accompanying him, as it were, to the nearest confines of that dark valley, through which he is to pass to glory, giving him such directions, as may seem most subservient to his honouring God, and adorning religion, by his dying behaviour. (Chap. 30.) Nor can I without a pleasing hope, that, through the divine blessing, and grace, I may be in some instances so successful as to leave those triumphing in the views of judgment and eternity, and glorifying God by a truly Christian life and death, whom I found trembling in the apprehensions of future misery; or perhaps in a much more dangerous and miserable circumstance than that: I mean, entirely forgetting the prospect, and sunk into the most stupid insensibility, of those things, for an attendance to which the human mind was formed, and in comparison of which, all the pursuits of this transitory life are emptier than wind, and lighter than a feather.

§ 12. Such a variety of heads must, to be sure, be handled but briefly, as we intend to bring them within the bulk of a moderate volume. I shall not, therefore, discuss them as a preacher might properly do in sermons, in which the truths of religion are professedly to be explained and taught, defended and improved, in a wide variety and long detail of propositions, arguments, objections, replies, and inferences, marshalled and numbered under their distinct generals. I shall here speak in a looser and freer manner, as a friend to a friend; just as I would do, if I were to be in person admitted to a private audience, by one whom I tenderly loved, and whose circumstances and character I knew to be like that which the title of one chapter or another of this treatise describes. And when I have discoursed with him a little while, which will seldom be so long as half an hour, I shall, as it were, step aside, and leave him to meditate on what he has heard, or endeavour to assist him in such fervent addresses to God, as it may be proper to mingle with those meditations. In the mean time, I will here take the liberty to pray over my reader and my work; and to commend it solemnly to the divine blessing, in token of my deep conviction of an entire dependence upon it. And I am well persuaded, that sentiments like these are common, in the general, to every faithful minister, to every real Christian.

A Prayer for the success of this work, in promoting the rise and progress of religion.

"O thou great eternal Original and Author of all created being and happiness! I adore thee who hast made man a creature capable of religion, and hast bestowed this dignity and felicity upon our nature, that it may be taught to say, Where is God our Maker? I lament that degeneracy spread over the whole human race, which has turned our glory into shame, and has rendered the forgetfulness of God (unnatural as it is) so common and so universal a disease. Holy Father, we know that it is thy presence and thy teaching alone, that can reclaim thy wandering children; can impress a sense of divine things on the heart, and render that sense lasting and effectual. From thee proceed all good purposes and desires; and this desire above all, of diffusing wisdom, piety, and happiness, in this world, which (though sunk in such deep apostasy) thine infinite mercy has not utterly forsaken.

"Thou knowest, O Lord, the hearts of the children of men; and an upright soul in the midst of all the censures and suspicions it may meet with, rejoices in thine intimate knowledge of its most secret recesses and principles of action. Thou knowest the sincerity and fervency with which thine unworthy servant desires to spread the knowledge of thy name, and the savour of thy gospel, among all to whom this work may reach. Thou knowest, that hadst thou given him an abundance of this world, it would have been in his esteem the noblest pleasure that abundance could have afforded, to have been thine almoner, in distributing thy bounties to the indigent and necessitous, and so causing the sorrowful heart to rejoice in thy goodness, dispensed through his hands. Thou knowest, that hadst thou given him, either by ordinary or extraordinary methods, the gifts of healing, it would have been his daily delight to relieve the pains, the maladies, and the infirmities of men's bodies; to have seen the languishing countenance brightened by returning health and cheerfulness; and much more, to have beheld the roving distracted mind reduced to calmness and serenity, in the exercise of its rational faculties. Yet happier, far happier, will he think himself, in those humble circumstances, in which thy providence hath placed him, if thou vouchsafe to honour these his feeble endeavours, as the means of relieving and enriching men's minds; of recovering them from the madness of a sinful state, and bringing back thy reasonable creatures to the knowledge, the service, and the enjoyment of their God; or of improving those who are already reclaimed.

"O may it have that blessed influence on the person, whosoever he be, that is now reading these lines, and on all who may read or hear them! Let not my Lord be angry, if I presume to ask, that however weak and contemptible this work may seem in the eyes of the children of this world, and however imperfect it really be, as well as the author of it unworthy, it may nevertheless live before thee, and through a divine power be mighty to produce the rise and progress of religion in the minds of multitudes, in distant places, and in generations yet to come! Impute it not, O God, as a culpable ambition, if I desire, that whatever becomes of my name, about which I would not lose one thought before thee, this work, to which I am now applying myself in thy strength, may be completed and propagated far abroad; that it may reach to those that are yet unborn, and teach them thy name and thy praise, when the author has long dwelt in the dust: that so, when he shall appear before thee in the great day of final account, his joy may be increased, and his crown brightened, by numbers before unknown to each other and to him! But if this petition be too great to be granted to one who pretends no claim, but thy sovereign grace, to hope for being favoured with the least, give him to be in thine Almighty hand the blessed instrument of converting and saving one soul: and if it be but one, and that the weakest and meanest of those who are capable of receiving this address, it shall be most thankfully accepted as a rich recompence for all the thought and labour it may cost; and though it should be amidst a thousand disappointments with respect to others, yet it shall be the subject of immortal songs of praise to thee, O blessed God, for and by every soul whom, through the blood of Jesus and the grace of thy Spirit, thou hast saved; and everlasting honours shall be ascribed to the Father, to the Son, and to thy Holy Spirit, by the innumerable company of angels, and by the general assembly and church of the first-born in heaven. Amen."

CHAP. II.

The careless sinner awakened.

It is too supposable a case, that this treatise may come into such hands. § 1, 2. Since many, not grossly vicious, fall under that character. § 3, 4. A more particular illustration of this case, with an appeal to the reader, whether it be not his own. § 5, 6. Expostulation with such. § 7–11. More particularly. § 7. From acknowledged principles, relating to the nature of God, his universal presence, purity, and perfections. § 10–12. § 8. From a view of personal obligations to him. § 13, 14. § 9. From the danger of this neglect, when considered in the aspect of a future state. § 14. An appeal to the conscience, practically convinced. § 15. Transition to the subject of the next chapter. § 16. The meditation of a sinner, who, having been long thoughtless, begins to be awakened.

§ 1. Shamefully and fatally as religion is neglected in the world, yet, blessed be God, it has some sincere disciples; children of wisdom, by whom, even in this foolish and degenerate age, it is justified; who, having by divine grace been brought to the knowledge of God in Christ, have faithfully devoted their hearts to him, and by a natural consequence, are devoting their lives to his service. Could I be sure this treatise would fall into no hands but theirs, my work would be shorter, easier, and pleasanter.

§ 2. But among the thousands that neglect religion, it is more than possible that some of my readers may be included; and I am so deeply affected with their unhappy case, that the temper of my heart, as well as the proper method of my subject, leads me in the first place to address myself to such; to apply to every one of them; and therefore to you, O reader, whoever you are, who may come under the denomination of a careless sinner.

§ 3. Be not, I beseech you, angry at the name. The physicians of souls must speak plainly, or they may murder those whom they should cure. I would make no harsh and unreasonable supposition, I would charge you with nothing more than is absolutely necessary to convince you that you are the person to whom I speak. I will not, therefore, imagine you to be a profane and abandoned profligate. I will not suppose that you allow yourself to blaspheme God, to dishonour his name by customary swearing, or grossly to violate his sabbath, or commonly to neglect the solemnities of his public worship; I will not imagine that you have injured your neighbours, in their lives, their chastity, or their possessions, either by violence or by fraud; or that you have scandalously debased the rational nature of man by that vile intemperance, which transforms us into the worst kind of brutes, or something beneath them.

§ 4. In opposition to all this, I will suppose that you believe the existence and providence of God, and the truth of Christianity, as a revelation from him; of which if you have any doubt, I must desire that you would immediately seek your satisfaction elsewhere. I say, immediately: because not to believe it, is in effect to disbelieve it; and will make your ruin equally certain, though perhaps it may leave it less aggravated, than if contempt and opposition had been added to suspicion and neglect. But supposing you to be a nominal Christian, and not a deist or a sceptic, I will also suppose your conduct among men to be not only blameless, but amiable; and that they who know you most intimately must acknowledge, that you are just and sober, humane and courteous, compassionate and liberal; yet with all this, you may lack that one thing on which your eternal happiness depends.

§ 5. I beseech you, reader, whoever you are, that you would now look seriously into your own heart, and ask it this one plain question, Am I truly religious? Is the love of God the governing principle of my life? Do I walk under the sense of his presence? Do I converse with him from day to day, in the exercise of prayer and praise? And am I, on the whole, making his service my business and my delight, regarding him as my Master and my Father?

§ 6. It is my present business only to address myself to the person whose conscience answers in the negative. And I would address with equal plainness, and equal freedom, to high and low, to rich and poor: to you, who (as the Scripture with a dreadful propriety expresses it) live without God in the world; and while in words and forms you own God, deny him in your actions, and behave yourselves in the main, (a few external ceremonies only excepted,) just as you would do, if you believed, and were sure, there was no God. Unhappy creature, whoever you are! your own heart condemns you immediately; and how much more that God, who is greater than your heart, and knoweth all things. He is in secret, as well as in public; and words cannot express the delight with which his children converse with him alone: but in secret you acknowledge him not; you neither pray to him nor praise him in your retirements. Accounts, correspondences, studies may often bring you into your closet, but if nothing but devotion were to be transacted there, it would be to you quite an unfrequented place. And thus you go on from day to day, in a continual forgetfulness of God, and are as thoughtless about religion, as if you had long since demonstrated it to yourself that it was a mere dream. It, indeed, you are sick, you will perhaps cry to God for health; in any extreme danger, you will lift up your eyes and voice for deliverance: but as for the pardon of sin, and the other blessings of the gospel, you are not at all inwardly solicitous about them; though you profess to believe that the gospel is divine, and the blessings of it eternal. All your thoughts, and all your hours, are divided between the business and the amusements of life; and if now and then an awful providence, or a serious sermon or book, awakens you, it is but a few days, or it may be a few hours, and you are the same careless creature you ever were before. On the whole, you act as if you were resolved to put it to the venture, and at your own expense to make the experiment, whether the consequences of neglecting religion be indeed as terrible as its ministers and friends have represented. Their remonstrances do indeed sometimes force themselves upon you, as (considering the age and country in which you live) it is hardly possible entirely to avoid them; but you have, it may be, found out the art of Isaiah's people, hearing to hear, and not to understand; and seeing to see, and not to perceive: your heart is waxed gross, your eyes are closed, and your ears heavy. Under the very ordinances of worship, your thoughts are at the ends of the earth. Every amusement of the imagination is welcome, if it may but lead away your mind from so insipid and so disagreeable a subject as religion. And probably the very last time you were in a worshipping assembly, you managed just as you would have done if you had thought God knew nothing of your behaviour; or as if you did not think it worth one single care, whether he were pleased or displeased with it.

§ 7. Alas! is it then come to this, with all your belief of God, and providence, and Scripture, that religion is not worth a thought! That it is not worth one hour's serious consideration and reflection, "what God and Christ are; and what you yourselves are, and what you must hereafter be?" Where then are all your rational faculties? how are they employed, or rather, how are they stupified and benumbed?

§ 8. The certainty and importance of the things of which I speak are so evident, from the principles which you yourselves grant, that one might almost set a child or an idiot to reason upon them. And yet they are neglected by those who are grown up to understanding, and perhaps some of them to such refinement of understanding, that they would think themselves greatly injured, if they were not to be reckoned among the politer, and the more learned, part of mankind.

§ 9. But it is not your neglect, sirs, that can destroy the being or importance of such things as these. It may indeed destroy you, but it cannot in the least affect them. Permit me, therefore, having been myself awakened, to come to each of you, and say, as the mariners did to Jonah, while asleep in the midst of a much less dangerous storm, What meanest thou, O sleeper? Arise, and call upon thy God. Do you doubt as to the reasonableness or necessity of doing it? I will demand, and answer me: answer me to your own conscience, as one that must, ere long, render another kind of account.

§ 10. You own that there is a God, and well you may; for you cannot open your eyes, but you must see the evident proofs of his being, his presence, and his agency. You behold him around you in every object. You feel him within you, if I may so speak, in every vein, and in every nerve. You see, and you feel, not only that he hath formed you with an exquisite wisdom, which no mortal man could ever fully explain or comprehend, but that he is continually near you, wherever you are, and however you are employed, by day, or by night; in him you live, and move, and have your being. Common sense will tell you, that it is not your own wisdom, and power, and attention, that causes your heart to beat, and your blood to circulate; that draws in, and sends out, that breath of life, that precarious breath of a most uncertain life, that is in your nostrils. These things are done when you sleep, as well as in those waking moments, when you think not of the circulation of the blood, or of the necessity of breathing, nor so much as to recollect that you have a heart and lungs. Now what is this, but the hand of God, perpetually supporting and actuating those curious machines that he has made?

§ 11. Nor is this his care limited to you; but if you look all around you, far as your view can reach, you see it extending itself on every side: and oh how much further than you can trace it! Reflect on the light and heat, which the sun every where dispenses; on the air, which surrounds all our globe, on the right temperature of which the life of the whole human race depends, and that of all the inferior creatures which dwell on the earth. Think of the suitable and plentiful provision made for man and beast: the grass, the grain, the variety of fruits, and herbs, and flowers, every thing that nourishes us, every thing that delights us; and say, whether it do not speak plainly and loudly, that our Almighty Maker is near, and that he is careful of us, and kind to us. And while all these things proclaim his goodness, do they not also proclaim his power?

For what power is any thing comparable to that, which furnishes out those gifts of royal bounty; and which, unwearied and unchanged, produces continually, from day to day, and from age to age, such astonishing and magnificent effects over the face of the whole earth, and through all the regions of heaven?

§ 12. It is then evident, that God is present, present with you at this moment; even God your creator and preserver, God the creator and preserver of the whole visible and invisible world. And is he not present as a most observant and attentive being? He that formed the eye, shall not he see? He that planted the ear, shall not he hear? He that teaches man knowledge, that gives him his rational faculties, and pours in upon his opening mind all the light it receives by them, shall not he know? He who sees all the necessities of his creatures so seasonably to provide for them, shall he not see their actions too? and seeing, shall he not judge them? Has he given us a sense and discernment of what is good and evil, of what is true and false, of what is fair and deformed, in temper and conduct? and has he himself no discernment of these things? Trifle not with your conscience, which tells you at once, that he judges of it, and approves or condemns, as it is decent or indecent, reasonable or unreasonable; and that the judgment which he passes is of infinite importance to all his creatures.

§ 13. And now, to apply all this to your own case, let me seriously ask you, Is it a decent and reasonable thing, that this great and glorious Benefactor should be neglected by his rational creatures? by those, that are capable of attaining to some knowledge of him, and presenting to him some homage? Is it decent and reasonable, that he should be forgotten and neglected by you? Are you alone, of all the works of his hands, forgotten or neglected by him? Oh sinner, thoughtless as you are, you cannot dare to say that, or even to think it. You need not go back to the helpless days of your infancy and childhood, to convince you of the contrary. You need not, in order to this, recollect the remarkable deliverances, which, perhaps, were wrought out for you many years ago. The repose of the last night, the refreshment and comfort you have received this day; yea, the mercies you are receiving this very moment, bear witness to him; and yet you regard him not. Ungrateful creature that you are! Could you have treated any human benefactor thus? Could you have borne to neglect a kind parent, or any generous friend, that had but a few months acted the part of a parent to you? to have taken no notice of him, while in his presence; to have returned him no thanks; to have had no contrivances to make some little acknowledgment for all his goodness? Human nature, bad as it is, is not fallen so low. Nay, the brutal nature is not so low as this. Surely every domestic animal round you must shame such ingratitude. If you do but for a few days take a little kind notice of a dog, and feed him with the refuse of your table, he will wait upon you, and love to be near you; he will be eager to follow you from place to place, or when, after a little absence, you return home, will try by a thousand fond transported motions, to tell you how much he rejoices to see you again. Nay, brutes far less sagacious and apprehensive, have some sense of our kindness, and express it after their way: as the blessed God condescends to observe, in this very view in which I mention it, The dull ox knows its owner, and the stupid ass his master's crib: what lamentable degeneracy therefore is it, that you do not know, that you, who have been numbered among God's professing people, do not, and will not, consider your numberless obligations to him?

§ 14. Surely, if you have any ingenuity of temper, you must be ashamed and grieved in the review: but if you have not, give me leave further to expostulate with you on this head, by setting it in something of a different light. Can you think yourselves safe, while you are acting a part like this? Do you not in your conscience believe, there will be a future judgment? Do you not believe there is an invisible and eternal world? As professed Christians, we all believe it; for it is no controverted point, but displayed in Scripture with so clear an evidence, that, subtle and ingenious as men are in error, they have not yet found out a way to evade it. And believing this, do you not see, that while you are thus wandering from God, destruction and misery are in your ways? Will this indolence and negligence of temper be any security to you? Will it guard you from death? Will it excuse you from judgment? You might much more reasonably expect, that shutting your eyes would be a defence against the rage of a devouring lion; or that looking another way should secure your body from being pierced by a bullet or a sword. When God speaks of the extravagant folly of some thoughtless creatures, who would hearken to no admonition, now he adds, in a very awful manner: In the latter day they shall consider it perfectly. And is not this applicable to you? Must you not, sooner or later, be brought to think of these things, whether you will or not? And, in the mean time, do you not certainly know, that timely and serious reflection upon them is, through divine grace, the only way to prevent your ruin?

§ 15. Yes, sinner, I need not multiply words on a subject like this. Your conscience is already inwardly convinced, though your pride may be unwilling to own it. And, to prove it, let me ask you one question more: Would you, upon any terms and considerations whatever, come to a resolution absolutely to dismiss all further thought of religion, and all care about it, from this day and hour, and to abide by the consequences of that neglect? I believe hardly any man living would be bold enough to determine upon this. I believe most of my readers would be ready to tremble at the thought of it.

§ 16. But if it be necessary to take these things into consideration at all, it is necessary to do it quickly; for life itself is not so very long, nor so certain, that a wise man should risk much upon its continuance. And I hope to convince you, when I have another hearing, that it is necessary to do it immediately; and that, next to the madness of resolving, you will not think of religion at all, is that of saying, you will think of it hereafter. In the mean time, pause on the hints which have been already given, and they will prepare you to receive what is to be added on that head.

The Meditation of a sinner who was once thoughtless, but begins to be awakened.

"AWAKE, oh my forgetful soul, awake from these wandering dreams. Turn thee from this chace of vanity, and for a little while be persuaded by all these considerations, to look forward, and to look upward, at least for a few moments. Sufficient are the hours and days given to the labours and amusements of life. Grudge not a short allotment of minutes, to view thyself, and thine own more immediate concerns; to reflect who and what thou art; how it comes to pass that thou art here, and what thou must quickly be!

"It is indeed, as thou hast seen it now represented, oh my soul! Thou art the creature of God; formed and furnished by him, and lodged in a body which he provided, and which he supports; a body, in which he intended thee only a transitory abode. Oh, think how soon this tabernacle must be dissolved, and thou must return to God! And shall he, the one infinite, eternal, ever-blessed, and ever-glorious Being, shall he be least of all regarded by thee? Wilt thou live and die with this character, saying by every action of every day unto God, Depart from me, for I desire not the knowledge of thy ways? The morning, the day, the evening, the night, every period of time, has its excuses for this neglect. But, oh my soul, what will these excuses appear, when examined by his penetrating eye? They may delude me; but they cannot impose upon him!

"Oh thou injured, neglected, provoked Benefactor! When I think, but for a moment or two, of all thy greatness, and of all thy goodness, I am astonished at this insensibility, which hath prevailed in mine heart, and even still prevails. I blush and am confounded to lift up my face before thee. On the most transient review, I see that I have played the fool, that I have erred exceedingly. And yet this stupid heart of mine would make its having neglected thee so long a reason for going on to neglect thee. I own it might justly be expected, that, with regard to thee, every one of thy rational creatures should be all duty and love; that each heart should be full of a sense of thy presence; and that a care to please thee should swallow up every other care. Yet thou hast not been in all my thoughts; and religion, the end and glory of my nature, has been so strangely overlooked, that I have hardly ever seriously asked my own heart, what it is. I know, if matters rest here, I perish, and yet I feel, in my perverse nature, a secret indisposition to pursue these thoughts: a proneness, if not entirely to dismiss them, yet to lay them aside for the present. My mind is perplexed and divided: but I am sure thou, who madest me, knowest what is best for me. I therefore beseech thee, that thou wilt, for thy name's sake, lead me and guide me. Let me not delay till it is for ever too late. Pluck me as a brand out of the burning. Oh, break this fatal enchantment that holds down my affection to objects, which my judgment comparatively despises! And let me, at length, come into so happy a state of mind, that I may not be afraid to think of thee, and of myself; and may not be tempted to wish that thou hadst not made me, or that thou couldst for ever forget me; that it may not be my best hope, to perish like the brutes.

"If what I shall further read here, be agreeable to truth and reason; if it be calculated to promote my happiness, and is to be regarded as an intimation of thy will and pleasure to me: O God, let me hear and obey! Let the words of thy servant, when pleading thy cause, be like goads to pierce into my mind! and let me rather feel, and smart, than die! Let them be as nails fastened in a sure place: that whatever mysteries are as yet unknown, or whatever difficulties there be in religion, if it be necessary, I may not finally neglect it; and that if it be expedient to attend immediately to it, I may no longer delay that attendance! And oh let thy grace teach me the lesson I am so slow to learn, and conquer that strong opposition, which I feel in my heart, against the very thought of it! Hear these broken cries, for the sake of thy Son, who has taught and saved many a creature as untractable as I, and can out of stones raise up children to Abraham!" Amen.

CHAP. III.

The awakened sinner urged to immediate consideration, and cautioned against delay.

Sinners when awaked [illegible] to serious meditation on the present, [illegible] An immediate regard to serious religion [illegible] How the excellency and pleasure of the thing itself. § 1. 2. From the uncertainty of that future time on which sinners presume, compared with the sad consequences of being cut off in sin. § 3. 3. From the unmeetableness of God's present demands. § 5. 4. From the hardness, which delay has, to make a compliance with those demands more difficult than it is at present. § 6. 5. From the danger of God's withdrawing his Spirit, compared with the dreadful case of a sinner given up by it. § 7. Which probably is often the case with many. § 8. Some therefore on the verge, whatever the event be deemed, may prove matter of lamentation. § 9. the chapter concludes with an exhortation against yielding to them. § 10. and a prayer against temptations of that kind.

§ 1. I HOPE my last address so far awakened the convictions of my reader, as to bring him to this purpose, "That some time or other he would attend to religious considerations." But give me leave to ask earnestly and punctually, "When that shall be?" "Go thy way for this time, and at a more convenient season I will send for thee," was the language, and the ruin, of unhappy Felix, when he trembled under the reasonings and expostulations of the apostle. The tempter presumed not to urge that he should give up all thoughts of repentance and reformation; but only that, considering the present hurry of his affairs, (as no doubt they were many,) he should defer it to a longer day. The artifice succeeded, and Felix was undone.

§ 2. Will you, reader, dismiss me thus? For your own sake, and out of tender compassion to your perishing immortal soul, I would not willingly take up with such a dismission and excuse. No, not though you shall fix a time; though you shall determine on the next year, or month, or week, or day. I would turn upon you with all the eagerness and tenderness of friendly importunity, and entreat you to bring the matter to an issue even now. For if you say, "I will think on these things to-morrow," I shall have but little hope; and shall conclude, that all that I have hitherto urged, and all that you have read, have been offered and viewed in vain.

§ 3. When I invited you to the care and practice of religion, it may seem strange that it should be necessary for me affectionately to plead the case with you, in order to your immediate regard and compliance. What I am inviting you to, is so noble and excellent in itself, so well worthy the dignity of our rational nature, so suitable to it, so manly, and so wise, that one would imagine you should take fire, as it were, at the first hearing of it; yea, that so delightful a view should presently possess your whole soul with a kind of indignation against yourself that you pursued it no sooner. "May I lift up my eyes and my soul to God? May I devote myself to him? May I even now commence a friendship with him; a friendship which shall last for ever, the security, the delight, the glory of this immortal nature of mine?" And shall I draw back and say, "Nevertheless let me not commence this friendship too soon? let me live at least a few weeks, or a few days, longer without God in the world?" Surely it would be much more reasonable to return inward, and say, "Oh my soul, on what vile husks hast thou been feeding, while thy heavenly Father has been forsaken, and injured! Shall I desire to multiply the days of my poverty, my scandal, and my misery?" On this principle, surely, an immediate return to God should in all reason be chosen, rather than to play the fool any longer, and to go on a little more to displease God, and thereby to starve and to wound your own soul; even though your continuance in life were ever so certain, and your capacity to return to God and your duty ever so entirely in your own power now, and in every future moment, through scores of years yet to come.

§ 4. But who or what are you, that you should lay your account for years or for months to come? What is your life? Is it not even as a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away? And what is your security, or what is your peculiar warrant, that you should thus depend upon the certainty of its continuance? and that so absolutely, as to venture, as it were, to pawn your soul upon it? Why, you will perhaps say, "I am young, and in all my bloom and vigour, I see hundreds about me, who are more than double my age, and not a few of them, who seem to think it too soon to attend to religion yet."—You view the living, and you talk thus. But, I beseech you, think of the dead. Return in your thoughts to those graves in which you have left some of your young companions and your friends. You saw them awhile ago gay and active, warm with life, and hopes, and schemes. And some of them would have thought a friend strangely importunate, that should have interrupted them in their business and their pleasures, with a solemn lecture on death and eternity. Yet they were then on the very borders of both. You have since seen their corpses, or at least their coffins; and probably carried about with you the badges of mourning which you received at their funerals. Those once vigorous, and perhaps beautiful, bodies of theirs, now lie mouldering in the dust, as senseless and helpless as the most decrepid pieces of human nature, which fourscore years ever brought down to it. And what is infinitely more to be regarded, their souls, whether prepared for this great change, or thoughtless of it, have made their appearance before God, and are at this moment fixed either in heaven or in hell. Now let me seriously ask you, Would it be miraculous, or would it be strange, if such an event should befall you? How are you sure that some fatal disease should not this day begin to work in your veins? How are you sure that you shall ever be capable of reading or thinking any more, if you do not attend to what you now read, and pursue the thought which is now offering itself to your mind? This sudden alteration may at least possibly happen; and if it does, it will be to you a terrible one indeed. To be thus surprised into the presence of a forgotten God, to be torn away, at once, from a world, to which your whole heart and soul has been rivetted, a world which has engrossed all your thoughts and cares, all your desires and pursuits, and be fixed in a state, which you never could be so far persuaded to think of, as to spend so much as one hour in serious preparation for it. How must you even shudder at the apprehension of it, and with what horror must it fill you! It seems matter of wonder, that, in such circumstances, you are not almost distracted with the thoughts of the uncertainty of life, and are not even ready to die for fear of death. To trifle with God any longer, after so solemn an admonition as this, would be a circumstance of additional provocation, which, after all the rest, might be fatal. Nor is there any thing you can expect in such a case, but that he should cut you off immediately, and teach other thoughtless creatures, by your ruin, what a hazardous experiment they make, when they act as you are acting.

§ 5. And will you, after all, run this desperate risk? For what imaginable purpose can you do it? Do you think the business of religion will become less necessary, or more easy, by your delay? You know that it will not. You know, that whatever the blessed God demands now, he will also demand twenty or thirty years hence, if you should live to see the time. God hath fixed this method, in which he will pardon and accept sinners in his gospel. And will he ever alter that method? Or if he will not, can men alter it? You like not to think of repenting, and humbling yourself before God, to receive righteousness and life from his free grace in Christ; and you above all dislike the thought of returning to God in the ways of holy obedience. But will he ever dispense with any of these, and publish a new gospel, with promises of life and salvation to impenitent, unbelieving sinners, if they will but call themselves Christians, and submit to a few external rites? How long do you think you might wait for such a change in the constitution of things? You know death will come upon you; and you cannot but know, in your own conscience, that a general dissolution will come upon the world, long before God can thus deny himself, and contradict all his perfections, and all his declarations.

§ 6. Or if his demands continue the same, as they assuredly will, do you think any thing which is now disagreeable to you in them, will be less disagreeable hereafter than it is at present? Shall you love to sin less, when it is become more habitual to you, and when conscience is yet more enfeebled and debauched? If you are running with the footmen and fainting, shall you be able to contend with the horsemen? Surely you cannot imagine it. You would not say, in any distemper which threatened your life, "I will stay till I grow a little worse, and then I will apply to a physician: I will let my disease get a little more footing in my vitals, and then I will try what can be done to remove it." No, it is only where the life of the soul is concerned that men think thus wildly; the life and health of the body appear too precious to be thus trifled away.

§ 7. If after such desperate experiments you are ever recovered, it must be by an operation of divine grace on your soul, yet more powerful and more wonderful, in proportion to the increasing inveteracy of your spiritual maladies. And can you expect that the Holy Spirit should be more ready to assist you, in consequence of your having so shamefully trifled with him and affronted him? He is now, in some measure, moving on your heart; if you feel any secret relentings in it upon what you read, it is a sign you are not yet utterly forsaken, but who can tell whether these are not the last touches he will ever give to a heart so long hardened against him? Who can tell but God may this day swear in his wrath that you shall not enter into his rest? I have been telling you that you may immediately die. You own it is possible you may. And can you think of any thing more terrible? Yes, sinner, I will tell you of one thing more dreadful than immediate death and immediate damnation. The blessed God may say, "As for that wretched creature who has so long trifled with me, and provoked me, let him still live. Let him live in the midst of prosperity and plenty. Let him live under the purest and most powerful ordinances of the gospel too; that he may abuse them to aggravate his condemnation, and die under seven-fold guilt, and a seven-fold curse. I will not give him the grace to think of his ways for one serious moment more; but he shall go on from bad to worse, filling up the measure of his iniquities, till death and destruction seize him in an unexpected hour, and wrath come upon him to the uttermost."

§ 8. You think this an uncommon case; but I fear it is much otherwise. I fear there are few congregations where the word of God has been faithfully preached, and where it has been long despised, especially by those whom it had once awakened, in which the eye of God does not see a number of such wretched souls; though it is impossible for us to pronounce upon the case who they are.

§ 9. I pretend not to say how he will deal with you, oh reader! whether he will immediately cut you off, or seal you up under final hardness and impenitency of heart; or whether his grace may at length awaken you to consider your ways, and return to him, even when your heart is grown yet more obdurate than it is at present. For to his almighty grace nothing is hard, not even to transform a rock of marble into a man and a saint. But this I will confidently say, that if you delay any longer, the time will come when you will bitterly repent of that delay, and either lament it before God in the anguish of your heart here, or curse your own folly and madness in hell; yea, when you will wish, that, dreadful as hell is, you had rather fallen into it sooner, than have lived in the midst of so many abused mercies, to render the degree of your punishment more insupportable, and your sense of it more exquisitely tormenting.

§ 10. I do therefore earnestly exhort you, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the worth, and, if I may so speak, by the blood, of your immortal and perishing soul, that you delay not a day or an hour longer. Far from giving sleep to your eyes or slumber to your eyelids, in the continued neglect of this important concern, take with you even now words, and turn unto the Lord; and before you quit the place where you now are, fall upon your knees in his sacred presence, and pour out your heart in such language, or at least to such purpose, as this.

A Prayer for one who is tempted to delay applying to religion, though under some conviction of its importance.

"Oh thou righteous and holy Sovereign of heaven and earth! Thou God, in whose hand my breath is, and whose are all my ways! I confess I have been far from glorifying thee, or conducting myself according to the intimations or the declarations of thy will. I have, therefore, reason to adore thy forbearance and goodness, that thou hast not long since stopped my breath, and cut me off from the land of the living. I adore thy patience, that I have not months and years ago been an inhabitant of hell; where ten thousand delaying sinners are now lamenting their folly, and will be lamenting it for ever. But, O God, how possible is it that this trifling heart of mine may at length betray me into the same ruin! And then, alas, into a ruin aggravated by all this patience and forbearance of thine! I am convinced that, sooner or later, religion must be my serious care, or I am undone. And yet my foolish heart draws back from the yoke. Yet I stretch myself upon the bed of sloth, and cry out for a little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands to sleep. Thus does my corrupt heart plead for its own indulgence, against the conviction of my better judgment. What shall I say? O Lord, save me from myself! Save me from the artifices and deceitfulness of sin! Save me from the treachery of this perverse and degenerate nature of mine, and fix upon my mind what I have now been reading!

"O Lord, I am not now instructed in truths which were before quite unknown. Often have I been warned of the uncertainty of life, and of the greater uncertainty of the day of salvation; and I have formed some light purposes, and have begun to take a few irresolute steps in my way towards a return to thee. But, alas! I have been only, as it were, fluttering about religion, and have never fixed upon it. All my resolutions have been scattered like smoke, or dispersed like a cloudy vapour before the wind. O that thou wouldst now bring these things home to my heart, with a more powerful conviction than it hath ever yet felt! O that thou wouldst pursue me with them, even when I flee from them, if I should ever grow mad enough to endeavour to escape them any more! May thy Spirit address me in the language of effectual terror, and add all the most powerful methods which thou knowest to be necessary, to awaken me from this lethargy, which must otherwise be mortal! May the sound of these things be in mine ears, when I go out, and when I come in, when I lie down, and when I rise up! And if the repose of the night, and the business of the day, be for a while interrupted by the impression, be it so, O God! if I may but thereby carry on my business with thee to better purpose, and at length secure a repose in thee, instead of all that terror which I now find, when I think upon God, and am troubled.

"O Lord, my flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments; I am afraid, lest even now that I have begun to think of religion, thou shouldst cut me off in this critical and important moment, before my thoughts grow to any ripeness, and blast in eternal death the first buddings and openings of it in my mind. But O spare me, I earnestly entreat thee; for thy mercy's sake, spare me a little longer! It may be, through thy grace, I shall return. It may be, if thou continuest thy patience towards me a while longer, there may be some better fruit produced by this cumberer of the ground. And may the remembrance of that long forbearance which thou hast already exercised towards me, prevent my continuing to trifle with thee and with my own soul! From this day, O Lord, from this hour, from this moment, may I be able to date more lasting impressions of religion, than have ever yet been made upon my heart, by all that I have ever read, or all that I have heard! Amen."

CHAP. IV.

The sinner arraigned and convicted.

Conviction urged. § 1. Various pretences for delay considered. § 2. Whether [illegible] Christ. § 3. Whether [illegible] Gospel. § 4. [illegible] § 5. An appeal to the reader's [illegible] § 6. Objection answered. § 7. That to have [illegible] § 8. [illegible] § 9. [illegible] by a mere profession. § 10. [illegible] guilt, [illegible] § 11. [illegible] § 12. [illegible] [illegible] § 13. [illegible] § 14. [illegible] § 15. [illegible] § 16. [illegible] § 17. [illegible] § 18. [illegible] § 19. [illegible] § 20. [illegible] § 21. [illegible] § 22. [illegible] § 23. [illegible] § 24. [illegible] § 25. [illegible] § 26. [illegible] § 27. [illegible] § 28. [illegible] § 29. [illegible] § 30. [illegible] § 31. [illegible] § 32. [illegible] § 33. [illegible] § 34. [illegible] § 35. [illegible] § 36. [illegible] § 37. [illegible] § 38. [illegible] § 39. [illegible] § 40. [illegible] § 41. [illegible] § 42. [illegible] § 43. [illegible] § 44. [illegible] § 45. [illegible] § 46. [illegible] § 47. [illegible] § 48. [illegible] § 49. [illegible] § 50. [illegible] § 51. [illegible] § 52. [illegible] § 53. [illegible] § 54. [illegible] § 55. [illegible] § 56. [illegible] § 57. [illegible] § 58. [illegible] § 59. [illegible] § 60. [illegible] § 61. [illegible] § 62. [illegible] § 63. [illegible] § 64. [illegible] § 65. [illegible] § 66. [illegible] § 67. [illegible] § 68. [illegible] § 69. [illegible] § 70. [illegible] § 71. [illegible] § 72. [illegible] § 73. [illegible] § 74. [illegible] § 75. [illegible] § 76. [illegible] § 77. [illegible] § 78. [illegible] § 79. [illegible] § 80. [illegible] § 81. [illegible] § 82. [illegible] § 83. [illegible] § 84. [illegible] § 85. [illegible] § 86. [illegible] § 87. [illegible] § 88. [illegible] § 89. [illegible] § 90. [illegible] § 91. [illegible] § 92. [illegible] § 93. [illegible] § 94. [illegible] § 95. [illegible] § 96. [illegible] § 97. [illegible] § 98. [illegible] § 99. [illegible] § 100. [illegible] § 101. [illegible] § 102. [illegible] § 103. [illegible] § 104. [illegible] § 105. [illegible] § 106. [illegible] § 107. [illegible] § 108. [illegible] § 109. [illegible] § 110. [illegible] § 111. [illegible] § 112. [illegible] § 113. [illegible] § 114. [illegible] § 115. [illegible] § 116. [illegible] § 117. [illegible] § 118. [illegible] § 119. [illegible] § 120. [illegible] § 121. [illegible] § 122. [illegible] § 123. [illegible] § 124. [illegible] § 125. [illegible] § 126. [illegible] § 127. [illegible] § 128. [illegible] § 129. [illegible] § 130. [illegible] § 131. [illegible] § 132. [illegible] § 133. [illegible] § 134. [illegible] § 135. [illegible] § 136. [illegible] § 137. [illegible] § 138. [illegible] § 139. [illegible] § 140. [illegible] § 141. [illegible] § 142. [illegible] § 143. [illegible] § 144. [illegible] § 145. [illegible] § 146. [illegible] § 147. [illegible] § 148. [illegible] § 149. [illegible] § 150. [illegible] § 151. [illegible] § 152. [illegible] § 153. [illegible] § 154. [illegible] § 155. [illegible] § 156. [illegible] § 157. [illegible] § 158. [illegible] § 159. [illegible] § 160. [illegible] § 161. [illegible] § 162. [illegible] § 163. [illegible] § 164. [illegible] § 165. [illegible] § 166. [illegible] § 167. [illegible] § 168. [illegible] § 169. [illegible] § 170. [illegible] § 171. [illegible] § 172. [illegible] § 173. [illegible] § 174. [illegible] § 175. [illegible] § 176. [illegible] § 177. [illegible] § 178. [illegible] § 179. [illegible] § 180. [illegible] § 181. [illegible] § 182. [illegible] § 183. [illegible] § 184. [illegible] § 185. [illegible] § 186. [illegible] § 187. [illegible] § 188. [illegible] § 189. [illegible] § 190. [illegible] § 191. [illegible] § 192. [illegible] § 193. [illegible] § 194. [illegible] § 195. [illegible] § 196. [illegible] § 197. [illegible] § 198. [illegible] § 199. [illegible] § 200. [illegible] § 201. [illegible] § 202. [illegible] § 203. [illegible] § 204. [illegible] § 205. [illegible] § 206. [illegible] § 207. [illegible] § 208. [illegible] § 209. [illegible] § 210. [illegible] § 211. [illegible] § 212. [illegible] § 213. [illegible] § 214. [illegible] § 215. [illegible] § 216. [illegible] § 217. [illegible] § 218. [illegible] § 219. [illegible] § 220. [illegible] § 221. [illegible] § 222. [illegible] § 223. [illegible] § 224. [illegible] § 225. [illegible] § 226. [illegible] § 227. [illegible] § 228. [illegible] § 229. [illegible] § 230. [illegible] § 231. [illegible] § 232. [illegible] § 233. [illegible] § 234. [illegible] § 235. [illegible] § 236. [illegible] § 237. [illegible] § 238. [illegible] § 239. [illegible] § 240. [illegible] § 241. [illegible] § 242. [illegible] § 243. [illegible] § 244. [illegible] § 245. [illegible] § 246. [illegible] § 247. [illegible] § 248. [illegible] § 249. [illegible] § 250. [illegible] § 251. [illegible] § 252. [illegible] § 253. [illegible] § 254. [illegible] § 255. [illegible] § 256. [illegible] § 257. [illegible] § 258. [illegible] § 259. [illegible] § 260. [illegible] § 261. [illegible] § 262. [illegible] § 263. [illegible] § 264. [illegible] § 265. [illegible] § 266. [illegible] § 267. [illegible] § 268. [illegible] § 269. [illegible] § 270. [illegible] § 271. [illegible] § 272. [illegible] § 273. [illegible] § 274. [illegible] § 275. [illegible] § 276. [illegible] § 277. [illegible] § 278. [illegible] § 279. [illegible] § 280. [illegible] § 281. [illegible] § 282. [illegible] § 283. [illegible] § 284. [illegible] § 285. [illegible] § 286. [illegible] § 287. [illegible] § 288. [illegible] § 289. [illegible] § 290. [illegible] § 291. [illegible] § 292. [illegible] § 293. [illegible] § 294. [illegible] § 295. [illegible] § 296. [illegible] § 297. [illegible] § 298. [illegible] § 299. [illegible] § 300. [illegible] § 301. [illegible] § 302. [illegible] § 303. [illegible] § 304. [illegible] § 305. [illegible] § 306. [illegible] § 307. [illegible] § 308. [illegible] § 309. [illegible] § 310. [illegible] § 311. [illegible] § 312. [illegible] § 313. [illegible] § 314. [illegible] § 315. [illegible] § 316. [illegible] § 317. [illegible] § 318. [illegible] § 319. [illegible] § 320. [illegible] § 321. [illegible] § 322. [illegible] § 323. [illegible] § 324. [illegible] § 325. [illegible] § 326. [illegible] § 327. [illegible] § 328. [illegible] § 329. [illegible] § 330. [illegible] § 331. [illegible] § 332. [illegible] § 333. [illegible] § 334. [illegible] § 335. [illegible] § 336. [illegible] § 337. [illegible] § 338. [illegible] § 339. [illegible] § 340. [illegible] § 341. [illegible] § 342. [illegible] § 343. [illegible] § 344. [illegible] § 345. [illegible] § 346. [illegible] § 347. [illegible] § 348. [illegible] § 349. [illegible] § 350. [illegible] § 351. [illegible] § 352. [illegible] § 353. [illegible] § 354. [illegible] § 355. [illegible] § 356. [illegible] § 357. [illegible] § 358. [illegible] § 359. [illegible] § 360. [illegible] § 361. [illegible] § 362. [illegible] § 363. [illegible] § 364. [illegible] § 365. [illegible] § 366. [illegible] § 367. [illegible] § 368. [illegible] § 369. [illegible] § 370. [illegible] § 371. [illegible] § 372. [illegible] § 373. [illegible] § 374. [illegible] § 375. [illegible] § 376. [illegible] § 377. [illegible] § 378. [illegible] § 379. [illegible] § 380. [illegible] § 381. [illegible] § 382. [illegible] § 383. [illegible] § 384. [illegible] § 385. [illegible] § 386. [illegible] § 387. [illegible] § 388. [illegible] § 389. [illegible] § 390. [illegible] § 391. [illegible] § 392. [illegible] § 393. [illegible] § 394. [illegible] § 395. [illegible] § 396. [illegible] § 397. [illegible] § 398. [illegible] § 399. [illegible] § 400. [illegible] § 401. [illegible] § 402. [illegible] § 403. [illegible] § 404. [illegible] § 405. [illegible] § 406. [illegible] § 407. [illegible] § 408. [illegible] § 409. [illegible] § 410. [illegible] § 411. [illegible] § 412. [illegible] § 413. [illegible] § 414. [illegible] § 415. [illegible] § 416. [illegible] § 417. [illegible] § 418. [illegible] § 419. [illegible] § 420. [illegible] § 421. [illegible] § 422. [illegible] § 423. [illegible] § 424. [illegible] § 425. [illegible] § 426. [illegible] § 427. [illegible] § 428. [illegible] § 429. [illegible] § 430. [illegible] § 431. [illegible] § 432. [illegible] § 433. [illegible] § 434. [illegible] § 435. [illegible] § 436. [illegible] § 437. [illegible] § 438. [illegible] § 439. [illegible] § 440. [illegible] § 441. [illegible] § 442. [illegible] § 443. [illegible] § 444. [illegible] § 445. [illegible] § 446. [illegible] § 447. [illegible] § 448. [illegible] § 449. [illegible] § 450. [illegible] § 451. [illegible] § 452. [illegible] § 453. [illegible] § 454. [illegible] § 455. [illegible] § 456. [illegible] § 457. [illegible] § 458. [illegible] § 459. [illegible] § 460. [illegible] § 461. [illegible] § 462. [illegible] § 463. [illegible] § 464. [illegible] § 465. [illegible] § 466. [illegible] § 467. [illegible] § 468. [illegible] § 469. [illegible] § 470. [illegible] § 471. [illegible] § 472. [illegible] § 473. [illegible] § 474. [illegible] § 475. [illegible] § 476. [illegible] § 477. [illegible] § 478. [illegible] § 479. [illegible] § 480. [illegible] § 481. [illegible] § 482. [illegible] § 483. [illegible] § 484. [illegible] § 485. [illegible] § 486. [illegible] § 487. [illegible] § 488. [illegible] § 489. [illegible] § 490. [illegible] § 491. [illegible] § 492. [illegible] § 493. [illegible] § 494. [illegible] § 495. [illegible] § 496. [illegible] § 497. [illegible] § 498. [illegible] § 499. [illegible] § 500. [illegible] § 501. [illegible] § 502. [illegible] § 503. [illegible] § 504. [illegible] § 505. [illegible] § 506. [illegible] § 507. [illegible] § 508. [illegible] § 509. [illegible] § 510. [illegible] § 511. [illegible] § 512. [illegible] § 513. [illegible] § 514. [illegible] § 515. [illegible] § 516. [illegible] § 517. [illegible] § 518. [illegible] § 519. [illegible] § 520. [illegible] § 521. [illegible] § 522. [illegible] § 523. [illegible] § 524. [illegible] § 525. [illegible] § 526. [illegible] § 527. [illegible] § 528. [illegible] § 529. [illegible] § 530. [illegible] § 531. [illegible] § 532. [illegible] § 533. [illegible] § 534. [illegible] § 535. [illegible] § 536. [illegible] § 537. [illegible] § 538. [illegible] § 539. [illegible] § 540. [illegible] § 541. [illegible] § 542. [illegible] § 543. [illegible] § 544. [illegible] § 545. [illegible] § 546. [illegible] § 547. [illegible] § 548. [illegible] § 549. [illegible] § 550. [illegible] § 551. [illegible] § 552. [illegible] § 553. [illegible] § 554. [illegible] § 555. [illegible] § 556. [illegible] § 557. [illegible] § 558. [illegible] § 559. [illegible] § 560. [illegible] § 561. [illegible] § 562. [illegible] § 563. [illegible] § 564. [illegible] § 565. [illegible] § 566. [illegible] § 567. [illegible] § 568. [illegible] § 569. [illegible] § 570. [illegible] § 571. [illegible] § 572. [illegible] § 573. [illegible] § 574. [illegible] § 575. [illegible] § 576. [illegible] § 577. [illegible] § 578. [illegible] § 579. [illegible] § 580. [illegible] § 581. [illegible] § 582. [illegible] § 583. [illegible] § 584. [illegible] § 585. [illegible] § 586. [illegible] § 587. [illegible] § 588. [illegible] § 589. [illegible] § 590. [illegible] § 591. [illegible] § 592. [illegible] § 593. [illegible] § 594. [illegible] § 595. [illegible] § 596. [illegible] § 597. [illegible] § 598. [illegible] § 599. [illegible] § 600. [illegible] § 601. [illegible] § 602. [illegible] § 603. [illegible] § 604. [illegible] § 605. [illegible] § 606. [illegible] § 607. [illegible] § 608. [illegible] § 609. [illegible] § 610. [illegible] § 611. [illegible] § 612. [illegible] § 613. [illegible] § 614. [illegible] § 615. [illegible] § 616. [illegible] § 617. [illegible] § 618. [illegible] § 619. [illegible] § 620. [illegible] § 621. [illegible] § 622. [illegible] § 623. [illegible] § 624. [illegible] § 625. [illegible] § 626. [illegible] § 627. [illegible] § 628. [illegible] § 629. [illegible] § 630. [illegible] § 631. [illegible] § 632. [illegible] § 633. [illegible] § 634. [illegible] § 635. [illegible] § 636. [illegible] § 637. [illegible] § 638. [illegible] § 639. [illegible] § 640. [illegible] § 641. [illegible] § 642. [illegible] § 643. [illegible] § 644. [illegible] § 645. [illegible] § 646. [illegible] § 647. [illegible] § 648. [illegible] § 649. [illegible] § 650. [illegible] § 651. [illegible] § 652. [illegible] § 653. [illegible] § 654. [illegible] § 655. [illegible] § 656. [illegible] § 657. [illegible] § 658. [illegible] § 659. [illegible] § 660. [illegible] § 661. [illegible] § 662. [illegible] § 663. [illegible] § 664. [illegible] § 665. [illegible] § 666. [illegible] § 667. [illegible] § 668. [illegible] § 669. [illegible] § 670. [illegible] § 671. [illegible] § 672. [illegible] § 673. [illegible] § 674. [illegible] § 675. [illegible] § 676. [illegible] § 677. [illegible] § 678. [illegible] § 679. [illegible] § 680. [illegible] § 681. [illegible] § 682. [illegible] § 683. [illegible] § 684. [illegible] § 685. [illegible] § 686. [illegible] § 687. [illegible] § 688. [illegible] § 689. [illegible] § 690. [illegible] § 691. [illegible] § 692. [illegible] § 693. [illegible] § 694. [illegible] § 695. [illegible] § 696. [illegible] § 697. [illegible] § 698. [illegible] § 699. [illegible] § 700. [illegible] § 701. [illegible] § 702. [illegible] § 703. [illegible] § 704. [illegible] § 705. [illegible] § 706. [illegible] § 707. [illegible] § 708. [illegible] § 709. [illegible] § 710. [illegible] § 711. [illegible] § 712. [illegible] § 713. [illegible] § 714. [illegible] § 715. [illegible] § 716. [illegible] § 717. [illegible] § 718. [illegible] § 719. [illegible] § 720. [illegible] § 721. [illegible] § 722. [illegible] § 723. [illegible] § 724. [illegible] § 725. [illegible] § 726. [illegible] § 727. [illegible] § 728. [illegible] § 729. [illegible] § 730. [illegible] § 731. [illegible] § 732. [illegible] § 733. [illegible] § 734. [illegible] § 735. [illegible] § 736. [illegible] § 737. [illegible] § 738. [illegible] § 739. [illegible] § 740. [illegible] § 741. [illegible] § 742. [illegible] § 743. [illegible] § 744. [illegible] § 745. [illegible] § 746. [illegible] § 747. [illegible] § 748. [illegible] § 749. [illegible] § 750. [illegible] § 751. [illegible] § 752. [illegible] § 753. [illegible] § 754. [illegible] § 755. [illegible] § 756. [illegible] § 757. [illegible] § 758. [illegible] § 759. [illegible] § 760. [illegible] § 761. [illegible] § 762. [illegible] § 763. [illegible] § 764. [illegible] § 765. [illegible] § 766. [illegible] § 767. [illegible] § 768. [illegible] § 769. [illegible] § 770. [illegible] § 771. [illegible] § 772. [illegible] § 773. [illegible] § 774. [illegible] § 775. [illegible] § 776. [illegible] § 777. [illegible] § 778. [illegible] § 779. [illegible] § 780. [illegible] § 781. [illegible] § 782. [illegible] § 783. [illegible] § 784. [illegible] § 785. [illegible] § 786. [illegible] § 787. [illegible] § 788. [illegible] § 789. [illegible] § 790. [illegible] § 791. [illegible] § 792. [illegible] § 793. [illegible] § 794. [illegible] § 795. [illegible] § 796. [illegible] § 797. [illegible] § 798. [illegible] § 799. [illegible] § 800. [illegible] § 801. [illegible] § 802. [illegible] § 803. [illegible] § 804. [illegible] § 805. [illegible] § 806. [illegible] § 807. [illegible] § 808. [illegible] § 809. [illegible] § 810. [illegible] § 811. [illegible] § 812. [illegible] § 813. [illegible] § 814. [illegible] § 815. [illegible] § 816. [illegible] § 817. [illegible] § 818. [illegible] § 819. [illegible] § 820. [illegible] § 821. [illegible] § 822. [illegible] § 823. [illegible] § 824. [illegible] § 825. [illegible] § 826. [illegible] § 827. [illegible] § 828. [illegible] § 829. [illegible] § 830. [illegible] § 831. [illegible] § 832. [illegible] § 833. [illegible] § 834. [illegible] § 835. [illegible] § 836. [illegible] § 837. [illegible] § 838. [illegible] § 839. [illegible] § 840. [illegible] § 841. [illegible] § 842. [illegible] § 843. [illegible] § 844. [illegible] § 845. [illegible] § 846. [illegible] § 847. [illegible] § 848. [illegible] § 849. [illegible] § 850. [illegible] § 851. [illegible] § 852. [illegible] § 853. [illegible] § 854. [illegible] § 855. [illegible] § 856. [illegible] § 857. [illegible] § 858. [illegible] § 859. [illegible] § 860. [illegible] § 861. [illegible] § 862. [illegible] § 863. [illegible] § 864. [illegible] § 865. [illegible] § 866. [illegible] § 867. [illegible] § 868. [illegible] § 869. [illegible] § 870. [illegible] § 871. [illegible] § 872. [illegible] § 873. [illegible] § 874. [illegible] § 875. [illegible] § 876. [illegible] § 877. [illegible] § 878. [illegible] § 879. [illegible] § 880. [illegible] § 881. [illegible] § 882. [illegible] § 883. [illegible] § 884. [illegible] § 885. [illegible] § 886. [illegible] § 887. [illegible] § 888. [illegible] § 889. [illegible] § 890. [illegible] § 891. [illegible] § 892. [illegible] § 893. [illegible] § 894. [illegible] § 895. [illegible] § 896. [illegible] § 897. [illegible] § 898. [illegible] § 899. [illegible] § 900. [illegible] § 901. [illegible] § 902. [illegible] § 903. [illegible] § 904. [illegible] § 905. [illegible] § 906. [illegible] § 907. [illegible] § 908. [illegible] § 909. [illegible] § 910. [illegible] § 911. [illegible] § 912. [illegible] § 913. [illegible] § 914. [illegible] § 915. [illegible] § 916. [illegible] § 917. [illegible] § 918. [illegible] § 919. [illegible] § 920. [illegible] § 921. [illegible] § 922. [illegible] § 923. [illegible] § 924. [illegible] § 925. [illegible] § 926. [illegible] § 927. [illegible] § 928. [illegible] § 929. [illegible] § 930. [illegible] § 931. [illegible] § 932. [illegible] § 933. [illegible] § 934. [illegible] § 935. [illegible] § 936. [illegible] § 937. [illegible] § 938. [illegible] § 939. [illegible] § 940. [illegible] § 941. [illegible] § 942. [illegible] § 943. [illegible] § 944. [illegible] § 945. [illegible] § 946. [illegible] § 947. [illegible] § 948. [illegible] § 949. [illegible] § 950. [illegible] § 951. [illegible] § 952. [illegible] § 953. [illegible] § 954. [illegible] § 955. [illegible] § 956. [illegible] § 957. [illegible] § 958. [illegible] § 959. [illegible] § 960. [illegible] § 961. [illegible] § 962. [illegible] § 963. [illegible] § 964. [illegible] § 965. [illegible] § 966. [illegible] § 967. [illegible] § 968. [illegible] § 969. [illegible] § 970. [illegible] § 971. [illegible] § 972. [illegible] § 973. [illegible] § 974. [illegible] § 975. [illegible] § 976. [illegible] § 977. [illegible] § 978. [illegible] § 979. [illegible] § 980. [illegible] § 981. [illegible] § 982. [illegible] § 983. [illegible] § 984. [illegible] § 985. [illegible] § 986. [illegible] § 987. [illegible] § 988. [illegible] § 989. [illegible] § 990. [illegible] § 991. [illegible] § 992. [illegible] § 993. [illegible] § 994. [illegible] § 995. [illegible] § 996. [illegible] § 997. [illegible] § 998. [illegible] § 999. [illegible] § 1000. [illegible]

§ 1. As I am attempting to lead you to true religion, and not merely to some superficial form of it

I am sensible I can do it no otherwise than in the way of deep humiliation. And therefore supposing you are persuaded through the divine blessing on what you have before read, to take it into consideration, I would now endeavour, in the first place, with all the seriousness I can, to make you heartily sensible of your guilt before God. For I well know, that unless you are convinced of this, and affected with the conviction, all the promissions of gospel grace will be slighted, and your soul infallibly destroyed in the midst of the noblest means appointed for its recovery. I am fully persuaded that thousands live and die in a course of sin without feeling upon their hearts any real fear that they are sinners; though they cannot for shame but own it in words. And therefore let me deal faithfully with you, though I may seem to deal roughly; for complaisance is not to give law to sobriety in which the life of your soul is concerned.

§ 2. Permit me therefore, O sinner, to consider myself at this time as an advocate of God's, as one employed in his name, to plead against thee, and to charge thee with nothing less than being a rebel and a traitor against the sovereign Majesty of heaven and earth. However thou mayst be ennobled or distinguished among men; if the noblest blood run in thy veins; if thy seat were among princes, and thy arm were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living; it would be necessary thou shouldst be told, and told plainly, thou hast broken the laws of the King of kings, and by the breach of it art become obnoxious to his righteous condemnation.

§ 3. Your conscience tells you, that you were born the natural subject of God; born under the indispensable obligations of his law. For it is most apparent, that the constitution of your rational nature, which makes you capable of receiving law from God, binds you to obey it. And it is equally evident and certain that you have not exactly obeyed this law; nay, that you have violated it in many aggravated instances.

§ 4. Will you dare to deny this? Will you dare to assert your innocence? Remember it must be complete innocence: yes, and a perfect righteousness too; or it can stand you in no stead, further than to prove, that though a condemned sinner, you are not quite so criminal as some others, and will not have quite so hot a place in hell as they. And when this is considered, will you plead Not guilty to the charge? Search the records of your own conscience; for God searcheth them; ask it seriously, "Have you never in your life sinned against God?" Solomon declared that in his days There was not a just man upon earth, who did good, and sinned not; and the apostle Paul, That all had sinned, and come short of the glory of God; that both Jews and Gentiles (which you know comprehended the whole human race) were all under sin. And can you pretend any imaginable reason to believe the world is grown so much better since their days that any should now plead their own case as an exception? Or will you, however, presume to arise in the face of the omniscient Majesty of heaven, and say, I am the man?

§ 5. Supposing, as before, you have been free from those gross acts of immorality which are so pernicious to society, that they have generally been punishable by human laws, can you pretend that you have not, in smaller instances, violated the rules of piety, of temperance, and of charity? Is there any one person who has intimately known you, that would not be able to testify you had said or done something amiss? Or if others could not convict you, would not your own heart do it? Does it not prove you guilty of pride, of passion, of sensuality; of an excessive fondness for the world and its enjoyments; of murmuring, or at least of secretly repining, against God, under the strokes of his afflicting providence; of mispending a great deal of your time; of abusing the gifts of God's bounty, to vain, if not (in some instances) to pernicious, purposes; of mocking him when you have pretended to engage in his worship, drawing near to him with your mouth and your lips, while your heart has been far from him? Does not conscience condemn you of some one breach of the law, at least? And by one breach of it you are in a sense, a scriptural sense, become guilty of all; and are as incapable of being justified before God by any obedience of your own, as if you had committed ten thousand offences. But, in reality, there are ten thousand and more chargeable to your account. When you come to reflect on all your sins of negligence, as well as on those of commission; on all the instances in which you have failed to do good when it was in the power of your hand to do it; on all the instances in which acts of devotion have been omitted, especially in secret; and on all those cases in which you have shown a stupid disregard to the honour of God, and to the temporal and eternal happiness of your fellow-creatures; when all these, I say, are reviewed, the number will swell beyond all possibility of account, and force you to cry out, Mine iniquities are more than the hairs of my head. They will appear in such a light before you, that your own heart will charge you with countless multitudes; and how much more then that God, who is greater than your heart, and knoweth all things.

§ 6. And say, sinner, is it a little thing that you have presumed to set light by the authority of the God of heaven, and to violate his law, if it had been by mere carelessness and inattention? How much more heinous, therefore, is the guilt, when in so many instances you have done it knowingly and wilfully! Give me leave seriously to ask you, and let me entreat you to ask your own soul, against whom hast thou magnified thyself? Against whom hast thou exalted thy voice, or lifted up thy rebellious hand? On whose law, O sinner, hast thou presumed to trample? And whose friendship, and whose enmity, hast thou thereby dared to affront? Is it a man like thyself that thou hast insulted? Is it only a temporal monarch? Only one who can kill thy body, and then hath no more than he can do? Nay, sinner, thou wouldst not have dared to treat a temporal prince as thou hast treated the King eternal, immortal, and invisible. No price could have hired thee to deal by the majesty of an earthly sovereign, as thou hast dealt by that God before whom the cherubim and seraphim are continually bowing. Not one opposing or complaining, disputing or murmuring, word is heard among all the celestial legions, when the intimations of his will are published to them. And who art thou, O wretched man, who art thou, that thou shouldst oppose him? That thou shouldst oppose and provoke a God of infinite power and terror, who needs but exert one single act of his sovereign will, and thou art in a moment stripped of every possession; cut off from every hope; destroyed and rooted up from existence, if that were his pleasure; or, what is inconceivably worse, consigned over to the severest and most lasting agonies? Yet, this is the God whom thou hast offended; whom thou hast affronted to his face, presuming to violate his express laws in his very presence. This is the God before whom thou standest as a convicted criminal; convicted not of one or two particular offences, but of thousands and ten thousands; of a course and series of rebellions and provocations, in which thou hast persisted, more or less, ever since thou wast born; and the particulars of which have been attended with almost every conceivable circumstance of aggravation. Reflect on particulars, and deny the charge if you can.

§ 7. If knowledge be an aggravation of guilt, thy guilt, O sinner, is greatly aggravated! For thou wast born in Emanuel's land, and God hath written to thee the great things of his law, yet thou hast accounted them as a strange thing. Thou hast known to do good, and hast not done it: and therefore to thee the omission of it has been sin indeed. Hast thou not known? Hast thou not heard? Wast thou not early taught the will of God, in thine infant years? Hast thou not since received repeated lessons, by which it has been inculcated again and again, in public and in private, by preaching and reading the word of God? Nay, hath not thy duty been in some instances so plain, that even without any instruction at all, thy own reason might easily have inferred it? And hast thou not also been warned of the consequences of disobedience? Hast thou not known the righteous judgment of God, that they who commit such things are worthy of death? Yet thou hast, perhaps, not only done the same, but hast taken pleasure in those that do them; hast chosen them for thy most intimate friends and companions; so as thereby to strengthen, by the force of example and converse, the hands of each other in your iniquities.

§ 8. Nay more, if divine love and grace [illegible] aggravation of the sins committed against it, thy crimes, O sinner, are heinously aggravated. Must thou not acknowledge it, O foolish creature, and unwise? Hast thou not been nourished and brought up by him as his child, and yet hast rebelled against him? Did not God take you out of the womb? Did he not watch over you in your infant days, and guard you from a multitude of dangers, which the most careful parent or nurse could not have observed or warded off? Has he not given you your rational powers? and is it not by him you have been favoured with every opportunity of improving them? Has he not every day supplied your wants with an unwearied liberality; and added, with respect to many who will read this, the delicacies of life to its necessary supports? Has he not heard your cry, when trouble came upon you, and frequently appeared for your deliverance, when in the distress [illegible] you have called upon him for help? Has he not rescued you from ruin, when it seemed just ready to swallow you up; and healed your diseases, when it seemed to all about you, that the residue of your days was cut off in the midst? Or if it had not been so, is not this long continued and uninterrupted health, which you have enjoyed for so many years, to be acknowledged as an equivalent obligation? Look round upon all your possessions, and say what one thing have you in the world, which his goodness did not give you, and which it hath not thus far preserved to you? Add to all this, the kind notices of his will, which he hath sent you; the tender expostulations which he hath used with you, to bring you to a wiser and better temper, and the discoveries and gracious invitations of his gospel, which you have heard, and which you have despised; and then say, whether your rebellion has not been aggravated by the vilest ingratitude, and whether that aggravation can be accounted small!

§ 9. Again, if it be any aggravation of sin to be committed against conscience, thy crimes, O sinner, have been so aggravated. Consult the records of it; and then dispute the fact, if you can. There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding; and that understanding will act, and a secret conviction of being accountable to its Maker and Preserver is inseparable from the workings of it. It is easy to [illegible] remonstrances, and to give things false colourings before men; but the heart [illegible] longing excuses. Have you not often found it so? Has not conscience remonstrated against your past conduct, and have not those remonstrances been very painful to you? I have been assured by a gentleman of undoubted credit, that when he was in the prime of all the gayest accomplishments of life, and was reckoned one of the happiest of mankind to his sense, he once came into the room where he was among his merry companions, and has grieved inwardly, and said, 'Oh that I had been that dog!' And did thou, sinner, felt nothing like this? Has thy conscience been so disquieted, so seared with a hot iron, that it has never cried out of any of the wickedness which have been done it? Has it never warned thee of the fatal consequences of what thou hast done in opposition to it? These warnings are, in effect, the voice of God, they are the admonitions which he gave thee by his vicegerent in thy breast. And when his sentence for thy evil works is executed upon thee in everlasting death, thou shalt hear that voice speaking to thee again, in a louder tone, and a severer accent, than before: and then shalt be tormented with its upbraidings through eternity, because thou wouldst not, in time, hearken to its admonitions.

§ 10. Let me add further, if it be any aggravation that sin has been committed after God has been moving by his Spirit on the mind, surely your sin has been attended with that aggravation too. Under the Mosaic dispensation, dark and imperfect as it was, the Spirit strove with the Jews else Stephen could not have charged it upon them, that through all their generations they had always resisted him. Now surely we may much more reasonably apprehend, that he strives with sinners under the gospel. And have you never experienced any thing of this kind, even when there has been no external circumstance to awaken you, nor any pious teacher near you? Have you never perceived some secret impulse upon your mind, leading you to think of religion, urging you to an immediate consideration of it, sweetly inviting you to make trial of it, and warning you that you would lament this stupid neglect? O sinner, why were not these happy motions attended to? Why did you not, as it were, spread out all the sails of your soul, to catch that heavenly, that favourable breeze? But you have carelessly neglected it, you have even borne them kind reproaches, how reasonably, how might the sentence have gone forth in righteous displeasure, My Spirit shall no more strive! And indeed who can say that it is not already gone forth? If you feel no secret agitations of mind, no remorse, no awakening, while you read such a remonstrance as this, there will be room great room, to suspect it.

§ 11. There is indeed one aggravation more, which may not attend your guilt. I mean that of having committed against solemn covenant engagements. A circumstance which has lain heavy on the consciences of many who perhaps in the main series of their lives have served God with great integrity. But let me call you to think, to what is this owing? Is it not that you have never personally made any solemn profession of devoting yourself to God at all? have never done any thing, which has appeared to your own apprehension an action by which you made a covenant with him; though you have heard so much of his covenant, though you have been so solemnly and so tenderly invited into it! And in this view how monstrous must the circumstance appear, which at first was mentioned as some alleviation of guilt! Yet I must add, that you are not perhaps altogether so free from guilt on this head as you may at first imagine. I will not insist on the covenant which your parents made in your name, when they devoted you to God in baptism; though it is really a weighty matter, and by calling yourself a Christian you have professed to own and avow what they then did. But I would remind you of what may have been more personal and express. Has your heart been, even from your youth, hardened to so uncommon a degree, that you have never cried to God in any season of danger and distress? And did you never mingle vows with those cries? Did you never promise, that if God would hear and help you in that hour of extremity, you would forsake your sins, and serve him as long as you lived? He heard and helped you, or you had not been reading these lines; and by such deliverance did, as it were, bind down your vows upon you; and therefore your guilt, in the violation of them, remains before him, though you are stupid enough to forget them. Nothing is forgotten, nothing is overlooked, by him; and the day will come when the record shall be laid before you too.

§ 12. And now, O sinner, think seriously with thyself, what defence thou wilt make to all this! Prepare thine apology; call thy witnesses; make thy appeal, from him whom thou hast thus offended, to some superior judge, if such there be. Alas, those apologies are so weak and vain, that one of thy fellow-worms may easily detect and confound them, as I will endeavour presently to show thee. But thy foreboding conscience already knows the issue. Thou art convicted; convicted of the most aggravated offences. Thou hast not humbled thy heart, but lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven; and thy sentence shall come forth from his presence. Thou hast violated his known law. Thou hast despised and abused his unbidden kindness; thou hast affronted conscience, his vicegerent in thy soul; thou hast resisted and grieved his Spirit. Thou hast trifled with him in all thy pretended solemnities; and in one word, and that his own, thou hast done evil things as thou couldst. Thou canst are, no doubt, already in hell, whose guilt never equalled thine; and it is astonishing that God has spared thee to read this representation of thy case, or to make any pause upon it. O waste not so precious a moment, but enter, as attentively and humbly as thou canst, into those reflections, which suit a case so lamentable and so terrible as thine!

The Confession of a sinner concerned in general of his guilt.

"O God! thou injured Sovereign, thou all penetrating and Almighty Judge! What shall I say to this charge? Shall I pretend I am wronged by it, and stand on the defence in thy presence? I dare not do it; for thou knowest my foolishness, and none of my sins are hid from thee. My conscience tells me, that a denial of my crimes would only increase them, and add new fuel to the fire of thy deserved wrath. If I justify myself, mine own mouth will condemn me: if I say I am perfect, it will also prove me perverse. For innumerable evils have compassed me about. Mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up. They are, as I have been told in thy name, more than the hairs of my head, and therefore my heart faileth me. I am more guilty than is possible for another to declare or represent. My heart speaks more than any other accuser. And thou, O Lord, art much greater than my heart, and knowest all things.

"What has my life been, but a course of rebellion against thee? It is not this or that particular action alone I have to lament. Nothing has been right in its principles, views, and ends. My whole soul has been disordered. All my thoughts, my affections, my desires, my pursuits, have been wretchedly alienated from thee. I have acted as if I had hated thee, who art infinitely the loveliest of all beings; as if I had been contriving how I might tempt thee to the uttermost, and wear out thy patience, marvellous as it is. My actions have been evil; my words yet more evil than they; and, O blessed God, my heart, how much more corrupt than either! What an inexhausted fountain of sin has there been in it! A fountain of original corruption, which mingled its bitter streams with the days of early childhood; and which, alas, flows on even to this very day, beyond what actions or words could express. I see this to have been the case, with regard to what I can particularly survey. But oh, how many months and years have I forgotten! concerning which I only know this, in the general, that they are much like those I can remember; except it be, that I have been growing worse and worse, and provoking thy patience more and more, though every new exercise of it was more and more wonderful.

"And how am I astonished, that thy forbearance is still continued! It is because thou art God, and not man. Had I, a sinful worm, been thus injured, I could not have endured it. Had I been a prince, I had long since done justice on any rebel, whose crimes had borne but a distant resemblance to mine. Had I been a parent, I had long since cast off the ungrateful child who had made me such a return, as I have all my life long been making to thee, O thou Father of my spirit! The flame of natural affection would have been extinguished, and the sight and his very name, would have become hateful to me. Why then, O Lord, am I not cast out from thy presence? Why am I not sealed up under the irreversible sentence of destruction? That I live, I owe to thine indulgence. But oh, if there be yet any way of deliverance, if there be yet any hope for so guilty a creature, may it be opened upon me by thy gospel and thy grace! And if any further alarm, humiliation, and terror, be necessary to my security and salvation, may I meet them, and bear them all! Wound mine heart, O Lord, so that thou wilt but afterwards heal it; and break it in pieces, if thou wilt but at length condescend to bind up!"

CHAP. V.

The [illegible]

§ 1. My last discourse left the sinner in a very alarming and a very pitiable circumstance, a criminal convicted at the bar of God, disarmed of all pretences to perfect innocence and sinless obedience, and consequently obnoxious to the sentence of a holy law, which can make no allowance for any transgression, no, not for the least; but pronounces death, and a curse, against every act of disobedience: how much more, then, against those [illegible] O sinner, thy [illegible] thee before God! I would hope some of my readers will ingenuously fall under the conviction, and not think of making any apology: for sure I am, that [illegible] decent, and, all things considered, the most prudent, thing that can be done in such an unhappy circumstance. Yet I know the [illegible] of a sinful and corrupted heart: I know what excuses it makes, and [illegible] refuge, it flies to another, to fortify itself against con-

vation, and to persuade, not merely another, but itself, "That it has been in some instances to blame, it is not to be crimined as was represented. That there are, at least, considerations that plead in its favour, which, if they cannot justify, will in some degree excuse." A secret reserve of this kind, sometimes perhaps scarce formed into a distinct reflection, hinders the force of conviction, and often prevents that deep humiliation before God, which is the happiest token of approaching deliverance. I will, therefore, examine into some of these particulars, and for that purpose would seriously ask thee, O sinner, What thou hast to offer in arrest of judgment? What plea thou canst urge for thyself, why the sentence of God should not go forth against thee, and why thou shouldst not fall into the hands of his justice?

§ 2. But this I premise, that the question is not, how thou wouldst answer to me, a weak sinful worm like thyself, who am shortly to stand with thee at the same bar, (the Lord grant that I may find mercy of the Lord in that day!) but what will thou reply to thy judge? What couldst thou plead if thou wast now actually before his tribunal? where, to multiply vain words, and to frame idle apologies, would be but to increase thy guilt and provocation? Surely the very thoughts of his presence, must supersede a thousand of those trifling excuses, which now sometimes impose on a generation that are pure in their own eyes, though they are not washed from their filthiness; or while they are conscious of their own impurities, trust in words that cannot profit, and lean upon broken reeds.

§ 3. You will not, to be sure, in such a circumstance, plead, "that you are descended from pious parents." That was indeed your privilege, and woe be to you that you have abused it, and forsaken the God of your fathers. Ishmael was immediately descended from Abraham, the friend of God; and Esau was the son of Isaac, who was born according to the promise. Yet, you know, they were both cut off from the blessing, to which they apprehended they had a kind of hereditary claim. You may remember, that our Lord does not only speak of one who could call Abraham father, who was circumcised in flames, but expressly declares that many of the children of the kingdom shall be shut out of it; and when others come from the most distant parts to sit down in it, shall be distinguished from their companions in misery only by louder accents of lamentation, and more furious gnashing of teeth.

§ 4. Nor will you then presume to plead, "that you had exercised your thoughts about the speculative part of religion." For to what end can this serve, but to increase your condemnation? Since you have broken God's law, since you have contradicted the most obvious and apparent obligations of religion, to have inquired into it, and argued upon it, is a circumstance that passes your guilt more heinous. What! did you think religion was merely an exercise of men's wit, and the amusement of their curiosity? If you argued about it, on the principles of common sense, you must have judged and proved it to be a practical thing: and if it was so, why did you not practise accordingly? You knew the particular branches of it, and why then did you not attend to every one of them? To have pleaded an unavoidable ignorance, would have been the happiest plea that could have remained for you; nay, an actual, though faulty, ignorance, would have been some little allay of your guilt. But if, by your own confession, you have known your Master's will, and have not done it, you bear witness against yourself, that you deserve to be beaten with many stripes.

§ 5. Nor yet again will it suffice to say, "that you have had right notions, both of the doctrines and the precepts of religion." Your advantage for practising it was therefore the greater; but understanding, and acting, might can never go for the same thing, in the judgment of God or of man. In believing there is one God, you have done well; but the devils also believe and tremble. In acknowledging Christ to be the Son of God, and the Holy One, you have done well too; but you know the unclean spirits made this very orthodox confession, and yet they are reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day. And will you place any secret confidence in that, which might be pleaded by the infernal spirits, as well as by you?

§ 6. But perhaps you may think of pleading "that you have actually done something in religion." Having judged what faith was the soundest, and what worship the purest, "you entered yourself into those societies, where such articles of faith were professed, and such forms of worship were practised; and among those you have signalized yourself, by the exactness of your attendance, by the zeal with which you have espoused their cause, and by the earnestness with which you have contended for such principles and practices." O sinner, I much fear that this zeal of thine, about the circumstantials of religion, will swell thy account, rather than be allowed in abatement of it. He that searches thy heart, knows from whence it arose, and how far it extended. Perhaps he sees that it was all hypocrisy; an artful veil, under which thou wast carrying on thy mean designs for this world, while the sacred names of God and religion were profaned and prostituted in the basest manner: and if so, thou art cursed with a distinguished curse, for so clearing an insult on the divine omniscience, as well as justice. Or perhaps, the earnestness with which you have been contending for the faith and worship, which was once delivered to the saints, or which it is possible you may have rashly concluded to be that, might be mere pride and bitterness of spirit: and all the zeal you have expressed might possibly arise from a confidence of your own judgment, from an impatience of contradiction, or some secret malignity of spirit, which delighted itself in condemning, and even in worrying, others: yea, which (if I may be allowed the expression) fiercely preyed upon religion, as the tiger upon the lamb, to turn it into a nature most contrary to its own. And shall this screen you before the great tribunal? Shall it not rather awaken the displeasure it is pleaded to avert?

§ 7. But say, that this zeal for notions and forms has been ever so well intended, and so far as it has gone, ever so well conducted too; what will that avail towards vindicating thee in so many instances of negligence and disobedience, as are recorded against thee in the book of God's remembrance? Were the revealed doctrines of the gospel to be earnestly maintained, (as indeed they ought,) and was the great practical purpose for which they were revealed to be forgot? was the very mint, and anise, and cummin to be tithed, and were the weightier matters of the law to be omitted; even that love to God, which is its first and great command? Oh, how will thou be able to vindicate even the justest sentence thou hast passed on others, for their infidelity, or for their disobedience, without being condemned out of thy own mouth?

§ 8. Will you then plead "your fair moral character, your works of righteousness and of mercy?" Had your obedience to the law of God been complete, the plea might be allowed as important and valid. But I have supposed and proved above, that conscience testifies to the contrary, and you will not now dare to contradict it. I add further, had these works of yours, which you now urge, proceeded from a sincere love to God, and a genuine faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, you would not have thought of pleading them, any otherwise than as an evidence of your interest in the gospel covenant, and in the blessings of it, procured by the righteousness and blood of the Redeemer. And that faith, had it been sincere, would have been attended with such deep humility, and with such solemn apprehensions of the divine holiness and glory, that instead of pleading any works of your own before God, you would rather have implored his pardon for the mixture of sinful imperfection attending the very best of them. Now, as you are a stranger to this humbling and sanctifying principle, (which here, in this address, I suppose my reader to be,) it is absolutely necessary you should be plainly and faithfully told, that neither sobriety, nor honesty, nor humanity, will justify you before the tribunal of God, when he lays judgment to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, and examines all your actions and all your thoughts with the strictest severity. You have not been a drunkard, an adulterer, or a robber. So far it is well. You stand before a righteous God, who will do you ample justice, and therefore will not condemn you for drunkenness, adultery, or robbery. But you have forgotten him, your Parent and your Benefactor; you have cast off fear, and restrained prayer before him; you have despised the blood of his Son, and all the immortal blessings that he purchased with it. For this, therefore, you are judged and condemned. And as for any thing that has looked like virtue and humanity in your temper and conduct, the exercise of it has in a great measure been its own reward, if there were any thing more than form and artifice in it; and the various bounties of Divine Providence to you amidst all the numberless provocations, have been a thousand times more than an equivalent for such defective and imperfect virtues as these. You remain, therefore, chargeable with the guilt of a thousand offences, for which you have no excuse; though there are some other instances in which you did not grossly offend. And those good works in which you have been so ready to trust, will no more vindicate you in his awful presence, than a man's kindness to his poor neighbours would be allowed as a plea in arrest of judgment, when he stood convicted of high treason against his prince.

§ 9. But you will perhaps be ready to say, "You did not expect all this; you did not think the consequences of neglecting religion would have been so fatal." And why did you not think it? Why did you not examine more attentively, and more impartially? Why did you suffer the pride and folly of your vain heart to take up with such superficial appearances, and trust the light suggestions of your own prejudiced mind against the express declaration of the word of God? Had you reflected on his character as the Supreme Governor of the world, you would have seen the necessity of such a day of retribution as we are now referring to. Had you regarded the Scripture, the divine authority of which you professed to believe, every page might have taught you to expect it. "You did not think of religion:" and of what were you thinking when you forgot or neglected it? Had you too much employment of another kind? Of what kind, I beseech you? What end could you propose by any thing else of equal moment? Nay, with all your engagements, conscience will tell you, that there have been seasons, when for want of thought, time and life have been a burthen to you: yet you guarded against thought as an enemy, and cast up (as it were) an intrenchment of inconsideration around you on every side, as if it had been to defend you from the most dangerous invasion. God knew you were thoughtless, and therefore he sent you line upon line, and precept upon precept, in such plain language that it needed no genius or study to understand it. He tried you with afflictions, as well as with mercies, to awaken you out of your fatal lethargy; and yet, once awakened, you would be down again upon the bed of sloth. And now, pleasing as your dreams might be, you must be down in earnest. Repentance has at last overtaken you, and must be heard as a tormentor, since it might not be heard as a friend.

§ 10. But some may perhaps suppose that an important apology is yet unheard, and that there may be room to say "you were, by the necessity of your nature, impelled to those things, which are now charged upon you as crimes; whereas it was not in your power to have avoided them, in the circumstances in which you are placed." If this will do any thing, it indeed promises to do much; so much that it will amount to nothing. If I were disposed to answer you upon the folly and madness of your own principles, I might say, that the same consideration, which proves it was necessary for you to offend, proves also that it is necessary for God to punish you; and that indeed he cannot but do it: and I might further say, with an excellent writer of our own age, "that the same principles which destroy the injustice of sins, destroy the injustice of punishment too." But if you cannot admit this, if you should still reply, in spite of principle, that it must be unjust to punish you for an action utterly and absolutely unavoidable, I really think you would answer right. But in that answer you would contradict your own scheme, (as I observed above,) and I leave your own conscience to judge, what sort of a scheme that must be, which would make all kind of punishment unjust: for the argument will on the whole be the same, whether with regard to human punishment or divine. It is a scheme full of confusion and horror. You would not, I am sure, take it from a servant who had robbed you, and then fired your house: you would never inwardly believe, that he could not have helped it; or think, that he had fairly excused himself by such a plea. And I am persuaded, you would be so far from presuming to offer it to God at the great day, that you would not venture to turn it into a prayer even now. Imagine that you saw a malefactor dying with such words as these in his mouth: "O God, it is true, I did indeed rob and murder my fellow-creatures: but thou knowest, that, as my circumstances were ordered, I could not do otherwise; my will was irresistibly determined by the motives which thou didst set before me; and I could as well have shaken the foundations of the earth, or darkened the sun in the firmament, as have resisted the impulse which bore me on." I put it to your conscience, whether you would not look on such a speech as this with detestation, as one enormity added to another. Yet if the excuse would have any weight in your mouth, it would have equal weight in his; or would be equally applicable to any the most shocking occasion. But indeed it is so contrary to the plainest principles of common reason, that I can hardly persuade myself any one could seriously and thoroughly believe it; and should misspend my time very ill employed here, if I were to set myself to combat those pretences to argument, by which the sentiousness of human wit has attempted to varnish it over.

§ 11. You see then, on the whole, the vanity of all your pleas, and how easily the most plausible of them might be silenced, by a mortal man like yourself! How much more then by him, who searches all hearts, and can, in a moment, flash in upon the conscience a most powerful and irresistible conviction! What then can you do, while you stand convicted in the presence of God! What should you do, but hold your peace under an inward sense of your inexcusable guilt, and prepare yourself to hear the sentence, which his law pronounces against you? You must feel the execution of it, if the gospel does not at length deliver you, and you must feel something of the terror of it, before you can be excited to seek to that gospel for deliverance.

The Meditation of a convicted sinner, giving up his own pleas before God

"DEPLORABLE condition, to which I am indeed reduced! I have sinned; and what shall I say unto thee, O thou Preserver of men! What shall I dare to say! Fond that I was, to entertain myself with such trifling excuses as these, and to imagine they could have any weight in thy tremendous presence; or that I should be able so much as to mention them there! I cannot presume to do it. I am silent and confounded. My hopes, alas, are slain, and my soul itself is ready to die too, so far as an immortal soul can die; and I am almost ready to say, O that it could die entirely! I am indeed a criminal in the hand of justice, quite disarmed, and stripped of the weapons in which I trusted. Dissimulation can only add provocation to provocation; I will therefore plainly and freely own it. I have acted as if I thought God was altogether such a one as myself. But he hath said, I will reprove thee; I will set thy sins in order before thine eyes, will marshal them in battle array. And oh, what a terrible kind of host do they appear! and how do they surround me beyond all possibility of an escape! O my soul, they have, as it were, taken thee prisoner; and they are bearing thee away to the divine tribunal!

"Thou must appear before it. Thou must see the awful eternal Judge, who tries the very reins; and who needs no other evidence, for he has himself been witness to all thy rebellion. Thou must see him, O my soul, sitting in judgment upon thee! And when he is strict to mark iniquity, how wilt thou answer him for one of a thousand? And if thou canst not answer him, in what language will he speak to thee? Lord, as things at present stand, I can expect no other language than that of condemnation. And what a condemnation it is! Let me reflect upon it. Let me read my sentence before I hear it finally and irreversibly passed. I know he has recorded it in his word; and I know, in the general, that the representation of it is made with a gracious design. I know that he would have us alarmed, that we may not be destroyed. Speak to me, therefore, O God, while thou speakest not for the last time, and in circumstances when thou wilt hear me no more. Speak in the language of effectual terror, so that it be not to speak me into final despair. And let thy word, however painful in its operations, be quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword. Let me not vainly flatter myself: let me not be left a wretched prey to those who would prophesy smooth things to me, till I am sealed up under wrath, and feel thy justice piercing my soul, and the poison of thine arrows drinking up all my spirits.

"Before I enter upon the particular view, I know, in the general, that it is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the living God. O thou living God, in one sense I am already fallen into thine hands. I am become obnoxious to thy displeasure, justly obnoxious to it; and whatever thy sentence may be, when it comes forth from thy presence, I must condemn myself, and justify thee. Thou canst not treat me with more severity than mine iniquities have deserved. And how bitter soever that cup of trembling may be, which thou shalt appoint for me, I give judgment against myself, that I deserve to wring out the very dregs of it."

CHAP. VI.

The sinner sentenced.

The Sinner called upon to hear his sentence. § 1–2. God's law does now in general pronounce a curse. § 3. It pronounces death. § 4. And hence eternal misery. § 5. The final sentence shall confirm. § 6. The solemnity of that grand transaction. § 7. Its awful representations of it. § 7, 8. Why a particular consideration of the sentence. Depart, accursed. &c. § 9. The punishment of sense, and immediately follows. § 10. The sinner, second to pronounce it, endeavoring it. § 11. The reflection of a condemned with the hearing of this sentence.

§ 1. HEAR, O sinner, and I will speak yet once more, as in the name of God, of God thine Almighty Judge; who if thou dost not attend to his servants, will ere long speak unto thee in a more immediate manner, with an energy and terror which thou shalt not be able to resist.

§ 2. Thou hast been convicted, as in his presence. Thy pleas have been overruled; or rather, they have been silenced. It appears before God, it appears to thine own conscience, that thou hast nothing more to offer in arrest of judgment; therefore hear thy sentence, and summon up, if thou canst, all the powers of thy soul to bear the execution of it. It is indeed a very small thing to be judged of man's judgment; but he that now judgeth thee is the Lord. Hear therefore, and tremble, while I tell thee how he will speak to thee; or rather, while I show thee, from express Scripture, how he doth even now speak, and what is the authentic and recorded sentence of his word; even of his word, who hath said, Heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one tittle of my word shall ever pass away.

§ 3. The law of God speaks, not to thee alone, O sinner, not to thee by any particular address; but in a most universal language, it speaks to all transgressors, and levels its terrors against all offences, great or small, without any exception. And this is its language: Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them. This is its voice to the whole world; and this it speaks to thee. Its awful contents are thy personal concern, O reader; and thy conscience knows it. Far from continuing in all things that are written therein to do them, thou canst not but be sensible that innumerable evils have encompassed thee about. It is then manifest, thou art the man whom it condemns. Thou art even now cursed with a curse, as God emphatically speaks, with the curse of the most high God. Yea, all the curses which are written in the book of the law are pointed against thee. God may righteously execute any of them upon thee in a moment: and though thou at present feelest none of them, yet, if infinite mercy doth not prevent, it is but a little while, and they will come into thy bowels like water, till thou art burst asunder with them, and shall penetrate like oil into thy bones.

§ 4. Thus saith the Lord, the soul that sinneth, it shall die. But thou hast sinned, and therefore thou art under a sentence of death. And, O unhappy creature, of what a death! What will the end of these things be! That the agonies of dissolving nature shall seize thee; that thy soul shall be torn away from thy languishing body, and thou return to the dust from whence thou wast taken. This is indeed one awful effect of sin. In these affecting characters has God, through all nations and all ages of men, written the awful register and memorial of his holy abhorrence of it, and righteous displeasure against it. But alas, all this solemn pomp and horror of dying is but the opening of the dreadful scene. It is but a rough kind of stroke, by which the fetters are knocked off, when the criminal is led out to torture and execution.

§ 5. Thus saith the Lord, the wicked shall be turned into hell, even all the nations that forget God. Though there be whole nations of them, their multitudes and their power shall be no defence to them. They shall be driven into hell together into that flaming prison, which divine vengeance hath prepared, into Tophet, which is ordained of old, even for royal sinners as well as for others, as little can any human distinction protect! He hath made it deep and large; the pile thereof is fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, shall kindle it; and the flaming torrent shall flow in upon it so fast, that it shall be turned into a sea of liquid fire; or, as the Scripture also expresses it, a lake burning with fire and brimstone for ever and ever. This is the second death; and the death to which thou, O sinner, by the word of God art doomed.

§ 6. And shall this sentence stand upon record in vain? Shall the law speak it, and the gospel speak it, and shall it never be pronounced more audibly? And will God never require and execute the punishment? He will, O sinner, require it, and he will execute it, though he may seem for a while to delay. For well dost thou know, that he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the whole world in righteousness, by that Man whom he hath ordained, of which he hath given us assurance in having raised him from the dead. And when God judgeth the world, O reader, whoever thou art, he will judge thee. And while I remind thee of it, I would also remember that he will judge me. And knowing the terror of the Lord, that I may deliver my own soul, I would with all plainness and sincerity labour to deliver thine.

§ 7. I therefore repeat the solemn warning: Thou, O sinner, shalt stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. Thou shalt see that pompous appearance, the description of which is grown so familiar to thee, that the repetition of it makes no impression on thy mind. But surely, stupid as thou now art, the shrill trumpet of the archangel shall shake thy very soul; and if nothing else can awaken and alarm thee, the convulsions and flames of a dissolving world shall do it.

§ 8. Dost thou really think that the intent of Christ's final appearance is only to recover his people from the grave, and to raise them to glory and happiness? Whatever assurance thou hast that there shall be a resurrection of the just, thou hast the same that there shall also be a resurrection of the unjust; that he shall separate the rising dead one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, with equal certainty, and with infinitely greater ease. Or can you imagine that he will only make an example of some flagrant and notorious sinners, when it is said, that all the dead, both small and great, shall stand before God; and that he who knew not his Master's will, and consequently seems of all others to have had the fairest excuse for his omission to obey it, yet even he, for that very omission, shall be beaten, though with fewer stripes? Or can you think, that a sentence to be delivered with so much pomp and majesty, a sentence by which the righteous judgment of God is to be revealed, and to have its most conspicuous and final triumph, will be inconsiderable? or the punishment to which it shall consign the sinner be slight or tolerable? There would have been little reason to apprehend that, even if we had been left barely to our own conjectures what that sentence should be. But this is far from being the case. Our Lord Jesus Christ, in his infinite condescension and compassion, has been pleased to give us a copy of the sentence, and no doubt a most exact copy; and the words which contain it are worthy of being inscribed on every heart. The King, amidst all the splendour and dignity in which he shall then appear, shall say unto those on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. And where the word of a king is, there is power indeed. And these words have a power which may justly animate the heart of the humble Christian, under the most overwhelming sorrow, and may fill him with joy unspeakable and full of glory. To be pronounced the blessed of the Lord! to be called to a kingdom! to the immediate, the everlasting inheritance of it! and of such a kingdom! so well prepared, so glorious, so complete, so exquisitely fitted for the delight and entertainment of such creatures so formed and so renewed, that it shall appear worthy the eternal counsels of God to have contrived it, worthy his eternal love to have prepared it, and to have delighted itself with the views of bestowing it upon his people. Behold a blessed hope indeed! a lively glorious hope, to which we are begotten again by the resurrection of Christ from the dead, and formed by the sanctifying influence of the Spirit of God upon our minds. But it is a hope from which thou, O sinner, art at present excluded; and, methinks, that might be grievous; to reflect, "These gracious words shall Christ speak to some, to multitudes, but not to me; on me there is no blessedness pronounced; for me there is no kingdom prepared." But is that all? Alas, sinner, our Lord hath given thee a dreadful counterpart to this. He has told us what he will say to thee if thou continuest what thou art; to thee, and all the nations of the impenitent and unbelieving world, be they ever so numerous, be the rank of particular criminals ever so great. He shall say to the kings of the earth, who have been rebels against him, to the great and rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, as well as to every bond man, and every free man of inferior rank, Depart from me, accursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. O pause upon these weighty words, that thou mayst enter into something of the importance of them!

§ 9. He will say, Depart! You shall be driven from his presence with disgrace and infamy; from him, the source of life and blessedness, in a nearness to whom all the inhabitants of heaven continually rejoice. You shall depart accursed. You have broken God's law, and its curse falls upon you; and you are, and shall be, under that curse, that abiding curse: from that day forward you shall be regarded by God, and all his creatures, as an accursed and abominable thing, as the most detestable and most miserable part of the creation. You shall go into fire; and O consider into what fire! Is it merely into one fierce blaze, which shall consume you in a moment, though with exquisite pain? That were terrible. But O, such terrors are not to be named with these! Thine, sinner, is everlasting fire: it is that which our Lord hath in such awful terms described as prevailing there, Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched; and then says it a second time, Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched; and again, in wonderful compassion, a third time, Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. Nor was it originally prepared, or principally intended, for you: it was prepared for the devil and his angels; for those first grand rebels, who were immediately upon their fall doomed to it: and since you have taken part with them in their apostasy, you must sink with them into that flaming ruin; and sink so much the deeper, as you have despised a Saviour who was never offered to them. These must be your companions and your tormentors, with whom you must dwell for ever. And is it I that say this? or say not the law and the gospel the same? Does not the Lord Jesus Christ expressly say it, who is the faithful and true witness, even he who himself is to pronounce the sentence?

§ 10. And when it is thus pronounced, and pronounced by him, shall it not also be executed! Who could imagine the contrary? Who could imagine there should be all this pompous declaration, to fill the mind only with vain terror; and that this sentence should vanish into smoke? You may easily apprehend that this would be a greater reproach to the divine administration, than if sentence were never to be passed. And therefore we might easily have inferred the execution of it from the process of the preceding judgment. But lest the treacherous heart of the sinner should deceive him with so vain a hope, the assurance of that execution is immediately added, in very memorable terms. It shall be done; it shall immediately be done. Then, on that very day, while the sound of it is yet in their ears, the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment; and thou, O reader, whoever thou art, being found in their number, shalt go away with them; shalt be driven on among all these wretched multitudes, and plunged with them into eternal ruin. The wide gates of hell shall be open to receive thee; they shall be shut upon thee for ever to enclose thee; and be fast barred by the almighty hand of divine justice, to prevent all hope, all possibility, of escape for ever.

§ 11. And now, prepare thyself to meet the Lord thy God; summon up all the resolution of thy mind, to endure such a sentence, such an execution, as this: for he will not meet thee as a man; whose heart may sometimes fail him, when about to exert a needful act of severity, so that compassion may prevail against reason and justice. No, he will meet thee as a God, whose schemes and purposes are all immovable as his throne. I therefore testify to thee in his name this day, that if God be true, he will thus speak; and that if he be able, he will thus act. And on supposition of thy continuance in thy impenitence and unbelief, thou art brought into this miserable case; that if God be not either false or weak, thou art undone, thou art eternally undone.

The Reflection of a sinner struck with the terror of this sentence.

"Wretch that I am! What shall I do! or whither shall I flee? I am weighed in the balance, and am found wanting. This is indeed my doom; the doom I am to expect from the mouth of Christ himself; from the mouth of him that died for the redemption and salvation of men. Dreadful sentence! and so much the more dreadful when considered in that view! To what shall I look to save me from it! To whom shall I call? Shall I say to the rocks, Fall upon me, and to the hills, Cover me? What shall I gain by that? Were I indeed overwhelmed with rocks and mountains, they could not conceal me from the notice of his eye; and his hand could reach me with as much ease there as any where else.

"Wretch indeed that I am! Oh that I had never been born! That I had never known the dignity and prerogative of the rational nature! Fatal prerogative indeed, that renders me obnoxious to condemnation and wrath! Oh that I had never been instructed in the will of God at all, rather than that, being thus instructed, I should have disregarded and transgressed it! Would to God I had been allied to the meanest of the human race, to them that come nearest to the state of the brutes, rather than that I should have had my lot in cultivated life, amidst so many of the improvements of reason, and (dreadful reflection!) amidst so many of the advantages of religion too! and thus to have perverted all to my own destruction! Oh that God would take away this rational soul! But this it will live for ever; will live to feel the agonies of eternal death. Why have I seen the beauties and glories of a world like this, to exchange it for that flaming prison! Why have I tasted so many of my Creator's bounties to wring out at last the cup of his wrath! Why have I known the delights of social life and friendly converse, to exchange them for the horrid company of devils and damned spirits in Tophet! Oh, who can dwell with them in everlasting flames! Who can lie down with them in everlasting, everlasting, everlasting burnings!

"But whom have I to blame in all this, but myself? What have I to accuse, but my own stupid incorrigible folly? On what is all this terrible ruin to be charged, but on this one fatal cursed cause, that having broken God's law, I rejected his gospel too!

"Yet stay, O my soul, in the midst of all these doleful foreboding complaints. Can I say that I have finally rejected the gospel? Am I not to this day under the sound of it? The sentence is not yet gone forth against me in so determinate a manner as to be utterly irreversible. Through all this gloomy prospect one ray of hope breaks in, and it is possible I may be delivered.

"Reviving thought! Rejoice in it, O my soul, though it be with trembling; and turn immediately to that God, who, though provoked by ten thousand offences, has not yet sworn in his wrath, that thou shalt never be permitted to hold further intercourse with him, or to enter into his rest.

"I do then, O blessed Lord, prostrate myself in the dust before thee. I own I am a condemned and miserable creature; but my language is that of the humble publican, God be merciful to me a sinner! Some general and confused apprehensions I have of a way by which I may possibly escape. O God, whatever that way is, show it me, I beseech thee! Point it out so plainly, that I may not be able to mistake it! And oh, reconcile my heart to it, be it ever so humbling, be it ever so painful!

"Surely, Lord, I have much to learn; but be thou my teacher! Stay for a little thine uplifted hand; and, in thine infinite compassion, delay the stroke, till I inquire a little further how I may finally avoid it!"

CHAP. VII.

The helpless state of the sinner under condemnation.

§ 1. SINNER, thou hast heard the sentence of God, as it stands upon record in his sacred and immutable word. And wilt thou lie down under it in everlasting despair? Wilt thou make no attempt to be delivered from it, when it speaks nothing less than eternal death to thy soul? If a criminal, condemned by human laws, has but the least shadow of hope that he may possibly escape, he is all attention to it. If there be a friend who he thinks can help him with what a strong importunity does he entreat the interposition of that friend! And even when he is before the judge, how difficult is it often to force him away from the bar, while the cry of Mercy, mercy, mercy, mercy, may be heard, though it be never so unreasonable! A mere possibility that it may make some impression, makes him eager in it, and unwilling to be silenced and removed.

§ 2. Will thou not then, O sinner, use yet execution is done, that execution which may perhaps be done this very day, will thou not cast about in thy thoughts what measures may be taken for deliverance? Yet what measures can be taken! Consider attentively, for it is an affair of moment. Thy wisdom, thy power, thy eloquence, or thine interest, can never be exerted on a greater occasion. If thou canst help thyself, do. If thou hast any secret source of relief, go not out of thyself for other assistance. If thou hast any sacrifice to offer, if thou hast any strength to exert; yea, if thou hast any allies on earth, or in the invisible world, who can defend and deliver thee; take thy own way, so that thou mayst but be delivered at all, that we may not see thy ruin. But say, oh sinner, in the presence of God, what sacrifice thou wilt present, what strength thou wilt exert, what allies thou wilt have recourse to, on so urgent, so hopeless an occasion; for hopeless I must indeed pronounce it, if such methods are taken.

§ 3. The justice of God is injured: hast thou any atonement to make to it? If thou wast brought to an inquiry and proposal, like that of an awakened sinner, wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Alas, wert thou as great a prince as Solomon himself, and couldst thou indeed purchase such sacrifices as these, there would be no room to mention them; Lebanon would not be sufficient to burn, nor all the beasts thereof for a burnt-offering. Even under that dispensation, which admitted and required sacrifices in some cases, the blood of bulls and of goats, though it exempted the offender from further temporal punishment, could not take away sin, nor prevail by any means to purge the conscience in the sight of God. And that soul that had done ought presumptuously was not allowed to bring any sin-offering or trespass-offering at all, but was condemned to die without mercy. Now God and thy own conscience know, that thy offences have not been merely the errors of ignorance and inadvertency, but that thou hast sinned with an high hand in repeated aggravated circumstances, as thou hast acknowledged already. Shouldst thou add, with the wretched sinner described above, shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? what could the blood of a beloved child do in such a case, but dye thy crimes so much the deeper, and add a yet unknown horror to them? Thou hast offended a being of infinite majesty; and if that offence is to be expiated by blood, it must be by another kind of blood than that which flows in the veins of thy children, or in thy own.

§ 4. Wilt thou then suffer thyself, till thou hast made full satisfaction? But where shall that satisfaction be made? shall it be by any calamities to be endured in this mortal momentary life? Is the justice of God then esteemed so little a thing, that the sorrows of a few days should suffice to answer its demands? Or dost thou think of future sufferings in the invisible world? If thou dost, that is not deliverance; and with regard to that I may venture to say, when thou hast made full satisfaction thou wilt be released; when thou hast paid the utmost farthing of that debt thy prison doors shall be opened. In the mean time thou must make thy bed in hell, and, O unhappy man, wilt thou lie down there, with a secret hope that the moment will come, when the rigour of divine justice will not be able to inflict any thing more than thou hast endured, and when thou mayst claim thy discharge as a matter of right? It would indeed be well for thee if thou couldst carry down with thee such a hope, false and flattering as it is; but alas, thou wilt see things in so just a light, that to have no comfort but this, will be eternal despair. That one word of thy sentence, Everlasting fire; that one declaration, The worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched; will be sufficient to strike such a thought into black confusion, and to overwhelm thee with hopeless agony and horror.

§ 5. Or do you think that your future reformation, and diligence in duty for the time to come, will procure your discharge from this sentence? Take heed, sinner, what kind of obedience thou thinkest of offering to a holy God. That must be spotless and complete which his infinite sanctity can approve and accept, if he consider thee in thyself alone: there must be no inconstancy, no forgetfulness, no mixture of sin, attending it. And wilt thou, enfeebled as thou art, by so much original corruption, and so many sinful habits contracted by innumerable actual transgressions, undertake to render such an obedience, and that for all the remainder of thy life? In vain wouldst thou attempt it, even for one day. New guilt would immediately plunge thee into new ruin. But if it did not: if from this moment to the very end of thy life all were as complete obedience as the law of God required from Adam in paradise, would that be sufficient to cancel past guilt? Would it discharge an old debt, that thou hadst not contracted a new one? Offer this to thy neighbour, and see if he will accept it for payment; and if he will not, wilt thou presume to offer it to thy God?

§ 6. But I will not multiply words on so plain a subject. While I speak thus, time is passing away, death presses on, and judgment is approaching. And what can save thee from these awful scenes, or what can protect thee in them? Can the world save thee from that vain delusive idol of thy wishes and pursuits, to which thou art sacrificing thy eternal hopes? Well dost thou know that it will utterly forsake thee when thou needest it most; and that not one of its enjoyments can be carried along with thee into the invisible state; no, not so much as a trifle to remember it by, if thou couldst desire to remember so inconstant and so treacherous a friend as the world has been.

§ 7. And when you are dead, or when you are dying, can your sinful companions save you? Is there any one of them, if he were ever so desirous of doing it, that can give unto God a ransom for you, to deliver you from going down to the grave, or from going down to hell? Alas, you will probably be so sensible of this, that when you lie on the border of the grave, you will be unwilling to see or to converse with those that were once your favourite companions. They will afflict you rather than relieve you, even then; how much less can they relieve you before the bar of God, when they are overwhelmed with their own condemnation!

§ 8. As for the powers of darkness, you are sure they will be far from any ability or inclination to help you. Satan has been watching and labouring for your destruction, and he will triumph in it. But if there could be any thing of an amicable confederacy between you, what would that be but an association in ruin? For the day of judgment for ungodly men will also be the judgment of these rebellious spirits; and the fire into which thou, O sinner, must depart, is that which was prepared for the devil and his angels.

§ 9. Will the celestial spirits then save thee? will they interpose their power, or their prayers, in thy favour? An interposition of power, when sentence is gone forth against thee, were an act of rebellion against heaven, which these holy and excellent creatures would abhor. And when the final pleasure of the Judge is known, instead of interceding in vain for the wretched criminal, they would rather, with adoring zeal for the glory of their Lord, and cordial acquiescence in the determination of his wisdom and justice, prepare to execute it. Yea, difficult as it may at present be to conceive it, it is a certain truth, that the servants of Christ who now most tenderly love you, and most affectionately seek your salvation, and excepting those who are allied to you in the nearest bonds of patience of friendship, even they shall put their hands to it. Now indeed their bowels yearn over you, and their eyes pour out tears on your account: now they expostulate with you, and plead with God for you, if by any means, while there is hope, you may be plucked as a firebrand out of the burning. But alas, their remonstrances you will not regard; and as for their prayers, what should they ask for you? What but this, that you may see yourselves to be undone? and that, utterly despairing of any help from yourselves, or from any created power, you may lie before God in humility and brokenness of heart: that submitting yourselves to his righteous judgment, and in an utter denunciation of all self-dependence, and of all creature dependence, you may lift up an humble look towards him, as almost from the depths of hell, if peradventure he may have compassion upon you, and may himself direct you to that only method of rescue, which, while things continue as in present circumstances they are, neither earth, nor hell, nor heaven can afford you.

The Lamentation of a sinner in this miserable condition.

"Oh doleful, uncomfortable, helpless state! Oh wretch that I am, to have reduced myself to it! Poor, empty, miserable, abandoned creature! Where is my pride, and the haughtiness of my heart! Where are my idol deities whom I have loved, and served, after whom I have walked, and whom I have sought, whilst I have been multiplying my transgressions against the Majesty of heaven! Is there no hand to save me! Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me, hath seized me! I feel it pressing me hard; and what shall I do? Perhaps they have pity upon me: but, alas, how feeble a compassion! Only, if there be any where in the whole compass of nature any help, tell me where it may be found! O point it out, direct me towards it, or rather, confounded and astonished as my mind is, take me by the hand, and lead me to it.

"O ye ministers of the Lord, whose office it is to guide and comfort distressed souls, take pity upon me! I fear I am a pattern of many other helpless creatures, who have the like need of your assistance. Lay aside your other cares, to care for my soul; to care for this precious soul of mine, which lies as it were bleeding to death, (if that expression may be used,) while you perhaps hardly afford me a look; or, glancing an eye upon me, pass over to the other side. Yet, alas, in a case like mine, what can your intercession avail, if it be alone? if the Lord do not help me, how can you help me?

"O God of the spirits of all flesh, I lift up mine eyes unto thee, and cry unto thee, according to the bells of my [illegible]. I cry unto thee, as it were, from the borders of it. Yet while I lie before thee in this miserable distress, I know that there is a [illegible] goodness and love, and that not a way for my recovery.

"Thou art he whom I have most of all injured and offended: and yet from thee alone must I now seek redress. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done evil in thy sight: so that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest, though thou shouldst this moment adjudge me to eternal misery. And yet I find something that secretly draws me to thee, as if I might find rescue there, where I have found the most aggravated destruction. Blessed God, I have destroyed myself: but in thee is my help, if there can be help at all.

"I know, in general, that thy ways are not as our ways, nor thy thoughts as our thoughts: but as the heavens are high above the earth, so are thy ways above our ways, and thy thoughts above our thoughts. Have mercy therefore upon me, O God, according to thy loving-kindness, according to the multitude of thy tender mercies! Oh point out the path to the city of refuge! Oh lead me thyself in the way everlasting! I know, in general, that thy gospel is the only remedy; O teach thy servants to administer it! Oh prepare mine heart to receive it! and suffer not sin to make [illegible] that noble medicine, which has spread itself through all my nature, to turn that noble medicine into poison!"

CHAP. VIII

News of salvation by Christ brought to the convicted and condemned sinner.

[illegible]

§ 1. My dear reader, it is the great design of the gospel, and, wherever it is cordially received, it is the glorious effects of it, to fill the heart with sentiments of love, to teach us to abhor all unnecessary rigour and severity, and to delight, not in the grief, but in the happiness of our fellow-creatures. I can heartily apprehend how he can be a Christian, who takes pleasure in the distress which appears even in a brute, much less in that of a human mind; and especially in such distress as the thoughts I have been proposing must give, if there be any due attes-

tion to their weight and energy. I have often felt a tender regret, while I have been representing these things; and I could have wished from my heart that it had not been necessary to have placed them in so severe and so painful a light. But now I am addressing myself to a part of my work, which I undertake with unutterable pleasure; and to that which indeed I had in view, in all these awful things which I have already been laying before you. I have been showing you, that if you hitherto have lived in a state of impenitence and sin, you are condemned by God's righteous judgment, and have in yourself no spring of hope, and no possibility of deliverance. But I mean not to leave you under this sad apprehension, to lie down and die in despair, complaining of that cruel zeal, which has tormented you before your time.

§ 2. Arise, O thou dejected soul, that art prostrate in the dust before God, and trembling under the terror of his righteous sentence: for I am commissioned to tell thee, that though thou hast destroyed thyself, in God is thy help. I bring thee good tidings of great joy, which delight my own heart, while I proclaim them, and will, I hope, reach and revive thine; even the tidings of salvation, by the blood and righteousness of the Redeemer. And I give it thee for thy greater security, in the words of a gracious and forgiving God, that "he is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, and not imputing to them their trespasses."

§ 3. This is the best news that ever was heard, the most important message which God ever sent to his creatures: and though I doubt not at all but, living as you have done, in a Christian country, you have heard it often, perhaps a thousand and a thousand times, I will, with all simplicity and plainness, repeat it to you again, and repeat it as if you had never heard it before. If thou, O sinner, shouldst now for the first time feel it, then will it be as a new gospel unto thee, though so familiar to thy ear; nor shall it be grievous for me to speak what is so common, since to you it is safe and necessary. They who are most deeply and intimately acquainted with it, instead of being cloyed and satiated, will hear it with distinguished pleasure; and as for those who have hitherto slighted it, I am sure they had need to hear it again. Nor is it absolutely impossible, that some one soul at least may read these lines, who hath never been clearly and fully instructed in this important doctrine, though his everlasting all depends on knowing and receiving it. I will therefore take care that such a one shall not have it to plead at the bar of God, that though he lived in a Christian country, he was never plainly and faithfully taught the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ, the way, the truth, and the life, by whom alone we come unto the Father.

§ 4. I do therefore testify unto you this day, that the holy and gracious Majesty of heaven and earth, foreseeing the fatal apostasy into which the whole human race would fall, did not determine to deal in a way of strict and rigorous severity with us, so as to consign us over to universal ruin and inevitable damnation: but on the contrary, he determined to enter into a treaty of peace and reconciliation, and to publish to all, whom the gospel should reach, the express offers of life and glory, in a certain method, which his infinite wisdom judged suitable to the purity of his nature, and the honour of his government. This method was indeed a most astonishing one, which, familiar as it is to our thoughts and our tongues, I cannot recollect and mention without great amazement. He determined to send his own Son into the world, the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, partaker of his own divine perfections and honours, to be not merely a teacher of righteousness and a messenger of grace, but also a sacrifice for the sins of men; and would consent to his saving them, on no other condition but this, that he should not only labour but die in the cause.

§ 5. Accordingly, at such a period of time as Infinite Wisdom saw most convenient, the Lord Jesus Christ appeared in human flesh: and after he had gone through incessant and long-continued fatigues, and borne all the preceding injuries, which the ingratitude and malice of men could inflict, he voluntarily submitted himself to death, even the death of the cross; and having been delivered for our offences, was raised again for our justification. After his resurrection, he continued long enough on earth to give his followers most convincing evidences of it, and then ascended into heaven in their sight; and sent down his Spirit from thence upon his apostles, to enable them, in the most persuasive and authoritative manner, to preach the gospel: and he has given it in charge to them, and to those who in every age succeed them in this part of their office, that it should be published to every creature; that all who believe in it may be saved, by virtue of its abiding energy, and the immutable power and grace of its divine Author, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

§ 6. This gospel do I therefore now preach and proclaim unto thee, O reader, with the sincerest desire, that, through divine grace, it may this very day be salvation to thy soul. Know therefore, and consider it, whosoever thou art, that as surely as these words are now before thy eyes, so surely it is that the incarnate Son of God was made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men; his back torn with scourges, his head with thorns, his limbs stretched out as on a rack, and nailed to the accursed tree; and in this miserable condition he was hung by his hands and his feet, as an object of public infamy and contempt. Thus did he die, in the midst of all the insults and insults of his cruel enemies, who thirsted for his blood; and, which was the saddest circumstance of all in the relish of those agonies with which he closed the most innocent, perfect, and useful life that ever was spent upon earth, he had not those supports of the divine presence, which sinful men have often experienced, when they have been suffering for the testimony of their conscience. They have often burst out into transports of joy, and songs of praise, while their executioners have been glutting their hellish malice, and more than savage barbarity, by making their torments artificially grievous; but the crucified Jesus cried out, in the distress of his spotless and holy soul, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

§ 7. Look upon our dear Redeemer; look up to this mournful, dreadful, yet, in one view, delightful, spectacle; and then ask thy own heart, Do I believe that Jesus suffered and died thus? And why did he suffer and die? Let me answer in God's own words. He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, and the chastisement of our peace was upon him, that by his stripes we might be healed; it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and to put him to grief, when he made his soul an offering for sin; for the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all. So that I may address you in the words of the apostle, Be it known unto you therefore, that through this Man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; as it was his command, just after he rose from the dead, that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem: the very place where his blood had so lately been shed in such a cruel manner. I do therefore testify to you, in the words of another inspired writer, that Christ was made sin, that is, a sin-offering, for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him; that is, that through the righteousness he has fulfilled, and the atonement he has made, we might be accepted by God as righteous, and be not only pardoned, but received into his favour. To you is the word of this salvation sent; and to you, O reader, are the blessings of it even now offered by God, sincerely offered; so that, after all that I have said under the former heads, it is not your having broken the law of God, that shall prove your ruin, if you do not also reject his gospel. It is not all those legions of sins which rise up in battle array against you that shall be able to destroy you, if unbelief do not lead them on, and final impenitency do not bring up the rear. I know that guilt is a tremendous thing; I will therefore speak in the words of God himself, nor can any be more comfortable. He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life; and he shall never come into condemnation: there is therefore now no condemnation to him or degree of it to any one of them, who are in Jesus Christ, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. You have indeed been a very great sinner, and your offences have truly been attended with most heinous aggravations; nevertheless, you may rejoice in the assurance, that where sin hath abounded, there shall grace much more abound; that where sin hath reigned unto death, where it has had its most undisputed sway, and most unresisted triumph, there shall righteousness reign to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. That righteousness, to which on believing on him thou wilt be entitled, shall not only break those chains, by which sin is (as it were) dragging thee at its chariot wheels with a furious pace to eternal ruin; but it shall clothe thee with the robes of salvation, shall fix thee on a throne of glory, where thou shalt live and reign for ever among the princes of heaven, shall set thee in immortal beauty and joy; without one remaining scar of divine displeasure upon thee; without one single mark by which it could be known, that thou hadst ever been obnoxious to wrath and a curse; except it be an anthem of praise to the Lamb that was slain, and has washed thee from thy sins in his own blood.

† 8. Nor is it necessary, in order to thy being released from guilt, and entitled to this high and complete felicity, that thou shouldst, before thou wilt venture to apply to Jesus, bring any good works of thy own to recommend thee to his acceptance. It is indeed true, that if thy faith be sincere, it will certainly produce them, but I have the authority of the word of God to tell thee, that if thou this day sincerely believest in the name of the Son of God, thou shalt this day be taken under his care, and be numbered among those of his sheep to whom he hath graciously declared, that he will give eternal life, and that they shall never perish. Thou hast no need therefore to say, Who shall go up into heaven, or who shall descend into the deep for me? So the word is nigh thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart. With this joyful message I leave thee; with this faithful saying, indeed worthy of all acceptation; with this gospel, O sinner, which is my life, and which, if thou dost not reject it, will be thine for

The author's Reflections on what is said above.

"Oh, my soul, how astonishing is the message which thou hast this day received! I have indeed often heard it before; and it is grown so common to me, that the surprise is not sensible. But reflect, O my soul, what is it thou hast heard! and say, whether the name of the Saviour, whose message it is, may not well be called Wonderful, Counsellor, when he displays before thee such wonders of love, and proposes to thee such counsels of peace!"

"Blessed Jesus, is it indeed thus? is it not the fiction of the human mind? Surely it is not! what human mind could have invented or conceived it? Is it a plain, a certain fact, that thou didst leave the magnificence and joy of the heavenly world, in compassion to such a wretch as I! O hadst thou, from that height of dignity, and felicity, only looked down upon me for a moment, and sent some gracious word to me for my direction and comfort, even by the least of thy servants, justly might I have prostrated myself in grateful admiration, and have kissed the very footsteps of him that published the salvation. But didst thou condescend to be thyself the messenger? what grace had that been though thou hadst but once in person made the declaration, and immediately returned back to the throne, from whence divine compassion brought thee down! But this is not all the triumph of thine illustrious grace. It not only brought thee down to earth, but kept thee here, in a frail and wretched tabernacle, for long successive years; and at length it cost thee thy life, and stretched thee out as a malefactor upon the cross, after thou hadst borne insults and cruelty, which it may justly wound my heart so much as to think of. And thus thou hast atoned injured justice, and redeemed me to God with thine own blood.

"What shall I say? Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief! It seems to put faith to the stretch, to admit, what it indeed exceeds the utmost stretch of imagination to conceive. Blessed, for ever blessed, be thy name, O thou Father of mercies, that thou hast contrived the way! Eternal thanks to the Lamb that was slain, and to that kind providence that sent the word of this salvation to me! Oh let me not, for ten thousand worlds, receive the grace of God in vain! Oh impress this gospel upon my soul, till its saving virtue be diffused over every faculty! Let it not only be heard, and acknowledged, and professed, but felt! Make it thy power to my eternal salvation, and raise me to that humble tender gratitude, to that active unwearied zeal in thy service, which becomes one to whom so much is forgiven, and forgiven upon such terms as these!

"I feel a sudden glow in my heart, while these tidings are sounding in mine ears: but oh, let it not be a slight superficial transport! Oh let not this, which I would fain call my Christian joy, be as that foolish laughter, with which I have been so madly enchanted, like the crackling blaze of thorns under a pot! Oh teach me to secure this mighty blessing, this glorious hope, in the method which thou hast appointed! and preserve me from mistaking the joy of nature, while it catches a glimpse of its rescue from destruction, for that consent of grace, which embraces and insures the deliverance!"

CHAP. IX.

A more particular account of the way by which this salvation is to be obtained.

[illegible]

§ 1. I now consider you, my dear reader, as coming to me with the inquiry which the Jews once addressed to our Lord, What shall we do that we may work the works of God? "What method shall I take to secure that redemption and salvation which I am told Christ has procured for his people?" I would answer it as seriously and carefully as possible; as one that knows of what importance it is to you to be rightly informed, and that knows also how strictly he is to answer to God, for the sincerity and care with which the reply is made. May I be enabled to speak as his oracle, that is, in such a manner as faithfully to echo back what the sacred oracles teach!

§ 2. And here, that I may be sure to follow the safest guides and the fairest examples, I must preach salvation to you in the way of repentance towards God, and of faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. That good old doctrine which the apostles preached, and which no man can pretend to change, but at the peril of his own soul, and of theirs who attend to him.

§ 3. I suppose that you are by this time convinced of your guilt and condemnation, and of your own inability to recover yourself. Let me nevertheless urge you to feel that conviction yet more deeply, and to impress it with yet greater weight upon your soul; that you have undone yourself, and that in yourself is not your help found. Be persuaded, therefore, expressly, and solemnly, and sincerely, to give up all self-dependence; which, if you do not guard against, will be ready to return secretly, before it is observed, and will lead you to attempt building up what you have just been destroying.

§ 4. Be assured, that if ever you are saved, you must ascribe that salvation entirely to the free grace of God. If, guilty and miserable as you are, you are not only accepted, but crowned, you must lay down your crown with all humble acknowledgment before the throne. No fresh moral glow in the pure sense, but he that glorieth must glory in the Lord: for of him are we in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. And you must be sensible you are in such a state, as having none of these in yourself, to need them in another. You must therefore be sensible that you are in a miserable and guilty, polluted and enslaved state, or, to use Scripture phrases, with regard to some who are under a Christian profession, that you are sinners, poor and wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.

§ 5. If these views be deeply impressed upon your mind, you will be prepared to receive what I am now to say. Hear therefore, in a few words your duty, your remedy, and your safety. Which consists in this: "That you must apply to Christ with a deep abhorrence of your former sins, and a firm resolution of forsaking them, leaning that conviction on the strength of his grace, and fixing your dependence on him for your acceptance with God, even while you are purposing to do your very best, and when you have actually done the best you ever will do in consequence of that purpose."

§ 6. The first and most important advice that I can give you in your present circumstances, is, that you look to Christ, and apply yourself to him. And here my text in your heart, Who shall ascend into heaven, to bring him down to me? or, Who shall raise me up thither, to present me before him? The blessed Jesus, by whom all things consist, by whom the whole system of them is supported, "forgotten as he is by most that bear his name," is not far from any of us: nor could he have promised to have been wherever two or three are met together in his name, but in consequence of those truly divine perfections by which he is every where present. Would you therefore, O sinner, desire to be saved? go to the Saviour. Would you desire to be delivered? look to that great Deliverer: and though you should be so overwhelmed with guilt, and shame, and fear, and horror, that you should be incapable of speaking to him, fall down in this speechless confusion at his feet; and behold him as the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world.

§ 7. Behold him therefore with an attentive eye, and say, whether the sight does not touch, and even melt, thy very heart? Dost thou not feel what a foolish and what a wretched creature thou hast been; that for the sake of such low and sordid gratifications and interests as those which thou hast been pursuing, thou shouldst thus kill the Prince of life? Behold the deep wounds which he bore for thee. Look on him whom thou hast pierced, and surely thou must mourn; unless thy heart be hardened into stone. Which of thy past sins canst thou reflect upon, and say, "But that it was worth my while thus to have incurred my Saviour's, and to have exposed the Son of God to such sufferings!" And what future temptations can arise, so considerable that thou shouldst say, "For the sake of this I will certainly my Lord again?" Sinner, thou must repent of every sin, and must forsake it; but if thou dost it to any purpose, I well know it must be at the foot of the cross. Thou must renounce every lust, even the dearest; though it should be like a right hand or a right eye; and therefore, that thou mayst, if possible, be animated to it, I have led thee to that altar on which Christ himself was sacrificed for thee, an offering of a sweet smelling savour. Thou must yield up thyself to God, as one alive from the dead, and therefore I have shewed thee at what a price he purchased thee: for thou wast not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of the Son of God, that Lamb without blemish and without spot. And now I would ask thee, as before the Lord, What does thy own heart say to it? Art thou grieved for thy former offences? Art thou willing to forsake thy sins? Art thou willing to become the cheerful, thankful servant of him who hath purchased thee with his own blood?

§ 8. I will suppose such a purpose as this arising in thy heart. How determinate it is, and how effectual it may be, I know not; what different views may rise hereafter, or how soon the present sense may wear off. But this I assuredly know, that thou wilt never see reason to change these views: for however thou mayst alter, the Lord Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. And the reasons that now recommend repentance and faith as fit and necessary, will continue invariable, as long as the perfections of the blessed God are the same, and as long as his Son continues the same.

§ 9. But while you have these views and these purposes, I must remind you that this is not all which is necessary to your salvation. You must not only purpose, but, as God gives opportunity, you must act, as those who are convinced of the evil of sin, and of the necessity and excellence of holiness. And that you may be enabled to do so in other instances, you must, in the first place, and as the first great work of God, (as our Lord himself calls it,) believe in him whom God hath sent: you must confide in him. "I must commit your soul into the hands of Christ, to be saved by him in his own appointed method of salvation." This is the great act of saving faith: and I pray God that you may experimentally know what it means: so as to be able to say, with the apostle Paul, in the near views of death itself, I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him until that day; that great decisive day, which, if we are Christians, we have always in view. To this I would urge you; and O that I could be so happy as to engage you to it while I am illustrating it in this and the following addresses! Be assured you must not apply yourselves immediately to God as absolutely, or in himself considered, in the neglect of a mediator. It will neither be acceptable to him, nor safe for you, to rush into his presence without any regard to his own Son.

whom he hath appointed to introduce sinners to him. And if you come otherwise, you come as one who is not a sinner. The very manner of presenting the address will be interpreted as a denial of that guilt with which he knows you are chargeable: and therefore he will not admit you, nor so much as look upon you. And accordingly, our Lord, knowing how much every man living was concerned in this, says in the most universal terms, No man cometh unto the Father but by me.

§ 10. Apply therefore to this glorious Redeemer, amiable (as he will appear to every believing eye,) in the blood which he shed upon the cross, and in the wounds which he received there. Go to him, O sinner, this day, this moment, with all thy sins about thee. Go just as thou art; for if thou wilt never apply to him till thou art first righteous and holy, thou wilt never be righteous and holy at all: nor canst be so on this supposition, unless there were some way of being so without him; and then there would be no occasion for applying to him for righteousness and holiness. It were indeed as if it should be said, that a sick man should defer his application to a physician, till his health is recovered. Let me therefore repeat it without offence, go to him just as thou art, and say, (O that thou mayst this moment be enabled to say it from thy very soul!) "Blessed Jesus, I am surely one of the most sinful, and one of the most miserable, creatures that ever fell prostrate before thee: nevertheless, I come, because I have heard that thou didst once say, Come unto me all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. I come, because I have heard thou didst graciously say, Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out. O thou Prince of peace, O thou King of glory, I am a condemned miserable sinner. I have ruined my own soul, and am condemned for ever, if thou dost not help me, and save me. I have broken thy Father's law and thine, for thou art one with him. I have deserved condemnation and wrath; and I am even at this very moment under a sentence of everlasting destruction; a destruction which will be aggravated by all the contempt which I have cast upon thee, O thou bleeding Lamb of God, for I cannot, and will not, dissemble it before thee, that I have wronged thee, most basely and ungratefully wronged thee, under the character of a Saviour, as well as of a Lord. But now I am willing to submit to thee, and I have brought my poor trembling soul, to lodge it in thine hands, if thou wilt condescend to receive it, and if thou dost not, it must perish. O Lord, I lie at thy feet; stretch out thy golden sceptre that I may live! Yea, if it please the King, let the life of my soul be given me at my petition." I have no treasure wherewith to purchase it; I have no equivalent to give thee for it; but if that compassionate heart of thine can find a pleasure in saving one of the most distressed creatures under heaven, that pleasure thou mayst here find. O Lord, I have foolishly attempted to be mine own saviour; but it will not do. I am sensible the attempt is vain; and therefore I give it over, and look unto thee. On thee, blessed Jesus, who art sure and stedfast, do I desire to fix my anchor. On thee, as the only sure foundation, would I build my eternal hopes. To thy teaching, O thou unerring Prophet of the Lord, would I submit: be thy doctrines ever so mysterious, it is enough for me that thou thyself hast said it. To thine atonement, obedience, and intercession, O thou holy and ever acceptable High Priest, would I trust. And to thy government, O thou exalted Sovereign, would I yield a willing delightful subjection: in token of reverence and love, I kiss the Son; I kiss the ground before his feet. I admit thee, O my Saviour, and welcome thee with unutterable joy to the throne in my heart. Ascend it, and reign there for ever! Subdue mine enemies, O Lord, for they are thine; and make me thy faithful and zealous servant; faithful to death, and zealous to eternity!"

§ 11. Such as this must be the language of your heart before the Lord. But then remember, that in consequence thereof, it must be the language of your life too. The unmeaning words of the lips would be a vain mockery. The most affectionate transport of the passions, should it be transient and ineffectual, would be but like a blaze of straw, presented instead of incense at his altar. With such humility, with such love, with such cordial self-dedication and submission of soul, must thou often prostrate thyself in the presence of Christ; and then thou must go away, and keep him in thy view; must go away, and live unto God through him, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and behaving thyself soberly, righteously, and godly in this vain insnaring world. You must make it your care to show your love by obedience; by pleasing him, as much as possible, according to the temper and manner of Jesus, in whom you believe. You must make it the great point of your ambition, (and a nobler view you cannot entertain,) to be a living image of Christ; that so far as circumstances will allow, even those who have heard and read but little of him, may, by observing you, in some measure see and know what kind of a life that of the blessed Jesus was. And this must be your constant care, your prevailing character, as long as you live. You must follow him, whithersoever he leads you; must follow with a cross on your shoulder, when he commands you to take it up; and so must be faithful even unto death, expecting the crown of life.

§ 12. Thus, so far as I have been able to learn from the word of God, is the way to safety and glory the surest, the only way you can take. It is the way which every faithful minister of Christ her trod, and is treading; and the way to which, as he holds to the salvation of his own soul, he must direct others. We cannot see how it could not arise in the heart of every true and honest friend. It is the way in which alone, as far as we can judge, it has seen fit, blessed God! to save the apostate creatures. And therefore, reader, I beseech and entreat you seriously to consider it; and let your own conscience answer as in the presence of God, whether you are willing to acquiesce in it, or not. But know, that to reject it is DEATH eternal death. For as there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved but that of Jesus of Nazareth, so there is no other method but that, in which Jesus himself will save us.

The author deliberates on the expediency of following it with this method of salvation.

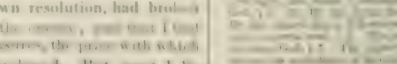
"CONSCIENCE. O my soul, what answer wilt thou return to such proposals as these? Surely, if I were to speak the first dictate of this corrupt and degenerate heart, it would be, This is a hard saying, and who can hear it? To be thus humbled thus mortified, thus subjected! To take such a yoke upon me, and to carry it as long as I live! To give up every darling lust, though dear to me as a right eye, and seemingly necessary as a right hand! To submit not only my life, but my heart, to the command and discipline of another! To have a master there, and such a master, as will control many of its favourite affections, and direct them quite into another channel; a master who himself opposes his commands, by taking up the cross and following him! To adhere to the strictest rules of godliness and sobriety, of righteousness and truth; not departing from them in any allowed instance, great or small, upon any temptation for any advantage, to escape any inconvenience and evil, no, not even for the preservation of life itself; but, upon a proper call of Providence, to act as if I hated even my own life! Lord, it is hard to flesh and blood; and yet I perceive and feel there is one demand yet harder than this.

"With all these precautions, with all these mortifications, the pride of my nature would find some inward resource of pleasure, might I but secretly think that I had been my own saviour; that my own wisdom, and my own resolution, had broken the bands and chains of the enemy, and that I had drawn out of my own treasuries, the price with which my redemption was purchased. But must I lie down before another as guilty and condemned, as weak and helpless" and must the obligation be undisputed, and must a mediator have the whole true! Must I go to thy cross for my salvation and seek my glory from the poverty of that! Must I be stripped of every pleasing pretence to righteousness and stand in this respect upon a level with the vilest of men! Stand at the last amongst the greatest criminals pleading guilty with them and seeking deliverance by that very act of grace whereby they have obtained it!

"I dare not deliberately say, this method is unreasonable. My conscience testifies, that I have sinned and cannot be justified before God, as an innocent and obedient creature. My conscience tells me, that all these humbling circumstances are fit, that it is fit a convicted criminal should be brought upon his knees; that a captive rebel should give up the weapons of his rebellion, and bow before his sovereign. If he expect his life. Yea my reason, as well as my conscience, tells me, that it is fit and necessary, that if I am saved at all, I should be saved from the power and love of sin, as well as from the condemnation of it: and that a contrary mercy gives up a soul for ever having deserved eternal death, it is most fit I should yield myself to God, as alive from the dead. But, oh wretched man that I am, I feel a law in my members that wars against the law of my mind, and captives me into subjection of my reason and conscience. Who shall deliver me from this bondage! Who shall make me willing to do that, which I know in my own soul to be most expedient! O Lord, sanctify my heart, and let it not be drawn so strongly one way, while the nobler powers of my mind would direct it another! Conquer every licentious principle within, that it may be my joy to be so wisely governed, and restrained! Especially, subdue my pride, that loudly corruption, which so ill suits an impoverished and a condemned creature; that thy way of salvation be made amiable to me, in proportion to the degree in which it is humbling! I feel a disposition to linger in Sodom, but oh be merciful to me, and pull me out of it, before the storm of thy flaming vengeance fall, and there be no more escaping!"

CHAP. X.

The author seriously argued and concluded to accept of salvation in this way.



"THUS far have I often known convictions and impressions to arise, for I might judge by the strongest appearances (which alas! all have more or less) Satan unhappy circumstances of external temptation, ever joined by the inward reluctance of an unconvinced heart to this lowly and humbling scheme of redemption, has been the ruin of multitudes. And through the deceitfulness of sin they have been hardened, till they seem to have been utterly destroyed, and that without remedy. And therefore, O thou immortal creature, who art now reading these lines, I beseech thee, that while affairs are in this critical situation, while there are these balancings of mind between accepting and rejecting that glorious gospel, which, in the integrity of my heart, I have now been laying before you, you would once more give me an attentive audience, while I plead in God's behalf, (shall I say?) or rather in your own: while as an ambassador from Christ, and as though God did beseech you by me, I pray you in Christ's stead, that you would be reconciled to God; and would not, after these awakenings and these inquiries, by a madness which it will surely be the doleful business of a miserable eternity to lament, reject this compassionate counsel of God towards you.

§ 2. One would indeed imagine there should be no need of importunity here. One would conclude, that as soon as perishing sinners are told, that an offended God is ready to be reconciled; that he offers them a full pardon for all their aggravated sins; yea, that he is willing to adopt them into his family now, that he may at length admit them to his heavenly presence; all should with the utmost readiness and pleasure embrace so kind a message, and fall at his feet in speechless transports of astonishment, gratitude, and joy. But alas, we find it much otherwise. We see multitudes quite unmoved, and the impressions which are made on many more, are feeble and transient. Lest it should be thus with you, O reader, let me urge the message with which I have the honour to be charged: let me entreat you to be reconciled to God, and to accept of pardon and salvation in the way in which it is so freely offered to you.

§ 3. I entreat you, "by the majesty of that God, in whose name I come;" whose voice fills all heaven with reverence and obedience. He speaks not in vain to legions of angels: but if there could be any contention among those blessed spirits, it would be, who should be first to execute his commands. O let him not speak in vain to a wretched mortal! I entreat you, "by the terrors of his wrath," who could speak to you in thunder; who could, by one single act of his will, cut off this precarious life of yours, and send you down to hell. I beseech you, "by his mercies, by his tender mercies;" by the bowels of his compassion, which still yearn over you, as those of a parent over a dear son, over a tender child, whom notwithstanding his former ungrateful rebellion, he earnestly remembers still. I beseech and entreat you, "by all this paternal goodness," that you do not (as it were) compel him to lose the character of the gentle parent in that of [illegible] regard to those whom he hath just called his sons and daughters) a [illegible] which shall burn unto the lowest hell.

§ 4. I beseech you, further, "by the name and love of our dying Saviour." I beseech you, by all the condescension of his incarnation; by that poverty to which he voluntarily submitted, that you might be enriched with eternal treasures; by all the gracious invitations which he gave, which still sound in his word, and still coming (as it were) warm from his heart, are sweeter than honey or the honeycomb. I beseech you, by all his glorious works of power and of wonder, which were also works of love. I beseech you, by the memory of the most benevolent person, and the most generous friend. I beseech you, by the memory of what he suffered, as well as of what he said and did; by the agony which he endured in the garden, when his body was covered with a dew of blood. I beseech you, by all that tender distress which he felt, when his dearest friends forsook him and fled, and his blood-thirsty enemies dragged him away like the meanest of slaves, and like the vilest of criminals. I beseech you, by the blows and bruises, by the stripes and lashes, which this injured Sovereign endured while in their rebellious hands; by the shame of spitting, from which he hid not that kind and venerable countenance. I beseech you, by the purple robe, the sceptre of reed, and the crown of thorns, which this King of glory wore, that he might set us among the princes of heaven. I beseech you, by the heavy burthen of the cross, under which he panted, and toiled, and fainted, in the painful way to Golgotha, that he might free us from the burthen of our sins. I beseech you, by the remembrance of those rude nails, that tore the veins and arteries, the nerves and tendons, of his sacred hands and feet; and by that invincible, that triumphant goodness, which while the iron pierced his flesh, engaged him to cry out, Father forgive them, for they know not what they do. I beseech you, by that unutterable anguish which he bore, when lifted up upon the cross, and extended there as on a rack. By [illegible] painful hours, that you open your hearts to those attractive influences which have drawn to him thousands and ten thousands. I beseech you, by all that insult and derision, which the Lord of glory bore there; by that parching thirst, which could [illegible] the cruel [illegible] to [illegible] O cry, so astonishing in the mouth of the Only-begotten of the Father, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? I beseech you, by that grace that subdued and pardoned a dying malefactor; by that compassion for sinners, by that compassion for you, which wrought in his heart, long as its vital motion continued, and which rushed out when he bowed his head, saying, It is finished, and gave up the plead. I beseech you, by the triumphs of that resurrection by which he was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the Spirit of holiness whereby he rose from the dead, by that gracious tenderness which accompanied all those triumphs, when he said to her out of whom he had cast seven devils, concerning his disciples, who had treated him so basely, Go, tell my brethren. I ascend unto my Father and your Father, unto my God and your God. I beseech you, by that condescension with which he said to Thomas, whose his unbelief had drawn such an unreasonable demand, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing. I beseech you, by that generous and faithful care of his people, which he carried up with him to the regions of glory, and which engaged him to send down his Spirit in that rich profusion of miraculous gifts, to spread the progress of the saving word. I beseech you, by that vein of sympathy and power with which he said to Saul, Saul, why injuring his church, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? by that generous goodness, which spared that prostrate enemy, when he lay trembling at his feet, and raised him to so high a dignity, as to be not inferior to the very chief of apostles. I beseech you, by the memory of all that Christ hath already done, by the expectation of all he will further do, for his people. I beseech you, at once, by the sceptre of his grace, and by the sword of his justice, by which all his incorrigible enemies shall be slain before him, that you do not trifle away these precious moments, while his Spirit is thus breathing upon you; that you do not lose an opportunity which may never return, and on the improvement of which your eternity depends.

§ 5. I beseech you, "by all the bowels of compassion which you owe to the faithful ministers of Christ" who are studying and laboring, preaching and praying, wearing out their time, exhausting their strength, and very probably shortening their lives, for the salvation of your soul, and of souls like yours. I beseech you, by the affection with which all that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, long to see you brought back to him. I beseech you, by the friendship of the living, and by the memory of the dead; by the ruin of those who have trifled away their days, and are perished in their sins, and by the happiness of those who have embraced the gospel, and are saved by it. I beseech you, by the great expectation of that important day, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, by the terrors of a dissolving world, by the sound of the archangel's trumpet, and of that infinitely more awful sentence, Come, ye blessed, and Depart, ye cursed, with which that awful solemnity shall close.

§ 6. I beseech you, [illegible] by your own precious and immortal soul, by the sure prospect of a dying hour, or of a solemn appearance before the awful tribunal, and as you would feel one spark of comfort in your departing spirit when your flesh and your heart are failing, I beseech you, by your own personal concern before the throne of Christ, for a personal appearance before it, that you would set on the throne of your heart, by all the transports of the Eternal, and by all the agonies of the damned, the one or the other of which must be your everlasting portion. I affectionately entreat and beseech you, as the servants of all those united considerations, as you will answer it to me, who may in that day be commanded to testify before your face what is the spiritually wise, as you will answer it to your own consciences, as you will answer it to the eternal Judge, that you dismiss not these thoughts, these meditations and these cares, till you have brought matters to a happy issue, till you have made a reasonable choice of Christ and his appointed way of salvation, and till you have solemnly devoted yourself to God, in the bonds of an everlasting covenant.

§ 7. And Oh! I leave the matter before you, and before the Lord. I have told you my errand, I have discharged my embassy. Stronger arguments I cannot use, more endearing and more useful ones I cannot suggest. Choose, therefore, whether you will go out (as it were) clothed in sackcloth, to cast yourself at the feet of him who now sends you these equitable and gracious terms of peace and pardon; or whether you will hold it out till he appears, sword in hand, to reckon with you for your treasons and your crimes, and for this neglected embassy among the rest of them. Fain would I hope the best: and can I believe that this labour of love shall be so entirely unsuccessful, that not one soul shall be brought to the foot of Christ in cordial submission and humble faith. Take with you, therefore, words, and turn unto the Lord: and all that those which follow mean, in effect at least, be the genuine language of every one that reads them.

The sinner praying to the Lord, and devoting himself to the covenant of salvation by Christ.

"Blessed Lord, it is enough! it is for much! Search these words out this variety of arguments, that acquiescence of persuasion to which we are to be happy, to reveal upon me the account of pardon, of life, of eternal glory. Compassionate Saviour, my soul is subdued, as thou knowest, to thy will; I trust the language of thy grace is become that of my petitions: and I may say, My heart is melted like wax in the midst of my bowels.

"O gracious Redeemer! I have already negotiated this affair with thee. I have received thee, and have consented that afresh by my guilt and unprintence, as if I had taken pleasure in putting thee to an open shame. But my heart now bows itself before thee, in humble unfeigned submission. I desire to make no terms with thee but these—that I may be entirely thine. I cheerfully present thee with a blank, entreating thee that thou wilt do me the honour to signify upon it what is thy pleasure. Teach me, O Lord, what thou wouldst have me to do! For I desire to learn the lesson, and to learn it that I may practise it. If it be more than my feeble powers can answer, thou wilt, I hope, give me more strength; and to that strength I will serve thee. O receive a soul which thou hast made willing to be thine!

"No more, O blessed Jesus, no more is it necessary to beseech and entreat me. Permit me rather to address myself to thee, with all the importunity of a perishing sinner, that at length sees and knows there is salvation in no other! Permit me now, Lord, to come and throw myself at thy feet, like a helpless outcast, that has no shelter but in thy generous compassion! like one pursued by the avenger of blood, and seeking earnestly an admittance into the city of refuge!

"I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in thy word do I hope that thou wilt receive me graciously. My soul confides in thy goodness, and adores it. I adore the patience which has borne with me so long, and the grace that now makes me heartily wishing to be thine, to be thine on thine own terms, thine on any terms. Oh secure this treacherous heart to thyself! Oh unite me to thee in such inseparable bonds, that none of the allurements of flesh and blood, none of the vanities of an insnaring world, none of the solicitations of sinful companions, may draw me back from thee, and plunge me into new guilt and ruin! Be security, O Lord, for thy servant, for good; that I may still keep my hold on thee, and so on eternal life; till at length I know more fully, by joyful and everlasting experience, how complete a Saviour Jesus art! Amen."

CHAP. XI.

A Serious Address to those who will not be persuaded to fall in with the design of the gospel.

I would [illegible] I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] distinguish the one from the other, that you may know on what principles to build as certain in the examination of those concerning which you are yet in doubt. But whatever these doubts are, I would further ask you, "How long have they continued? and what method have you taken to get them resolved?" Do you imagine, that in matters of such moment it will be an allowable case for you to trifle on, neglecting to inquire into the evidence of these things, and then plead your not being satisfied in that evidence as an excuse for not acting according to them? Must not the principles of common sense assure you, that if these things be true, (as when you talk of doubting about them, you acknowledge it at least possible they may,) they are of infinitely greater importance than any of the affairs of life, whether of business or pleasure, for the sake of which you neglect them? Why then do you continue indolent and unconcerned, from week to week and from month to month, which probably conscience tells you is the case?

§ 3. Do you ask, "What method you should take to be resolved?" It is no hard question. Open your eyes. Set yourself to think; let conscience speak; and verily do I believe, that if it be not seared in an uncommon degree, you will find shrewd forebodings of the certainty, both of natural and revealed religion, and of the absolute necessity of repentance, faith, and holiness, to a life of future felicity. If you are a person of any learning, you cannot but know, by what writers, and in what treatises, these great truths are defended. And if you are not, you may find, in almost every town and neighbourhood, persons capable of informing you in the main evidences of Christianity, and of answering such scruples against it as unlearned minds may have met with. Set yourself then, in the name of God, immediately to consider the matter. If you study at all, bend your studies close this way; and trifle not with mathematics, or poetry, or history, or law, or physic, (which are all comparatively light as a feather,) while you neglect this. Study the argument, as for your life; for much more than life depends on it. See how far you are satisfied, and why that satisfaction reaches no further. Compare evidences on both sides. And above all, consider the design and tendency of the New Testament. See to what it will lead you, and all them that cordially obey it; and then say whether it be not good. And consider, how naturally its truths are connected with its goodness. Trace the character and sentiments of its authors, whose living image (if I may be allowed the expression) is still preserved in their writings. And then ask your own heart, Can you think this was a forgery? an impious cruel forgery? For such it must have been, if it were a forgery at all: a scheme to mock God, and to ruin men, even the best of men, such as reverenced conscience, and would abide all extremities for what they apprehended to be truth. Put the question to your own heart. Can I in my conscience believe it to be such an imposture? can I look up to an omniscient God, and say, "O Lord thou knowest, that it is in reverence to thee, and in love to truth and virtue, that I reject this book, and the method to happiness here laid down?"

§ 4. But there are difficulties in the way. And what then? Have those difficulties never been cleared. Go to the living advocates for Christianity, to those of whose abilities, candour, and piety you have the best opinion; if your prejudices will give you leave to have a good opinion of any such: tell them your difficulties; hear their solutions; weigh them seriously, as those who know they must answer it to God; and while doubts continue, follow the truth as far as it will lead you, and take heed that you do not imprison it in unrighteousness. Nothing appears more inconsistent and absurd, than for a man solemnly to pretend dissatisfaction in the evidences of the gospel, as a reason why he cannot in conscience be a thorough Christian; when yet, at the same time, he violates the most apparent dictates of reason and conscience, and lives in vices condemned even by the heathens. O sirs, Christ has judged concerning such, and judged most righteously and most wisely, They do evil, and therefore hate the light, neither come they to the light, lest their deeds should be made manifest, and be reproved. But there is a light, that will make manifest, and reprove their works, to which they shall be compelled to come, and the painful scrutiny of which they shall be forced to abide.

§ 5. In the mean time, if you are determined to inquire no further into the matter now, give me leave at least, from a sincere concern that you may not heap upon your head more aggravated ruin, to entreat you, that you would be cautious how you expose yourself to yet greater danger, by what you must yourself own to be unnecessary, I mean, attempts to prevent others from believing the truth of the gospel. Leave them, for God's sake, and for your own, in possession of those pleasures and those hopes, which nothing but Christ and his grace can give them: and let not, as it were, carelessness to add to the guilt of an infidel, the tenfold damnation, which they who have been the perverters and destroyers of the souls of others, must expect to meet, if that gospel which they have so adversariously opposed shall prove, as it certainly will, a serious, and to them a dreadful, truth.

§ 6. If I cannot prevail here, but the pride of displaying a superiority of understanding should bear on such a reader, even in opposition to his own favourite maxims of the innocence of error, and the equal merit of all religions consistent with moral virtue, to do his utmost to trample down the gospel with contempt. I would however dismiss him with one proposal, which I think the importance of the affair may fully justify. If you have done with your examination into Christianity, and determine to live and conduct yourself as if it were assuredly false, sit down then, and make a memorandum of that determination. Write it down; "On such a day of such a year, I deliberately resolved, that I would live and die rejecting Christianity myself, and doing all I could to overthrow it. This day I determined, not only to renounce all subjection to, and expectation from, Jesus of Nazareth, but also to make it a serious part of the business of my life, to destroy, as far as I possibly can, all regard to him in the minds of others, and to exert my most vigorous efforts, in the way of reasoning or of ridicule, to sink the credit of his religion, and if it be possible, to root it out of the world: in calm, steady defiance of that day, when his followers say, he shall appear in so much majesty and terror, to execute the vengeance threatened to his enemies." Dare you write this, and sign it? I firmly believe, that many a man, who would be thought a deist, and endeavours to increase the number, would not. And if you in particular dare not to do it, whence does that small remainder of caution arise? The cause is plain. There is in your conscience some secret apprehension, that this rejected, this opposed, this derided gospel, may after all prove true. And if there be such an apprehension, then let conscience do its office, and convict you of the impious madness of acting as if it were most certainly and demonstrably false. Let it tell you at large, how possible it is, that haply you may be found fighting against God, that, bold as you are in defying the terrors of the Lord, you may possibly fall into his hands; may chance to hear that despised sentence, which when you hear it from the mouth of the eternal Judge, you will not be able to despise. I will repeat it again, in spite of all your scorn, you may hear the King say to you, Depart, accursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. And now, go and pervert and burlesque the Scripture, go and lampoon the character of its heroes, and ridicule the sublime discourses of its prophets and its apostles; as some have done, who have left little behind them, but the short-lived monuments of their ignorance, their profaneness, and their malice. Go and spread like them the banners of infidelity, and pride thyself in the number of credulous creatures listed under them. But take heed, lest the insulted Galilean direct a secret arrow to thy heart, and stop thy licentious breath, before it has finished the next sentence thou wouldst utter against him.

§ 7. I will turn myself from the deist or the sceptic, and direct my address to the nominal Christian, if he may upon any terms be called a Christian, who heeds not, after all I have pleaded, a Christ to subject himself to the government and the grace of that Saviour, whose name he bears. O sinner, thou art turning away from my Lord, in whose cause I speak, but let me earnestly entreat thee seriously to consider, why thou art turning away, and to whom thou wilt go from him, whom thou acknowledgest to have the words of eternal life. You call yourself a Christian, and yet will not by any means be persuaded to seek salvation in good earnest from and through Jesus Christ, whom you call your Master and Lord. How do you for a moment excuse this negligence to your own conscience? If I had urged you on any controverted point, it might have altered the case. If I had laboured hard to make you the disciple of any particular party of Christians, your delay might have been more reasonable; nay, perhaps, your refusing to acquiesce might have been an act of apprehended duty to our common Master. But is it matter of controversy amongst Christians, whether there be a great, holy, and righteous God; and whether such a being, whom we agree to own, should be reverenced and loved, or neglected and dishonoured? Is it matter of controversy, whether a sinner should deeply and seriously repent of his sins, or whether he should go on in them? Is it a disputed point amongst us, whether Jesus became incarnate, and died upon the cross, for the redemption of sinners, or no? And if it be not, can it be disputed by them who believe him to be the Son of God and the Saviour of men, whether a sinner should seek to him, or neglect him? or whether one who professes to be a Christian, should depart from iniquity, or give himself up to the practice of it? Are the precepts of our great Master written so obscurely in his word, that there should be room seriously to question, whether he require a devout, holy, humble, spiritual, watchful, self-denying life, or whether he allow the contrary? Has Christ, after all his pretensions of bringing life and immortality to light, left it more uncertain than he found it, whether there be any future state of happiness and misery, or for whom these states are respectively intended? Is it a matter of controversy, whether God will, or will not, bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil? or whether, at the conclusion of that judgment, the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, and the righteous into life eternal? You will not, I am sure, for very shame pretend any doubt about these things, and yet call yourself a Christian. Why then will you not be persuaded to lay them to heart, and to act as duty and interest so evidently require? Oh sinner, the cause is too obvious: a cause indeed quite unworthy of being called a reason. It is because thou art blinded and besotted with thy vanities and thy lusts. It is because thou hast some darling trifle which charms thy imagination and thy senses, so that it is dearer to thee than God and Christ, than thy own soul and its salvation. It is my word, because thou art still under the influence of that carnal mind, which, whatever pious forms it may sometimes assume and pretend to, remains against God, and is not subject to the Law of God, neither indeed can be. And therefore, thou art in the very case of those wretches, concerning whom our Lord said in the days of his flesh, Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life, and therefore ye shall die in your sins.

8. In this case, I see not what it can signify, to renew those expostulations and addresses which I have made in the former chapters. As our blessed Redeemer says of those who rejected his gospel, Ye have both seen and hated both me and my Father; so may I truly say with regard to you, I have endeavoured to show you in the plainest and the clearest words, both Christ and the Father; I have urged the obligations you are under to both; I have laid before you your guilt, and your condemnation. I have pointed out the only remedy; I have pointed out the Rock, on which I have built my own eternal hopes, and the way in which alone I expect salvation. I have recommended those things to you, which, if God gives me an opportunity, I will with my dying breath earnestly and affectionately recommend to my own children, and to all the dearest friends that I have upon earth, who may then be near me; esteeming it the highest token of my friendship, the surest proof of my love to them. And if believing the gospel to be true, you resolve to reject it; I have nothing further to say, but that you must abide by the consequence. Yet as Moses, when he went out from the presence of Pharaoh for the last time, finding his heart yet more hardened by all the judgments and deliverances with which he had formerly been exercised, denounced upon him God's passing through the land in terror, to smite the first-born with death, and warned him of that great and lamentable cry which the sword of the destroying angel should raise throughout all his realms; so will I, sinner, now when I am quitting thee, speak to thee yet again, whether thou wilt hear, or whether thou wilt forbear, and denounce that much more terrible judgment, which the sword of divine vengeance, already whetted and drawn and bathed as it were in heaven, is preparing against thee; which shall end in a much more dreadful cry, though thou wert greater and more obstinate than that haughty monarch. Yes, sinner, that I may, with the apostle Paul, when turning to others who are more like to hear me, shake my raiment, and say, I am pure from your blood; I will once more tell you what the end of these things will be. And oh, that I could speak to purpose! Oh that I could thunder in thy ear such a peal of terror as might awaken thee, and be too loud to be drowned by all the noise of carnal mirth, or to be deadened by those dangerous opiates with which thou art endeavouring to stupefy thy conscience!

10. Seek what amusements and entertainments thou wilt. O sinner, I tell thee, if thou wert equal in dignity, and power, and magnificence, to the great monarch of Babylon, thy pomp should be brought down to the grave, and all the sound of thy viols, the worm should be spread under thee, and the worm shall cover thee. Yes, sinner, the end of these things is death; death in its most terrible sense to thee, if this continue thy governing temper. Thou canst avoid it; and, if it be possible for any thing that I can say to prevent, thou shalt not forget it. Your stomach is not the strength of stones, nor is your flesh of brass. You are accessible to diseases as well as others; and if some sudden accident do not prevent it, we shall soon see how heroically you will behave yourself on a dying bed, and in the near views of eternity. You that now despise Christ, and trifle with his gospel, we shall see you droop and languish; shall see all your relish for your carnal recreations, and your vain companions, lost. And if, perhaps, one and another of them bolt in upon you, and is brutish and desperate enough to attempt to entertain a dying man with a gay story, or a profane jest, we shall see how you will relish it. We shall see what comfort you will have in reflecting on what is past, or what hope in looking forward to what is to come. Perhaps, trembling and astonished, you will then be inquiring in a wild kind of consternation, what you should do to be saved; calling for the ministers of Christ, whom you now despise for the earnestness with which they would labour to save your soul; and it may be, falling into a delirium, or dying convulsions, before they can come. Or perhaps we may see you hoodwink yourself through a long lingering illness, that you shall still recover, and putting off any serious reflection and conversation, for fear it should overset your spirits. And the cruel kindness of friends and physicians, as if they were in league with Satan to make the destruction of your soul as sure as possible, may perhaps abet this fatal deceit.

11. And if any of these probabilities happen, that is, in short, unless a miracle of grace snatch you as a brand out of the burning, when the flames have, as it were, already taken hold of you: all these gloomy circumstances, which pass in the chambers of illness and the beds of death, are but the forerunners of infinitely more dreadful things. Oh, who can describe them? who can imagine them? When surviving friends are tenderly mourning over the breathless corpse, and taking a final farewell of it before it is laid to consume away in the dark and silent grave; what words, O sinner, will thy soul be fallen! What scenes will open upon thy separate spirit, even before thy deserted flesh be cold, or thy sightless eyes are closed, it shall then know what it is to return to God to be rejected by him, as having rejected his gospel and his Son, and despised the only treaty of reconciliation; and that such a one, so amazingly condescending and gracious. Thou shalt know what it is to be disowned by Christ, whom thou hast refused to entertain: and what it is, as the certain and immediate consequence of that, to be left in the hands of the malignant spirits of hell. There will be no more friendship then; none to comfort, none to alleviate thy agony and distress; but, on the contrary, all around thee labouring to aggravate and increase them. Thou shalt pass away the intermediate years of the separate state in dreadful expectation, and bitter outcries of horror and remorse. And then thou shalt hear the trumpet of the archangel, in whatever cavern of that gloomy world thou art lodged. Its sound shall penetrate thy prison, where, doleful and horrible as it is, thou shalt nevertheless wish, that thou mightest still be allowed to hide thy guilty head, rather than show it before the face of that awful Judge, before whom heaven and earth are fleeing away. But thou must come forth, and be reunited to a body, not formed for ever to endure agonies, which in this mortal state would have dissolved it in a moment. You would not be persuaded to come to Christ before; you would stupidly neglect him, in spite of reason, in spite of conscience, in spite of all the tenderest solicitations of the gospel, and the repeated admonitions of its most faithful ministers. But now, sinner, you shall have an interview with him; if that may be called an interview, in which you will not dare to lift up your head to view the face of your tremendous and inexorable Judge. There, at least, how distant soever the time of our life and the place of our abode may have been, there shall we see how courageously your heart will endure, and how strong your hands will be, when the Lord doth this. There shall I see thee, O reader, whoever thou art, that goest on in thy impenitency, among thousands and ten thousands of despairing wretches, trembling and confounded. There shall I hear thy cries among the rest, rending the very heavens in vain. The Judge will rise from his tribunal with majestic composure, and leave thee to be hurried down to those everlasting burnings, to which his righteous vengeance hath doomed thee, because thou wouldst not be saved from them. Hell shall shut its mouth upon thee for ever, and the sad echo of thy groans and outcries shall be lost amidst the Hallelujahs of heaven, to all that find mercy of the Lord in that day.

§ 11. This will most assuredly be the end of those things, and thou, as a Christian, professest to know and to believe it. It moves my heart, at least, if it moves not thine. I firmly believe that every one, who himself obtains salvation and glory, will have so much of his Saviour's image in wisdom and goodness, in zeal for God, and a steady regard to the happiness of the whole creation, that he will behold this sad scene with calm approbation, and without any painful commotion of mind. But as yet I am flesh and blood; and therefore my bowels are troubled, and my eyes often overflow with grief, to think that wretched sinners will have no more compassion upon their own souls; to think, that in spite of all admonition they will obstinately run upon final everlasting destruction. It would signify nothing here to add a prayer, or a meditation, for your use. Poor creature! you will not meditate! you will not pray! Yet, as I have often poured out my heart in prayer over a dying friend, when the force of his distemper has rendered him incapable of joining with me; so I will now apply myself to God for you, O unhappy creature! And if you disdain so much as to read what my compassion dictates; yet I hope, they who have felt the power of the gospel on their own souls, as they cannot but pity such as you, will join with me in such cordial though broken petitions as these.

A Prayer in behalf of an impenitent sinner, in the case mentioned above.

"ALMIGHTY GOD! with thee all things are possible: to thee therefore do I humbly apply myself in behalf of this dear immortal soul, which thou here seest perishing in its sins, and hardening itself against that everlasting gospel, which has been the power of God to the salvation of so many thousands and millions. Thou art witness, O blessed God, thou art witness to the plainness and seriousness with which the message has been delivered. It is in thy presence that these awful words have been written; and in thy presence have they been read. Be pleased therefore to record it in the book of thy remembrance, that so if this wicked man dieth in his iniquity, after the warning has been so plainly and solemnly given him, his blood may not be required at my hand, nor at the hand of that Christian friend, whoever he is, by whom this book has been put into his, with a sincere desire for the salvation of his soul. Be witness, O blessed Jesus, in the day in which thou shalt judge the secret of all hearts, that thy gospel hath been preached to this hardened wretch, and salvation by thy blood hath been offered him, though he continue to despise it. And may thy unworthy messengers be unto God a sweet savour in Christ, in this very soul, even though it should at last perish!

"But, oh that, after all this hardness and impenitence, thou wouldst still be pleased, in the sovereign power of thine efficacious grace, to awaken and convert him! Well do we know, O thou Lord of universal nature, that he who made the soul, can cause the sword of conviction to come near and enter into it. Oh that, in thine infinite wisdom and love, thou wouldst find out a way to interpose and save this sinner from death, from eternal death! Oh that, if it be thy blessed will, thou wouldst immediately do it! Thou knowest, oh God, he is a dying creature; thou knowest, that if any thing be done for him, it must be done quickly; thou seest, in the book of thy wise and gracious decrees, a moment marked which must seal him up in an unchangeable state: oh that thou wouldst lay hold on him, while he is yet joined with the living, and hath hope! Thy immutable laws in the dispensation of grace forbid that a soul should be converted and renewed after its entrance on the invisible world; oh let thy sacred Spirit work while he is yet, as it were, within the sphere of its operations! Work, O God, by whatever method thou pleasest; only have mercy upon him! O Lord, have mercy upon him, that he sink not into those depths of damnation and ruin, on the very brink of which he so evidently appears! Oh that thou wouldst bring him, if that be necessary, and seem to thee most expedient, into any depths of calamity and distress! Oh that, with Manasseh, he may be taken in the thorns, and laden with the fetters, of affliction, if that may but cause him to seek the God of his fathers!

"But I prescribe not to thine infinite wisdom. Thou hast displayed thy power in glorious and astonishing instances; which I thank thee that I have so circumstantially known, and by the knowledge of them have been fortified against the rash confidence of those who weakly and arrogantly pronounce that to be impossible which is actually done. Thou hast, I know, done that by a single thought in retirement, when the happy man reclaimed by it hath been far from means, and far from ordinances, which neither the most awful admonitions, nor the most tender entreaties, nor the most terrible afflictions, nor the most wonderful deliverances, had been able to effect.

"Glorify thy name, O Lord, and glorify thy grace, in the method which to thine infinite wisdom shall seem most expedient! Only grant, I beseech thee, with all humble submission to thy will, that this sinner may be saved! Or if not, that the labour of this part may not be altogether in vain; but that if some reject it to their aggravated ruin, others may hearken and live: that those thy servants, who have laboured for their deliverance and happiness, may view them in the regions of glory, as the spoils which thou hast honoured them as the instruments of recovering; and may join with them in the hallelujahs of heaven, to him who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us of condemned rebels, and accursed polluted sinners, kings and priests unto God; to whom be glory and dominion for ever and ever! Amen."

CHAP. XII.

An Address to a soul so overwhelmed with a sense of the greatness of its sins, that it dares not apply itself to Christ with any hope of salvation.

[illegible]

§ 1. I HAVE now done with those unhappy creatures who despise the gospel, and with those who neglect it. With pleasure do I now turn myself to those who will hear me with more regard. Among the various cases which now present themselves to my thoughts, and demand my tender, affectionate, respectful care, there is none more worthy of compassion than that which I have mentioned in the title of this chapter; none which requires a more immediate attempt of relief.

§ 2. It is very possible some afflicted creature may be ready to cry out, "It is enough: aggravate my grief and my distress no more. The sentence you have been so awfully describing, as what shall be passed and executed on the impenitent and unbelieving, is my sentence; and the terrors of it are my terrors. For my iniquities are gone up unto the heavens, and my transgressions have reached unto the clouds. My case is quite singular. Surely there never was so great a sinner as I. I have received so many mercies, I have enjoyed so many advantages, I have heard so many invitations of gospel grace; and yet my heart has been so hard, and my nature so exceeding sinful, and the number and aggravating circumstances of my provocations have been such, that I dare not hope. It is enough that God hath supported me thus long. It is enough that, after so many years of wickedness, I am yet out of hell. Every day's reprieve is a mercy at which I am astonished. I lie down, and wonder that death and damnation have not seized me in my walks the day past. I arise, and wonder that my bed hath not been my grave; wonder that my soul is not separated from the flesh, and surrounded with devils and damned spirits.

§ 3. "I have indeed heard the message of salvation; but alas, it seems no message of salvation to me. There are happy souls that have hope; and their hope is indeed in Christ, and the grace of God manifested in him. But them they find in their hearts an encouragement to apply to him; whereas I dare not do it. Christ and grace are things in which I fear I have no part, and must expect none.

There are exceeding rich and precious promises in the word of God; but they are to me as a sealed book, and are hid from me as to any personal use. I know Christ is able to save. I know he is willing to save some. But that he should be willing to save me, such a polluted, such a provoking, creature, as God knows, and as conscience knows, I have been, and to this day am: this I know not how to believe; and the utmost that I can do towards believing it, is to acknowledge that it is not absolutely impossible, and that I do not yet lie down in complete despair; though, alas, I seem upon the very borders of it, and expect every day and hour to fall into it."

§ 4. I should not perhaps have entered so fully into this case, if I had not seen many in it; and I will add, reader, for your encouragement, if it be your case, several who are now in the number of the most established, cheerful, and useful Christians. And I hope divine grace will add you to the rest, if out of these depths you be enabled to cry unto God; and though, like Jonah, you may seem to be cast out from his presence, yet still, with Jonah, you look towards his holy temple.

§ 5. Let it not be imagined that it is in any neglect of that blessed Spirit, whose office it is to be the great Comforter, that I now attempt to reason you out of this disconsolate frame. For it is as the great source of reason, that he deals with rational creatures; and it is in the use of rational means and considerations, that he may most justly be expected to operate. Give me leave therefore to address myself calmly to you, and to ask you, what reason you have for all these passionate complaints and accusations against yourself? What reason have you to suggest that your case is singular, when so many have told you that they have felt the same? What reason have you to conclude so hardly against yourself, when the gospel speaks in such favourable terms? or what reason to imagine, that the gracious things it says are not intended for you? You know indeed more of the corruptions of your own heart, than you know of the hearts of others, and you make a thousand charitable excuses for their visible failings and infirmities, which you make not for your own. And it may be, some of those whom you admire as eminent saints when compared with you, are on their part humbling themselves in the dust, as unworthy to be numbered amongst the least of God's people, and wishing themselves like you, in whom they think they see much more good, and much less of evil, than in themselves.

§ 6. But to suppose the worst, what if you were really the vilest sinner that ever lived upon the face of the earth? What if your iniquities had gone up unto the heavens every day, and your transgressions had reached unto the clouds; reached thither with such horrid aggravations, that earth and heaven should have had reason to detest you as a monster of impiety? Admitting all this, is any thing too hard for the Lord? Are any sins of which a sinner can repent, of so deep a dye that the blood of Christ cannot wash them away? Nay, though it would be daring wickedness and monstrous folly for any to sin that grace may abound, yet had you indeed raised your account beyond all that divine grace has ever yet pardoned, who should limit the Holy One of Israel? Or who should pretend to say, that it was impossible that God might for your very wretchedness choose you out from others, to make you a monument of mercy, and a trophy of hitherto unparalleled grace? The apostle Paul strongly intimates this to have been the case with regard to himself. And why might not you likewise, if indeed the chief of sinners obtain mercy, that in you, as the chief, Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them who shall hereafter believe?

§ 7. Gloomy as your apprehensions are, I would ask you plainly, Do you in your conscience think, that Christ is not able to save you? What! is he not able to save even to the uttermost, them that come unto God by him? Yes, you will say, abundantly able to do it; but I dare not imagine that he will do it. And how do you know that he will not? He has helped the very greatest sinners of all that have yet applied themselves to him; and he has made the offers of grace and salvation in the most engaging and encouraging terms. If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. Let him that is athirst come: and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely. Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. And once more, Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out. True, you will say, none that are given him by the Father. Could I know I were of that number, I could then apply cheerfully to him. But, dear reader, let me entreat you to look into the text itself, and see whether that limitation be expressly added there. Do you there read, none of them whom the Father hath given me shall be cast out? The words are in a much more encouraging form. And why should you frustrate his wisdom and goodness, by such an addition of your own? Add not to his words, lest he reprove thee: take them as they stand, and drink in the consolation of them. Our Lord knew into what perplexity some serious minds might possibly be thrown by what he had before been saying, All that the Father hath given me, shall come unto me: and therefore, as if it were on purpose to balance it, he adds those gracious words, Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise, by no means, on no consideration whatsoever, cast out.

§ 8. If therefore you are already discouraged and terrified at the greatness of your sins do not add to their weight and number that one greatest and worse than all the rest, a distrust of the faithfulness and grace of the blessed Redeemer. Do not, so far as in you lies, oppose all the purposes of his love to you. O distressed soul, whom dost thou dread? to whom dost thou tremble to approach? Is there any thing so terrible in a crucified Redeemer, in the Lamb that was slain? If thou canst thy soul almost sinking under the burthen of its guilt to lay down at his feet, what dost thou offer him, but the spoil which he bled and died to recover and possess? And did he purchase it so dearly that he might reject it with disdain? Go to him directly, and fall down in his presence, and plead that misery of thine, which thou hast now been pleading in a contrary view, as an encouragement to your own soul to make the application, and as an argument with the compassionate Saviour to receive you. Go, and be assured, that where sin hath abounded there grace shall much more abound. Be assured, that if one sinner can promise himself a more certain welcome than another, it is not he that is least guilty and miserable, but he that is most deeply humbled before God under a sense of that misery and guilt, and lies the lowest in the apprehension of it.

Reflections on these encouragements, ending in an humble and earnest application to Christ for mercy.

"O my soul, what sayest thou to these things? Is there not at least a possibility of help from Christ? and is there a possibility of help any other way? Is any other name given under heaven, whereby we can be saved? I know there is none. I must then say, like the lepers of Israel, if I sit here I perish; and if I make my application in vain, I can but die. But, peradventure, he may save my soul alive. I will therefore arise, and go unto him; or rather, believing him here, by his spiritual presence, sinful and miserable as I am, I will this moment fall down on my face before him, and pour out my soul unto him.

"Blessed Jesus, I present myself unto thee, as a wretched creature; driven indeed by necessity to do it. For surely, were not that necessity urgent and absolute, I should not dare for very shame to appear in thy holy and majestic presence. I am fully convinced that my sins and my follies have been inexcusably great; more than I can express, more than I can conceive. I feel a source of sin in my corrupt and degenerate nature, which pours out iniquity, as a fountain sends out its water, and makes me a burthen and a terror to myself. Such aggravations have attended my transgressions, that it looks like presumption so much as to ask pardon for them. And yet, would it not be greater presumption to say, that they exceed thy mercy, and the efficacy of thy blood; to say, that thou hast power and grace enough to pardon and save only sinners of a lower order, while such as I lie out of thy reach? Preserve me from that blasphemous imagination! preserve me from that unreasonable suspicion! Lord, thou canst do all things, neither is there any thought of mine heart withholden from thee. Thou art indeed, as thy word declares, able to save unto the uttermost. And therefore, breaking through all the oppositions of shame and fear, that would keep me from thee, I come and lie down as in the dust before thee. Thou knowest, O Lord, all my sins, and all my follies. I cannot, and I hope I may say, I would not, disguise them before thee, or set myself to find out plausible excuses. Accuse me, Lord, as thou pleasest; and I will ingenuously plead guilty to all thine accusations, I will own myself as great a sinner as thou callest me; but I am still a sinner that comes unto thee for pardon. If I must die, it shall be submitting and owning the justice of the fatal stroke. If I perish, it shall be laying hold, as it were, on the horns of the altar: laying myself down at thy footstool, though I have been such a rebel against thy throne. Many have received a full pardon there; have met with favour even beyond their hopes. And are all thy compassions, O blessed Jesus, exhausted! And wilt thou now begin to reject a humble creature, who flies to thee for life, and pleads nothing but mercy and free grace? Have mercy upon me, O most gracious Redeemer, have mercy upon me, and let my life be precious in thy sight! O do not resolve to send me down to that state of final misery and despair, from which it was thy gracious purpose to deliver and save so many!

"Spurn me not away, O Lord, from thy presence, nor be offended when I presume to lay hold on thy royal robe, and say that I cannot and will not let thee go, till my suit is granted! O remember, that all my hopes of obtaining eternal happiness, and avoiding everlasting, helpless, hopeless destruction, are anchored upon thee; they hang upon thy smiles, or drop at thy frown. Oh have mercy upon me, for the sake of this immortal soul of mine! or if not for the sake of mine alone, for the sake of many others, who may, on the one hand, be encouraged by thy mercy to me, or, on the other, may be greatly wounded and discouraged by my helpless despair! I beseech thee, O Lord, for thine own sake, and for the display of thy Father's rich and sovereign grace! I beseech thee by the blood thou didst shed on the cross! I beseech thee by the covenant of grace and peace, into which the Father did enter with thee for the salvation of believing and repenting sinners, save me! Save me, O Lord, who earnestly desire to repent and believe! I am indeed a sinner, in whose final and everlasting destruction thy justice might be greatly glorified. But oh if thou wilt pardon me, it will be a monument raised to the honour of thy grace, and the efficacy of thy blood, in propor-portion to the degree in which the wretch, to whom thy mercy is extended, was mean and miserable without it. Speak, Lord, by thy blessed Spirit, and banish my fears! Look upon me with love and grace in thy countenance, and say to me, as in the days of thy flesh thou didst to many an humble supplicant, Thy sins are forgiven thee, go in peace!"

CHAP. XIII.

The doubting soul more particularly assisted in its inquiries as to the sincerity of its faith and repentance.

THERE is inquiry which leads to [illegible] which [illegible] § 1. Inquire seriously, in the first place, what views you have had of sin, and what sentiments you have felt in your soul with regard to it. § 2. Put the inquiries, What views have you had of Christ? and what sentiments have you felt of him? § 3. What views have you had of sin? and what sentiments have you felt of it? § 4. What views have you had of God? and what sentiments have you felt of him? § 5. And what resolutions have you made with regard to your future conduct? § 6. Now [illegible] § 7. The soul submitting to divine [illegible] sincerity of its faith and repentance.

§ 1. In consequence of all the serious things which have been said in the former chapters, I hope it will be no false presumption to imagine, that some religious impressions may be made on hearts which had never felt them before; or may be revived, where they have formerly grown cold and languid. Yet I am very sensible, and I desire that you may be so, how great danger there is of self-flattery on this important head; and how necessary it is to caution men against too hasty a conclusion, that they are really converted, because they have felt some warm emotions on their minds, and have reformed the gross irregularities of their former conduct. A mistake here might be infinitely fatal; it may prove the occasion of that false peace, which shall lead a man to bless himself in his own heart, and to conclude himself secure, while all the threatenings and curses of God's law are sounding in his ears, and lie indeed directly against him; while in the mean time he applies to himself a thousand promises in which he has no share, which may prove therefore like generous wine to a man in a high fever, or strong opiates to one in a lethargy. The stony ground received the word with joy, and a promising harvest seemed to be springing up; yet it soon withered away, and no reaper filled his arms with it. Now, that this may not be the case with you, that all my labours and yours hitherto may not be lost, and that a vain dream of security and happiness may not plunge you deeper in misery and ruin, give me leave to lead you into a serious inquiry into your own heart, that so you may be better able to judge of your case, and to distinguish between what it is at most being only near the kingdom of heaven, and becoming indeed a member of it.

§ 2. Now this depends upon the sincerity of your faith in Christ, when faith is taken in its largest extent, as explained above; that is, as comprehending repentance, and that steady purpose of new and universal obedience, of which, wherever it is real, faith will assuredly be the vital principle. Therefore, to assist you in judging of your state, give me leave to ask you, or rather to entreat you to ask yourself, what views you have had, and now have, of sin, and of Christ? and what your future purposes are, with regard to your conduct in the remainder of life that may lie before you? I shall not reason largely upon the several particulars I suggest under those heads, but rather refer you to your own reading and observation, to judge how agreeable they are to the word of God, the great rule by which our characters must quickly be tried, and our eternal state unalterably determined.

§ 3. Inquire seriously, in the first place, what views you have had of sin, and what sentiments you have felt in your soul with regard to it. There was a time, when it wore a flattering aspect, and made a fair enchanting appearance, so that all your heart was charmed with it, and it was the very business of your life to practise it. But you have since been undeceived. You have felt it bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder. You have beheld it with an abhorrence, far greater than the delight which it ever gave you. So far it is well. It is thus with every true penitent, and with some, I fear, who are not of that number. Let me therefore inquire further, whence arose this abhorrence? Was it merely from a principle of self-love? Was it merely because you had been wounded by it? Was it merely because you had thereby brought condemnation and ruin upon your own soul? Was there no sense of its deformity, of its baseness, of its malignity, as committed against the blessed God, considered as a glorious, a bountiful, and a merciful Being? Were you never pierced by an apprehension of its vile ingratitude? And as for those purposes which have arisen in your heart against it, let me beseech you to reflect, how they have been formed, and how they have hitherto been executed. Have they been universal? Have they been resolute? And yet, amidst all that resolution, have they been humble? When you declared war with sin, was it with every sin? And is it an irreconcilable war, which you determine, by divine grace, to push on till you have entirely conquered it, or die in the attempt? And are you accordingly active in your endeavours to subdue and destroy it? If so, what are the fruits worthy of repentance which you bring forth? It does not, I hope, all flow away in floods of grief. Have you ceased to do evil? Are you learning to do well? Doth your reformation show, that you repent of your sins? or do your renewed relapses into sin prove, that you repent even of what you call your repentance? Have you an inward abhorrence of all sin, and an unfeigned zeal against it? And doth that produce a care to guard against the occasions of it, and temptations to it? Do you watch against the circumstances that have ensnared you? And do you particularly exercise your guard against that sin which does most easily beset you? Is that laid aside, that the Christian race may be run? Said aside with a firm determination, that you will return to it no more, that you will hold no more parley with it, that you will never take another step towards it?

§ 4. Permit me also further to inquire, what your views of Christ have been? what think you of him, and of your concern with him? Have you been fully convinced, that there must be a correspondence settled between him and your soul? And do you see and feel, that you are not only to pay him a kind of distant homage, and transient compliment, as a very wise, benevolent, and excellent person, whose name and memory you have a reverence for; but that, as he lives and reigns, as he is ever near you, and always observing you, so you must look to him, must approach him, must humbly transact business with him, and that business of the highest importance, on which your salvation depends?

§ 5. You have been brought to inquire, wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the most high God? And once, perhaps, you were thinking of sacrifices, which your own stores might have been sufficient to furnish out. Are you now convinced they will not suffice; and that you must have recourse to the Lamb which God hath provided? Have you had a view of Jesus, as taking away the sin of the world? as made a sin-offering for us, though he knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him? Have you viewed him as perfectly righteous in himself? and despairing of being justified by any righteousness of your own, have you submitted to the righteousness of God? Has your heart ever been brought to a deep conviction of this important truth, that if ever you are saved at all, it must be through Christ; that if ever God extend mercy to you at all, it must be for his sake; that if ever you are fixed in the temple of God above, you must stand there as an everlasting trophy of that victory which Christ has gained over the powers of hell, who would otherwise have triumphed over you?

§ 6. Our Lord says, Look unto me, and be ye saved: he says, If I be lifted up, I shall draw all men unto me. Have you looked to him as the only Saviour? Have you been drawn unto him by that sacred magnet, the attracting influence of his dying love? Do you know what it is, to come to Christ as a poor, weary, and heavy laden sinner, that you may find rest? Do you know what it is, in a spiritual sense, to eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of Man; that is, to look upon Christ crucified as the great support of your soul, and to feel a desire after him, earnest as the appetite of nature after its necessary food? Have you known what it is cordially to surrender yourself to Christ, as a poor creature whom love has made his property? Have you committed your immortal soul to him, that he may purify and save it; that he may govern it by the dictates of his word and the influences of his Spirit; that he may use it for his glory; that he may appoint it to what exercise and discipline he pleases, while it dwells here in flesh; and that he may receive it at death, and fix it among those spirits who with perpetual songs of praise surround his throne, and are his servants for ever? Have you heartily consented to this? and do you, on this account of the matter, renew your consent? Do you renew it deliberately and determinately, and feel your whole soul, as it were, saying Amen, while you read this? If this be the case, then I can with great pleasure give you, as it were, the right hand of fellowship, and salute and embrace you as a sincere disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ, as one who is delivered from the power of darkness, and is translated into the kingdom of the Son of God. I can then salute you in the Lord, as one to whom, as a minister of Jesus, I am commissioned and charged to speak comfortably, and to tell you, not that I absolve you from your sins, for it is a small matter to be judged of man's judgment, but that the blessed God himself absolveth you; that you are one to whom he has said in his gospel, and is continually saying, Your sins are forgiven you; therefore go in peace, and take the comfort of it.

§ 7. But if you are a stranger to these experiences, and to this temper, which I have now described, the great work is yet undone; you are an impenitent and unbelieving sinner, and the wrath of God abideth on you. However you may have been awakened and alarmed, whatever resolutions you may have formed for amending your life, how right soever your notions may be, how pure soever your forms of worship, how ardent soever your zeal, how severe soever your mortification, how humane soever your temper, how inoffensive soever your life may be, I can speak no comfort to you. Vain are all your religious hopes, if there has not been a cordial humiliation before the presence of God for all your sins; if there has not been this avowed war declared against every thing displeasing to God; if there has not been this sense of your need of Christ, and of your ruin without him; if there has not been this earnest application to him, this surrender of your soul into his hands by faith, this renunciation of yourself, that you might fix on him the anchor of your hope; if there has not been this unreserved dedication of yourself to be at all times, and in all respects, the faithful servant of God through him; and if you do not with all this acknowledge, that you are an unprofitable servant, who have no other expectations of acceptance or of pardon, but only through his righteousness and blood, and through the riches of divine grace in him; I repeat it again, that all your hopes are vain, and you are building on the sand. The house you have already raised must be thrown down to the ground, and the foundation be removed and laid anew, or you, and all your hopes, will shortly be swept away with it, and buried under it in everlasting ruin.

The soul submitting to divine examination, the sincerity of its repentance and faith.

"O LORD God, thou searchest all hearts, and triest the reins of the children of men. Search me, O Lord, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. Doth not conscience, O Lord, testify in thy presence, that my repentance and faith are such as have been described, or at least that it is my earnest prayer, that they may be so? Come therefore, O thou blessed Spirit, who art the author of all grace and consolation, and work this temper more fully in my soul! Oh represent sin to my eyes in all its most odious colours, that I may feel a mortal and irreconcilable hatred to it! Oh represent the majesty and mercy of the blessed God in such a manner, that my heart may be alarmed, and that it may be melted! smite the rock, that the waters may flow; waters of genuine, undissembled, and filial repentance! Convince me, O thou blessed Spirit, of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment! Show me that I have undone myself, but that my help is found in God alone, in God through Christ, in whom alone he will extend compassion and help to me! According to thy peculiar office, take of Christ and show it unto me! Show me his power to save! Show me his willingness to exert that power! Teach my faith to behold him, as extended on the cross, with open arms, and with a piercing bleeding side; and so telling me, in the most forcible language, what room there is in his very heart for me! May I know what it is to have my whole heart subdued by love; so subdued as to be crucified with him; as to be dead to sin, and dead to the world, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ! In his power and love may I confide! To him may I without any reserve commit my spirit! His image may I bear! His laws may I observe! His service may I pursue! And may I remain, through time and eternity, a monument of the efficacy of his gospel, and a trophy of his victorious grace!

"Oh blessed God! if there be any thing wanting towards constituting me a sincere Christian, discover it to me, and work it in me! Beat down, I beseech thee, every false and presumptuous hope, how costly soever that building may have been which is thus laid in ruins, and how proud soever I may have been of its vain ornaments! Let me know the worst of my case, be that knowledge ever so distressful, and if there be remaining danger, O let my heart be fully sensible of it, sensible while yet there is remedy!

"If there be any secret sin yet lurking in my soul, which I have not sincerely renounced, discover it to me, and rend it out of my heart, though it should have shot its roots ever so deep, and should have wrapped them all around it, so that every nerve should be pained by the separation! Tear it away, O Lord, by a hand graciously severe! And by degrees, yea, Lord, by speedy advances, go on, I beseech thee, to perfect what is still lacking in my faith! Accomplish in me all the good pleasure of thy goodness: enrich me, O heavenly Father, with all the graces of thy Spirit: form me to the complete image of thy dear Son: and then, for his sake, come unto me, and manifest thy gracious presence in my soul, till it is ripened for that state of glory for which all these operations are intended to prepare it! Amen."

CHAP. XIV.

A more particular view of the several branches of the Christian temper, by which the reader may be further assisted in judging what he is, and what he should endeavour to be.

The importance of the case proposed [illegible] a more particular view of the several branches of the Christian temper, by which the reader may be further assisted in judging what he is, and what he should endeavour to be. As [illegible] to direct us [illegible] by which [illegible] temper, [illegible] As [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] acquainted with it. Happy will you be, happy beyond expression, if, as you go on from one article to another, you can say, "This is my temper and character." Happy, in no inconsiderable degree, if you can say, "This is what I desire, what I pray for, and what I pursue, in preference to every opposite view, though it be not what I have as yet attained."

§ 2. Search then, and try what manner of spirit you are of. And may he that searcheth all hearts direct the inquiry, and enable you so to judge yourself, that you may not be condemned of the Lord!

§ 3. Know in the general, that if you are a Christian indeed, you have been renewed in the spirit of your mind; so renewed, as to be regenerated and born again. It is not enough to have assumed a new name, to have been brought under some new restraints, or to have made a partial change in some particulars of your conduct. The change must be great and universal. Inquire then, whether you have entertained new apprehensions of things, have formed a practical judgment different from what you formerly did; whether the ends you propose, the affections which you feel working in your heart, and the course of action to which, by those affections, you are directed, be on the whole new or old?* Again, if you are a Christian indeed, you are partaker of a divine nature; divine in its original, its tendency, and its resemblance. Inquire therefore, whether God hath implanted a principle in your heart, which tends to him, and which makes you like him.—Search your soul attentively, to see if you have really the image there of God's moral perfections, of his holiness and righteousness, his goodness and fidelity; for the new man is after God created in righteousness and true holiness, and is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him.

§ 4. For your further assistance inquire, whether the same mind be in you which was also in Christ! whether you bear the image of God's incarnate Son, the brightest and fairest resemblance of the Father, which earth or heaven has ever beheld? The blessed Jesus designed himself to be a model for all his followers; and he is certainly a model most fit for our imitation; an example in our own nature, and in circumstances adapted to general use; an example, recommended to us at once by its spotless perfection, and by the endearing relations in which he stands to us, as our Master, our Friend, and our Head; as the person by whom our everlasting state is to be fixed, and in a resemblance to whom our final happiness is to consist, if ever we be happy at all. Look then into the life and temper of Christ, as described and illustrated in the gospels, and search whether you can find any thing like it in your own life. Have you any thing of his devotion, love, and resignation to God? Any thing of his humility, meekness, and benevolence to men? Any thing of his purity and wisdom, his contempt of the world, his patience, his fortitude, his zeal? And indeed all the other branches of the Christian temper, which do not imply previous guilt in the person by whom they are exercised, may be called in to illustrate and assist your inquiries under this head.

§ 5. Let me add, if you are a Christian, you are in the main spiritually minded, as knowing that it is life and peace, whereas to be carnally-minded is death. Though you live in the flesh, you will not war after it; you will not take your orders and your commands from it. You will indeed attend to its necessary interests, as matter of duty, but it will still be with regard to another and a nobler interest, that of the rational and immortal spirit. Your thoughts, your affections, your pursuits, your choice, will be determined by a regard to things spiritual, rather than carnal. In a word, you will walk by faith, and not by sight. Future, invisible, and in some degree incomprehensible, objects, will take up your mind. Your faith will act on the being of God, his perfections, his providences, his precepts, his threatenings, and his promises. It will act upon Christ, whom having not seen, you will love and honour. It will act on that unseen world, which it knows to be eternal, and therefore infinitely more worthy of your affectionate regard, than any of those things which are seen, and are temporal.

§ 6. These are general views of the Christian temper, on which I would entreat you to examine yourself. And now I would go on to lead you into a survey of the grand branches of it, as relating to God, our neighbour, and ourselves; and of those qualifications, which must attend each of these branches, such as sincerity, constancy, tenderness, zeal, and prudence. And I beg your diligent attention, while I lay before you a few hints with regard to each, by which you may judge the better, both of your state and your duty.

§ 7. Examine then, I entreat you, the temper of your heart, with regard to the blessed God. Do you find there a reverential fear, and a supreme love and veneration for his incomparable excellences, a desire after him as the highest good, and a cordial gratitude towards him as your supreme Benefactor? Can you trust his care? Can you credit his testimony? Do you desire to pay an unreserved obedience to all that he commands, and a humble submission to all the disposals of his providence? Do you design his glory as your noblest end, and make it the great business of your life to approve yourself to him? Is it your governing care to imitate him, and to serve him in spirit and in truth?

§ 8. Faith in Christ I have already described at large; and therefore shall say nothing further, either of that persuasion of his power and grace, which is the great foundation of it; or of that acceptance of Christ under all his characters, or that surrender of the soul into his hands, in which its peculiar and distinguishing nature consists.

* The reader may see these thoughts illustrated at large in the three first of my Sermons on Regeneration.

§ 9. If this faith in Christ be sincere, it will undoubtedly produce a love to him; which will express itself in affectionate thoughts of him; in strict fidelity to him; in a careful observation of his charge; in a regard to his Spirit, to his friends, and to his interests; in a reverence to the memorials of his dying love which he has instituted; and in an ardent desire after that heavenly world where he dwells, and where he will at length have all his people to dwell with him.

§ 10. I may add, agreeably to the word of God, that thus believing in Christ, and loving him, you will also rejoice in him; in his glorious design, and in his complete fitness to accomplish it; in the promises of his word, and in the privileges of his people. It will be matter of joy to you, that such a Redeemer has appeared in this world of ours; and your joy for yourselves will be proportionable to the degree of clearness with which you discern your interest in him, and relation to him.

§ 11. Let me further lead you into some reflections on the temper of your heart towards the blessed Spirit. If we have not the Spirit of Christ, we are none of his. If we are not led by the Spirit of God, we are not the children of God. You will then, if you are a real Christian, desire that you may be filled with the Spirit, that you may have every power of your soul subject to his authority; that his agency on your heart be more constant, more operative, and more delightful. And to cherish these sacred influences, you will often have recourse to serious consideration and meditation; you will abstain from those sins, which tend to grieve him; you will improve the tender seasons, in which he seems to breathe upon your soul; you will strive earnestly with God in prayer, that you may have him shed on you still more abundantly through Jesus Christ; and you will be desirous to fall in with the great end of his mission, which was to glorify Christ, and to establish his kingdom. You will desire his influences as the Spirit of adoption, to render your acts of worship free and affectionate, your obedience vigorous, your sorrow for sin overflowing and tender, your resignation meek, and your love ardent; in a word, to carry you through life and death, with the temper of a child, who delights in his father, and who longs for his more immediate presence.

§ 12. Once more, if you are a Christian indeed, you will be desirous to obtain the spirit of courage. Amidst all that humility of soul to which you will be formed, you will wish to commence a hero in the cause of Christ, opposing with a vigorous resolution the strongest efforts of the powers of darkness, the inward corruption of your own heart, and all the outward difficulties you may meet with in the way of your duty, while in the cause and in the strength of Christ you go on conquering and to conquer.

§ 13. All these things may be considered as branches of godliness; of that godliness which is profitable unto all things, and hath the promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come.

§ 14. Let me now further lay before you some branches of the Christian temper, which relate more immediately to ourselves. And here, if you are a Christian indeed, you will undoubtedly prefer the soul to the body, and things eternal to those that are temporal. Conscious of the dignity and value of your immortal part, you will come to a firm resolution to secure its happiness, whatever is to be resigned, whatever is to be endured, in that view.—If you are a real Christian, you will also be clothed with humility. You will have a deep sense of your own imperfections, both natural and moral; of the short extent of your knowledge; of the uncertainty and weakness of your resolutions; and of your continual dependence upon God, and upon almost every thing about you. And especially, you will be deeply sensible of your guilt, the remembrance of which will fill you with shame and confusion, even when you have some reason to hope it is forgiven. This will forbid all haughtiness and insolence in your behaviour to your fellow-creatures. It will teach you, under afflictive providences, with all holy submission to bear the indignation of the Lord, as those that know they have sinned against him.—Again, if you are a Christian indeed, you will labour after purity of soul, and maintain a fixed abhorrence of all prohibited sensual indulgence. A recollection of past impurities will fill you with shame and grief; and you will endeavour for the future to guard your thoughts and desires, as well as your words and actions; and to abstain, not only from the commission of evil, but from the distant appearance and probable occasions of it; as conscious of the perfect holiness of that God with whom you converse, and the purifying nature of that hope, which by his gospel he hath taught you to entertain.

§ 15. With this is nearly allied that amiable virtue of temperance, which will teach you to guard against such a use of meats and drinks as indisposes the body for the service of the soul: or such an indulgence in either as will rob you of that precious jewel, your time, or occasion an expense beyond what your circumstances will admit, and beyond what will consist with those liberalities to the poor which your relation and theirs to God and each other will require. In short, you will guard against whatever has a tendency to increase a sensual disposition; against whatever would alienate the soul from communion with God, and would diminish its zeal and activity in his service.

§ 16. The divine philosophy of the blessed Jesus will also teach you a contented temper. It will moderate your desires of those worldly enjoyments, after which many feel such an insatiable thirst, ever growing with indulgence and success. You will guard against an immoderate care about those things which would lead you into a forgetfulness of your heavenly inheritance. If Providence disappoint your undertakings, you will submit. If others be more prosperous, you will not envy them; but rather will be thankful for what God is pleased to bestow upon them, as well as for what he gives you. No unlawful methods will be used to alter your present condition; and whatever it is, you will endeavour to make the best of it; remembering, it is what infinite wisdom and goodness have appointed you, and that it is beyond all comparison better than you have deserved; yea, that the very deficiencies and inconveniences of it may conduce to the improvement of your future and complete happiness.

§ 17. With contentment, if you are a disciple of Christ, you will join patience too, and in patience will possess your souls. You cannot indeed be quite insensible, either of afflictions, or of injuries; but your mind will be calm and composed under them, and steady in the prosecution of proper duty, though afflictions press, and though your hopes, your dearest hopes and prospects, be delayed. Patience will prevent rash and hasty conclusions, and fortify you against seeking irregular methods of relief; disposing you in the mean time, till God shall be pleased to appear for you, to go on steadily in the way of your duty, committing yourself to him in well doing. You will also be careful, that patience may have its perfect work, and prevail in proportion to those circumstances which demand its peculiar exercise. For instance, when the successions of evil are long and various, so that deep calls to deep, and all God's waves and billows seem to be going over you one after another; when God touches you in the most tender part; when the reasons of his conduct to you are quite unaccountable; when your natural spirits are weak and decayed; when unlawful methods of redress seem near and easy; still your reverence for the will of your heavenly Father will carry it against all, and keep you waiting quietly for deliverance in his own time and way.

[N. B. If this chapter seem too long to be read at once, it may properly be divided here.]

§ 18. I have thus led you into a brief review of the Christian temper, with respect to God and ourselves: permit me now to add, that the gospel will teach you another set of very important lessons with respect to your fellow creatures. They are all summed up in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; and whatsoever thou wouldst that is, whatsoever thou couldst in an exchange of circumstances fairly and reasonably desire, that others should do unto thee, do thou likewise the same unto them. The religion of the blessed Jesus, when it triumphs in your soul, will conquer the predominancy of an irregular self-love, and will teach you candidly and tenderly to look upon your neighbour as another self. As you are sensible of your own rights, you will be sensible of his; as you support your own character, you will support his. You will desire his welfare, and be ready to relieve his necessity, as you would have your own consulted by another. You will put the kindest construction upon his dubious words and actions. You will take pleasure in his happiness; you will feel his distress, in some measure, as your own. And most happy will you be, when this obvious rule is familiar to your mind; when this golden law is written upon your heart; and when it is habitually and impartially consulted by you, upon every occasion, whether great or small.

§ 19. The gospel will also teach you to put on meekness, not only with respect to God, submitting to the authority of his word, and the disposal of his providence, as was urged before; but also with regard to your brethren of mankind. Its gentle instructions will form you to calmness of temper under injuries and provocations, so that you may not be angry without or beyond just cause. It will engage you to guard your words, lest you provoke and exasperate those you should rather study by love to gain, and by tenderness to heal. Meekness will render you slow in using any rough and violent methods, if they can by any means be lawfully avoided; and ready to admit, and even to propose, a reconciliation, after they have been entered into, if there may yet be hope of succeeding. So far as this branch of the Christian temper prevails in your heart, you will take care to avoid every thing which might give unnecessary offence to others; you will behave yourself in a modest manner, according to your station; and it will work, both with regard to superiors and inferiors; teaching you duly to honour the one, and not to overbear or oppress, to grieve or insult, the other. And in religion itself, it will restrain all immoderate sallies and harsh censures; and will command down that wrath of man, which instead of working, so often opposes, the righteousness of God, and shames and wounds that good cause, in which it is boisterously and furiously engaged.

§ 20. With this is naturally connected a peaceful disposition. If you are a Christian indeed, you will have such a value and esteem for peace, as to endeavour to obtain and to preserve it, as much as lieth in you, as much as you fairly and honourably can. This will have such an influence upon your conduct, as to make you not only cautious of giving offence, and slow in taking it, but earnestly desirous to regain peace as soon as may be, when it is in any measure broken; that the wound may be healed while it is green, and before it begins to rankle and fester. And more especially this disposition will engage you to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, with all that in every place call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; whom, if you truly love, you will also love all those whom you have reason to believe to be his disciples and servants.

§ 21. If you be yourselves indeed of that number, you will also put on bowels of mercy. The mercies of God, and those of the blessed Redeemer, will work on your heart, to mould it to sentiments of compassion and generosity, so that you will feel the wants and sorrows of others; you will desire to relieve their necessities, and, as you have an opportunity, you will do good both to their bodies and their souls; expressing your kind affections in suitable actions, which may both evince their sincerity, and render them effectual.

§ 22. As a Christian, you will also maintain truth inviolable, not only in your solemn testimonies, when confirmed by an oath, but likewise in common conversation. You will remember, too, that your promises bring an obligation upon you which you are by no means at liberty to break through. On the whole, you will be careful to keep a strict correspondence between your words and your actions, in such a manner as becomes a servant of the God of truth.

§ 23. Once more, as amidst the strictest care to observe all the divine precepts, you will still find many imperfections, on account of which you will be obliged to pray, that God would not enter into strict judgment with you, as well knowing that in his sight you cannot be justified; you will be careful not to judge others in such a manner as should awaken the severity of his judgment against yourself. You will not, therefore, judge them pragmatically, that is, when you have nothing to do with their actions; nor rashly, without inquiring into circumstances; nor partially, without weighing them attentively and fairly; nor uncharitably, putting the worst construction upon things in their own nature dubious, deciding upon intentions as evil further than they certainly appear to be so, pronouncing on the state of men, or on the whole of their character, from any particular action, and involving the innocent with the guilty. There is a moderation contrary to all these extremes, which the gospel recommends; and if you receive the gospel in good earnest into your heart, it will lay the axe to the root of such evils as these.

§ 24. Having thus briefly illustrated the principal branches of the Christian temper and character, I shall conclude the representation with reminding you of some general qualifications, which must be mingled with all, and give a tincture to each of them; such as sincerity, constancy, tenderness, zeal, and prudence.

§ 25. Always remember, that sincerity is the very soul of true religion. A single intention to please God, and to approve ourselves to him, must animate and govern all that we do in it. Under the influence of this principle, you will impartially inquire into every intimation of duty, and apply to the practice of it so far as it is known to you. Your heart will be engaged in all you do. Your conduct in private and in secret will be agreeable to your most public behaviour. A sense of the divine authority will teach you to esteem all God's precepts concerning all things to be right, and to hate every false way.

§ 26. Thus are you in simplicity and godly sincerity to have your conversation in the world. And you are also to charge it upon your soul to be stedfast and immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. There must not only be some sudden fits and starts of devotion, or of something which looks like it; but religion must be an habitual and permanent thing. There must be a purpose to adhere to it at all times. It must be made the stated and ordinary business of life. Deliberate and presumptuous sins must be carefully avoided; a guard must be maintained against the common infirmities of life; and falls of one kind or of another must be matter of proportionable humiliation before God, and must occasion renewed resolutions for his service. And thus you are to go on to the end of your life, not discouraged by the length and difficulty of the way; nor allured on the one hand, or terrified on the other, by all the various temptations which may surround and assault you. Your soul must be fixed on this basis, and you are still to behave yourself as one who knows he serves an unchangeable God, and who expects from him a kingdom which cannot be moved.

§ 27. Again, so far as the gospel prevails in your heart, your spirit will be tender, and the stone will be transformed into flesh. You will desire, that your apprehension of divine things may be quick, your affections ready to take proper impressions, your conscience always easily touched, and, on the whole, your resolutions pliant to the divine authority, and cordially willing to be, and to do, whatever God shall appoint. You will have a tender regard to the word of God, a tender caution against sin, a tender guard against the snares of prosperity, a tender submission to God's afflicting hand; in a word, you will be tender, wherever the divine honour is concerned; and careful, neither to do any thing yourself, nor to allow any thing in another, so far as you can influence, by which God should be offended, or religion reproached.

§ 28. Nay more than all this, you will, so far as true Christianity governs in your mind, exert a holy zeal in the service of your Redeemer and your Father. You will be zealously affected in every good thing, in proportion to its apprehended goodness and importance. You will be zealous, especially, to correct what is irregular in yourselves, and to act to the utmost of your ability for the cause of God. Nor will you be able to look with an indifferent eye on the conduct of others in this view; but so far as charity, meekness, and prudence, will admit, you will testify your disapprobation of every thing in it which is dishonourable to God, and injurious to men. And you will labour, not only to reclaim men from such courses, but to engage them to religion, and to quicken them in it.

§ 29. And once more, you will desire to use the prudence which God hath given you, in judging what is, in present circumstances, your duty to God, your neighbour, and yourself; what will be, on the whole, the most acceptable manner of discharging it, and how far it may be most advantageously pursued; as remembering, that he is indeed the wisest and the happiest man, who, by constant attention of thought, discovers the greatest opportunities of doing good, and with ardent and animated resolution breaks through every opposition, that he may improve those opportunities.

§ 30. This is such a view of the Christian temper as could conveniently be thrown within such narrow limits: and I hope it may assist many in the great and important work of self-examination. Let your own conscience answer, how far you have already attained it, and how far you desire it; and let the principal topics here touched upon be fixed in your memory and in your heart, that you may be mentioning them before God in your daily addresses to the throne of grace, in order to receive from him all necessary assistances for bringing them into practice.

A Prayer chiefly in Scripture language, in which the several branches of the Christian temper are more briefly enumerated in the order laid down above.

"Blessed God, I humbly adore thee, as the great Father of lights, and the giver of every good and every perfect gift. From thee therefore I seek every blessing, and especially those which may lead me to thyself, and prepare me for the eternal enjoyment of thee. I adore thee, as the God who searches the hearts and tries the reins of the children of men. Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts: see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. May I know what manner of spirit I am of, and be preserved from mistaking, where the error might be infinitely fatal!

"May I, O Lord, be renewed in the spirit of my mind! A new heart do thou give me, and a new spirit do thou put within me! Make me partaker of a divine nature; and as he who hath called me is holy, may I be holy in all manner of conversation! May the same mind be in me which was in Christ Jesus: and may I so walk even as he walked! Deliver me from being carnally minded, which is death; and make me spiritually minded, since that is life and peace. And may I, while I pass through this world of sense, walk by faith, and not by sight; and be strong in faith, giving glory to God!

"May thy grace, O Lord, which hath appeared unto all men, and appeared to me with such glorious evidence and lustre, effectually teach me to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly! Work in my heart that godliness which is profitable unto all things, and teach me by the influence of thy blessed Spirit, to love thee, the Lord my God, with all my heart, and with all my soul, and with all my mind, and with all my strength. May I yield myself unto thee, as alive from the dead; and present my body a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable in thy sight, which is my most reasonable service. May I entertain the most faithful and affectionate regards to the blessed Jesus, thine incarnate Son, the brightness of thy glory, and the express image of thy person. Though I have not seen him, may I love him; and in him, though now I see him not, yet believing, may I rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory: and may the life which I live in the flesh be daily by the faith of the Son of God. May I be filled with the Spirit, and may I be led by it; and so may it be evident to others, and especially to my own soul, that I am a child of God, and an heir of glory. May I not receive the spirit of bondage unto fear, but the Spirit of adoption, whereby I may be enabled to cry, Abba, Father! May he work in me as the spirit of love, and of power, and of a sound mind; that so I may add to my faith virtue. May I be strong, and very courageous, and quit myself like a man and like a Christian, in the work to which I am called; and in that warfare which I had in view when I listed under the banner of the great Captain of my salvation!

"Teach me, O Lord, seriously to consider the nature of my own soul, and to set a suitable value upon it! May I labour not only, or chiefly, for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endureth to eternal life! May I humble myself under thy mighty hand, and be clothed with humility; decked with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price! May I be pure in heart, that I may see God; mortifying my members which are on the earth, so that if a right eye offend me, I may pluck it out, and if a right hand offend me, I may cut it off! May I be temperate in all things, content with such things as I have, and instructed to be so, in whatsoever state I am! May patience also have its perfect work in me, that I may be in that respect complete and wanting nothing!

"Form me, O Lord, I beseech thee, to a proper temper towards my fellow-creatures! May I love my neighbour as myself: and whatsoever I would that others should do unto me, may I also do the same unto them! May I put on meekness under the greatest injuries and provocations; and if it be possible, as much as lieth in me, may I live peaceably with all men. May I be merciful, as my Father in heaven is merciful. May I speak the truth from my heart; and may I speak it in love, guarding against every instance of a censorious and malignant disposition; and taking care not to judge severely, as I would not be judged with a severity which thou, Lord, knowest, and which my own conscience knows, I should not be able to support!

"I entreat thee, O Lord, to work in me all those qualifications of the Christian temper, which may render it peculiarly acceptable to thee, and may prove ornamental to my profession in the world. Renew, I beseech thee, a right spirit within me; make me an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no allowed guile. And while I feast on Christ, as my passover sacrificed for me, may I keep the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. Make me, I beseech thee, O thou almighty and unchangeable God, stedfast and immovable, always abounding in thy work, as knowing that my labour in the Lord shall not be finally in vain. May my heart be tender, easily impressed with thy word and providence, touched with an affectionate concern for thy glory, and sensible of every impulse of thy Spirit. May I be zealous for my God, with a zeal according to knowledge and charity, and teach me in thy service to join the wisdom of the serpent with the boldness of the lion, and the innocence of the dove. Thus render me, by thy grace, a shining image of my dear Redeemer; and at length bring me to wear the bright resemblance of his holiness and his glory in that world where he dwells; that I may ascribe everlasting honours to him, and to thee, O thou Father of mercies, whose invaluable gift he is, and to thine Holy Spirit, through whose gracious influences I would humbly hope I may call thee my Father, and Jesus my Saviour! Amen."

CHAP. XV.

The reader reminded how much he needs the assistance of the Spirit of God, to form him to the temper described above, and what encouragement he has to expect it.

Forward resolutions may prove ineffectual, § 1. Yet religion is not to be given up in despair, but divine grace sought, § 2. A general view of its reality and necessity, from reason, § 3, and Scripture, § 4. The Spirit to be sought of Christ, § 5. And that we may obtain strength of the Spirit, § 6. The encouragement there is to [illegible] for the communication of it, § 7. A [illegible] for the [illegible] § 8. And a humble address to God, pursuant to these considerations.

§ 1. I HAVE now laid before you a plan of that temper and character which the gospel requires, and which, if you are a true Christian, you will desire and pursue. Surely there is in the very description of it something which must powerfully strike every mind, which has any taste for what is truly beautiful and excellent. And I question not, but you, my dear reader, will feel some impression of it upon your heart. You will immediately form some lively purpose of endeavouring after it; and perhaps you may imagine, you shall certainly and quickly attain to it. You see how reasonable it is, and what desirable consequences necessarily attend it, and the aspect which it bears on your present enjoyment, and your future happiness; and therefore are determined you will act accordingly. But give me leave seriously to remind you, how many there have been, (would to God that several of the instances had not happened within the compass of my own personal observation!) whose goodness hath been like a morning cloud, and the early dew, which soon passeth away. There is not room indeed absolutely to apply the words of Joshua, taken in the most rigorous sense, when he said to Israel, (that he might humble their too hasty and sanguine resolutions,) Ye cannot serve the Lord. But I will venture to say, you cannot easily do it. Alas, you know not the difficulties you have to break through; you know not the temptations which Satan will throw in your way; you know not how importunate your vain and sinful companions will be, to draw you back into the snare you may attempt to break; and above all, you know not the subtle artifices which your own corruptions will practise upon you, in order to recover their dominion over you. You think the views you now have of things will be lasting, because the principles and objects to which they refer are so; but perhaps to-morrow may undeceive you, or rather deceive you anew. To-morrow may present some trifle in a new dress, which shall amuse you into a forgetfulness of all this. Nay, perhaps, before you lie down on your bed, the impressions you now feel may wear off. The corrupt desires of your own heart, now perhaps a little charmed down, and lying as if they were dead, may spring up again with new violence, as if they had slept only to recruit their vigour; and if you are not supported by a better strength than your own, this struggle for liberty will only make your future chains the heavier, the more shameful, and the more fatal.

§ 2. What then is to be done? Is the convinced sinner to lie down in despair? to say, "I am a helpless captive; and by exerting myself with violence, may break my limbs sooner than my bonds, and increase the evil I would remove." God forbid! You cannot, I am persuaded, be so little acquainted with Christianity as not to know "that the doctrine of divine assistance bears a very considerable part in it." You have often, I doubt not, read of the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, as making us free from the law of sin and death: and have been told that through the Spirit we mortify the deeds of the body: you have read of doing all things through Christ who strengtheneth us; whose grace is sufficient for us, and whose strength is made perfect in weakness. Permit me, therefore, now to call down your attention to this, as a truth of the clearest evidence, and of the utmost importance.

§ 3. Reason, indeed, as well as the whole tenor of Scripture, agrees with this.* The whole created world has a necessary dependence on God: from him even the knowledge of natural things is derived, and skill in them is to be ascribed to him. Much more loudly does so great and excellent a work, as the new forming the human mind, be speak its divine Author. When you consider how various the branches of the Christian temper are, and how contrary many of them also are to that temper, which hath prevailed in your heart, and governed your life in time past, you must readily see divine influences as necessary to produce and nourish them, as the influences of the sun and rain are to call up the variety of plants, and flowers, and grain, and fruits, by which the earth is adorned, and our life supported. You will yet be more sensible of this, if you reflect on the violent opposition which this happy work must be expected to meet with, of which I shall presently warn you more largely, and which if you have not already experienced, it must be because you have but very lately begun to think of religion.

§ 4. Accordingly, if you give yourself leave to consult Scripture on this head, (and if you would live like a Christian, you must be consulting it every day, and forming your notions and actions by it,) you will see, that the whole tenor of it teaches that dependence upon God, which I am now recommending. You will particularly see, that the production of religion in the soul is matter of divine promise; that when it has been affected, Scripture ascribes it to a divine agency; and that the increase of grace and piety in the heart of those who are truly regenerate, is also spoken of as the work of God, who begins and carries it on, until the day of Jesus Christ.

§ 5. In consequence of all these views, lay it down to yourself as a most certain principle, "that no attempt in religion is to be made in your own strength." If you forget this, and God permit, finally to save you, he will humble you by repeated disappointments, till he teach you better. You will be ashamed of one scheme and effort, and of another, till you settle upon the true basis. He will also probably show you, not only in the general, that your strength is to be derived from heaven, but particularly, that it is the office of the Blessed Spirit, to purify the heart, and to invigorate holy resolutions; and also, that in all these operations he is to be considered as the Spirit of Christ, working under his direction, and as a vital communication from him, under the character of the great Head of the church, the grand treasurer and dispenser of these holy and beneficial influences. On which account it is called the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, who is exalted at the right hand of the Father, to give repentance and remission of sins; in whose grace alone we can be strong, and of whose fulness we receive, even grace for grace.

§ 6. Resolve therefore strenuously for the service of God, and for the care of your soul: but "resolve modestly and humbly." Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men utterly fall; but they who wait on the Lord are the persons who renew their strength. When a soul is almost afraid to declare, in the presence of the Lord, that it will not do this, or that, which has formerly offended him; when it is afraid absolutely to promise that it will perform this or that duty with vigour and constancy; but only expresses its humble earnest desire, that it may by grace be enabled to avoid the one, or pursue the other; then, so far as my observation and experience have reached, it is in the best way to learn the happy art of conquering temptations, and of discharging duty.

§ 7. On the other hand, let not your dependence upon this spirit, and your sense of your own weakness and insufficiency for any thing spiritually good without his continued aid, discourage you from devoting yourself to God, and engaging in a religious life, considering "what abundant reason you have to hope, that these gracious influences will be communicated to you." The light of nature, at the same time that it teaches the need we have of help from God, in a virtuous course, may lead us to conclude, that so benevolent a Being, who bestows on the most unworthy and careless part of mankind so many blessings, will take a peculiar pleasure in communicating to such as humbly ask them, those gracious assistances which may form their deathless souls into his own resemblance, and fit them for that happiness to which their rational nature is suited, and for which it was in its first constitution intended. The word of God will much more abundantly confirm such a hope. You there hear divine wisdom crying, even to those who had long trifled with her instructions, Turn ye at my reproof, and I will pour out my Spirit upon you. You hear the apostle say, in, Let us come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in every time of need. Yea, you there hear our Lord himself arguing in this sweet and convincing manner: If ye being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give his Holy Spirit unto them that ask him? This gift and promise of the Spirit was given unto Christ, when he ascended up on high, in trust for all his true disciples. God hath shed it abundantly upon us in him. And I may add, that the very desire you feel after the further communication of the Spirit, is the result of the first-fruits of it already given: so that you may with peculiar propriety interpret it as a special call, to open your mouth wide, that he may fill it. You thirst, and therefore you may cheerfully plead that Jesus hath invited you to come unto him and drink; with a promise, not only that you shall drink if you come unto him, but also, that out of your belly shall flow, as it were, rivers of living water for the edification and refreshment of others.

* See Dr. Clarke's [illegible] Sermon, vol. ii. Serm. 2, beginning [illegible].

§ 8. Go forth, therefore, with humble cheerfulness, to the prosecution of all the duties of the Christian life. Go, and prosper, in the strength of the Lord, making mention of his righteousness, and of his only. And as a token of further communications, may your heart be quickened to the most earnest desires, after the blessings I have now been recommending to your pursuit! May you be stirred up to pour out your soul before God in such holy breathings as these! And may they be your daily language in his gracious presence!

An humble Supplication for the influences of Divine Grace, to form and strengthen religion in the soul.

"Blessed God! I sincerely acknowledge before thee mine own weakness and insufficiency for any thing that is spiritually good. I have experienced it a thousand times: and yet my foolish heart would again trust itself, and form resolutions in its own strength. But let this be the first-fruits of thy gracious influence upon it, to bring it to a humble distrust of itself, and to a repose on thee!

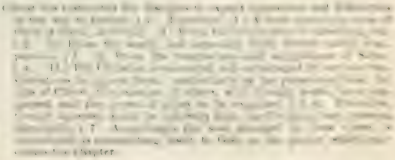
"Abundantly do I rejoice, O Lord, in the kind assurances which thou givest me, of thy readiness to bestow liberally and richly so great a benefit. I do therefore, according to thy condescending invitation, come with boldness to the throne of grace, that I may find grace to help in every time of need. I mean not, O Lord God, to turn thy grace into wantonness or perverseness, or to make my weakness an excuse for negligence and sloth. I confess, thou hast already given me more strength than I have used, and I charge it upon myself, and not on thee, that I have not long since received still more abundant supplies. I desire for the future to be found diligent in the use of all appointed means: in the neglect of which I well know that petitions like these would be a profane mockery, and might much more probably provoke thee to take away what I have, than prevail upon thee to impart more. But firmly resolving to exert myself to the utmost, I earnestly entreat the communications of thy grace, that I may be enabled to fulfil that resolution.

"Be surety, O Lord, unto thy servant for good! Be pleased to shed abroad thy sanctifying influences on my soul, to form me for every duty thou requirest! Implant, I beseech thee, every grace and virtue deep in mine heart; and maintain the happy temper in the midst of those assaults, from within and from without, to which I am continually liable, while I am still in this world, and carry about with me so many infirmities! Fill my breast, I beseech thee, with good affections towards thee, my God, and towards my fellow-creatures! Remind me always of thy presence; and may I remember that every secret sentiment of my soul is open to thee! May I, therefore, guard against the first risings of sin, and the first approaches to it! And that Satan may not find room for his evil suggestions, I earnestly beg thou, Lord, wouldst fill my heart by thine Holy Spirit, and take up thy residence there! Dwell in me, and walk with me; and let my body be the temple of the Holy Ghost!

"May I be so joined to Christ Jesus my Lord, as to be one Spirit with him, and feel his invigorating influences continually bearing me on, superior to every temptation and to every corruption! That while the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men utterly fall, I may so wait upon the Lord, as to renew my strength, and may go from one degree of faith, and love, and zeal, and holiness, to another, till I appear perfect before thee in Zion, to drink in immortal vigour and joy from thee, as the everlasting fountain of both, through Jesus Christ my Lord, in whom I have righteousness and strength, and to whom I desire ever to ascribe the praise of all mine improvement in both! Amen."

CHAP. XVI

The Christian convert warned of, and armed against, those discouragements which he may expect to meet with, when entering on a religious course.



§ 1. With the utmost propriety has our Divine Master required us, to strive to enter in at the strait gate; thereby, as it seems, intimating, not only that the passage is narrow, but that it is beset with enemies, beset on the right hand and on the left, with enemies cunning and formidable. And be assured, O reader, that whatever your circumstances in life are, you must meet and encounter them. It will, therefore, be your prudence to survey them attentively in your own reflections, that you may see what you are to expect; and may consider in what armour it is necessary you should be clothed, and with what weapons you must be furnished, to manage the combat. You have often heard them marshalled, as it were, under three great leaders, the flesh, the world, and the devil: and according to this distribution, I would call you to consider the forces of each, as setting themselves in array against you. O that you may be excited to take to yourself the whole armour of God, and to acquit yourself like a man and a Christian!

§ 2. Let your conscience answer, whether you do not carry about with you a corrupt and degenerate nature? You will, I doubt not, feel its effects. You will feel, in the language of the apostle, (who speaks of it as the case of Christians themselves,) the flesh lusting against the spirit, so that you will not be able in all instances to do the things that you would. You brought irregular propensities into the world along with you; and you have so often indulged those sinful inclinations, that you have greatly increased their strength; and you will find, in consequence of it, that these habits cannot be broke through without great difficulty. You will, no doubt, often recollect the strong figures in which the prophet describes a case like yours; and you will own, that it is justly represented by that of an Ethiopian changing his skin, and the leopard his spots. It is indeed possible, that at first you may find such an edge and eagerness upon your spirits, as may lead you to imagine that all opposition will immediately fall before you. But alas, I fear that in a little time, these enemies, which seemed to be slain at your feet, will revive, and recover their weapons, and renew the assault in one form or another. And perhaps your most painful combats may be with such as you had thought most easy to be vanquished, and your greatest danger may arise from some of those enemies from whom you apprehended the least; particularly from pride, and from indolence of spirit: from a secret alienation of heart from God, and from an indisposition for conversing with him, through an immoderate attachment to things seen and temporal, which may be oftentimes exceeding dangerous to your salvation, though perhaps they be not absolutely and universally prohibited. In a thousand of these instances you must learn to deny yourself, or you cannot be Christ's disciple.

§ 3. You must also lay your account to find great difficulties from the world: from its manners, customs, and examples. The things of the world will hinder you one way, and the men of the world another. Perhaps you may meet with much less assistance in religion, than you are now ready to expect from good men. The present generation of them is generally so cautious to avoid every thing that looks like ostentation, and there seems something so insupportably dreadful in the charge of enthusiasm, that you will find most of your Christian brethren studying to conceal their virtue and their piety, much more than others study to conceal their vice and their profaneness. But while, unless your situation be singularly happy, you meet with very little aid one way, you will no doubt find great opposition another. The enemies of religion will be bold and active in their assaults, while many of its friends seem unconcerned; and one sinner will probably exert himself more to corrupt you, than ten Christians to secure and save you. They who have once been your companions in sin, will try a thousand artful methods to allure you back again to their forsaken society; some of them, perhaps, with an appearance of tender fondness, and many more by the almost irresistible art of banter and ridicule. That boasted test of right and wrong, as it has been wantonly called, will be tried upon you, perhaps without any regard to decency, or even to common humanity. You will be derided and insulted by those whose esteem and affection you naturally desire; and may find much more propriety than you imagine, in that expression of the apostle, the trial of cruel mockings, which some fear more than either sword or flames. This persecution of the tongue you must expect to go through, and perhaps may be branded as a lunatic, for no other cause than that now you begin to exercise your reason to purpose, and will not join with those who are destroying their own souls, in their wild career of folly and madness.

§ 4. And it is not at all improbable, that in the meantime Satan may be doing his utmost to discourage and distress you. He will, no doubt, raise in your imagination the most tempting idea of the gratifications, the indulgences, and the companions you are obliged to forsake; and give you the most discouraging and terrifying view of the difficulties, severities, and dangers, which are (as he will persuade you) inseparable from religion. He will not fail to represent God himself, the fountain of goodness and happiness, as a hard master, whom it is impossible to please. He will perhaps fill you with the most distressful fears, and with cruel and insolent malice glory over you as his slave, when he knows you are the Lord's freeman. At one time, he will study by his vile suggestions to interrupt you in your duties, as if they gave him an additional power over you.

At another time he will endeavour to weary you of your devotion, by influencing you to prolong it to an immoderate and tedious length, lest his power should be exerted upon you when it ceases. In short, this practised deceiver has artifices which it would require whole volumes to display, with particular cautions against each. And he will follow you with malicious arts and pursuits, to the very end of your pilgrimage; and will leave no method unattempted, which may be likely to weaken your hands and to sadden your heart; that if, through the gracious interposition of God, he cannot prevent your final happiness, he may at least impair your peace and your usefulness, as you are passing to it.

§ 5. This is what the people of God feel: and what you will feel in some degree or other, if you have your lot and your portion among them. But after all, be not discouraged; Christ is the captain of your salvation. It is delightful to consider him under this view. When we take a survey of these hosts of enemies, we may lift up our head amidst them all, and say, More and greater is he that is with us than all those that are against us. Trust in the Lord, and you will be like mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. When your enemies press upon you, remember you are to fight in the presence of God. Endeavour therefore to act a gallant and a resolute part. Endeavour to resist them stedfast in the faith. Remember, he can give power to the faint, and increase strength to them that have no might. He hath done it in ten thousand instances already; and he will do it in ten thousand more. How many striplings have conquered their gigantic foes in all their most formidable armour, when they have gone forth against them, though but as it were with a staff and a sling, in the name of the Lord God of Israel! How many women and children have trodden down the force of the enemy, and out of weakness have been made strong!

§ 6. Amidst all the opposition of earth and hell, look upward, and look forward; and you will feel your heart animated by the view. Your General is near, he is near to aid you; he is near to reward you. When you feel the temptation press the hardest, think of him who endured even the cross itself for your rescue. View the fortitude of your divine Leader, and endeavour to march on in his steps. Hearken to his voice, for he proclaims it aloud, Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. And O, how bright will it shine! and how long will its lustre last! When the gems that adorn the crowns of monarchs, and pass (instructive thought!) from one royal head to another through succeeding centuries, are melted down in the last flame, it is a crown of glory which fadeth not away.

§ 7. It is indeed true, that such as turn aside to crooked paths, will be led forth with the workers of iniquity, to that terrible execution, which the divine justice is preparing for them; and it would have been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after having known it, to turn aside from the holy commandment. But I would, by divine grace, hope better things of you. And I make it my hearty prayer for you, my reader, that you may be kept by the mighty power of God, kept as in a garrison, on all sides fortified, in the securest manner, through faith unto salvation.

The soul, alarmed by a sense of these difficulties, committing itself to Divine Protection.

"Blessed God, it is to thine almighty power that I flee. Behold me surrounded with difficulties and dangers, and stretch out thine omnipotent arm to save me, O thou that savest by thy right hand them that put their trust in thee, from those that rise up against them. This day do I solemnly put myself under thy protection. Exert thy power in my favour, and permit me to make the shadow of thy wings my refuge. Let thy grace be sufficient for me, and thy strength be made perfect in my weakness. I dare not say, I will never forsake thee; I will never deny thee; but I hope I can truly say, O Lord, I would not do it; and that, according to my present apprehension and purpose, death would appear to me much less terrible, than in any wilful and deliberate instance to offend thee. Oh root out those corruptions from my heart, which in an hour of pressing temptation might incline me to view things in a different light, and so might betray me into the hands of the enemy! Strengthen my faith O Lord, and encourage my hope! Inspire me with an heroic resolution in opposing every thing that lies in my way to heaven; and let me set my face like a flint, against all the assaults of earth and hell! If sinners entice me, let me not consent; if they insult me, let me not regard it; if they threaten me, let me not fear! Rather may a holy and ardent, yet prudent and well-governed, zeal, take occasion from that malignity of heart which they discover, to attempt their conviction and reformation. At least, let me never be ashamed to plead thy cause against the most profane deriders of religion. Make me to hear joy and gladness in my own soul; and I will endeavour to teach transgressors thy way, that sinners may be converted unto thee. Yea, Lord, while my fears continue, though I should apprehend myself condemned, I am condemned so righteously for my own folly, that I would be thine advocate, though against myself.

"Keep me, O Lord, now, and at all times! Never let me think, whatever age or station I attain, that I am strong enough to maintain the combat without thee. Not let me imagine myself, even in this infancy of religion in my soul, so weak that thou canst not support me. Wherever thou leadest me, there let me follow; and whatever station thou appointest me, there let me labour; there let me maintain the holy war against all the enemies of my salvation, and rather fall in it than basely abandon it!

"And thou, O glorious Redeemer, the Captain of my salvation, the great Author and Finisher of my faith, whom I am in danger of denying, as Peter did, look upon me with that mixture of majesty and tenderness, which may either secure me from falling, or may speedily recover me to God and my duty again! And teach me to take occasion, even from my miscarriages, to humble myself more deeply for all that has been amiss, and to redouble my future diligence and caution! Amen."

CHAP. XVII

The Christian is called to, and invested in, an express act of Self-dedication to the service of God.

§ 1. As I would hope, that notwithstanding all the views of opposition which do or may arise, yet, in consideration of those noble supports and motives which have been mentioned in the two preceding chapters, you are heartily determined for the service of God, I would now urge you to make a solemn surrender of yourself unto it. Do not only form such a purpose in your heart, but expressly declare it in the divine presence. Such solemnity in the manner of doing it, is certainly very reasonable in the nature of things, and sure it is highly expedient, for binding to the Lord such a treacherous heart, as we know our own to be. It will be pleasant to reflect upon it, as done at such and such a time, with such and such circumstances of place and method, which may serve to strike the memory and the conscience. The sense of the vows of God which are upon you, will strengthen you in an hour of temptation; and the recollection may also encourage your humble boldness and freedom in applying to him, under the character and relation of your covenant God and Father, as future exigencies may require.

§ 2. Do it therefore; but do it deliberately. Consider what it is that you are to do, and consider how reasonable it is that it should be done, and done cordially and cheerfully; not by constraint, but willingly: for in this sense, and in every other, God loves a cheerful giver. Now, surely there is nothing we should do with greater cheerfulness, or more cordial consent, than making such a surrender of ourselves to the Lord; to the God who created us, who brought us into this pleasant and well-furnished world, who supported us in our tender infancy, who guarded us in the thoughtless days of childhood and youth, who has hitherto continually helped, sustained, and preserved us. Nothing can be more reasonable, than that we should acknowledge him as our rightful Owner and our sovereign Ruler; than that we should devote ourselves to him as our most generous Benefactor, and seek him as our supreme felicity. Nothing can be more apparently equitable, than that we, the product of his power and the price of his Son's blood, should be his, and his for ever. If you see the matter in its just view, it will be the grief of your soul, that you have ever alienated yourself from the blessed God and his service; so far will you be from wishing to continue in that state of alienation another year, or another day. You will be sure to bring back to him his revolted creature; and, as you have in times past yielded your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, you will delight to yield yourselves unto God, as alive from the dead, and to employ your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.

§ 3. The surrender will also be as entire as it is cheerful and immediate. All you are, and all you have, and all you can do, your time, your possessions, your influence over others, will be devoted to him, that for the future it may be employed entirely for him, and to his glory. You will desire to keep back nothing from him, but will solemnly judge that you are then in the truest and noblest sense your own, when you are most entirely his. You are also, on this great occasion, to resign all that you have to the disposal of his wise and gracious providence; not only owning his power, but consenting to his undoubted right, to do what he pleases with you, and all that he has given you, and declaring a hearty approbation of all that he has done, and of all that he may further do.

§ 4. Once more, let me remind you, that this surrender must be perpetual. You must give yourself up to God in such a manner, as never more to pretend to be your own, for the rights of God are, like his nature, eternal and immutable; and with regard to his rational creatures, are the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

§ 5. I would further advise and urge, that this dedication may be made with all possible solemnity. Do it in express words. And, perhaps, it may be in many cases most expedient, as many pious divines have recommended to do it in writing. Set your hand and seal to it, that on such a day of such a month and year, and at such a place, on full consideration and serious reflection, you came to this happy resolution, that whatever others might do, you would serve the Lord.

§ 6. Such an instrument you may, if you please, draw up for yourself: or, if you rather choose to have it drawn up to your hand, you may find something of this nature below, in which you may easily make such alterations as shall suit your circumstances, where there is any thing peculiar in them. But whatever you use, weigh it well, meditate attentively upon it, that you may not be rash with your mouth to utter any thing before God. And when you determine to execute this instrument, let the transaction be attended with some more than ordinary religious retirement. Make it, if you conveniently can, a day of secret fasting and prayer; and when your heart is prepared with a becoming awe of the Divine Majesty, with a humble confidence in his goodness, and an earnest desire of his favour, then present yourself on your knees before God, and read it over deliberately and solemnly; and when you have signed it, lay it by in some secure place, where you may review it whenever you please, and make it a rule with yourself, to review it, if possible, at certain seasons of the year, that you may keep up the remembrance of it.

§ 7. At least, take this course, till you see your way clear to the table of the Lord, where you are to renew the same covenant, and to seal it, with more affecting solemnities. And God grant, that you may be enabled to keep it, and in the whole of your conversation to walk according to it! May it be an anchor to your soul in every temptation, and a cordial to it in every affliction! May the recollection of it embolden your addresses to the throne of grace now, and give additional strength to your departing spirit, in a consciousness that it is ascending to your covenant God and Father, and to that gracious Redeemer whose power and faithfulness will securely keep what you commit to him until that day.

An example of Self dedication, or a solemn form of renewing our covenant with God.

"ETERNAL and unchangeable Jehovah! thou great Creator of heaven and earth, and adorable Lord of angels and men! I desire with the deepest humiliation and abasement of soul, to fall down at this time in thine awful presence; and earnestly pray, that thou wilt penetrate my very heart with a suitable sense of thine unutterable and inconceivable glories!

"Trembling may justly take hold upon me, when I, a sinful worm, presume to lift up my head to thee, presume to appear in thy majestic presence on such an occasion as this. Who am I, O Lord God, or what is my house? What is my nature or descent, my character and desert, that I should speak of this, and desire that I may be one party in a covenant, where thou, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, art the other? I blush and am confounded, even to mention it before thee. But, O Lord, great as is thy majesty, so also is thy mercy. If thou wilt hold converse with any of thy creatures, thy superlatively exalted nature must stoop, must stoop infinitely low. And I know, that in and through Jesus, the Son of thy love, thou condescendest to visit sinful mortals, and to allow their approach to thee, and their covenant intercourse with thee; nay, I know, that the scheme and plan is thine own; and that thou hast graciously sent to propose it to us; as none untaught by thee would have been able to form it, or inclined to embrace it even when actually proposed.

"To thee, therefore, do I now come, invited by the name of thy Son, and trusting in his righteousness and grace. Laying myself at thy feet with shame and confusion of face, and smiting upon my breast, I say with the humble publican, God be merciful to me a sinner! I acknowledge, O Lord, that I have been a great transgressor. My sins have reached unto heaven, and mine iniquities are lifted up unto the skies. The irregular propensities of my corrupted and degenerate nature have, in ten thousand aggravated instances, wrought to bring forth fruit unto death. And if thou shouldst be strict to mark mine offences, I must be silent under a load of guilt, and immediately sink into destruction. But thou hast graciously called me to return unto thee, though I have been a wandering sheep, a prodigal son, a backsliding child. Behold, therefore, O Lord, I come unto thee. I come, convinced not only of my sin, but of my folly. I come, from my very heart ashamed of myself, and with an acknowledgment, in the sincerity and humility of my soul, that I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly. I am confounded myself at the remembrance of these things; but be thou merciful to my unrighteousness, and do not remember against me my sins and my transgressions! Pardon me, O Lord, to bring back unto thee those powers and faculties which I have ungratefully and sacrilegiously alienated from thy service; and receive, I beseech thee, thy poor revolted creature, who is now convinced of thy right to him, and desires nothing in the whole world so much as to be thine!

"Blessed God, it is with the utmost solemnity that I make this surrender of myself unto thee. Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; I avouch the Lord this day to be my God; and I avouch and declare myself this day to be one of his covenant children and people. Hear, O thou God of heaven, and record it in the book of thy remembrance, that henceforth I am thine, entirely thine. I would not merely consecrate unto thee some of my powers or some of my possessions, or give thee a certain proportion of my services, or all I am capable of for a limited time, but I would be wholly thine, and thine for ever. From this day, do I solemnly renounce all the former lords which have had dominion over me, every sin and every lust; and bid in thy name an eternal defiance to the powers of hell, which have most unjustly usurped the empire over my soul, and to all the corruptions which their fatal temptations have introduced into it. The whole frame of my nature, all the faculties of my mind, and all the members of my body, would I present before thee this day, as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which I know to be my most reasonable service. To thee I consecrate all my worldly possessions; in thy service I desire to spend all the remainder of my time upon earth, and beg thou wouldst instruct and influence me, so that whether my abode here be longer or shorter, every year and month, every day and hour, may be used in such a manner as shall most effectually promote thy honour, and subserve the schemes of thy wise and gracious providence. And I earnestly pray, that whatever influence thou givest me over others, in any of the superior relations of life in which I may stand, or in consequence of any peculiar regard which may be paid to me; thou wouldst give me strength and courage to exert myself to the utmost for thy glory; resolving, not only that I will myself do it, but that all others, so far as I can rationally and properly influence them, shall serve the Lord. In this course, O blessed God, would I steadily persevere to the very end of my life; earnestly praying, that every future day of it may supply the deficiencies, and correct the irregularities, of the former; and that I may, by divine grace, be enabled, not only to hold on in that happy way, but daily to grow more active in it!

"Nor do I only consecrate all that I am, and have, to thy service; but I also most humbly resign, and submit to thy holy and sovereign will, myself, and all that I can call mine. I leave, O Lord, to thy management and direction all I possess, and all I wish; and set every enjoyment, and every interest, before thee, to be disposed of as thou pleasest. Continue, or remove, what thou hast given me; bestow, or refuse, what I imagine I want, as thou Lord shalt see good. And though I dare not say, I will never repine; yet I hope I may venture to say, that I will labour, not only to submit, but to acquiesce; not only to bear what thou dost in thy most afflictive dispensations, but to consent to it, and to praise thee for it; contentedly resolving, in all that thou appointest for me, my will into thine, and looking on myself as nothing, and on thee, O God, as the great eternal All, whose word ought to determine every thing, and whose government ought to be the joy of the whole rational creation.

"Use me, O Lord, I beseech thee, as the instrument of thy glory, and honour me so far, as, either by doing or suffering what thou shalt appoint, to bring some revenue of praise to thee, and of benefit to the world in which I dwell! And may it please thee, from this day forward, to number me among thy peculiar people, that I may no more be a stranger and foreigner, but a fellow-citizen with the saints, and of the household of God! Receive, O heavenly Father, thy returning prodigal! Wash me in the blood of thy dear Son; clothe me with his perfect righteousness; and sanctify me throughout by the power of thy Spirit! Destroy, I beseech thee, more and more the power of sin in my heart! Transform me more into thine own image, and fashion me to the resemblance of Jesus, whom henceforth I would acknowledge as my teacher and sacrifice, my intercessor and my Lord! Communicate to me, I beseech thee, all needful influences of thy purifying, thy cheering, and thy comforting Spirit; and lift up that light of thy countenance upon me, which will put the sublimest joy and gladness into my soul.

"Dispose my affairs, O God, in a manner which may be most subservient to thy glory and my own truest happiness; and when I have done and borne thy will upon earth, call me from hence, at what time, and in what manner, thou pleasest. Only grant, that in my dying moments, and in the near prospects of eternity, I may remember these my engagements to thee, and may employ my latest breath in thy service! And do thou, Lord, when thou seest the agonies of dissolving nature upon me, remember this covenant too, even though I should then be incapable of recollecting it! Look down, O my heavenly Father, with a pitying eye upon thy languishing, thy dying, child; place thine everlasting arms underneath me for my support, put strength and confidence into my departing spirit: and receive it to the embraces of thine everlasting love! Welcome it to the abodes of them that sleep in Jesus, to wait with them that glorious day, when the last of thy promises to thy covenant people shall be fulfilled in their triumphant resurrection, and that abundant entrance, which shall be administered to them into that everlasting kingdom, of which thou hast assured them by thy covenant, and in the hope of which I now lay hold on it, desiring to live and to die, as with my hand on that hope!

"And when I am thus numbered among the dead, and all the interests of mortality are over with me for ever, if this solemn memorial should chance to fall into the hands of any surviving friends, may it be the means of making serious impressions on their minds! May they read it, not only as my language, but as their own; and learn to fear the Lord my God, and with me to put their trust under the shadow of his wings for time and for eternity! And may they also learn to adore with me that grace, which inclines our hearts to enter into the covenant, and condescends to admit us into it when so inclined; ascribing with me, and with all the nations of the redeemed, to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, that glory, honour, and praise, which is so justly due to each divine person for the part he bears in this illustrious work! Amen."

N. B. For the sake of those who may think the preceding form of self-dedication too long to be transcribed, as it is probable many will, I have, at the desire of a much esteemed friend, added the following abridgment of it, which should by all means be attentively weighed in every clause before it is executed, and any words or phrases which may seem liable to exception changed, that the whole heart may consent to it all.

"ETERNAL and ever-blessed God! I desire to present myself before thee, with the deepest humiliation and abasement of soul; sensible how unworthy such a sinful worm is to appear before the holy Majesty of heaven, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, and especially on such an occasion as this, even to enter into a covenant transaction with thee. But the scheme and plan is thine own. Thine infinite condescension hath offered it by thy Son, and thy grace hath inclined my heart to accept of it.

"I come, therefore, acknowledging myself to have been a great offender; smiting on my breast, and saying, with the humble publican, God be merciful to me a sinner! I come, invited by the name of thy Son, and wholly trusting in his perfect righteousness; entreating, that for his sake thou wilt be merciful to my unrighteousness, and wilt no more remember my sins. Receive, I beseech thee, thy revolted creature, who is now convinced of thy right to him, and desires nothing so much as that he may be thine!

"This day do I, with the utmost solemnity, surrender myself to thee. I renounce all former lords that have had dominion over me; and I consecrate to thee all that I am, and all that I have; the faculties of my mind, the members of my body, my worldly possessions, my time, and my influence over others; to be all used entirely for thy glory, and resolutely employed in obedience to thy commands, as long as thou continuest me in life; with an ardent desire and humble resolution to continue thine through all the endless ages of eternity: ever holding myself in an attentive posture to observe the first intimations of thy will, and ready to spring forward with zeal and joy to the immediate execution of it.

"To thy direction also I resign myself, and all I am and have, to be disposed of by thee in such a manner, as thou shalt in thine infinite wisdom judge most subservient to the purposes of thy glory. To thee I leave the management of all events, and say, without reserve, Not my will, but thine be done; rejoicing with a loyal heart in thine unlimited government, as what ought to be the delight of the rational creation.

"Use me, O Lord, I beseech thee, as an instrument for thy service! Number me among thy peculiar people! Let me be washed in the blood of thy dear Son! Let me be clothed with his righteousness! Let me be sanctified by his Spirit! Transform me more and more into his image! Impart to me, through him, all needful influences of thy purifying, cheering, and comforting Spirit! And let my life be spent under those influences, and in the light of thy gracious countenance, as my Father and my God!

"And when the solemn hour of death comes, may I remember this thy covenant, well ordered in all things and sure, as all my salvation and all my desire, though every other hope and enjoyment is perishing! And do thou, O Lord, remember it too! Look down with pity, O my heavenly Father, on thy languishing dying child! Embrace me in thine everlasting arms! Put strength and confidence into my departing spirit! and receive it to the abodes of them that sleep in Jesus, peacefully and joyfully to wait the accomplishment of thy great promise to all thy people, even that of a glorious resurrection, and of eternal happiness in thy heavenly presence! And if any surviving friend should, when I am in the dust, meet with this memorial of my solemn transactions with thee, may he make the engagement his own; and do thou graciously admit him to partake in all the blessings of thy covenant, through Jesus, the great Mediator of it; to whom, with thee, O Father, and thy Holy Spirit, be everlasting praises ascribed, by all the millions who are thus saved by thee, and by all those other celestial spirits, in whose work and blessedness thou shalt call them to share! Amen."

CHAP. XVIII.

Of entering into Church-communion by an attendance upon the Lord's Supper.

The reader, being already supposed to have entered into covenant with God, [illegible] to urge it publicly upon [illegible] Lord. [illegible] And [illegible] the authority of Christ [illegible] to the ordinance [illegible] Weakness of grace. Secondly, [illegible] At least serious thoughts [illegible] The chapter [illegible] The reader [illegible] tend, yet finds himself pressed with [illegible]

§ 1. I HOPE this chapter will find you, by a most express consent, become one of God's covenant people, solemnly and cordially devoted to his service; and it is my hearty prayer, that the covenant you have made on earth may be ratified in heaven. But for your further instruction and edification give me leave to remind you, that our Lord Jesus Christ hath appointed a peculiar manner of expressing our regard to him, and of solemnly renewing our covenant with him, which, though it does not for-but any other proper way of doing it, must by no means be set aside or neglected for any human methods, how prudent and expedient soever they may appear to us.

§ 2. Our Lord has wisely ordained, that the advantages of society should be brought into religion; and as by his command professing Christians assemble together for other acts of public worship, so he has been pleased to institute a social ordinance, in which a whole assembly of them is to come to his table, and there to eat the same bread, and drink the same cup. And this they are to do, as a token of their affectionate remembrance of his dying love, of their solemn surrender of themselves to God, and of their sincere love to one another, and to all their fellow Christians.

§ 3. That these are indeed the great ends of the Lord's supper, I shall not now stay to argue at large. You need only read what the apostle Paul has written in the tenth and eleventh chapters of his first epistle to the Corinthians, to convince you fully of this. He there expressly tells us, that our Lord commanded the bread to be eaten, and the wine to be drunk, in remembrance of him, or as a commemoration or memorial of him; so that as often as we attend this institution, we show forth our Lord's death, which we are to do even till he come. And it is particularly asserted, that the cup is the new testament in his blood; that is, it is a seal of that covenant which was ratified by his blood. Now it is evident, that, in consequence of this, we are to approach it with a view to that covenant, desiring its blessings, and resolving by divine grace to comply with its demands. On the whole, therefore, as the apostle speaks, we have communion in the body and the blood of Christ, and partaking of his table and of his cup, we converse with Christ, and join ourselves to him as his people: as the heathens in their idolatrous rites, had communion with their deities, and joined themselves to them; and the Jews, by eating their sacrifices, conversed with Jehovah, and joined themselves to him. He further reminds them, that, though many, they were one bread and one body, being all partakers of that one bread, and being all made to drink into one Spirit; that is, meeting together as if they were but one family, and joining in the commemoration of that one blood which was their common ransom, and of the Lord Jesus, their common head. Now it is evident, all these reasonings are equally applicable to Christians in succeeding ages. Permit me therefore, by the authority of our divine Master, to press upon you the observation of this precept.

§ 4. And let me also urge it, from the apparent tendency which it has to promote your truest advantage. You are setting out in the Christian life, and I have reminded you at large of the opposition you must expect to meet with in it. It is the love of Christ which must animate you to break through all. What then can be more desirable, than to bear about with you a lively sense of it? and what can awaken that sense more, than the contemplation of his death as there represented? Who can behold the bread broken, and the wine poured out, and not reflect, how the body of the blessed Jesus was even torn in pieces by his sufferings, and his sacred blood poured forth like water on the ground? Who can think of the heart-rending agonies of the Son of God, as the price of our redemption and salvation, and not feel his soul melted with tenderness, and inflamed with grateful affection? What an exalted view doth it give us of the blessings of the gospel-covenant, when we consider it as established in the blood of God's only-begotten Son! And when we make our approach to God as our heavenly Father, and give up ourselves to his service in this solemn manner, what an awful tendency has it to fix the conviction, that we are not our own, being bought with such a price! What a tendency has it to guard us against every temptation to those sins which we have so solemnly renounced, and to engage our fidelity to him to whom we have bound our souls as with an oath! Well may our hearts be knit together in mutual love, when we consider ourselves as one in Christ: his blood becomes the cement of the society, joins us in Spirit, not only to each other, but to all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours: and we anticipate, in pleasing hope, that blessed day, when the assembly shall be complete, and we shall all be for ever with the Lord. Well may these views engage us to deny ourselves, and to take up our cross to follow our crucified Master. Well may they engage us to do our utmost, by prayer and all other suitable endeavours, to serve his followers and his friends; to serve those whom he hath purchased with his blood, and who are to be his associates, and ours, in the glories of a happy immortality.

§ 5. It is also the express institution and command of our blessed Redeemer, that the members of such societies should be tenderly solicitous for the spiritual welfare of each other; and that, on the whole, his churches may be kept pure and holy, that they should withdraw themselves from every brother that walketh disorderly; that they should mark such as cause offences or scandals amongst them, contrary to the doctrine which they have learned, and avoid them: that if any obey not the word of Christ, by his apostles, they should have no fellowship or communion with such, that they may be ashamed; that they should not eat with such as are notoriously irregular in their behaviour, but, on the contrary, should put away from among themselves such wicked persons. It is evident, therefore, that the institution of such societies is greatly for the honour of Christianity, and for the advantage of its particular professors. And consequently, every consideration of obedience to our common Lord, and of prudent regard to our own benefit and that of our brethren, will require, that those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, should enter into them and assemble among them, in these their most solemn and peculiar acts of communion at his table.

§ 6. I entreat you therefore, and if I may presume to say it, in his name and by his authority I charge it on your conscience, that this precept of our dying Lord go not, as it were, for nothing with you; but that, if you indeed love him, you keep this, as well as the rest of his commandments.—I know, you may be ready to form objections. I have elsewhere debated many of the chief of them at large, and I hope not without some good effect.* The great question is that which relates to your being prepared for a worthy attendance. And in conjunction with what has been said before, I think that may be brought to a very short issue. Have you, so far as you know your own heart, been sincere in that deliberate surrender of yourself to God, through Christ, which I recommended in the former chapter? If you have, (whether it were with, or without, the particular form or manner of doing it there recommended,) you have certainly taken hold of the covenant, and therefore have a right to the seal of it. And there is not, and cannot be, any other view of the ordinance in which you can have any further objection to it. If you desire to remember Christ's death, if you desire to renew the dedication of yourself to God through him, if you would list yourself among his people, if you would love them and do them good according to your ability, and, on the whole, would not allow yourself in the practice of any one known sin, or in the omission of any one known duty, then I will venture confidently to say, not only that you may be welcome to the ordinance, but that it was instituted for such as you.

§ 7. As for other objections, a few words may suffice by way of reply. The weakness of the religious principle in your soul, if it be really implanted there, is so far from being an argument against your seeking such a method to strengthen it, that it rather strongly enforces the necessity of doing it.—The neglect of this solemnity, by so many that call themselves Christians, should rather engage you so much the more to distinguish your zeal for an institution, in this respect so much slighted and injured.—And as for the fears of aggravating guilt in case of apostasy, do not indulge them. This may, by the divine blessing, be an effectual remedy against the evil you fear; and it is certain, that after what you must already have known and felt, before you could be brought into your present situation, (on the suppositions I have now been making,) there can be no room to think of a retreat; no room even for the wretched hope of being less miserable than the generality of those that have perished. Your scheme therefore must be to make your salvation as sure, and to make it as glorious, as possible. And I know not any appointment of our blessed Redeemer, which may have a more comfortable aspect upon that blessed end, than this which I am recommending to you.

§ 8. One thing I would at least insist upon, and I see not with what face it can be denied. I mean, that you should take this matter into a serious consideration; that you should diligently inquire, whether you have reason, in your conscience, to believe it is the will of God you should now approach to the ordinance, or not? And that you should continue your reflections, your inquiries, and your prayers, till you find further encouragement to come; if that encouragement be hitherto wanting. For of this be assured, that a state in which you are on the whole unfit to approach this ordinance, is a state in which you are destitute of the necessary preparations for death and heaven; in which therefore, if you would not allow yourselves to slumber on the brink of destruction, you ought not to rest so much as one single day.

A Prayer for one who earnestly desires to approach the table of the Lord, yet has some remaining doubts concerning his right to that solemn ordinance.

"Blessed Lord, I adore thy wise and gracious appointments, for the edification of thy church in holiness and in love. I thank thee, that thou hast commanded thy servants to form themselves into societies; and I adore my gracious Saviour, who hath instituted, as with his dying breath, the holy solemnity of his supper, to be through all ages a memorial of his dying love, and a bond of that union which it is his sovereign pleasure that his people should preserve. I hope thou, Lord, art witness to the sincerity with which I desire to give myself up to thee; and that I may call thee to record on my soul, that if I now hesitate about this particular manner of doing it, it is not because I would allow myself to break any of thy commands, or to slight any of thy favours. I trust, thou knowest that my present delay arises only from my uncertainty as to my own duty, and a fear of profaning holy things by an unworthy approach to them. Yet surely, O Lord, if thou hast given me a reverence for thy command, a desire of communion with thee, and a willingness to devote myself wholly to thy service, I may regard it as a token for good, that thou art disposed to receive me, and that I am not wholly unprepared for an ordination which I so highly honour, and so earnestly desire. I therefore make it my humble request unto thee, O Lord, this day, that thou wouldst graciously be pleased to instruct me in my duty, and to teach me the way that I should take! Examine me, O Lord, and prove me, try my reins and my heart! Is there any secret sin in the heart and practice of which I would indulge? Is there any of thy precepts, in the habitual breach of which I would allow myself? I trust I can appeal to thee as a witness that there is not. Let me not then wrong mine own soul by a groundless and partial censure from thy sacred bible! But grant, O Lord, I beseech thee, that thy word, thy providence, and thy Spirit may so concur as to make my way plain before me! Scatter my remaining doubts, if thou seest they have no just foundation! Fill me with a more assured faith, with a more ardent love; and plead thine own cause with my heart in such a manner, as that I may not be able any longer to delay that approach, which, if I am thy servant indeed, is equally my duty and my privilege! In the mean time, grant that it may never be long out of my thoughts; but that I may give all diligence, if there be any remaining occasion of doubt, to remove it, by a more affectionate concern to avoid whatever is displeasing to the eyes of thine holiness, and to practise the full extent of my duty! May the views of Christ crucified be so familiar to my mind, and may a sense of his dying love so powerfully constrain my soul, that my own growing experience may put it out of all question that I am one of those for whom he intended this feast of love!

* See the fourth of my Sermons to Young Persons.

"And even now, as joined to thy churches in spirit and in love, though not in so express and intimate a bond as I could wish, would I heartily pray that thy blessing may be on all thy people: that thou wouldst feed thine heritage, and lift them up for ever! May every Christian society flourish in knowledge, in holiness, and in love! May all thy priests be clothed with salvation, that by their means thy chosen people may be made joyful! And may there be a glorious accession to thy churches every where, of those who may fly to them as a cloud, and as doves to their windows! May thy table, O Lord, be furnished with guests, and may all those that love thy salvation say, Let the Lord be magnified, who hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servants! And I earnestly pray, that all who profess to have received Christ Jesus the Lord, may be duly careful to walk in him; and that we may all be preparing for the general assembly of the first-born, and may join in that nobler and more immediate worship, where all these types and shadows shall be laid aside, where even these memorials shall be no longer necessary, but a living, present Redeemer shall be the everlasting joy of those, who here in his absence have delighted to commemorate his death!" Amen. *

CHAP. XIX.

Some more particular Directions for maintaining constant Communion with God, or being in his fear all the day long.

[illegible]

3. I. I would hope that, upon serious consideration, self-examination, and prayer, the reader may by this time be come to a resolution to attend the table of the Lord, and to seal his vows there. I will now suppose that solemn transaction to be over, or some other deliberate act to have passed, by which he has given himself up to the service of God: and that his concern now is to inquire, how he may act according to the vows of God which are upon him. Now, for his further assistance here, besides the general view I have already given of the Christian temper and character, I will propose some more particular directions relating to maintaining that devout, spiritual, and heavenly character, which may, in the language of Scripture, be called a daily walking with God, or being in his fear all the day long. And I know not how I can express the idea and plan, which I have formed of this, in a more clear and distinct manner, than I did in a letter, which I wrote many years ago, † to a young person of eminent piety, with whom I had then an intimate friendship, and who, to the great grief of all that knew him, died a few months after he received it. Yet I hope he lived long enough to reduce the directions into practice, which I wish and pray that every reader may do, so far as they may properly suit his capacities and circumstances in life, considering it as if addressed to himself. I say, and assure it may be observed, that I wish my reader may act on these directions so far as they may properly suit his capacities and circumstances in life, for I would be far from laying down the following particulars as universal rules for all, or for any one person in the world at all times. Let them be practised by those that are able, and when they have leisure: and when you cannot reach them all, come as near the most important of them as you conveniently can. With this precaution I proceed to the letter, which I would hope, after this previous care to guard against the danger of misteking it, will not discourage any, even the weakest Christian. Let us humbly and cheerfully do our best, and rejoice that we have so gracious a Father, who knows all our infirmities, and so compassionate a High Priest, to recommend to divine acceptance the feeblest efforts of sincere duty and love!

* I purposed to have added something here, concerning a proper method of the Lord's supper, a prudent behaviour upon it, and particularly concerning a due care and a full view, which would enable new converts to go to the Lord's table with more satisfaction and advantage. But I have since found, that I have already published my sentiments on that subject, in the Divine Dialogues, and Mr. Clarke's Discourses, which I therefore recommend to the Lord's People, hereby, if I should immediately translate or send them, and which may be had at very many places. Yet for the further satisfaction of devout communicants, I have since compiled a small collection of Scripture Meditations, Addresses, and Prayers, at the Lord's Supper, which I hope may be published, if God spares me to finish my Exposition on the New Testament, and some other pieces, which I have upon the hand.

† [illegible] year 1727.

My dear Friend,

Since you desire my thoughts in writing, and at large, on the subject of our late conversation, viz. By what particular methods in our daily conduct a life of devotion and usefulness may be most happily maintained and secured? I set myself, with cheerfulness, to recollect and digest the hints which I then gave you; hoping it may be of some service to you in your most important interests; and may also fix on my own mind a deeper sense of my obligations, to govern my own life by the rules I offer to others. I esteem attempts of this kind among the pleasantest fruits, and the surest cements, of friendship; and as I hope ours will last for ever, I am persuaded a mutual care to cherish sentiments of this kind, will add everlasting endearments to it.

§ 2. The directions you will expect from me on this occasion, naturally divide themselves into three heads: How we are to regard God, —in the beginning,—the progress,—and the close of the day. I will open my heart freely to you with regard to each, and will leave you to judge, how far these hints may suit your circumstances: aiming, at least, to keep between the extremes, of a superstitious strictness in trifles, and of an indolent remissness, which, if admitted in little things, may draw after it criminal neglects, and at length more criminal indulgences.

§ 3. [1.] In the beginning of the day, it should certainly be our care to lift up our hearts to God as soon as we wake, and while we are rising; and then, to set ourselves seriously and immediately to the secret devotions of the morning.

§ 4. For the first of these, it seems exceedingly natural. There are so many things that may suggest a great variety of pious reflections and ejaculations, which are so obvious, that one would think a serious mind could hardly miss them. The ease and cheerfulness of our mind at our first awakening; the refreshment we find from sleep; the security we have enjoyed in that defenceless state; the provision of warm and decent apparel; the cheerful light of the returning sun; or even (which is not unfit to mention to you) the contrivances of art, taught and furnished by the great Author of all our conveniences, to supply us with many useful hours of life in the absence of the sun; the hope of returning to the dear society of our friends; the prospect of spending another day in the service of God, and the improvement of our own minds; and above all, the lively hope of a joyful resurrection to an eternal day of happiness and glory: any of these particulars, and many more which I do not mention, may furnish us with matter of pleasing reflection and cheerful praise while we are rising. And for our further assistance, when we are alone at this time, it may not be improper to speak sometimes to ourselves, and sometimes to our heavenly Father, in the natural expressions of joy and thankfulness. Permit me, Sir, to add, that if we find our hearts in such a frame at our first awakening, even that is just matter of praise, and the rather, as perhaps it is an answer to the prayer with which we lay down.

§ 5. For the exercise of secret devotion in the morning, which I hope will generally be our first work, I cannot prescribe an exact method to another. You must, my dear friend, consult your own taste in some measure. The constituent parts of the service are in the general plan. Were I to propose a particular model for those who have half, or three quarters, of an hour at command, (which with prudent conduct I suppose most may have,) it should be this:

§ 6. To begin the stated devotions of the day with a solemn act of praise, offered to God on our knees, and generally with a low, yet distinct, voice; acknowledging the mercies we had been reflecting on while rising: never forgetting to mention Christ, as the great foundation of all our enjoyments and our hopes, or to return thanks for the influences of the blessed Spirit, which have led our hearts to God, or are then engaging us to seek him. This, as well as other offices of devotion afterwards mentioned, must be done attentively and sincerely; for not to offer our praises heartily, is, in the sight of God, not to praise him at all. This address of praise may properly be concluded with an express renewal of our covenant with God, declaring our continued repeated resolutions of being devoted to him, and particularly of living to his glory the ensuing day.

§ 7. It may be proper, after this, to take a prospect of the day before us, so far as we can probably foresee in the general, where and how it may be spent: and seriously to reflect, how shall I employ myself for God this day? What business is to be done, and in what order? What opportunities may

I expect either of doing or of receiving good? What temptations am I like to be assaulted with, in any place, company, or circumstances, which may probably occur? In what instances have I lately failed? And how shall I be safest now?

§ 8. After this review, it would be proper to offer up a short prayer, begging that God would quicken us to each of these foreseen duties; that he would fortify us against each of these apprehended dangers; that he would grant us success in such or such a business undertaken for his glory, and also, that he would help us to discover and improve unforeseen opportunities, to resist unexpected temptations, and to bear patiently, and religiously, any afflictions which may surprise us in the day on which we are entering.

§ 9. I would advise you after this, to read some portion of Scripture; not a great deal, nor the whole Bible in its course, but some select lessons out of its most useful parts, perhaps ten or twelve verses; not troubling yourself much about the exact connexion, or other critical niceties, which may occur, (though at other times I would recommend them to your inquiry, as you have ability and opportunity,) but considering them merely in a devotional and practical view. Here take such instructions as readily present themselves to your thoughts, repeat them over to your own conscience, and charge your heart religiously to observe them and act upon them, under a sense of the divine authority which attends them. And if you pray over the substance of this scripture with your Bible open before you, it may impress your memory and your heart yet more deeply, and may form you to a copiousness and variety, both of thought and expression, in prayer.

§ 10. It might be proper to close these devotions with a psalm or hymn; and I rejoice with you, that through the pious care of Dr. Watts, and some other sacred poets, we are provided with so rich a variety for the assistance of the closet and family on these occasions, as well as for the service of the sanctuary.

§ 11. [II.] The most material directions which have occurred to me, relating to the progress of the day, are these:—That we be serious in the devotions of the day;—that we be diligent in the business of it, that is, in the prosecution of our worldly callings; that we be temperate and prudent in the recreations of it;—that we carefully remark the providences of the day;—that we cautiously guard against the temptations of it;—that we keep up a humble and lively dependence upon the divine influence, suitable to every emergency of it;—that we govern our thoughts well in the solitude of the day, and our discourses well in the conversations of it. These, Sir, were the heads of a sermon which you lately heard me preach on this occasion, and to which I know you referred in that request which I am now endeavouring to answer. I will therefore touch upon the most material hints which fell under each of these particulars.

§ 12. (1.) For seriousness in devotion, whether public or domestic: Let us take a few moments, before we enter upon such solemnities, to pause, and to reflect, on the perfections of the God we are addressing, on the importance of the business we are coming about, on the pleasure and advantage of a regular and devout attendance, and on the guilt and folly of a hypocritical formality. When engaged, let us maintain a strict watchfulness over our own spirits, and check the first wanderings of thought. And when the duty is over, let us immediately reflect on the manner in which it has been performed, and ask our own consciences whether we have reason to conclude, that we are accepted of God in it? For there is a certain manner of going through these offices, which our own hearts will immediately tell us, it is impossible for God to approve: and if we have inadvertently fallen into it, we ought to be deeply humbled before God for it, lest our very prayer become sin.

§ 13. (2.) As for the hours of worldly business; whether it be, as with you, that of the hands; or whether it be the labour of a learned life, not immediately relating to religious matters: Let us set to the prosecution of it with a sense of God's authority, and with a regard to his glory. Let us avoid a dreaming, sluggish, indolent temper, which nods over its work, and does only the business of one hour in two or three. In opposition to this, which runs through the life of some people, who yet think they are never idle, let us endeavour to despatch as much as we well can in a little time; considering, that it is but a little we have in all. And let us be habitually sensible of the need we have of the divine blessing, to make our labours successful.

§ 14. (3.) For seasons of diversion: Let us take care, that our recreations be well chosen; that they be pursued with a good intention, to fit us for a renewed application to the labours of life; and thus, that they be only used in subordination to the honour of God, the great end of all our actions. Let us take heed, that our hearts be not estranged from God by them; and that they do not take up too much of our time; always remembering that the faculties of the human nature, and the advantages of the Christian revelation, were not given us in vain; but that we are always to be in pursuit of some great and honourable end, and to indulge ourselves in amusements and diversions no further, than as they make a part in a scheme of rational and manly, benevolent and pious, conduct.

§ 15. (4.) For the observation of providences. It will be useful to regard the divine interposition, in our comforts, and in our afflictions. In our comforts, whether more common or extraordinary: that we find ourselves in continued health; that we are furnished with food for support and pleasure; that we have so many agreeable ways of employing our time; that we have so many friends, and those so good, and so happy; that our business goes on prosperously; that we go out and come in safely; and that we enjoy composure and cheerfulness of spirit, without which nothing else could be enjoyed: all these should be regarded as providential favours, and due acknowledgments should be made to God on these accounts, as we pass through such agreeable scenes. On the other hand, Providence is to be regarded in every disappointment, in every loss, in every pain, in every instance of unkindness from those who have professed friendship: and we should endeavour to argue ourselves into a patient submission, from this consideration, that the hand of God is always mediately, if not immediately, in each of them; and that, if they are not properly the work of Providence, they are at least under its direction. It is a reflection, which we should particularly make with relation to those little cross accidents, (as we are ready to call them,) and those infirmities and follies in the temper and conduct of our intimate friends, which may else be ready to discompose us. And it is the more necessary to guard our minds here, as wise and good men often lose the command of themselves on these comparatively little occasions; who, calling up reason and religion to their assistance, stand the shock of great calamities with fortitude and resolution.

§ 16. (5.) For watchfulness against temptations: It is necessary, when changing our place, or our employment, to reflect, "What snares attend me here?" And as this should be our habitual care, so we should especially guard against those snares which in the morning we foresaw. And when we are entering on those circumstances in which we expected the assault, we should reflect, especially if it be a matter of great importance, "Now the combat is going to begin; now God and the blessed angels are observing, what constancy, what fortitude, there is in my soul; and how far the divine authority, and the remembrance of my own prayers, and resolutions, will weigh with me, when it comes to a trial.

§ 17. (6.) As for dependence on divine grace and influence: It must be universal; and since we always need it, we must never forget that necessity. A moment spent in humble fervent breathings after the communications of the divine assistance, may do more good than many minutes spent in mere reasonings. And though indeed this should not be neglected, since the light of reason is a kind of divine illumination; yet, still it ought to be pursued in a due sense of our dependence upon the Father of lights, or, where we think ourselves wisest, we may become vain in our imaginations. Let us therefore always call upon God, and say, for instance, when we are going to pray, "Lord, fix my attention! awaken my holy affections, and pour out upon me the spirit of grace and of supplication!" When taking up the Bible, or any other good book, "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law! Enlighten my understanding! Warm my heart! May my good resolutions be confirmed, and all the course of my life in a proper manner regulated!" When addressing ourselves to any worldly business, "Lord, prosper thou the work of my hands upon me, and give thy blessing to my honest endeavours!" When going to any kind of recreation, "Lord, bless my refreshments! Let me not forget thee in them, but still keep thy glory in view!" When coming into company, "Lord, may I do and get good! Let no corrupt communication proceed out of my mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace to the hearers!" When entering upon difficulties, "Lord, give me that wisdom which is profitable to direct! Teach me thy way, and lead me in a plain path!" When encountering with temptations, "Let thy strength, O gracious Redeemer, be made perfect in my weakness!" These instances may illustrate the design of this direction, though they be far from a complete enumeration of all the circumstances in which it is to be regarded.

§ 18. (7.) For the government of our thoughts in solitude, let us accustom ourselves on all occasions to exercise a due command over our thoughts. Let us take care of those entanglements of passion, and those attachments to any present interest and view, which would deprive us of our power over them. Let us set before us some profitable subject of thought; such as, the perfections of the blessed God, the love of Christ, the value of time, the certainty and importance of death and judgment, and the eternity of happiness or misery which is to follow. Let us also at such intervals reflect on what we have observed as to the state of our own souls, with regard to the advance or decline of religion; or on the last sermon we have heard, or the last portion of Scripture we have read. You may perhaps, in this connexion, Sir, recollect what I have (if I remember right) proposed to you in conversation; that it might be very useful to select some one verse of Scripture, which we had met with in the morning, and to treasure it up in our mind, resolving to think of that at any time when we are at a loss for matter of pious reflection, in any intervals of leisure for entering upon it. This will often be as a spring, from whence many profitable and delightful thoughts may arise, which perhaps we did not before see in that connexion and force. Or if it should not be so, yet I am persuaded it will be much better to repeat the same Scripture in our mind a hundred times in a day, with some pious ejaculation formed upon it, than to leave our thoughts at the mercy of all those various trifles which may otherwise intrude upon us, the variety of which will be far from making amends for their vanity.

§ 19. (8.) Lastly, for the government of our discourse in company: We should take great care, that nothing may escape us, which can expose us, or our Christian profession, to censure and reproach; nothing injurious to those that are absent, or to those that are present; nothing malignant, nothing insincere, nothing which may corrupt, nothing which may provoke, nothing which may mislead those about us. Nor should we, by any means, be content, that what we say is innocent; it should be our desire, that it may be edifying to ourselves and others. In this view, we should endeavour to have some subject of useful discourse always ready, in which we may be assisted by the hints given, about furniture for thought, under the former head. We should watch for decent opportunities of introducing useful reflections; and if a pious friend attempt to do it, we should endeavour to second it immediately. When the conversation does not turn directly on religious subjects, we should endeavour to make it improving some other way: we should reflect on the character and capacities of our company, that we may lead them to talk of what they understand best; for their discourses on those subjects will probably be most pleasing to themselves, as well as most useful to us. And in pauses of discourse, it may not be improper to lift up a holy ejaculation to God, that his grace may assist us and our friends in our endeavours to do good to each other; that all we say and do may be worthy the character of reasonable creatures and Christians.

§ 20. [III.] The directions for a religious closing of the day, which I shall here mention, are only two.—Let us see to it, that the secret duties of the evening be well performed;—and let us lie down on our beds in a pious frame.

§ 21. (1.) For secret devotion in the evening, I would propose a method something different from that in the morning; but still, as then, with due allowances for circumstances, which may make unthought-of alterations proper. I should, Sir, advise you to read a portion of Scripture in the first place, with suitable reflections, and prayers, as above: then to read a hymn or psalm: after this to enter on self-examination, to be followed by a longer prayer than that which followed reading, to be formed on this review of this day. In this address to the throne of grace, it will be highly proper to entreat that God would pardon the omissions and offences of the day; to praise him for mercies temporal and spiritual; to recommend ourselves to his protection for the ensuing night; with proper petitions for others, whom we ought to bear on our hearts before him, and particularly for those friends with whom we have conversed or corresponded in the preceding day. Many other concerns will occur, both in morning and evening prayer, which I have not here hinted at: but I did not apprehend that a full enumeration of these things belonged, by any means, to our present purpose.

§ 22. Before I quit this head, I must take the liberty to remind you, that self-examination is so important a duty, that it will be worth our while to spend a few words upon it. And this branch of it is so easy, that when we have proper questions before us, any person of a common understanding may hope to go through it with advantage, under the divine blessing. I offer you therefore the following queries, which I hope you will, with such alterations as you may judge requisite, keep near you for daily use:—"Did I awake as with God this morning, and rise with a grateful sense of his goodness? How were the secret devotions of the morning performed? Did I offer my solemn praises, and renew the dedication of myself to God, with becoming attention and suitable affections? Did I lay my scheme for the business of the day wisely and well? How did I read the Scripture, and any other devotional or practical piece, which I might afterwards conveniently review? Did it do my heart good, or was it a mere amusement? How have the other stated devotions of the day been attended, whether in the family or in public? Have I pursued the common business of this day with diligence and spirituality; doing every thing in season, and with all convenient despatch, and as unto the Lord? What time have I lost this day, in the morning or the forenoon, in the afternoon, or the evening;" (for these divisions will assist your recollection:) "and what has occasioned the loss of it? With what temper, and under what regulations, have the recreations of this day been pursued? Have I seen the hand of God in my mercies, health, cheerfulness, food, clothing, books, preservation in journeys, success of business, conversation, and kindness of friends, &c.? Have I seen it in afflictions, and particularly in little things which had a tendency to vex and disquiet me? And with regard to this interposition, have I received my comforts thankfully, and my afflictions submissively? How have I guarded against the temptations of the day, particularly against this or that temptation, which I foresaw in the morning? Have I maintained a humble dependence on divine influences? Have I lived by faith in the Son of God, and regarded Christ, this day, as my teacher and governor, my atonement and intercessor, my example and guardian, my strength and portion? Have I been looking forward to death and eternity this day, and considered myself as a probationer for heaven, and through grace an expectant of it? Have I governed my thoughts well, especially in such or such an interval of solitude. How was my subject of thought this day chosen, and how was it regarded? Have I governed my discourses well in such and such company? Did I say nothing passionate, mischievous, slanderous, imprudent, impertinent? Has my heart this day been full of love to God, and to all mankind; and have I sought, and found, and improved, opportunities of doing and of getting good? With what attention and improvement have I read the Scripture this evening? How was self-examination performed the last night? and how have I profited this day by any remarks I then made on former negligences and mistakes? With what temper did I then lie down and compose myself to sleep?"

§ 23. You will easily see, Sir, that these questions are so adjusted, as to be an abridgment of the most material advices I have given in this letter, and I believe I need not, to a person of your understanding, say any thing as to the usefulness of such inquiries. Conscience will answer them in a few minutes; but if you think them too large and particular, you may make a still shorter abstract for daily use, and reserve these, with such obvious alterations as will then be necessary, for seasons of more than ordinary exactness in review, which I hope will occur at least once a week. Secret devotion being thus performed, before drowsiness render us unfit for it, the interval between that and our going to rest, must be conducted by the rules mentioned under the next head. And nothing will further remain to be considered here, but,

§ 24. (2.) The sentiments with which we should lie down, and compose ourselves to sleep. Now here it is obviously suitable to think of the divine goodness, in adding another day, and the mercies of it, to the former days and mercies of our life; to take notice of the indulgence of Providence, in giving us commodious habitations and easy beds, and continuing to us such health of body, that we can lay ourselves down at ease upon them, and such serenity of mind as leaves us any room to hope for refreshing sleep: a refreshment to be sought, not merely as an indulgence to animal nature, but as what our wise Creator, in order to keep us humble in the midst of so many infirmities, has been pleased to make necessary to our being able to pursue his service with renewed alacrity. Thus may our sleeping, as well as our waking, hours, be in some sense devoted to God. And when we are just going to resign ourselves to the image of death, (to what one of the ancients beautifully calls its lesser mysteries,) it is also evidently proper to think seriously of that end of all the living, and to renew those actings of repentance and faith which we should judge necessary if we were to wake no more here. You have once, Sir, seen a meditation of that kind in my hand, I will transcribe it for you in the postscript and therefore shall add no more to this head, but here put a close to the directions you desire.

§ 25. I am persuaded the most important of them have, in one form or another, been long regarded by you, and made governing maxims of your life. I shall greatly rejoice, if the review of these, and the examination and trial of the rest, may be the means of leading you into more intimate communion with God, and so of rendering your life more pleasant and useful, and your eternity, whenever that is to commence, more glorious. There is not a human creature upon earth whom I should not delight to serve in these important interests; but I can faithfully assure you, that I am with particular respect,

Dear Sir,

Your very affectionate Friend and Servant.

§ 26. This, reader, with the alteration of a very few words, is the letter I wrote to a worthy friend, (now, I doubt not, with God,) about sixteen years ago. And I can assuredly say, that the experience of each of these years has confirmed me in these views, and established me in the persuasion, that one day thus spent is preferable to whole years of sensuality, and the neglect of religion. I chose to insert the letter as it is, because I thought the freedom and particularity of the advice I had given in it, would appear most natural in its original form; and as I propose to enforce these advices in the next chapter, I shall conclude this with that meditation which I promised my friend as a postscript; and which I could wish you to make so familiar to yourself, as that you might be able to recollect the substance of it, whenever you compose yourself to sleep.

A serious view of death, proper to be taken as we lie down on our beds.

"O my soul, look forward a little with seriousness and attention, and learn wisdom by the consideration of thy latter end. Another of thy mortal days is now numbered and finished: and as I have put off my clothes, and laid myself upon my bed, for the repose of the night; so will the day of life quickly come to its period, so must the body itself be put off, and laid to its repose in a bed of dust. There let it rest: for it will be no more regarded by me, than the clothes which I have now laid aside. I have another far more important concern to attend. Think, oh my soul, when death comes, thou art to enter upon the eternal world, and to be fixed either in heaven or in hell. All the schemes and cares, the hopes and fears, the pleasures and sorrows, of life, will come to their period, and the world of spirits will open upon thee. And oh, how soon may it open! Perhaps before the returning sun bring on the light of another day. To-morrow's sun may not enlighten mine eyes, but only shine round a senseless corpse, which may lie in the place of this animated body. At least, the death of many in the flower of their age, and many who were superior to me in capacity, piety, and the prospects of usefulness, may loudly warn me not to depend on a long life, and engage me rather to wonder that I am continued here so many years, than to be surprised if I am speedily removed.

"And now, oh my soul, answer as in the sight of God, art thou ready? Art thou ready? Is there no sin unforsaken, and so unrepented of, to fill me with anguish in my departing moments, and to make me tremble on the brink of eternity? Dread to remain under the guilt of it, and this moment renew thy most earnest applications to the mercy of God, and the blood of a Redeemer, for deliverance from it.

"But if the great account be already adjusted, if thou hast cordially repented of thy numerous offences, if thou hast sincerely committed thyself by faith into the hands of the blessed Jesus, and hast not renounced thy covenant with him by returning to the allowed practice of sin, then start not at the thoughts of a separation: it is not in the power of death to hurt a soul devoted to God, and united to the great Redeemer. It may take me from my worldly comforts; it may disconcert and break my schemes for service on earth; but, oh my soul, diviner entertainments, and nobler services, wait thee beyond the grave. For ever blessed be the name of God, and the love of Jesus, for these quieting, encouraging, joyful views! I will now lay me down in peace, and sleep; free from the fears of what shall be the issue of this night, whether life or death be appointed for me. Father, into thine hands I commend my spirit; for thou hast redeemed me, O God of truth, and therefore I can cheerfully refer it to thy choice, whether I shall awake in this world or another."

CHAP. XX.

A serious persuasive to such a method of spending our days, as is represented in the former chapters.

Christians by their example [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] against the whole, which may, in their consequences, affect particulars against which no reasonable man would presume to make any objection at all. Recollect, O Christian, and carry it with you in your memory and your heart, while you are pursuing this review, that you are the creature of God, that you are purchased with the blood of Jesus; and then say, whether these relations in which you stand, do not demand all that application and resolution which I would engage you to. Suppose all the counsels I have given reduced into practice; suppose every day begun and concluded with such devout breathings after God, and such holy retirements for morning and evening converse with him and with your own heart; suppose a daily care, in contriving how your time may be managed, and in reflecting how it has been employed: suppose this regard to God, this sense of his presence, and zeal for his glory, to run through your acts of worship, your hours of business and recreation: suppose this attention to Providence, this guard against temptations, this dependence upon divine influence, this government of the thoughts in solitude, and of the discourses in company: nay, I will add further, suppose every particular direction given to be pursued, excepting when particular cases occur, with respect to which you shall be able in conscience to say—I wave it, not from indolence and carelessness, but because I think it will be just now more pleasing to God to be doing something else, which may often happen in human life, where general rules are best concerted: suppose, I say, all this to be done, not for a day or a week, but through the remainder of life, whether longer or shorter; and suppose this to be reviewed at the close of life, in the full exercise of your rational faculties; will there be reason to say in the reflection, I have taken too much pains in religion; the Author of my being did not deserve all this from me; less diligence, less fidelity, less zeal than this, might have been an equivalent for the blood which was shed for my redemption. A part of my heart, a part of my time, a part of my labours, might have sufficed for him, who hath given me all my powers; for him who hath delivered me from that destruction which would have made them my everlasting torment; for him who is raising me to the regions of a blissful immortality. Can you, with any face, say this? If you cannot, then surely your conscience bears witness, that all I have recommended under the limitations above, is reasonable, that duty and gratitude require it; and, consequently, that by every allowed failure in it, you bring guilt upon your own soul, you offend God, and act unworthy your Christian profession.

§ 4. I entreat you further to consider, whether such a conduct as I have now been recommending, would not conduce much to your comfort and usefulness in life. Reflect seriously, what is true happiness? Does it consist in distance from God, or in nearness to him? Surely you cannot be a Christian, surely you cannot be a rational man, if you doubt, whether communion with the great Father of our spirits be a pleasure and felicity; and if it be, then surely they enjoy most of it who keep him most constantly in view. You cannot but know in your own conscience, that it is this which makes the happiness of heaven; and therefore the more of it any man enjoys upon earth, the more of heaven comes down into his soul. If you have made any trial of religion, though it be but a few months or weeks since you first became acquainted with it, you must be some judge of it upon your own experience, which have been the most pleasant days of your life. Have they not been those, in which you have acted most upon these principles; those in which you have most steadily and resolutely carried them through every hour of time, and every circumstance of life? The check which you must in many instances give to your own inclinations might seem disagreeable; but it would surely be overbalanced in a most happy manner, by the satisfaction you would find in a consciousness of self-government; in having such a command of your thoughts, affections, and actions, as is much more glorious than any authority over others can be.

§ 5. I would also entreat you to consider the influence, which such a conduct as this might have upon the happiness of others. And it is easy to be seen it must be very great; as you would find your heart always disposed to watch every opportunity of doing good, and to seize it with eagerness and delight. It would engage you to make it the study and business of your life, to order things in such a manner, that the end of one kind and useful action might be the beginning of another; in which you would go on as naturally, as the inferior animals do in those productions and actions by which mankind are relieved or enriched; or as the earth bears her successive crops of different vegetable supplies. And though mankind be, in this corrupt state, so unhappily inclined to imitate evil examples rather than good; yet it may be expected, that while your light shines before men, some seeing your good works, will endeavour to transcribe them in their own lives, and so to glorify your Father which is in heaven. The charm of such beautiful models would surely impress some, and incline them at least to attempt an imitation; and every attempt would dispose to another. And thus, through the divine goodness, you might be entitled to a share in the praise, and the reward, not only of the good you had immediately done yourself, but likewise of that which you had engaged others to do. And no eye, but that of an all-searching God, can see into what distant times or places the blessed consequences may reach. In every instance in which these consequences appear, it will put a generous and sublime joy into your heart, which no worldly prosperity could afford, and which would be the liveliest emblem of that high delight which the blessed God feels in seeing and making his creatures happy.

6. It is true indeed, that, amidst all these pious and benevolent views, afflictions may occur, and in some measure interrupt you in the midst of your projected schemes. But surely these afflictions will sit much lighter, when your heart is gladdened with the peaceful and joyful reflection of your own mind, and with so honourable a testimony of conscience before God and men. Delightful will it be, to go back to past scenes in your pleasing review, and to think, that you have not only been sincerely humbling yourself for those past offences, which afflictions may bring to your remembrance; but that you have given substantial proofs of the sincerity of that humiliation by a real reformation of what has been amiss, and by acting with strenuous and vigorous resolution on the contrary principle. And while converse with God, and doing good to men, are made the great business and pleasure of life, you will find a thousand opportunities of enjoyment, even in the midst of those afflictions, which would render you so incapable of relishing the pleasures of sense, that the very mention of them might in those circumstances seem an insult and a reproach.

7. At length death will come, that solemn and important hour, which hath been passed through by so many thousands who have in the main lived such a life, and by so many millions who have neglected it. And let conscience say, if there was ever any one of these millions, who had then any reason to repent in that neglect; or any one, among the most strict and exemplary Christians, who then lamented that his heart and life had been too zealously devoted to God? Let me once more say, whether they have wished to have a part of that time which they have thus employed, given back to them again, that they might be more conformed to this world; that they might plunge themselves deeper into its amusements, or pursue its honours, its possessions, or its pleasures, with greater eagerness than they had done? If you were yourself dying, and a dear friend or child stood near you, and the book and the last chapter of it should chance to come into your thoughts, would you caution that friend or child against conducting himself by such rules as I have advanced? The question may perhaps seem unnecessary, where the answer is so plain and so certain. Well then, let it assist you to know how you should live, by reflecting how you would then, and what course you would wish to look back upon, when you are just quitting this world, and entering upon another. Think seriously: what if death should surprise you on a sudden, and you should be called into eternity at an hour's or a minute's warning, would you not wish that your last day should have been thus begun, and the course of it, if it were a day of health and activity, should have been thus managed? Would not you wish that your last thoughts should have been employed in such meditations and in such purposes? Would not the passage, the flight from earth to heaven, be most easy, most pleasant in this view and connexion? And on the other hand, if death should make more gradual approaches, would not the remembrance of such a pious, holy, humble, diligent, and useful life, make a dying bed much softer and easier, than it would otherwise be? You would not die reproaching upon those things. God forbid that you should! Sensible of your many imperfections, you would no doubt desire to throw yourself at the feet of Christ, that you might appear before God adorned with his righteousness, and washed from your sins in his blood. You would also, with your dying breath, ascribe to the riches of His grace every good disposition you had found in your heart, and every worthy action you had been enabled to perform. But would it not give you a delight worthy of being purchased with a thousand worlds, to reflect, that his grace had wrought upon you had not been in vain; but that you had from an humble principle of grateful love, glorified your heavenly Father on earth, and in some degree, though not with the perfection you could desire, finished the work which he had given you to do, that you had been living for many past years as on the borders of heaven, and endeavouring to form your heart and life to the temper and manners of its inhabitants.

8. And once more, let me entreat you to reflect on the view you will have of this matter, when you come into a world of glory, as (which I hope will be the happy case) divine mercy conduct you thither. Will not your reception there be affected by your care, or negligence, in this your course? Will it appear an indifferent thing in the eye of the blessed Jesus, who distributes the crowns, and allots the thrones there, whether you have been among the most zealous, or the most indolent, of his servants? Surely you must wish to have an entrance ministered unto you abundantly into the Kingdom of your Lord and Saviour: and what can more certainly conduce to it than to be always abounding in this work? You cannot think so meanly of that glorious state as to imagine, that you shall there look round about you with a secret disappointment, and say in your heart, that you overvalued the endeavours you have exerted, and practised it with too much carefulness. You will not wonder, that it had so many of your thoughts and cares. But on the contrary, you have the highest reason to believe, that if any thing were capable of exciting your indignation and your grief there, it would be, that, amidst so many motives, and so many advantages, you exerted yourself no more in the prosecution of such a prize.

§ 9. But I will not enlarge on so clear a case, and therefore conclude the chapter with reminding you, that to allow yourself deliberately to sit down satisfied with any imperfect attainments in religion, and to look upon a more confirmed and improved state of it as what you do not desire, nay, as what you secretly resolve that you will not pursue, is one of the most fatal signs we can well imagine, that you are an entire stranger to the first principles of it.

A Prayer suited to the state of a soul, who desires to attain the life recommended above.

"Blessed God, I cannot contradict the force of these reasonings: oh that I may feel more than ever the lasting effects of them! Thou art the great fountain of being, and of happiness, and as from thee my being was derived, so from thee my happiness directly flows: and the nearer I am to thee, the purer and the more delicious is the stream. With thee is the fountain of life; in thy light may I see light! The great object of my final hope is to dwell for ever with thee. Give me now some foretaste of that delight! Give me, I beseech thee, to experience the blessedness of that man who feareth the Lord, and who delighteth greatly in his commandments; and so form my heart by thy grace, that I may be in the fear of the Lord all the day long!

"To thee may my awakening thoughts be directed; and with the first ray of light that visits mine opening eyes, lift up, O Lord, the light of thy countenance upon me! When my faculties are roused from that broken state, in which they lay, while buried, and as it were annihilated, in sleep, may my first actions be consecrated to thee, O God, who givest me light; who givest me, as it were, every morning a new life and a new reason! Enable my heart to pour out itself before thee, with a filial reverence, freedom, and endearment! And may I hearken to God as I desire he should hearken unto me! May thy word be read with attention and pleasure; may my soul be delivered into the mould of it, and may I hide it in mine heart, that I may not sin against thee! Animated by the great motives there suggested, may I every morning be renewing the dedication of myself to thee, through Jesus thy beloved Son; and be deriving from him new supplies of that blessed Spirit of thine, whose influences are the life of my soul!

"And being thus prepared, do thou, Lord, lead me forth by the hand to all the duties and events of the day! In that calling wherein thou hast been pleased to call me, may I abide with thee; not being slothful in business but fervent in spirit, serving the Lord! May I know the value of time, and always improve it to the best advantage, in such duties as thou hast assigned me, how low soever they may seem, or how painful soever they may be! To thy glory, O Lord, may the labours of life be pursued; and to thy glory may the refreshments of it be sought! Whether I eat or drink, or whatever I do, may that end still be kept in view, and may it be attained; and may every refreshment and release from business, prepare me to serve thee with greater vigour and resolution!

"May mine eye be watchful to observe the descent of mercies from thee, and may a grateful sense of thine hand in them add a savour and a relish to all! And when afflictions come, which in a world like this I would accustom myself to expect, may I remember that they come from thee; and may that fully reconcile me to them, while I firmly believe, that the same love which gives us our daily bread, appoints us our daily crosses; which I would learn to take up, that I may follow my dear Lord, with a temper like that which he manifested, when ascending Calvary for my sake, saying like him, The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it? And when I enter into temptation, do thou, Lord, deliver me from evil! Make me sensible, I intreat thee, of my own weakness, that my heart may be raised to thee for present communications of proportionable strength! When I am engaged in the society of others, may it be my desire and my care, that I may do and receive as much good as possible; and may I continually answer the great purposes of life, by honouring thee, and diffusing useful knowledge and happiness in the world! And when I am alone, may I remember my heavenly Father is with me; and may I enjoy the pleasure of thy presence, and feel the animating power of it, awakening my soul to an earnest desire to think and act as in thy sight!

"Thus let my days be spent, and let them always be closed in thy fear, and under a sense of thy gracious presence! Meet me, O Lord, in my evening retirements! May I choose the most proper time for them; may I diligently attend to reading and prayer, and when I review my conduct, may I do it with an impartial eye! Let not self-love spread a false colouring over it; but may I judge myself, as one that expects to be judged of the Lord, and is very solicitous he may be approved by thee, who searchest all hearts, and canst not forget any of my works! Let my prayer come daily before thee as incense, and let the lifting up of my hands be as the morning and the evening sacrifice! May I resign my powers to sleep in sweet calmness and security, conscious that I have lived to God in the day, and cheerfully persuaded that I am accepted of and in Christ Jesus my Lord, and humbly hoping in thy mercy, through him whether my days on earth be prolonged, or the resolve of them be cut off in the midst.' If death comes by a leisurely advance may it find me thus employed: and if I am called on a sudden to exchange worlds, may my last days and hours be found to have been conducted by such maxims as these: that I may have a sweet and easy passage from the services of time to the infinitely nobler services of an immortal state.' I ask it through him, who while on earth was the truest pattern and example of every virtue and grace, and who now lives and reigns with that able to save unto the uttermost. To him having done all I would fly with humble acknowledgment that I am an unprofitable servant: to him be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

CHAP. XXI.

A Caution against various Temptations, by which the young convert may be drawn aside from the course recommended above.

[illegible]

§ 1. THY representation I have been making of the pleasure and advantage of a life spent in devotedness to God and communion with him, as I have described it above, will I hope engage you, my dear reader, to form some purposes, and make some attempt, to obtain it. But from considering the nature and observing the course of things, it appears exceedingly evident, that besides the general opposition which I formerly mentioned as likely to attend you in your first entrance on a religious life, you will find, even after you have resolutely broken through this, a variety of hinderances in any attempts of exemplary piety, and in the prosecution of a remarkably strict and edifying course, will present themselves daily in your path. And whereas you may, by a few resolute efforts, battle some of the former sort of enemies; these will be perpetually renewing their onsets, and a vigorous struggle must be continually maintained with them. Give me leave now, therefore, to be particular in my cautions against some of the chief of these. And here I would insist upon the deliberties which will arise from indolence and the love of pleasure, from vain company, and worldly cares. Each of these may prove insnaring to any, and especially to young persons, to whom I would now leave some particular regard.

§ 2. I entreat you, therefore, in the first place, that you will guard against a sluggish and indolent temper. The love of ease insinuates itself into the heart, under a variety of plausible pretences, which are often allowed to pass, when temptations of a grosser nature would not be admitted. The misspending a little time seems to wise and good men but a small matter; yet this sometimes runs them into great inconveniences. It often leads them to break in upon the seasons regularly allotted to devotion, and to defer business which might immediately be done, but being put off from day to day, is not done at all: and thereby the services of life are at least diminished, and the rewards of eternity diminished proportionably: not to insist upon it, that very frequently this lays the soul open to further temptations, by which it falls, in consequence of being found unemployed. Be therefore suspicious of the first approaches of this kind. Remember, that the soul of man is an active being, and that it must find its pleasure in activity. Gird up therefore the loins of your mind. Endeavour to keep yourself always well employed. Be exact, if I may with humble reverence use the expression, in your appointments with God. Meet him early in the morning: and say not with the sluggard, when the proper hour of rising is come, a little more sleep, a little more slumber. That time which prudence shall advise you give to conversation, and to other recreations. But when that is elapsed, and no unforeseen and important engagement presents, rise and be gone. Quit the company of your dearest friends, and retire to your proper business, whether it be in the field, the shop, or the closet. For by acting contrary to the secret dictates of your mind, as to what it is just at the present moment best to do, though it be but in the manner of spending half an hour, some degree of guilt is contracted, and a habit is cherished, which may draw after it much worse consequences. Consider, therefore, what duties are to be despatched, and in what seasons. Form your plan as prudently as you can, and pursue it resolutely; unless any unexpected incident arise, which leads you to conclude, that duty calls you another way. Allowances for such unthought-of interruptions must be made; but if in consequence of this, you are obliged to omit any thing of importance which you proposed to have done to-day, do it if possible to-morrow: and do not cut yourself out new work till the former plan be despatched; unless you really judge it, not merely more amusing, but more important. And always remember that a servant of Christ should see to it, that he determine on these occasions as in his Master's presence.

§ 3. Guard also against an excessive love of sensitive and outward pleasure, as that which will be a great hinderance to you in that religious course which I have now been urging. You cannot but know that Christ has told us, that a man must deny himself, and take up his cross daily, if he desire to become his disciple. Christ, the Son of God, the maker and the heir of all things, pleased not himself, but submitted to want, to difficulties, and hardships, in the way of duty, and some of them of the extremest kind and degree, for the glory of God and the salvation of men. In this way we are to follow him; and as we know not how soon we may be called even to resist unto blood, striving against sin, it is certainly best to accustom ourselves to that discipline which we may possibly be called out to exercise even in such rigorous heights. A soft and delicate life will give force to temptations, which might easily be subdued by one who has habituated himself to endure hardships, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. It also produces an attachment to this world, and an unwillingness to leave it: which ill becomes those who are strangers and pilgrims on earth, and who expect so soon to be called away to that better country which they profess to seek. Add to this, that what the world calls a life of pleasure is necessarily a life of expense too, and may perhaps lead you, as it has done many others, and especially many who have been setting out in the world, beyond the limits which providence has assigned; and so, after a short course of indulgence, may produce proportionable want. And while in other cases it is true that pity should be shown to the poor, this is a poverty that is justly contemptible, because it is the effect of a man's own folly: and when your want thus comes upon you as an armed man, you will not only find yourself stripped of the capacity you might otherwise have secured, for performing those works of charity which are so ornamental to a Christian profession, but probably will be under strong temptations to some low artifice or mean compliance, quite beneath the Christian character, and that of an upright man. Many who once made a high profession, after a series of such sorry and scandalous shifts, have fallen into the infamy of bankrupts, and of the worst kind of bankrupts; I mean, such as have lavished away on themselves what was indeed the property of others, and so have injured, and perhaps ruined, the industrious, to feed a foolish, luxurious, or ostentatious humour, which while indulged was the shame of their own families, and when it can be indulged no longer, is their torment. This will be a terrible reproach to religion; such a reproach to it, that a good man would rather choose to live on bread and water, or indeed to die for want of them, than to occasion it.

§ 4. Guard, therefore, I beseech you, against any thing which might tend that way, especially by diligence in business, and by prudence and frugality in expense; which, by the divine blessing, may have a very happy influence to make your affairs prosperous, your health vigorous, and your mind easy. But this cannot be attained without keeping a resolute watch over yourself, and strenuously refusing to comply with many proposals, which indolence or sensuality will offer in very plausible forms, and for which it will plead, that it asks but very little. Take heed, lest in this respect you imitate those fond parents, who, by indulging their children in every little thing they have a mind to, encourage them, by insensible degrees, to grow still more encroaching and imperious in their demands; as if they chose to be ruined with them, rather than to check them in what seems a trifle. Remember and consider that excellent remark, sealed by the ruin of so many thousands; "He that despiseth small things, shall fall by little and little."

§ 5. In this view, give me leave also seriously and tenderly to caution you, my dear reader, against the snares of vain company. I speak not, as before, of that company which is openly licentious and profane. I hope there is something now in your temper and views which would engage you to turn away from such with detestation and horror. But I beseech you to consider that those companions may be very dangerous who might at first give you but very little alarm; I mean those, who though not the declared enemies of religion, and professed followers of vice and disorder, yet nevertheless have no practical sense of divine things on their hearts, so far as can be judged by their conversation and behaviour. You must often of necessity be with such persons, and Christianity not only allows, but requires, that you should, on all expedient occasions of intercourse with them, treat them with civility and respect; but choose not such for your most intimate friends, and do not contrive to spend most of your leisure moments among them. For such converse has a sensible tendency to alienate the soul from God, and to render it unfit for all spiritual communion with him. To convince you of this, do but reflect on your own experience, when you have been for many hours together among persons of such a character. Do you not find yourself more indisposed for devotional exercises? Do you not find your heart, by insensible degrees, more and more inclined to a conformity to this world, and to look with a secret disrelish on those objects and employments to which reason directs as the noblest and the best? Observe the first symptoms, and guard against the snare in time: and for this purpose, endeavour to form friendships founded in piety, and supported by it. Be a companion of them that fear God, and of them that keep his precepts. You well know, that in the sight of God they are the excellent of the earth; let them therefore be all your delight. And that the peculiar benefit of their friendship may not be lost, endeavour to make the best of the hours you spend with them. The wisest of men has observed, that when counsel in the heart of a man is like deep water, that is, when it lies low and concealed, a man of understanding will draw it out. Endeavour therefore on such occasions, so far as you can do it with decency and convenience, to give the conversation a religious turn. And when serious and useful subjects are started in your presence, lay hold of them, and cultivate them; and for that purpose, let the word of Christ dwell richly in you, and be continually made the men of your counsel.

1 6. If it be so, it will secure you, not only from the enervating illness and luxury, but from the contagion of every bad example. And it will also engage you to guard against those excessive hurries of worldly business, which would fill up all your time and thoughts, and thereby choke the good seed of God, and render it in a great measure, if not quite, unfruitful. Young people are generally of an enterprising disposition: having experienced comparatively little of the fatigue of business, and of the disappointments and encumbrances of life, they easily swallow them up, and accumulate them in their imagination, and fancy that their spirit, their application, and address, will be able to encounter and surmount every obstacle or hinderance. But the event proves it otherwise. Let me entreat you, therefore, to be cautious how you plunge yourself into a greater variety of business than you are capable of managing as you ought, that is, in consistency with the care of your souls, and the service of God: which certainly ought not on any pretence to be neglected. It is true, indeed, that a prudent regard to your worldly interest would require such a caution as it is obvious to every careful observer, that multitudes are undone by grasping at more than they can conveniently manage. Hence it has frequently been seen, that while they have seemed resolved to be rich, they have pierced themselves through with many sorrows, have ruined their own families and drawn down many others into destruction with them. Whereas, could they have been contented with moderate employments and moderate gains, they might have prospered in their business, and might by some degrees, under a divine blessing, have advanced to great and honourable increase. But if there were no danger at all to be apprehended on this head, if you were as certain of becoming rich and great as you would perplexing and fattening yourself in the attempt, consider, I beseech you how precarious those enjoyments are. Consider how often a plentiful table becomes a snare, and that which should have been for a man's welfare, becomes a trap. Forget not that short lesson, which is so comprehensive of the highest wisdom, One thing is needful. Be daily thinking, while the joy and the great things of life are glittering before your eyes, how soon death will come, and approach you at once: how soon it will strip you of all possessions, but those which a naked soul can carry along with it into eternity, when it drops the body in the grave. ETERNITY! ETERNITY! ETERNITY! Carry the word of it about with you. If it be possible, through every hour of waking life: and be fully persuaded that you have no business in life, that is inconsistent with it. For whatsoever would be injurious to your soul, is not your business, is not your interest. You are indeed, that the generality of men are, as if they thought the great thing which God required of them was to be as successful in trade, as to get as much of the world as possible; at least, as much as they can without any great inconvenience, and without risking the loss of all, for making a little addition. And so it were to stay this course they will either not perhaps feel themselves, they only seek opportunities of greater carelessness. But in effect if they mean any thing more by this, than a capacity of usefulness, which when they have it they will not exert, they generally deceive themselves: and one way or another, it is a vain pretence. In most instances men seek the world rather that they may heap up riches, for the mean and scandalous satisfaction of looking upon them while they are living, and of thinking, that when they are dead it will be said of them, that they have left so many hundreds or thousands of pounds behind them; very probably to insnare their children in their hurry, for the vanity is not peculiar to those who have children of their own) or else that they may lavish away their riches on their lusts, and drown themselves in a gulf of sensuality, in which, if reason be not lost, religion is soon swallowed up, and with it all the noblest pleasures which can enter into the heart of man. In this view, the generality of rich people appear to me objects of much greater compassion than the poor: especially as, when both live, which is frequently the case, without any fear of God before their eyes, the rich abuse the greater variety and abundance of his favours, and therefore will probably feel in that world of future ruin which awaits impenitent sinners, a more exquisite sense of their misery.

1 7. And let me observe to you, my dear reader, lest you should think yourself secure from such a dreadful danger, that we have great reason to apprehend there are many now in a very wretched state, who once thought seriously of religion, when they were first setting out, in lower circumstances of life, but they have since forsaken God for mammon and are now pitching themselves in those golden places, which, to all probability, before it be long will leave them to remain in those of darkness. When, therefore, an attachment to the world may be followed with such fatal consequences, let me entreat you to stand upon your guard, and do not run out of a desire of gaining what they have, be guilty of such folly as to expose yourself to this double danger, of losing in the attempt, or of being undone by the success of it. Contract your desires; endeavour to be easy and content with a little; and if Providence call you out to act on a larger sphere, submit to it in obedience to Providence, but number it among the trials of life, which it will require a large proportion of grace to bear well. For be assured, that as affairs and interests multiply, cares and duties will certainly increase, and probably disappointments and sorrows will increase in an equal proportion.

§ 8. On the whole, learn by divine grace to die to the present world; to look upon it as a low state of being, which God never intended for the final and complete happiness, or the supreme care, of any one of his children. A world, where something is indeed to be enjoyed, but chiefly from himself; where a great deal is to be borne with patience and resignation; and where some important duties are to be performed, and a course of discipline to be passed through, by which you are to be formed for a better state, to which, as a Christian, you are near, and to which God will call you, perhaps on a sudden, but undoubtedly, if you hold on your way, in the fittest time and the most convenient manner. Refer, therefore, all this to him. Let your hopes and fears, your expectations and desires, with regard to this world, be kept as low as possible; and all your thoughts be united as much as may be in this one centre—What it is that God would, in present circumstances, have you to be; and what is that method of conduct by which you may most effectually please and glorify him!

The young convert's Prayer for divine protection, against the danger of these snares.

"Blessed God! in the midst of ten thousand snares and dangers which surround me from without and from within, permit me to look up unto thee with my humble entreaty, that thou wouldst deliver me from them that rise up against me, and that thine eyes may be upon me for good! When sloth and indolence are ready to seize me, awaken me from that idle dream, with lively and affectionate views of that invisible and eternal world, to which I am tending! Remind me of what infinite importance it is, that I diligently improve those transient moments, which thou hast allotted to me as the time of my preparation for it.

"When sinners entice me, may I not consent! May holy converse with God give me a disrelish for the converse of those who are strangers to thee, and who would separate my soul from thee! May I honour them that fear the Lord, and walking with such wise and holy men, may I find I am daily advancing in wisdom and holiness! Quicken me, O Lord, by their means, that by me thou mayst also quicken others! Make me the happy instrument of enkindling and animating the flame of divine love in their breasts, and may it catch from heart to heart, and grow every moment in its progress!

"Guard me, O Lord, from the love of sensual pleasures! May I seriously consider, that to be carnally minded is death! May it please thee, therefore, to purify and refine my soul by the influences of thine holy Spirit, that I may always shun unlawful gratifications more solicitously than others pursue them; and that those indulgences of animal nature which thou hast allowed, and which the constitution of things renders necessary, may be soberly and moderately used! May I still remember the superior dignity of my spiritual and intelligent nature, and may the pleasures of the man and the Christian be sought as my noblest happiness! May my soul rise on the wings of holy contemplation to the regions of invisible glory; and may I be endeavouring to form myself, under the influences of divine grace, for the entertainments of those angelic spirits, that live in thy presence in a happy incapacity of those gross delights, by which spirits dwelling in flesh are so often insnared, and in which they so often lose the memory of their high original, and of those noble hopes which alone are proportionable to it!

"Give me, O Lord, to know the station in which thou hast fixed me, and steadily to pursue the duties of it! But deliver me from those excessive cares of this world, which would so engross my time and my thoughts, that the one thing needful should be forgotten! May my desires after worldly possessions be moderated, by considering their uncertain and unsatisfying nature; and while others are laying up treasures on earth, may I be rich towards God! May I never be too busy to attend to those great affairs which lie between thee and my soul; never be so engrossed with the concerns of time, as to neglect the interests of eternity! May I pass through earth with my heart and hopes set upon heaven, and feel the attractive influence stronger and stronger as I approach still nearer and nearer to that desirable centre: till the happy moment come, when every earthly object shall disappear from my view, and the shining glories of the heavenly world shall fill my improved and strengthened sight, which shall then be cheered with that which would now overwhelm me! Amen."

CHAP. XXII.

The case of spiritual decay and barrenness in religion.

[illegible]

§ 1. If I am so happy as to prevail upon you in the exhortations and cautions I have given you, you probably go on with pleasure and comfort in religion, and your path will generally be like the morning light which shineth more and more until the perfect day. Yet I dare not flatter myself with an expectation of such success as shall carry you above those varieties of temper, conduct, and state, which have been more or less the complaint of the best of men. Much do I fear, that how warmly soever your heart may now be impressed with the representations I have been making, though the great objects of your faith and hope continue unchangeable, your temper towards them will be changed. Much do I fear, that you will feel your mind languish and tire in the good ways of God. Nay that you may be prevailed upon to take some step out of them, and may thus fall a prey to some of those temptations, which you now look upon with a holy scorn. The probable consequence of this will be, that God will hide his face from you, that he will stretch forth his afflicting hand against you, and that you will see those sorrowful moments, how cheerfully soever you may now be rejoicing in the Lord, and joying in the God of your salvation. I hope, therefore, it may be of some service, if this too probable event should happen, to consider these cases a little more particularly; and I heartily pray, that God would make what I shall say concerning them the means of restoring, comforting, and strengthening your soul, if he ever suffers you in any degree to deviate from him.

§ 2. We will first consider the case of spiritual declensions, and languor in religion. And here I desire, that, before I proceed any further, you would observe, that I do not comprehend under this head every abatement of that fervour, which a young convert may find when he first becomes experimentally acquainted with divine things. Our natures are so framed, that the novelty of objects strikes them in something of a peculiar manner: not to urge, how much more easily our passions are impressed in the earlier years of life, than when we are more advanced in the journey of it. This, perhaps, is not sufficiently considered. Too great a stress is commonly laid on the flow of affections, and in consequence of this, a Christian who is ripened in grace, and greatly advanced in his preparation for glory, may sometimes be ready to lament imaginary rather than real decays, and to say, without any just foundation, O that it were with me as in months past! Therefore you can hardly be too frequently told, that religion consists chiefly "in the resolution of the will to God, and in a constant care to avoid whatever we are persuaded he would disapprove, to despatch the work he has assigned us in life, and to promote his glory in the happiness of mankind." To this we are daily to attend, having in all to the simplicity and purity of those motives from which we act, which we know are chiefly regarded by that God who searches the heart, humbling ourselves before him at the same time under a sense of our many imperfections, and flying to the blood of Christ and the grace of the gospel.

§ 3. Having given this precaution, I will now a little more particularly describe the case which I call the state of a Christian who is declining in religion: so far as it does not fall in with those which I shall consider in the following chapters. And I must observe, that it chiefly consists "in the languid views of divine objects, and a coldness in those various duties, to which we should be excited by that solemn surrender which we have made of ourselves to the service of God." There will be a variety of symptoms, according to the different circumstances and relations in which the Christian is placed; but some will be of a more universal kind. It will be peculiarly proper to touch on these; and so much the rather, as these declensions are often unobserved, like the gray hairs which were upon Ephraim, when he knew it not.

§ 4. Should you, my good reader, fall into this state, it will probably first discover itself by a failure of the duties of the closet. Not that I suppose they will at first, or certainly conclude that they will at all, be wholly omitted; but they will be run over in a cold and formal manner. Sloth, or some of those other causes which I mentioned you against in the former chapter, will so far prevail upon you, that though perhaps you know and recollect that the proper season of retirement is come, you will sometimes indulge yourself upon your bed in the morning, sometimes in conversation or business in the evening, so as not to have convenient time for it. Or perhaps, when you come into your closet at that season, some favourite book you are desirous to read, some correspondence that you choose to carry on, or some other amusement, will present itself and plead to be despatched first. This will probably take up more time than you imagined; and then secret prayer will be hurried over, and perhaps reading the Scriptures quite neglected. You will plead, perhaps, that it is but for once; but the same allowance will become a second and a third time; and it will grow more easy and familiar to you each time, than it was the last. And thus God will be mocked, and your soul will be defrauded of its spiritual meals. If I may be allowed the expression, the meal of God will be slighted, and self-examination quite dismissed, and secret prayer itself will pass a burthen rather than a delight: a trifling ceremony rather than a decent homage fit for the acceptance of our Father who is in heaven.

§ 5. If immediate and resolute measures be not taken for your recovery from these declensions, they will spread further, and reach the acts of social worship. You will feel the effect in your families and in public ordinances. And if you do not feel it, the symptoms will be so much the worse. Wandering thoughts will (as it were) eat out the very heart of these duties. It is not, I believe, the privilege of the most eminent Christians, to be entirely free from them; but probably in these circumstances you will find but few intervals of strict attention, or of any thing which wears the appearance of inward devotion. And when these heartless duties are concluded, there will scarcely be a reflection made, how little God hath been enjoyed in them, how little he hath been honoured by them. Perhaps the sacrament of the Lord's supper, being so admirably adapted to fix the attention of the soul, and to excite its warmest exercise of holy affections, may be the last ordinance in which these declensions will be felt. And yet who can say that the sacred table is a privileged place? Having been unnecessarily straitened in your preparations, you will attend with less fixedness and enlargement of heart than usual. And perhaps a dissatisfaction in the review, when there has been a remarkable alienation or insensibility of mind, may occasion a disposition to forsake your place and your duty there. And when your spiritual enemies have once gained this point upon you, it is probable you will fall by swifter degrees than ever, and your resistance to their attempts will grow weaker and weaker.

§ 6. When your love to God our Father and to the Lord Jesus Christ fails, your fervour of Christian affection to your brethren in Christ will proportionably decline, and your concern for usefulness in life abate; especially where any thing is to be done for spiritual edification. You will find one excuse or another for the neglect of religious discourse, perhaps not only among neighbours and Christian friends, when very convenient opportunities offer, but even with regard to those who are members of your own families, and to those who, if you are fixed in the superior relations of life, are committed to your care.

§ 7. With this remissness, an attachment, either to sensual pleasure, or to worldly business, will increase. For the soul must have something to employ it, and something to delight itself in; and as it turns to one or the other of these, temptations of one sort or another will present themselves. In some instances, perhaps, the strictest bounds of temperance, and the regular appointments of life, may be broken in upon, through a fondness for company, and the entertainments which often attend it. In other instances, the interests of life appearing greater than they did before, and taking up more of the mind, contrary interests of other persons may throw you into disquietude, or plunge you in debate and contention; in which it is extremely difficult to preserve either the serenity or the innocence of the mind. And perhaps, if ministers and other Christian friends observe this, and endeavour in a plain and faithful way to reduce you from your wandering, a false delicacy of mind, often contracted in such a state as this, will render these attempts extremely disagreeable. The ulcer of the soul (if I may be allowed the expression) will not bear being touched, when it most needs it; and one of the most generous and self-denying instances of Christian friendship, shall be turned into an occasion of coldness and distaste, yea, perhaps of enmity.

§ 8. And possibly, to sum up all, this disordered state of mind may lead you into some prejudices against those very principles, which might be most effectual for your recovery: and your great enemy may succeed so far in his attempts against you, as to persuade you, that you have lost nothing in religion, when you have almost lost all. He may very probably lead you to conclude, that your former devotional frames were mere fits of enthusiasm; and that the holy regularity of your walk before God was an unnecessary strictness and scrupulosity. Nay, you may think it a great improvement in understanding, that you have learnt from some new masters, that if a man treat his fellow-creatures with humanity and good nature, judging and reviling those only who would disturb others by the narrowness of their notions, (for these are generally exempted from other objects of the most universal and disinterested benevolence so often boasted of,) he must necessarily be in a very good state, though he pretend not to converse much with God, provided that he think respectfully of him, and do not provoke him by any gross immoralities.

§ 9. I mention this in the last stage of religious declensions, because I apprehend that to be its proper place: and I fear, it will be found by experience to stand upon the very confines of that gross apostasy into deliberate and presumptuous sin, which will claim our consideration under the next head, and [illegible] which most effectually tends to prevent the success, and even the use, of [illegible] in consequence of a fond and fatal apprehension, that they are needless. It is, if I may borrow the simile, like those fits of [illegible] drowsiness, which often precede apoplexies and death.

§ 10. It is by no means my design at this time to reckon up, much less to consider at large, those dangerous principles which are now ready to possess the mind, and to lay the foundation of a false and treacherous peace. Indeed they are in different instances various, and sometimes run into opposite extremes. But I could wish you to read your Bible with attention, and give you to feel the spirit with which it is written, almost every page will find in many of us upon the mind, and spread a light to search out and dispose them to shame and confusion.

§ 11. What I chiefly intend in this address is to engage you, if possible, to attend to your guiltiness, the first symptoms of your declension, to the spirit you gained, and to endeavour to repentfully as possible to recover yourself from them. And I would counsel you, that the moment your heart begins to whisper that your cause of complaint prevailed, I mean in the closet. Take some time for meditation, and ask your own conscience seriously, how matters stand between you and the blessed God. And your soul! Whether they are as they once were, and as you could wish them to be. If you saw your life run down to a period, and were to pass immediately into the eternal state? One serious thought of eternity shows you the most vain excuses, with which, in the forgetfulness of it, we are ready to delude our own souls. And when you feel that secret misgiving of heart, which will naturally arise on this occasion, do not endeavour to palliate the matter, and to find out slight and artful coverings for what you cannot but see and severely condemning; but honestly fall under the conviction, and be humbled for it. Pour out your heavy before God, and seek the renewed influences of his Spirit and grace. Return with more exactness to secret devotion, and to self-examination. Read the Scripture with yet greater diligence, and especially the more devotional and spiritual parts of it. Labour to ground it in your heart, and to feel, what you have reason to believe the sacred penmen felt when they wrote, as far as circumstances were alike. Open your soul with all simplicity to every lesson which the word of God would teach you; and guard against those things which you perceive to alienate your mind from inward religion, though there be nothing criminal in the things themselves. They may perhaps in the general be lawful, because possibly they may be expedient; but if they produce such an effect as was mentioned above, it is certain they are not convenient for you. In these circumstances above all seek the conversation of those Christians who so progress in religion as to be most remarkable, and who adorn their profession in the most amiable manner. Labour to obtain their temper and sentiments, and lay open your case and your heart to them, with all the freedom which prudence will permit. Employ yourself at seasons of leisure in reading practical and devotional books, in which the mind and heart of the pious author is transfused into the work, and in which you can like it well taste the genuine spirit of Christianity. And to conclude, take the first opportunity that presents, of making an approach to the table of the Lord, and spare neither time nor pains in the most serious preparation for it. There renew your covenant with God; put your soul anew into the hand of Christ, and endeavour to view the wonders of his dying love with such a sensibility as may provide the language, the tears, and gratitude you fly to more vigorous resolutions than ever, to live only to him who died for you. And watch over your own heart, that the good impressions you then feel may continue. Rest not, till you have attained or continued a state as near to heaven as you can leave. Rest not, till you have made a greater progress than before, for it is certain, nearly to yesterday; and it is only by a zeal to go forward, that you can be secure from the danger of going backward, and of travelling more and more.

§ 12. Lastly, add, that it is necessary to take these precautions as soon as possible, or you will probably find it much harder progress than you are aware to the thousand evils, and you may possibly be left of God to feel him some grave and aggravated sin, so as to fill your conscience with an agony and horror, where the pain of broken bones can but imperfectly express.

A Prayer for one under spiritual decays

"Eternal and unchangeable Jehovah! thy perfections and glories are, like thy being, immutable. Jesus! thy Soul is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. The enemy with whom I am now engaging is always equally augmented, and presses upon the attentive mind for a more fixed and solemn regard, in proportion to the degree in which it comes nearer and nearer. But, alas, my views, and my affections, and my best resolutions are continually varying, like this gay body, which goes through daily and hourly alterations in its state and circumstances. Whence, O Lord, whence this sad change which I now experience in the frame and temper of my mind towards thee? Whence this alienation of my soul from thee? Why can I not come to thee with all the circumstances of filial love, as I once could? Why is thy service so unwisely attended, if attended at all? And why are the exercises of it, which were once my greatest pleasure, become a burthen to me? Where, O God, is the blessedness I once spoke of, when my joy in thee as my heavenly Father, was so conspicuous, that strangers might have observed it; and when my heart did so overflow with love to thee, and with zeal for thy service, that it was matter of self-denial to me to limit and restrain the generous expressions of those strong emotions of my soul, even when prudence and duty required it?

"Alas, Lord, whither am I fallen! Thou canst see me still; but O how unlike what it once was to thee! Cold and insensible as I am, I must bleed on to-day's sin. I must secret sin in secret, and sweet sin, perhaps, often amusing myself with trifles in those seasons which I used solemnly to devote to thee.

immediate service. Thou seest me, coming into thy presence as by constraint; and when I am before thee, so straitened in my spirit, that I hardly know what to say to thee, though thou art the God with whom I have to do, and though the keeping up a humble and dutiful correspondence with thee is beyond all comparison the most important business of my life. And even when I am speaking to thee, with how much coldness and formality is it! It is perhaps the work of the imagination, the labour of the lips, but where are those ardent desires, those intense breathings after God, which I once felt? Where is that pleasing repose in thee, which I was once conscious of, as being near my divine rest, as being happy in that nearness, and resolving that, if possible, I would no more be removed from it? But O, how far am I now removed? When these short devotions, it they may be called devotions, are over, in what long intervals do I forget thee, and appear so little animated with thy love, so little devoted to thy service, that a stranger might converse with me a considerable time, without knowing that I had ever formed any acquaintance with thee, without discovering that I had so much as known or heard any thing of God! Thou callest me to thy house, O Lord, on thine own day; but how heartless are my services there! I offer thee no more than a carcass. My thoughts and affections are engrossed with other objects, while I draw near thee with my mouth, and honour thee with my lips. Thou callest me to thy table; but my heart is so frozen, that it hardly melts even at the foot of the cross; hardly feels any efficacy in the blood of Jesus. O wretched creature that I am! Unworthy of being called thine! Unworthy of a place among thy children, or of the meanest situation in thy family; rather worthy to be cast out, to be forsaken, yea, to be utterly destroyed!

"Is this, Lord, the service which I once promised, and which thou hast so many thousand reasons to expect? Are these the returns I am making for thy daily providential care, for the sacrifice of thy Son, for the communications of thy Spirit, for the pardon of my numberless aggravated sins, for the hopes, the undeserved and so often forfeited hopes, of eternal glory? Lord, I am ashamed to stand or to kneel before thee. But pity me, I beseech thee, and help me; for I am a pitiable object indeed! My soul cleaveth unto the dust, and lays itself as in the dust before thee; but oh, quicken me according to thy word! Let me trifle no longer, for I am upon the brink of a precipice! I am thinking of my ways; oh give me grace to turn my feet unto thy testimonies; to make haste, without any further delay, that I may keep thy commandments! Search me, O Lord, and try me! Go to the first root of this distemper, which spreads itself over my soul; and recover me from it. Represent sin unto me, O Lord, I beseech thee, that I may see it with abhorrence! and represent the Lord Jesus Christ to me, in such a light that I may look upon him and mourn, that I may look upon him and love! May I awaken from this stupid lethargy, into which I am sinking, and may O thou give me [illegible] degrees of spiritual life and activity than I have ever yet exercised! And may I be [illegible] and animated by him, that I may more than recover the ground I have lost, and may make a more speedy and exemplary progress, than in my best days I have ever yet done! Send down upon me, O Lord, in a more rich and abundant effusion, thy good Spirit! May he dwell in me, as in a temple which he has consecrated to himself: and while all the service is directed and governed by him, may holy and acceptable sacrifices be continually offered. May the incense be constant, and may it be fragrant! May the sacred fire burn and blaze perpetually; and may none of its vessels ever be profaned, by being employed to an unholy or forbidden use! Amen."

CHAP. XXIII.

The sad case of a Religious [illegible] who, after many [illegible] of Christ, and some progress made in religion

[illegible]

[illegible] Thy doubtless was what I have described in the foregoing chapter must be acknowledged worthy of deep lamentation. But happy will you be, my dear reader, if you never know, by experience, a circumstance yet more melancholy than this. Perhaps, when you consider the view of things which you now have, you imagine that no considerations can ever bring you, in any single instance, to act contrary to the present dictates or suggestions of your conscience, and of the Spirit of God setting it on work. No, you think it would be better for you to die. And you think rightly. Even Peter thought, and said so too: Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee; and yet after all he fell: and therefore be not high-minded, but fear. It is not impossible but that you may fall into that very sin, of which you imagine you [illegible] or into that against which you have most solemnly resolved, and of which you have already most bitterly repented. You may relapse into it again and again: but oh, if you do, say if you [illegible] heavenly and precious seed fall but some hard deep soil of gross unbelief? How should you pay for all the glorious gain which the temptation has been baited! How will this separate between God and you? What a desolation, what a dreadful desolation will it spread over your soul! It is gracious to think of it. Perhaps in such a state you can feel some agony and distress in your own conscience when you come seriously to reflect: then you ever felt when you were first awakened and reclaimed; because the sea will be observed with some very high aggravations, beyond those of your unregenerate state. I well know the reason that said: "The sickness of a disease in the first pangs of his repentance were not to be mentioned on the same day with those of the backsliden in heart, who finds his conscience filled with his own ways."

§ 2. Indeed it is enough to wound one's heart to think how yours will be wounded; how all your comforts, all your evidences, all your hopes, will be clouded; what thick darkness will spread itself on every side, so that neither sun nor moon, nor stars, will appear in your heaven. Your spiritual consolations will be gone, and your temporal enjoyments will also be rendered tasteless and insipid. And if afflictions be sent, as they probably may, in order to reclaim you, a consciousness of guilt will sharpen and envenom the dart. Then will the enemy of your soul, with all his art and power rise up against you, encouraged by your fall and labouring to trample you down in utter hopeless ruin. He will persuade you that you are already undone beyond recovery. He will suggest that it signifies nothing to attempt it any more: for that every effort, every amendment, every act of repentance will but make your case so much the worse, and plunge you lower and lower into hell.

§ 3. Thus will he endeavour by terrors to keep you from that sure remedy, which yet remains. But yield not to him. Your case will indeed be sad; and if it be now your case, it is deplorably so, and to rest in it would be still much worse. Your heart would be hardened yet more and more; and nothing could be expected but sudden and aggravated destruction. Yet, blessed be God, it is not quite hopeless. Your wounds are corrupted, because of your backslidings; but the gangrene is not incurable. There is balm in Gilead, there is a Physician there. Do not therefore render your condition indeed hopeless, by thus saying there is no hope, and drawing a fatal argument from that false supposition for going after the idols you have loved. Let me address you in the language of God to the backsliding people whose sins were made to upbraid them that to be their case, and to draw such a conclusion from it: only return unto me, saith the Lord. Cry for renewed grace, and in the strength of it labour to return. Cry daily David under the like guilty fears: turn away also thy servant; seek thy servant for I do not forget thy commandments; and that consciousness of them as I hope is taking too good. But I thus with others at all, do it immediately. Take not one step more in that fatal path to which thou hast turned aside. Think not to wind one step more to the westward and then to return: as it would be but the same thing on the whole. The second step may be more than the first; it may make way for much more guilt, and draw on a terrible train of consequences, beyond all you can now imagine. Make haste, therefore, and do not delay. Escape, and fly as for thy life, before the dart strike through thy liver. Give not sleep to thy eyes, nor slumber to thy eyelids: lie not down upon thy bed under unpardoned guilt, lest evil overtake thee, lest the sword of divine justice should smite thee: and whilst thou purposest to return to-morrow thou shouldst this night go and take possession of hell.

§ 4. Return immediately; and permit me to add, return solemnly. Some very pious and excellent divines have expressed themselves upon this head in a manner which seems liable to dangerous abuse; when they urge men after a fall, not to stay to survey the ground, nor consider how they came to be thrown down, but immediately to get up and renew the race. In slighter cases the advice is good, but when conscience has suffered such violent outrage by the commission of known wilful sins deliberate sin, (a case which one would hope should but seldom happen to those who have once sincerely entered on a religious course,) I can by no means think that either reason or Scripture countenances such a method. Especially would it be improper, if the action itself has been of so heinous a nature, that even to have fallen into it on the most sudden surprise of temptation, must have greatly ashamed, and terrified, and distressed the soul. Such an affair is dreadfully solemn, and should be treated accordingly. If this has been the sad case with you, my then unhappy reader, I would pity you, and mourn over you. And would humbly ask, as you tender your peace, your recovery to health and the very life of your soul, that you would not loiter away an hour. Before you attend to business or Pleasure, Book Owings, other engagements and employments unless they be such as you cannot in conscience delay for a few hours, which can seldom happen in the circumstances I am supposing. This is the one thing needful. Set yourself to it therefore, as in the presence of God, and hear at large, patiently and humbly, what conscience has to say. Though it chide and reproach severely. Yea, especially pray that God would speak to you by convincing and make you more thoroughly to know and feel what an evil and bitter thing it is that you have thus forsaken him. Think of all the aggravating circumstances attending your offence, and especially think of those which arise from abused mercy and goodness, which arise, not only from your solemn vows and engagements to God, but from the views you have had of a Redeemer's love, sealed even in blood. And are these the returns? Was it not enough that Christ should have been thus injured by his enemies? Must he be wounded in the house of his friends too? Were you delivered to work such abominations as these? Did the blessed Jesus groan and die for you, that you might sin with boldness and freedom, that you might extract, as it were, the very spirit and essence of sin, and offend God to a height of ingratitude and baseness, which would otherwise have been in the nature of things impossible? O think how justly God might cast you out from his presence! How justly he might number you among the most signal instances of his vengeance! And think how your heart would endure, or your hands be strong, if he should deal thus with you! Alas, all your former experiences would enhance your sense of the ruin and misery, that must be felt in an eternal banishment from the divine presence and favour.

§ 5. Indulge such reflections as these. Stand the humbling sight of your sins in such a view as this. The more odious and the more painful it appears, the greater prospect there will be of your benefit by attending to it. But the matter is not to rest here. All these reflections are intended, not to grieve but to cure; and to grieve no more, than may promote the cure. You are indeed to look upon sin; but you are also, in such a circumstance, if ever, to look upon Christ, to look upon him, whom you have now pierced deeper than before, and to mourn for him with sincerity and tenderness. The God whom you have injured and affronted, whose laws you have broken, and whose justice you have (as it were) challenged by this foolish wretched apostasy, is nevertheless a most merciful God. You cannot be so ready to return to him as he is to receive you. Even now does he, as it were, solicit a reconciliation, by those tender impressions which he is making upon your heart. But remember how he will be reconciled. It is in the very same way in which you made your first approach to him; in the name, and for the sake, of his dear Son. Come, therefore, in a humble dependence upon him. Renew your application to Jesus, that his blood may (as it were) be sprinkled upon your soul, that your soul may thereby be purified, and your guilt be removed. This very sin of yours, which the blessed God foresaw, increased the weight of your Redeemer's sufferings. It was concerned in shedding his blood. Humbly go, and place your wounds, as it were, under the droppings of that precious balm, by which alone they can be healed. That compassionate Saviour will delight to restore you, when you lie as a humble suppliant at his feet, and will graciously take pleasure even in that peace and pleasure which he gives. Let him renew your covenant with God, that broken covenant, the breach of which divine justice might teach you to know by terrible things in righteousness; but mercy allows of an accommodation. Let the consciousness and remembrance of that breach engage you to enter into covenant anew, under a deeper sense than ever of your own weakness, and a more cordial dependence on divine grace for your security, than you have ever yet entertained. I know you will be ashamed to present yourself among the children of God in his sanctuary, and especially at his table, under a consciousness of so much guilt; but break through that shame if Providence open you the way. You will be humbled before your offended Father: but surely there is no place where you are more likely to be humbled, than when you see yourself in his house, and no ordinance administered there can lay you lower than that in which Christ is evidently set forth as crucified before your eyes. Sinners are the only persons who have business there. The best of men come to that sacred table, as sinners. As such make your approach to it; you, as the greatest of sinners, as one who needs the blood of Jesus, as much as any creature upon earth.

§ 6. And let me remind you of one thing more. If your fall has been of such a nature as to give any scandal to others, be not at all concerned to save appearances, and to moderate those mortifications which deep humiliation before them would occasion. The depth and pain of that mortification is indeed an excellent medicine, which God has in his wise goodness appointed for you in such circumstances as these. In such a case, confess your fault with the greatest frankness; aggravate it to the utmost: entreat pardon, and prayer, from those whom you have offended. Then, and never till then, will you be in the way to peace: not by palliating a fault, not by making vain excuses, not by objecting to the manner in which others may have treated you; as if the least excess of rigour in a faithful admonition, were a crime equal to some great immorality that occasioned it. This can only proceed from the madness of pride and self-love: it is the sensibility of a wound, which is hardened, swelled, and inflamed, and it must be reduced, and cooled, and suppled, before it can possibly be cured. To be censured and condemned by men, will be but a little grievance to a soul thoroughly humbled and broken under a sense of having incurred the condemning sentence of God. Such a one will rather desire to glorify God by submitting to deserved blame; and will fear deceiving others into a more favourable opinion of him than he inwardly knows himself to deserve. Those are the generous views which God gives to the sincere penitent, to exalt a con-and by this means be restored from time to time to that credit and regard among others, which he does not know how to seek, but which nevertheless for the sake both of his comfort and usefulness, God wills that he should have; and which it is, humanly speaking, impossible for him to recover any other way. But there is something so honourable in the frank acknowledgement of a fault, and a deep humiliation for it, that all who see it must needs approve it. They pity an offender, who is brought to such a disposition; and endeavour to comfort him with returning expressions, not only of their love, but also of their esteem.

7. Excuse this digression, which may suit some cases, and which would suit many more, if a regular discipline were to be exercised in churches. For on such a supposition, the Lord's supper could not be approached after visible and scandalous falls, without solemn confession of the offence, and declarations of repentance. On the other hand, there may be instances of sad apostasy where the crime, though highly aggravated before God, may not fall under human notice. In this case remember, that your business is with him, to whose piercing eye every thing appears in its just light. Before him therefore prostrate your soul, and seek a solemn reconciliation with him, confirmed by the memorials of his dying Son. And when this is done, imagine not, that because you have received the tokens of pardon, the guilt of your apostasy is to be forgot at once. Bear it still in your memory for future caution. Lament it before God, in the frequent returns of secret devotion especially. And view with humiliation the scars of those wounds which your own folly occasioned, even when by divine grace they are thoroughly healed. For God establishes his covenant, not to remove the sense of every past abomination, but that thou mayest remember thy ways, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, even when I am pacified towards thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord.

8. And now, upon the whole, if you desire to attain such a temper, and to return by such steps as these, then immediately fall down before God, and pour out your heart in his presence, in language like this:

A Prayer for one who has fallen into some sin, after religious resolutions and engagements.

"O most Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God! when I seriously reflect on thy spotless purity, and on the strict and impartial methods of thy steady administration, together with that almighty power of Satan, which is able to carry away the thoughts of those most who meditate and hold communion with thee, I may justly tremble before thee this day with shame and horror in confusion and consternation of spirit. This day, O my God, this dark mournful day, would I take occasion to look back to that sad source of our guilt and our misery the apostasy of our common parents, and say, with thine offending servant David, Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me! This day would I lament all the fatal consequences of such a descent, with regard to myself. And oh, how many have they been! The remembrance of the sins of my unconverted state, and the failings and infirmities of my after-life, may justly confound me. How much more such a scene as now lies before my conscience, and before thine all-seeing eye! For thou, O Lord, knowest my foolishness, and my sins are not hid from thee. Thou tellest all my wanderings from thy statutes. Thou seest, and thou recordest, every instance of my disobedience to thee, and of my rebellion against thee. Thou seest it in every aggravated circumstance which I can discern, and in many more which I never observed or reflected upon. How, then, shall I appear in thy presence, or lift up my face to thee! I am full of confusion, and feel a secret regret in the thought of applying to thee. But, O Lord, to whom should I go, but unto thee? Unto thee, on whom depends my life or my death; unto thee, who alone canst take away the burthen of guilt, which now presses me down to the dust; who alone canst restore to my soul that rest and peace which I have lost, and which I deserve for ever to lose!

"Behold me, O Lord God, falling down at thy feet! I hold up pleading guilty in thy presence, and surrendering myself to that justice which I cannot escape! I have not one word to offer in my own vindication, in my own excuse. Words, far from being able to clear up my innocence, can never sufficiently describe the enormity and demerit of my sin. Thou, O Lord, and thou only, knowest to the full, how heinous and how aggravated it is. Thine infinite understanding alone can fathom the infinite depth of its malignity. I am on many accounts most unable to do it. I cannot conceive the glory of thy sacred Majesty, whose authority I have despised, nor the number and variety of those mercies which I have sinned against. I cannot conceive the value of the blood of thy dear Son, which I have so gratuitously trampled under my feet, nor the dignity of that blessed Spirit of thine, whose agency I have, as far as I could, been endeavouring to oppose; and whose work I have long, as with all my might, laboured to undo and to tear up (as it were) that plantation of his grace, which I should rather have been willing to have guarded with my life, and watered with my blood. Oh the baseness and madness of my conduct! that I should thus, as it were, rend open the wounds of my soul, of which I had died long ere now had not thine own hand applied a remedy, had not thine only Son bled to prepare it! That I should violate the covenant I have made with thee by sacrifice, by the memorials of such a sacrifice too, even of Jesus my Lord, whereby I am become guilty of his body and blood! That I should bring such dishonour upon religion too, by so unsuitable a walk, and perhaps open the mouths of its greatest enemies to insult it upon my account, and prejudice some against it to their everlasting destruction!

"I wonder, O Lord God, that I am here to own all this. I wonder that thou hast not long ago appeared as a swift witness against me; that thou hast not discharged the thunderbolts of thy flaming wrath against me, and crushed me into hell: making me there a terror to all about me, as well as to myself, by a vengeance and ruin, to be distinguished even there, where all are miserable and all hopeless.

"O God, thy patience is marvellous! But how much more marvellous is thy grace, which after all this invites me to thee! While I am here giving judgment against myself, that I deserve to die, to die for ever, thou art sending me the words of everlasting life, and calling, me as a backsliding child, to return unto thee. Behold therefore, O Lord, invited by thy word, and encouraged by thy grace, I come: and great as my transgressions are, I humbly beseech thee freely to pardon them; because I know, that though my sins have reached unto heaven, and are lifted up even unto the skies, thy mercy, O Lord, is above the heavens. Extend that mercy to me, O heavenly Father, and display in this illustrious instance, the riches of thy grace, and the prevalency of thy Son's blood! For surely if such crimson sins as mine may be made white as snow, and as wool, and if such a revolter as I am be brought to eternal glory, earth must, so far as it is known, be filled with wonder, and heaven with praise; and the greatest sinner may cheerfully apply for pardon, if I, the chief of sinners, find it. And oh that, when I have lain mourning, and as it were bleeding, at thy feet, as long as thou thinkest proper, thou wouldst at length heal this soul of mine which has sinned against thee: and give me beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness! O that thou wouldst at length restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and make me to hear songs of gladness, that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice! Then, when a sense of thy forgiving love is shed abroad upon my heart, and it is cheered with the voice of pardon, I will proclaim thy grace to others; I will teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee: those that have been backsliding from thee, shall be encouraged to seek thee by my happy experience, which I will gladly proclaim for thy glory, though it be to my own shame and confusion of face. And may this joy of the Lord be my strength! so that as it is, I may serve thee henceforward with a vigour and zeal far beyond what I have hitherto known!

"This I would ask with all humble submission to thy will; for I presume not to insist upon it. If thou shouldst see fit to make me a warning to others, by appointing that I should walk all my days in darkness, and at last die under a cloud, thy will be done! But, O God, extend mercy, for thy Son's sake, to this sinful soul at last; and give me some place, though it were at the feet of all thine other servants, in the regions of glory! Oh bring me at length, though it should be through the gloomiest valley that any have ever passed, into that blessed world, where I shall depart from God no more, where I shall wound my own conscience, and dishonour thy holy name, no more! Then shall my tongue be loosed, how long soever it might here be bound under the confusion of guilt; and immortal praises shall be paid to that victorious blood which has redeemed such an infamous slave of sin, as I must acknowledge myself to be, and brought me, from returns into bondage and repeated pollution, to share the dignity and holiness of those who are kings and priests unto God. Amen."

CHAP. XXIV.

The case of the Christian under the hiding of God's face.

[illegible] (1.) [illegible] (2.) [illegible] (3.) To be humble and patient [illegible] tion of what has been amiss. (4, 5, 6. (3.) To be humble and patient [illegible]

§ 1. THERE is a case which often occurs in the Christian life, which they who accustom themselves much to the exercise of devotion, have been used to call the hiding of God's face. It is a phrase borrowed from the word of God, which I hope may shelter it from contempt at the first hearing. It will be my business in this chapter, to state it as plainly as I can, and then to give some advice as to your own conduct, when you fall into it, as it is very probable you may, before you have finished your journey through this wilderness.

§ 2. The meaning of it may partly be understood by the opposite phrase of God's causing his face to shine upon a person or turning up upon him the light of his countenance. This seems to carry in it an allusion to the pleasant and delightful appearance which the face of a friend has, and especially if in a superior relation of life, when he converses with those whom he loves and delights in. Thus Job, when speaking of the regard paid him by his attendants, says, If I smiled upon them, they believed it not, and the light of my countenance they cast not down: that is, they were careful in such an agreeable circumstance, to do nothing to displease me, or (as we speak) to cloud my brow. And David, when expressing his desire of the manifestation of God's favour to him, says, Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me; and as the effect of it, declares, thou hast put gladness into my heart more than if corn and wine increased. Nor is it impossible, that in this phrase, as used by David, there may be some allusion to the bright shining forth of the Shekinah, that is, the lustre which dwelt in the cloud as the visible sign of the divine presence with Israel, which God was pleased peculiarly to manifest upon some public occasions as a token of his favour and acceptance.—On the other hand, therefore, for God to hide his face, must imply the withholding the tokens of his favour, and must be esteemed a mark of his displeasure. Thus Isaiah says: Your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear. And again, Thou hast hid thy face from us, as not regarding the calamities we suffer, and hast consumed us, because of our iniquities. So likewise, for God to hide his face from our sins, signifies to overlook them, and to take no further notice of them. The same idea is, at other times, expressed by God's hiding his eyes from persons of a character disagreeable to him, when they come to address him with their petition, not vouchsafing (as it were) to look towards them. This is plainly the scriptural sense of the word; and agreeably to this, it is generally used by Christians to our day, and every thing which seems a token of divine displeasure towards them is expressed by it.

§ 3. It is further to be observed here, that the things which they judge to be manifestations of divine favour towards them, or complacency in them, are not only, nor chiefly, of a temporal nature, or such as merely relate to the blessings of this animal and perishing life. David, though the promises of the law had a continual reference to such, yet was taught to look further, and describes them as preferable to, and therefore plainly distinct from, the blessings of the corn-floor, or the wine-press. And if you, to whom I am now addressing, do not know them to be so, it is plain you are quite ignorant of the subject we are inquiring into, and indeed are yet to take out the first lessons of true religion. All that David says, of beholding the beauty of the Lord, or being satisfied as with marrow and fatness when he remembered him on his bed as well as with the goodness of his house, even of his holy temple, is to be taken in the same sense, and can need very little explication to the truly experienced soul. But those that have known the light of God's countenance, and the shinings of his face, will, in proportion to the degree of that knowledge, be able to form some notion of the feeling of his face, or the withdrawing of the tokens he has given his people of his presence and favour, which sometimes greatly imbitters prosperity: as where the contrary is found, it sweetens afflictions, and often swallows up the sense of them.

§ 4. And give me leave to remind you, my Christian friend, (for under that character I now address my reader,) that to be thus deprived of the sense of God's love, and of the tokens of his favour, may soon be the case with you, though you may now have the pleasure to see the candle of the Lord shining upon you, or though it may even seem to be sunshine and high-noon in your soul. You may lose your lively views of the divine perfections and glories, in the contemplation of which you now find that inward satisfaction. You may think of the divine wisdom and power, of the divine mercy and fidelity, as well as of his righteousness and holiness, and feel little inward complacency of soul in the view. It may be, with respect to any lively impressions, as if it were the contemplation merely of a common object. It may seem to you as if you had lost all idea of those important words, though the view has sometimes swallowed up your whole soul in transports of astonishment, admiration, and love. You may lose your delightful sense of the divine favour. It may be matter of great and sad doubt with you, whether you do indeed belong to God; and all the work of his blessed Spirit may be so veiled and shaded in the soul, that the peculiar characters by which the hand of that sacred agent might be distinguished, shall be in a great measure lost, and you may be ready to imagine you have only deluded yourself in all the former hopes you have entertained. In consequence of this, those ordinances in which you now rejoice may grow very uncomfortable to you, even when you do indeed desire communion with God in them. You may hear the most delightful evangelical truths opened, you may hear the privileges of God's children most affectionately represented, and not be aware that you have any part or lot in the matter; and from that very coldness and insensibility may be drawing a further argument, that you have nothing to do with them. And then your heart may meditate terror, and under the distress that overwhelms you, your dearest enjoyments may be reflected upon as adding to the weight of it, and making it more sensible, while you consider that you had once such a taste for these things, and have now lost it all. So that perhaps it may seem to you, that they who never felt any thing at all of religious impressions are happier than you, or at least are less miserable. You may perhaps, in these melancholy hours, even doubt whether you have ever prayed at all, and whether all that you called your enjoyment of God were not some false delights excited by the great enemy of souls, to make you apprehend that your state was good, that so you might continue his more secure prey.

§ 5. Such as this may be your case for a considerable time; and ordinances may be attended in vain, and the presence of God may be in vain sought in them. You may pour out your soul in private, and then come to public worship, and find little satisfaction in either; but be forced to take up the Psalmist's complaint, My God, I cry in the day time, but thou hearest not; and in the night season, and am not silent: or that of Job, Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him; on the left hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him; he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him. So that all which looked like religion in your mind, shall seem, as it were, to be melted into grief, or chilled into fear, or crushed into a deep sense of your own unworthiness; in consequence of which, you shall not dare so much as to lift up your eyes before God, and be almost ashamed to take your place in a worshipping assembly, among any that you think his servants. I have known this to be the case of some excellent Christians, whose improvements in religion have been distinguished, and whom God hath honoured above many of their brethren, in what he hath done for them and by them. Give me leave, therefore, having thus described it, to offer you some plain advices with regard to it; and let not that be imputed to enthusiastic fancy, which proceeds from an intimate and frequent view of facts on the one hand, and from a sincere affectionate desire, on the other, to relieve the tender, pious heart in so desolate a state. At least, I am persuaded the attempt will not be overlooked or disapproved by the great Shepherd of the sheep, who has charged us to comfort the feeble minded.

§ 6. And here I would first advise you most carefully to inquire, Whether your present distress does indeed arise from causes which are truly spiritual? Or whether it may not rather have its foundation in some disorder of body, or in the circumstances of life in which you are providentially placed, which may break your spirits and deject your mind? The influence of the inferior part of our nature on the nobler, the immortal spirit, while we continue in this embodied state, is so evident, that no attentive person can, in the general, fail to have observed it; and yet there are cases, in which it seems not to be sufficiently considered; and perhaps your own may be one of them. The state of the blood is often such as necessarily to suggest gloomy ideas even in dreams, and to indispose the soul for taking pleasure in any thing. And when it is so, why should it be imagined to proceed from any peculiar divine displeasure, if it does not find its usual delight in religion? Or why should God be thought to have departed from us, because he suffers natural causes to produce natural effects, without opposing by miracle to break the connexion? When this is the case, the help of the physician is to be sought, rather than that of the divine, or at least, by all means, together with it; and medicine, diet, exercise, and air, may in a few weeks effect that, which the strongest reasonings, the most pathetic exhortations or consolations, might for many months have attempted in vain.

§ 7. In other instances, the dejection and feebleness of the mind may arise from something uncomfortable in our worldly circumstances; these may cloud as well as distract the thoughts, and imbitter the temper, and thus render us, in a great degree, unfit for religious services or pleasures; and when it is so, the remedy is to be sought in submission to divine Providence, in abstracting our affections as far as possible from the present world, in a prudent care to ease ourselves of the burthen so far as we can, by moderating unnecessary expenses, and by diligent application to business, in humble dependence on the divine blessing: in the mean time, endeavouring by faith to look up to him, who sometimes suffers his children to be brought into such difficulties, that he may endear himself more sensibly to them by the method he shall take for their relief.

§ 8. On the principles here laid down, it may perhaps appear on inquiry, that the distress complained of may have a foundation very different from what was at first supposed. But where the health is sound, and the circumstances easy; when the animal spirits are disposed for gaiety and entertainment, while all taste for religious pleasure is in a manner gone; when the soul is seized with a kind of lethargic insensibility, or what I had almost called a paralytic weakness, with respect to every religious exercise; even though there should not be that deep terrifying distress, or pungent amazement, which I before represented as the effect of melancholy; nor that anxiety about the accommodations of life, which strait circumstances naturally produce: I would in that case vary my advice, and urge you, with all possible attention and impartiality, to search into the cause which has brought upon you that great evil, under which you justly mourn. And probably, in the general, the cause is sin; some secret sin, which has not been discovered or observed by the eye of the world; for enormities that draw on them the observation and censure of others, will probably call under the case mentioned in the former chapter as they must be instances of known and deliberate guilt. Now the eye of God hath seen those evils which have escaped the notice of your fellow creatures; and in consequence of this care to conceal them from others, while you could not but know they were open to him, God has seen himself in a peculiar manner affronted and injured. I had almost said insulted, by them; and hence his righteous displeasure. Oh! let that severe but forgotten, which is so plainly said, so commonly known, so familiar to almost every religious ear, yet too little felt by any of our hearts. Your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear. And this is, on the whole, a merciful dispensation of God, though it may seem severe; regard it not, therefore, merely as your calamity, but as intended to awaken you, that you may not content yourself, even with lying in tears of humiliation before the Lord, but, like Joshua, rise and exert yourself vigorously, to put away from you that accursed thing, whatever it be. Let this be your immediate and earnest care, that your pride may be humbled, that your watchfulness may be maintained, that your affections to the world may be deadened, and that, on the whole, your fitness for heaven may in every respect be increased. These are the designs of your heavenly Father, and let it be your great concern to co-operate with them.

§ 9. Receive it, therefore, on the whole, as the most important advice that can be given you, immediately to enter on a strict examination of your consciences. Attend on its gentlest whispers. If a suspicion arises in your mind, that any thing has not been right, trace that suspicion, search into every secret folding of your heart; improve to the purposes of a fuller discovery the advices of your friends, the reproaches of your enemies; recollect for what your heart hath smitten you, at the table of the Lord, for what it would smite you, if you were upon a dying bed, and within this hour to enter on eternity. When you have made any discovery, note it down, and so on in your search till you can say, these are the remaining corruptions of my heart; these are the sins and follies of my life; this have I neglected; this have I done amiss. And when the account is as complete as you can make it, set yourself in the strength of God to a strenuous reformation, or rather, begin the reformation of every thing that seems amiss in you as soon as ever you discover it: return to the Almighty, and thou shalt be built up, and put iniquity far from thy tabernacle: then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty, and shalt lift up thy face unto God. Thou shalt make thy prayer unto him, and he shall hear thee; thou shalt pay thy vows unto him, and his light shall shine upon thy ways.

§ 10. In the mean time, be waiting for God with the deepest humility, and submit yourself to the disciplines of your heavenly Father, acknowledging his justice, and hoping in his mercy: even when your conscience is least severe in its reminstrances, and discovers nothing more than the common infirmities of God's people; yet still bow yourself down before him, and own, that so many are the evils of your best days, so many the imperfections of your best services, that by them you have deserved all, and more than all, that you suffer deserved, not only that your sun should be clouded, but that it should go down, and rise no more, but leave your soul in a state of everlasting darkness. And while the shade continues, be not impatient. Fret not yourself in any wise, but rather, with a holy calmness and gentleness of soul, wait on the Lord. Be willing to stay his time, willing to bear his frown, in humble hope that he will at length return and have compassion on you. He has not utterly forgotten to be gracious, nor resolved that he will be favourable no more. For the Lord will not cast off for ever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. It is comparatively but for a small moment that he hides his face from you; but you may humbly hope, that with great mercies he will gather you, and that with everlasting kindness he will have mercy on you. These suitable words are not mine, but his: and they wear this, as in the very front of them, "That a soul under the hidings of God's face may at last be one whom he will gather, and to whom he will extend everlasting favour."

§ 11. But while the darkness continues, "go on in the way of your duty." Continue in the use of means and ordinances; read and meditate; pray, yea, and sing the praises of God too, though it may be with a heavy heart. Follow the footsteps of his flock: you may perhaps meet the Shepherd of souls in doing it. Please yourself at least in his way. It is possible you may by this means get a kind look from him; and one look, one turn of thought which may happen in a moment, may as it were create a heaven in your soul at once. Go to the table of the Lord. If you cannot rejoice, go and mourn there. Go and mourn that Saviour, whom by your sins you have pierced; go and lament the breaches of that covenant, which you have there so often confirmed. Christ may perhaps make himself known unto you in the breaking of the bread, and you may find by your experience, that he hath blessed you, when you imagined he was at the greatest distance from you; nay, you, whom you thought you were cast out from his presence. Seek your comfort in such simple methods as these, and not in the vain amusements of the world and in the pleasures of sense. I shall never forget that affectionate expression, which I am well assured broke out from an eminently pious heart, then almost ready to break under its sorrows of this kind! "Lord, if I may not enjoy thee, let me enjoy nothing else; but go down mourning after thee to the grave." I wondered not to hear, that almost as soon as this sentiment had been breathed out before God in prayer, the burthen was taken off, and the joy of God's salvation restored.

§ 12. I shall add but one advice more, and that is, "that you renew your application to the blood of Jesus, through whom the reconcilation between God and your soul has been accomplished." It is he that is our peace, and by his blood it is that we are made nigh. It is in him, as the beloved of his soul, that God declares, he is well pleased; and it is in him that we are made accepted to the glory of his grace. Go therefore, O Christian, and apply by faith to a crucified Saviour; go and apply to him as to a merciful high priest, and pour out thy complaint before him, and show before him thy trouble. Lay open the distress and anguish of thy soul to him, who once knew what it was to say, (O astonishing! that he of all others should ever have said it,) My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Look up for pity and relief to him, who himself suffered, being not only tempted, but with regard to sensible manifestations deserted; that he might thus know how to pity those that are in such a melancholy case, and be ready, as well as able, to succour them. He is Immanuel, God with us; and it is only in and through him, that his Father shines forth upon us with the mildest beams of mercy and love. Let it be therefore your immediate care, to renew your acquaintance with him. Review the records of his life and death: hear his words: behold his actions: and when you do so, surely you will find a sacred sweetness diffusing itself over your soul. You will be brought into a calm, gentle, silent frame, in which faith and love will operate powerfully, and God may probably cause the still small voice of his comforting Spirit to be heard, till your soul bursts out into a song of praise, and you may be made glad according to the days in which you have been afflicted. In the mean time, such language as the following supplication speaks may be suitable:

A humble Supplication for one under the hidings of God's face.

"BLESSED GOD! with thee is the fountain of life and of happiness. I adore thy name, that I have ever tasted of thy streams; that I have ever felt the peculiar pleasure arising from the light of thy countenance, and the shedding abroad of thy love on my soul. But alas, these delightful seasons are now to me no more, and the remembrance of them engages me to pour out my soul within me. I would come, as I have formerly done, and call thee, with the same endearment, my Father and my God; but alas, I know not how to do it. Guilt and fear arise, and forbid the delightful language. I seek thee, O Lord, but I seek thee in vain. I would pray, but my lips are sealed up. I would read thy word, and all the promises of it are veiled from mine eyes. I frequent those ordinances, which have been formerly most nourishing and comfortable to my soul, but alas, they are only the shadows of ordinances! the substance is gone, the animating spirit is fled, and leaves them now at best but the image of what I once knew them!

"But, Lord, hast thou cast off for ever, and wilt thou be favourable no more? Hast thou in awful judgment determined, that my soul must be left to a perpetual winter, the sad emblem of eternal darkness! Indeed I deserve it should be so. I acknowledge, O Lord, I deserve to be cast away from thy presence with disdain; to be sunk lower than I am, much lower; I deserve to have the shadow of death upon mine eyelids, and even to be surrounded with the thick gloom of the infernal prison. But hast thou not raised multitudes, who have deserved like me to be delivered into chains of darkness, to the visions of thy glory above, where no cloud can ever interpose between thee and their rejoicing spirits? Have mercy upon me, O Lord, have mercy upon me! and though mine iniquities have now justly caused thee to hide thy face from me, yet be thou rather pleased, agreeably to the gracious language of thy word, to hide thy face from my sins, and to blot out all mine iniquities! Cheer my heart with the tokens of thy returning favour, and say unto my soul, I am thy salvation!

"Remember, O Lord God, remember that dreadful day, in which Jesus thy dear Son endured what my sins have deserved! Remember that agony in which he poured out his soul before thee, and said, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me! Did he not, O Lord, endure all this, that humble penitents might through him be brought near unto thee, and might behold thee with pleasure, as their Father and their God! Thus do I desire to come unto thee. Blessed Saviour, art thou not appointed to give unto them that mourn in Zion beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness? O wash away my tears, anoint my head with the oil of gladness, and clothe me with the garments of salvation!

"Oh that I knew where I might find him! Oh that I knew what it is that has engaged thee to depart from me! I am searching and trying my ways, oh that thou wouldst search me and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts, and if there be any wicked way in me, remove it, and lead me in the way everlasting, even that way, O Lord, I may find rest and peace for my soul, and feel the discoveries of thy love in Christ!'

'O God, who didst command the light to shine out of darkness, speak but the word and light shall dart into my soul at once! Open thou my eyes, and my mouth shall show forth thy praise: shall burst out into a cheerful song, which shall display to those whom my present dejections may have discouraged, the pleasures and supports of religion!

'Yet, Lord, on the whole, I submit to thy will. If it is thus that my faith must be exercised, by walking in darkness for days and months and years to come, how long soever they may seem, how long soever they may be, I will submit. Still will I adore thee, as the God of Israel, and the Saviour, though thou art a God that hidest thyself: still will I trust in the name of the Lord, and stay myself upon my God; trusting in thee, though thou slay me; and waiting for thee, more than they that watch for the morning, yea, more than they that watch for the morning. Peradventure in the evening time it may be light. I know, that thou hast sometimes manifested thy compassions to thy dying servants, and given them, in the lowest ebb of their natural spirits, a full tide of divine glory, thus turning darkness into light before them. So may it please thee to gild the valley of the shadow of death with the light of thy presence, when I am passing through it, and to stretch forth thy rod and thy staff to comfort me, that my tremblings may cease, and the gloom may echo with songs of praise! But if it be thy sovereign pleasure, that distress and darkness should still continue to the last motion of my pulse, and the last gasp of my breath, oh let it cease with the parting struggle; and bring me to that light which is sown for the righteous, and to that gladness which is reserved for the upright in heart; to the unclouded regions of everlasting splendour and joy, where the full anointings of thy Spirit shall be poured out on all thy people, and thou wilt no more hide thy face from any of them!

'This, Lord, is thy salvation, for which I am waiting; and whilst I feel the desires of my soul drawn out after it, I will never despair of obtaining it. Continue and increase those desires, and at length satisfy and exceed them all, through the riches of thy grace in Christ Jesus. Amen.'

CHAP. XXV

The Christian strengthening under trial and being comforted.

1. SINCE man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward, and when his conduct as well as the sad tale of nature or calamity in their way to him, it will certainly be prudent and necessary that we should all expect to meet with trials and afflictions, and that we, reader, whoever you are, should be endeavouring to find on your heaven, and get yourself into a posture to encounter those trials which will fall to your lot, as a man and a Christian. Prepare yourself to receive afflictions and to endure them in a manner agreeable to both those characters. In this view, when you are sitting under the burthen, consider how possible it is that you may be called out to the very same distresses or to others equal to them.—Put your soul as in the place of theirs. Think, how you could endure the load under which they lie; and endeavour at once to comfort them, and to strengthen your own heart; or rather pray that God would do it. And observing how liable mortal life is to such sorrows, moderate your expectations from it, raise your thoughts above it, and form your schemes of happiness only for that world, where they cannot be disappointed in the most time. Blessing God, that your prosperity is lengthened out thus far, and ascribing it to his special providence, that you continue so long unwounded, when so many showers of arrows are flying around you and so many are falling by them, on the right hand and on the left.

2. When at length your turn comes, as it certainly will, from the first hour in which an affliction seizes you, realize to yourself the hand of God in it, and lose not the view of him in any second cause, which may have procured the immediate occasion. Let it be your first care to humble yourself under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time. Own that he is just in all that is brought upon you, and that in all those things he punishes you less than your iniquities deserve. Compose yourself to bear his hand with patience, to glorify his name by a submission to his will, and to fall in with the gracious design of this visitation as well as to avert the event of it quietly, whatever the event may be.

3. Now, dear patience may have its perfect work, reflect impartially and deeply upon your own meanness and sinfulness. Consider how dear every mercy has been forfeited, and every judgment deserved. And consider too how long the patience of God hath borne with you, and how wonderfully it is still exerted towards you; and indeed, not only has patience, but its longsuffering too. Although as you are (as I speak to you now as actually under the pressure,) look round and survey your remaining mercies, and be gratefully sensible of them. Make the supposition of their being removed: what if God should stretch out his hand against you, and add poverty to pain, or pain to poverty, or the loss of friends to both; or the death of surviving friends to that of those whom you are now mourning over? Would not the wound be more grievous? Adore his goodness that this is not the case; and take heed, lest your unthankfulness should provoke him to multiply your sorrows. Consider also the need you have of discipline; how wholesome it may prove to your soul, and what merciful designs our heavenly Father has, in all the corrections he sends upon his children.

§ 4. Nay I will add, that in consequence of all these considerations it may well be expected, not only that you should submit to your afflictions as what you cannot avoid, but that you should sweetly acquiesce in them and approve them; that you should not only justify, but glorify, God in sending them; that you should glorify him with your heart, and with your lips too. Think not praise unsuitable, on such an occasion; nor think that praise alone to be suitable, which takes its rise from remaining comforts; but know that it is your duty, not only to be thankful in your afflictions, but to be thankful on account of them.

§ 5. God himself has said, In every thing give thanks; and he has taught his servants to say, Yea, also we glory in tribulation. And most certain it is, that to true believers they are instances of divine mercy, for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth with peculiar and distinguished endearment. View your present afflictions in this light, as chastisements of love; and then let your own heart say, whether love does not demand praise. Think with yourself, "It is thus that God is making me conformable to his own Son; it is thus that he is training me up for complete glory. Thus he kills my corruptions, thus he strengthens my graces; thus he is wisely contriving to bring me nearer to himself, and to ripen me for the honours of his heavenly kingdom. It is, if need be, that I am in heaviness; and he surely knows what that need is, better than I can pretend to teach him, and knows what peculiar property there is in this affliction, to answer my present necessity, and do me that peculiar good which he is graciously intending me by it. This tribulation shall work patience, and patience experience, and experience a more assured hope, even a hope which shall not make ashamed, while the love of God is shed abroad in my heart, and shines through my affliction, like the sun through a gentle descending cloud, darting in light upon the shade, and mingling fruitfulness with weeping."

§ 6. Let it be, then, your earnest care, while you thus look on your affliction, whatever it may be, as coming from the hand of God, to improve it to the purposes for which it was sent. And that you may so improve it, let it be your first concern to know what those purposes are. Summon up all the attention of your soul to hear the rod, and him who hath appointed it; and pray earnestly that you may understand its voice. Examine your life, your words, and your heart; and pray, that God would so guide your inquiries, that you may return unto the Lord that smiteth you. To assist you in this, call in the help of pious friends, and particularly of your ministers; entreat not only their prayers, but their advices too, as to the probable design of Providence; and encourage them freely to tell you any thing which occurs to their minds upon this head. And if such an occasion should lead them to touch upon some of the imperfections of your character and conduct, look upon it as a great token of their friendship, and take it, not only patiently, but thankfully. It does but ill become a Christian, at any time, to resent reproofs and admonitions; and least of all does it become him when the rebukes of his heavenly Father are upon him. He ought rather to seek admonitions at such a time as this, and voluntarily offer his wounds to be searched by a faithful and skilful hand.

§ 7. And when, by one means or another, you have got a ray of light to direct you in the meaning and language of such dispensations, take heed that you do not, in any degree, harden yourself against God, and walk contrary to him. Obstinate reluctance to the apprehended design of any providential stroke is inexpressibly provoking to him. Set yourself, therefore, to an immediate reformation of whatever you discover amiss, and labour to learn the general lessons, of greater submission to God's will, of a more calm indifference to the world, and of a closer attachment to divine converse, and to the views of an approaching invisible state. And whatever particular proportion or correspondence you may observe, between this or that circumstance in your affliction, and your former transgressions, be especially careful to act according to that more peculiar and express voice of the rod. Then you may perhaps have speedy and remarkable reason to say, that it hath been good for you that you have been afflicted; and with a meekened heart, may learn to number the times of your sharpest trials among the sweetest and the most exalted moments of your life. For this purpose, let prayer be your frequent employment; and let such sentiments as these, if not in the very same terms, be often and affectionately poured out before God.

A Humble Address to God under the pressure of bitter afflictions.

"O thou supreme, yet all-righteous and gracious, Governor of the whole universe! mean and inconsaleable as this little grossness of my spermatic vapour may appear, thou dost not disregard the cattle and its melodiously bad attendant in its connection with the most condescending and gracious regards. Thou respectest and honourest it, as it is indeed a matter of universal joy. I bemoan thy universal providence and care; and I thank thee for thy wise, holy, and kind interposition in every thing which relates to me and to the circumstances of my abode in this world. I would look through all inferior causes unto thee, whose eyes are upon all thy creatures; to thee, who formest the light, and greatest darkness, who makest peace, and greatest evil, to thee, Lord, who at thy pleasure canst exchange the one for the other, canst turn the brightest noon into midnight, and the darkest midnight into noon.

"O thou wise and merciful Governor of the world! I have often said, Thy will be done: and now, thy will is granted to me. But shall I, upon that account, mean what I have so often said? God forbid! Let me rather to lay myself down at thy feet, and to declare my full and free submission to all thy sacred pleasure. O Lord, thou art just and righteous in all! I acknowledge in thy venerable and awful presence, that I have deserved this, and ten thousand times more. I acknowledge, that it is of thy mercy that I am not utterly consumed, and that any, the least, degree of comfort yet remains. O Lord, I most readily confess, that the sins of one day of my life have merited all these chastisements; and that every day of my life hath been more or less sinful. Smite therefore, O thou righteous Judge! and I will still adore thee, that instead of the scourge thou hast not given a commission to the sword, to do all the dreadful work of justice, and to pour out my blood in thy presence.

"But shall I speak unto thee only as my Judge? O Lord, thou hast taught me a tenderer name: thou condescendest to call thyself my Father, and to speak of correction as the effect of thy love. O welcome, welcome those afflictions, which are the tokens of thy paternal affection, the marks of my adoption into thy family! Thou knowest what discipline I need. Thou seest, O Lord, that bundle of folly which there is in the heart of thy poor froward and thoughtless child: and knowest what rod and what strokes are needful to drive it away. I would therefore be in humble subjection to the Father of spirits, who chasteneth me for my profit; would be in subjection to him and live. I would bear thy strokes, not merely because I cannot resist them, but because I love and trust in thee. I would sweetly acquiesce and rest in thy will as well as submit to it; and would say, O God, it is the word of the Lord. And I desire, that not only my lips, but my soul, may acquiesce. Yea, Lord, I would please thee that thou wilt show so much regard to me, as to apply such corrosives as these to the diseases of my mind: and that kindly employ thy power to cure my faults. I have neither courage nor strength against being afflicted in this particular way. The cup which my Father puts into my hand shall I not drink it? By thine assistance and support I will. Only be pleased, O Lord, to stand by me and sometimes to grant me a favourable look in the midst of my sufferings! Support my soul, I beseech thee, by thy consolations mingled with my tribulations; and I shall glory in those tribulations that are thus allayed." It has been the experience of many who have reflected on afflicted days with pleasure, and have acknowledged that their comforts have swallowed up their sorrows. And after all that these have done, are thy mercies restrained? Is thy hand waxed short? or canst thou not still do the same for me?

"If my heart be less tender, less sensible, thou canst cure that disorder, and canst make this affliction the means of curing it. Thus let it be; and at length, in thine own due time, and in the way which thou shall choose, work out salvation for me: and show me thy marvellous loving-kindness, O thou that savest by thy right hand them that put their trust in thee! For I well know, that how dark soever this night of affliction seem to those saved, Let there be light, there shall be light. But I would urge nothing, before the time thy wisdom and goodness shall appoint. I am much more concerned, that my afflictions may be sanctified, than that they may be removed. Number me, O God, among the happy persons, whom, while thou chastenest, thou teachest out of thy law! Show me, I beseech thee, wherefore thou contendest with me, and purify me by the fire, which is so painful to me, while I am passing through it! Dost thou not chasten thy children for this very end, that they may be partakers of thy holiness? Thou knowest, O God, it is this my soul is breathing after. I am partaker of thy bounty every day and moment of life. I am partaker of thy gospel, and I hope, in some measure too, a partaker of the grace of it operating on my heart. O may it operate more and more, that I may largely partake of thy holiness too; that I may come nearer and nearer in the temper of my mind to thee, O blessed God, the supreme model of perfection! Let my soul be (as it were melted through with the intense heat of the furnace, if I may but thereby be made to run being delivered into the mould of thy gospel, and bearing thy bright and amiable image."

"O Lord, my soul longeth for thee; it crieth out for the living God! In thy presence and under the support of thy love, I can bear any thing: and am willing to bear it, if I may grow more lovely in thine eyes, and more meet for thy kingdom. The days of my affliction will have an end; the hour will at length come, when thou wilt wipe away all my tears. Though it tarry, I would wait for it. My foolish heart, in the midst of all its trouble, is ready to grow fond of this earth, disappointing and grievous as it is: and graciously, O God, dost thou deal with me, in breaking those bonds that would tie me faster to it. O let my soul be girding itself up, and, as it were, stretching its wings, in expectation of that blessed hour, when it shall drop all its sorrows and encumbrances at once, and soar away to expatiate with intimate delight in the regions of liberty, peace, and joy! Amen."

CHAP. XXVI.

The Christian assisted in examining into his growth in grace.

The examination important. § 1. False marks of growth to be avoided. § 2. True marks proposed. And first, I. Increase of knowledge. § 3. II. Increase of love. § 4. III. Conscience of the good law. § 5. More successful against sin. § 6. IV. Serenity, and full assurance. § 7, 8. V. Humility. § 9. Some duties as expressed in scripture. Spiritual harmony of mind to God, and the Spirit. § 10. Zeal for the divine honour. § 11. Heavenly-mindedness. § 12. Care to exclude worldly manners. Good shall appear. § 13. Conclusion. § 14. The Christian breathing after growth in grace.

§ 1. If by divine grace you have been born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, even by that word of God which liveth and abideth for ever, not only in the world and the church, but in particular souls in which it is sown; you will, as new-born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby. And though, in the most advanced state of religion on earth, we are but infants in comparison of what we hope to be, when in the heavenly world we arrive unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; yet as we have some exercise of a sanctified reason, we shall be solicitous that we may be growing and thriving infants. And you, my reader, if so be you have tasted that the Lord is gracious, will, I doubt not, feel this solicitude. I would, therefore, endeavour to assist you in making the inquiry whether religion be on the advance in your soul. And here I shall warn you against some false marks of growth; and then shall endeavour to lay down others on which you may depend as more solid. In this view I would observe, that you are not to measure your growth in grace, only or chiefly by your advances in knowledge, or in zeal, or any other passionate impression of the mind; no, nor by the fervour of devotion alone; but by the habitual determination of the will for God, and by your prevailing disposition to obey his commands, to submit to his disposals, and to subserve his schemes in the world.

§ 2. It must be allowed that knowledge and affection in religion are indeed desirable. Without some degree of the former, religion cannot be rational; and it is very reasonable to believe, that without some degree of the latter it cannot be sincere, in creatures whose natures are constituted like ours. Yet there may be a great deal of speculative knowledge, and a great deal of rapturous affection, where there is no true religion at all; and therefore much more, where there is no advanced state in it. The exercise of our rational faculties, upon the evidences of divine revelation, and upon the declaration of it as contained in Scripture, may furnish a very wicked man with a well digested body of orthodox divinity in his head, when not one single doctrine of it has ever reached his heart. An eloquent description of the sufferings of Christ, of the solemnities of judgment, of the joys of the blessed, and the miseries of the damned, might move the breast even of a man who did not firmly believe them; as we often find ourselves strongly moved by well-wrought narrations, or discourses, which at the same time we know to have their foundation in fiction. Natural constitution, or such accidental causes as are some of them too low to be here mentioned, may supply the eyes with a flood of tears, which may discharge itself plenteously upon almost any occasion that shall first arise. And a proud impatience of contradiction, directly opposite as it is to the gentle spirit of Christianity, may make a man's blood boil, when he hears the notions he has entertained, and especially those which he has openly and vigorously espoused, disputed and opposed. This may possibly lead him, in terms of strong indignation, to pour out his zeal and his rage before God, in a fond conceit, that, as the God of truth, he is the patron of those favourite doctrines by whose fair appearances perhaps he himself is misled. And if these speculative refinements, or these affectionate sallies of the mind, be consistent with a total absence of true religion, they are much more apparently consistent with a very low estate of it. I would desire to lead you, my friend, into sublimer notions and juster marks; and refer you to other practical writers, and above all, to the book of God, to prove how material they are. I would therefore entreat you to bring your own heart to answer, as in the presence of God, to such inquiries as these:

§ 3. Do you find divine love, on the whole, advancing in your soul? Do you feel yourself more and more sensible of the presence of God? and does that sense grow more delightful to you than it formerly was? Can you, even when your natural spirits are weak and low, and you are not in any frame for the ardours and ecstasies of devotion, nevertheless find a pleasing rest, a calm repose in heart, in the thought that God is near you, and that he sees the secret sentiments of your soul; while you are, as it were, labouring up the hill, and casting a longing eye towards him, though you cannot say you enjoy any sensible communications from him? Is it agreeable to you to open your heart to his inspection and regard, to present it to him bare of every disguise, and to say, with David, Thou, Lord, knowest thy servant? Do you find a growing esteem and approbation of that sacred Law of God, which is the transcript of his moral perfections? Do you inwardly esteem all his precepts concerning all things to be right? Do you discern, not only the necessity, but the reasonableness, the beauty, the pleasure of obedience, and feel a growing scorn and contempt of those things which may be offered as the price of your innocence, and would tempt you to sacrifice or to hazard your interest in the divine favour and friendship? Do you find an ingenuous desire to please God; not only because he is so powerful, and has so many good and so many evil things entirely at his command, but from a veneration of his most amiable nature and character; and do you find your heart habitually reconciled to a most humble subjection, both to his commanding and to his disposing will? Do you perceive that your own will is now more ready and disposed, in every circumstance, to bear the yoke, and to submit to the divine determination, whatever he appoints to be borne or forborne? Can you in patience possess your soul? Can you maintain a more steady calmness and serenity, when God is striking at your dearest enjoyments in this world, and acting most directly contrary to your present interests, to your natural passions and desires? If you can, it is a most certain and noble sign that grace is grown up in you to a very vigorous state!

§ 4. Examine also, what affections you find in your heart towards those who are round about you, and towards the rest of mankind in general.—Do you find your heart overflow with undissembled and unrestrained benevolence? Are you more sensible than you once were, of those many endearing bonds, which unite all men, and especially all Christians, into one community; which make them brethren and fellow-citizens? Do all the unfriendly passions die and wither in your soul, while the kind social affections grow and strengthen? And though self-love was never the reigning passion since you became a true Christian, yet, as some remainders of it are still too ready to work inwardly, and to show themselves, especially as sudden occasions arise, do you perceive that you get ground of them? Do you think of yourself only as one of a great number, whose particular interests and concerns are of little importance, when compared with those of the community, and ought by all means, on all occasions, to be sacrificed to them!

§ 5. Reflect especially on the temper of your mind towards those, whom an unsanctified heart might be ready to imagine it had some just excuse for excepting out of the list of those it loves, and towards whom you are ready to feel a secret aversion, or at least an alienation from them.—How does your mind stand affected towards those who differ from you in their religious sentiments and practices? I do not say that Christian charity will require you to think every error harmless. It argues no want of love to a friend, in some cases to fear his disorder should prove more fatal than he seems to imagine; nay, sometimes, the very tenderness of friendship may increase that apprehension. But to hate persons because we think they are mistaken, and to aggravate every difference in judgment or practice, into a fatal and damnable error that destroys all Christian communion and love, is a symptom generally much worse than the evil it condemns. Do you love the image of Christ in a person who thinks himself obliged, in conscience, to profess and worship in a manner different from yourself? Nay, further, can you love and honour that which is truly amiable and excellent in those, in whom much is defective; in those, in whom there is a mixture of bigotry and narrowness of spirit, which may lead them perhaps to slight, or even to censure, you? Can you love them, as the disciples and servants of Christ, who through a mistaken zeal may be ready to cast out your name as evil, and to warn others against you as a dangerous person? This is none of the least triumphs of charity, nor any despicable evidence of an advance in religion.

§ 6. And, on this head, reflect further, how can you bear injuries!—There is a certain hardness of soul in this respect, which argues a confirmed state in piety and virtue. Does every thing of this kind hurry and ruffle you, so as to put you on contrivances how you may recompense, or at least how you may disgrace and expose him, who has done you the wrong? Or can you stand the shock calmly, and easily divert your mind to other objects, only when you recollect those things, praying and praying for those who, with the worst tempers and views, are assaulting you? This is a Christ-like temper indeed, and he will own it as such; will own you as one of his soldiers, as one of his heroes, especially if it rises so far, as instead of being overcome of evil, to overcome evil with good. Watch over your spirit, and over your tongue, when injuries are offered; and see whether you be ready to meditate upon them, to aggravate them to yourself, to complain of them to others, and to lay on all the load of blame that you in justice can: or, whether you be ready to put the kindest construction upon the offence, to excuse it as far as reason will allow, and (where, after all, it will wear a black and odious aspect) to forgive it, heartily to forgive it, and that even before any submission is made, or pardon asked; and in token of the sincerity of that forgiveness, to be contriving what can be done, by some benefit or other towards the injurious person, to teach him a better temper.

§ 7. Examine further, with regard to the other evils and calamities of life, and even with regard to its uncertainties, how you can bear them.—Do you find your soul is in this respect gathering strength? Have you fewer foreboding fears and disquieting alarms, than you once had, as to what may happen in life? Can you trust the wisdom and goodness of God, to order your affairs for you, with more complacency and cheerfulness than formerly? Do you find you are able to unite your thoughts more in surveying present circumstances, that you may collect immediate duty from them, though you know not what God will next appoint or call you to? And when you feel the smart of affliction, do you make a less matter of it? Can you transfer your heart more easily to heavenly and divine objects, without an anxious solicitude, whether this or that burthen be removed, so it may but be sanctified to promote your communion with God, and your ripeness for glory?

§ 8. Examine also, whether you advance in humility.—This is a silent but most excellent grace; and they who are most eminent in it, are dearest to God, and most fit for the communications of his presence to them. Do you then feel your mind more emptied of proud and haughty imaginations; not prone so much to look back upon past services, which it has performed, as forward to those which are yet before you, and inward upon the remaining imperfections of your heart? Do you more tenderly observe your daily slips and miscarriages, and find yourself disposed to mourn over those things before the Lord, that once passed with you as slight matters; though when you come to survey them as in the presence of God, you find they were not wholly involuntary, or free from guilt? Do you feel in your breast a deeper apprehension of the infinite majesty of the blessed God, and of the glory of his natural and moral perfections; so as, in consequence of these views, to perceive yourself (as it were) annihilated in his presence, and shrink into less than nothing, and vanity? If this be your temper, God will look upon you with peculiar favour, and will visit you more and more with the distinguishing blessings of his grace.

§ 9. But there is another great branch and effect of Christian humility, which it would be an unpardonable negligence to omit. Let me therefore further inquire; Are you more frequently renewing your application, your sincere, steady, determinate application to the righteousness and blood of Christ, as being sensible how unworthy you are to appear before God, otherwise than in him? And do the remaining corruptions of your heart humble you before him, though the disorders of your life are in a great measure cured? Are you more earnest to obtain the quickening influences of the Holy Spirit; and have you such a sense of your own weakness, as to engage you to depend, in all the duties you perform, upon the communications of his grace to help your infirmities? Can you, at the close of your most religious, exemplary, and useful days, blush before God for the deficiencies of them, while others perhaps may be ready to admire and extol your conduct? And while you give the glory of all that has been right to him, from whom the strength and grace has been derived, are you coming to the blood of sprinkling, to free you from the guilt which mingles itself even with the best of your services? Do you learn to receive the bounties of providence, not only with thankfulness as coming from God, but with a mixture of shame and confusion too, under a consciousness that you do not deserve them, and are continually forfeiting them? And do you justify Providence in your afflictions and disappointments, even while many are flourishing around you in the full bloom of prosperity, whose offences have been more visible at least, and more notorious than yours?

§ 10. Do you also advance in zeal and activity for the service of God, and the happiness of mankind? Does your love show itself solid and sincere, by a continual flow of good works from it? Can you view the sorrows of others with tender compassion, and with projects and contrivances what you may do to relieve them? Do you feel in your breast that you are more frequently devising liberal things, and ready to wave your own advantage or pleasure that you may accomplish them? Do you find your imagination teeming, as it were, with conceptions and schemes, for the advancement of the cause and interest of Christ in the world, for the propagation of his gospel, and for the happiness of your fellow-creatures? And do you not only pray, but act, for it; act in such a manner as to show that you pray in earnest, and feel a readiness to do what little you can in this cause, even though others, who might if they pleased very conveniently do a vast deal more, will do nothing?

§ 11. And, not to enlarge upon this copious head, reflect once more how your affections stand, with regard to this world, and another.—Are you more deeply and practically convinced of the vanity of these things which are seen, and are temporal? Do you perceive your expectations from them, and your attachments to them, to diminish? You are willing to stay in this world as long as your Father pleases; and it is right and well: but do you find your bonds so loosened to it, that you are willing, heartily willing, to leave it at the shortest warning; so that if God should see fit to summon you away on a sudden, though it should be in the midst of your enjoyments, pursuits, expectations, and hopes, you would cordially consent to that remove; without saying, "Lord, let me stay a little longer, to enjoy these or that agreeable entertainment, to hear this or that scheme?" Can you think with an habitual calmness and hearty approbation, if such be the divine pleasure, of waking no more when you lie down on your bed, of returning home no more when you go out of your house? And yet, on the other hand, how great soever the burthens of life are, do you find a willingness to bear them, in submission to the will of your heavenly Father, though it should be to many future years; and though they should be years of far greater affliction than you have ever yet seen? Can you say calmly and steadily, if not with such overflowings of tender affections as you could desire, "Behold thy servant, thy child, is in thy hand, do with me as seemeth good in thy sight! My will is melted into thine, to be lifted up or laid down, to be carried out or brought in, to be here or there, in this or that circumstance, just as thou pleasest, and as shall best suit with thy great extensive plan, which it is impossible that I, or all the angels in heaven, should mend."

§ 12. These, if I understand matters aright, are some of the most substantial evidences of growth and establishment in religion. Search after them; bless God for them, so far as you discover them in yourself; and study to advance in them daily, under the influences of divine grace, to which I heartily recommend you, and to which I entreat you frequently to recommend yourself.

The Christian breathing earnestly after growth in grace.

"O thou ever-blessed Fountain of natural and spiritual life! I thank thee that I live, and know the exercises and pleasures of a religious life. I bless thee, that thou hast infused into me thine own vital breath, though I was once dead in trespasses and sins; so that I am become, in a sense peculiar to thine own children, a living soul. But it is mine earnest desire, that I may not only live, but grow; grow in grace, and in the knowledge of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, upon an acquaintance with whom my progress in it so evidently depends. In this view, I humbly entreat thee, that thou wilt form my mind to right notions in religion, that I may not judge of grace by any wrong conceptions of it, nor measure my advances in it by those things which are merely the effects of nature, and probably its corrupt effects.

"May I be seeking after an increase of divine love to thee, my God and Father in Christ, of unreserved resignation to thy wise and holy will, and of extensive benevolence to my fellow-creatures! May I grow in patience and fortitude of soul, in humility and zeal in spirituality and a heavenly disposition of mind, and in a concern, that whether present or absent I may be accepted of the Lord, that whether I live or die it may be for his glory! In a word, as thou knowest I hunger and thirst after righteousness, make me whatever thou wouldst delight to see me! Draw as my soul, by the gentle influences of thy gracious Spirit, every trace and every feature, which thine eye, O heavenly Father, may survey with pleasure, and which thou mayst acknowledge as thine own image!

"I am sensible, O Lord, I have not as yet attained, yea, my soul is utterly confounded to think how far I am from being already perfect: but this one thing (after the great example of thine apostle, and the much greater of his Lord) I would endeavour to do; forgetting the things which are behind, I would press forward to those which are before. Oh that thou wouldst feed my soul by thy word and Spirit! Having been, as I humbly hope and trust, regenerated by it, being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, even by thy word which liveth and abideth for ever, as a new-born babe I desire the sincere milk of the word, that I may grow thereby. And may my profiting appear unto all men, till at length I come unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; and after having enjoyed the pleasures of those that flourish eminently in thy courts below, be fixed in the paradise above! I ask and hope it through him, of whose fulness we have all received, even grace for grace: to him be glory, both now and for ever! Amen."

CHAP. XXVII.

The advanced Christian reminded of the mercies of God, and exhorted to the exercises of habitual love to him, and joy in him.

[illegible] to God our progress as well as our duty. [illegible] The Christian [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Christianity, to see how low a life the generality even of sincere Christians commonly live in this respect. Rejoice then in the Lord, ye righteous, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness, and of all those other perfections and glories, which are included in that majestic, that wonderful, that delightful name, the Lord thy God! Spend not your sacred moments merely in confession, or in petition, though each must have their daily share; but give a part, a considerable part, to the celestial and angelic work of praise. Yea, labour to carry about with you continually a heart overflowing with such sentiments, warmed and inflamed with such affections.

§ 2. Are there not continually rays enough diffused from the great Father of light and love to enkindle it in our bosom? Come, my Christian friend and brother, come and survey with me the goodness of our heavenly Father; and O that he would give me such a sense of it, that I might represent it in a suitable manner; that while I am musing the fire may burn in my own heart, and be communicated to yours! And O that it might pass with the lines I write, from soul to soul; awakening in the breast of every Christian that reads them, sentiments more worthy of the children of God, and the heirs of glory; who are to spend an eternity in those sacred exercises, to which I am now endeavouring to excite you!

§ 3. Have you not reason to adopt the words of David, and say, How many are thy gracious thoughts unto me, O Lord! how great is the sum of them! When I would count them they are more in number than the sand. You indeed know where to begin the survey, for the favours of God to you began with your being. Commemorate it, therefore, with a grateful heart, that the eyes which saw your substance, being yet imperfect, beheld you with a friendly care, when you were made in secret, and have watched over you ever since; and that the hand, which drew the plan of your members, when as yet there was none of them, not only fashioned them at first, but from that time has been concerned in keeping all your bones, so that not one of them is broken, and that, indeed, it is to this you owe it that you live. Look back upon the path you have trod, from the day that God brought you out of the womb, and say, whether you do not, as it were, see all the road thick-set with the marks and memorials of the divine goodness. Recollect the places where you have lived, and the persons with whom you have most intimately conversed; and call to mind the mercies you have received in those places, and from those persons, as the instruments of the divine care and goodness. Recollect the difficulties and dangers, with which you have been surrounded; and reflect attentively on what God hath done to defend you from them, or to carry you through them. Think how often there has been but a step between you and death, and how suddenly God hath sometimes interposed to set you in safety, even before you apprehended your danger. Think of those chambers of illness, in which you have been confined, and from whence perhaps you once thought you should go forth no more: but said, with Hezekiah, in the cutting off of your days, I shall go to the gates of the grave; I am deprived of the residue of my years. God has, it may be, since that time added many years to your life; and you know not how many may be in reserve, or how much usefulness and happiness may attend each. Survey your circumstances in relative life; how many kind friends are surrounding you daily, and studying how they may contribute to your comfort. Reflect on those remarkable circumstances in providence, which occasioned the knitting of some bonds of this kind, which, next to those which join your soul to God, you number among the happiest. And forget not in how many instances, when these dear lives have been threatened, lives perhaps more sensibly dear than your own, God has given them back from the borders of the grave, and so added new endearments, arising from that tender circumstance, to all your after-converse with them. Nor forget in how gracious a manner he hath supported some others in their last moments, and enabled them to leave behind a sweet odour of piety, which hath embalmed their memories, revived you when ready to faint under the sorrows of the first separation, and, on the whole, made even the recollection of their death delightful.

§ 4. But it is more than time that I lead on your thoughts to the many spiritual mercies which God hath bestowed upon you. Look back, as it were, to the rock from whence you were hewn, and to the hole of the pit from whence you were digged. Reflect seriously on the state wherein divine grace found you; under how much guilt; under how much pollution! In what danger; in what ruin! Think what was, and oh think, with yet deeper reflection, what would have been, the case! The eye of God, which penetrates into eternity, saw what your mind, amused with the trifles of the present time and sensual gratification, was utterly ignorant and regardless of. It saw you on the [illegible] and pitied you; saw, that you would in a little time have been such a helpless, wretched creature, as the sinner that is just now dead, and has, to his infinite surprise and everlasting terror, met his unexpected doom, and would, like him, stand thunderstruck in astonishment and despair. This God saw, and he pitied you; and being unwilling [illegible] be provided in the counsels of his eternal love and grace [illegible] Redeemed for you, and purchased [illegible] himself with the blood of his Son! a price infinitely [illegible] you will praise [illegible] and thank infinitely [illegible] was most sovereign effect ever to such a degree as to make you fall down before God in wonder and shame, to think that it should ever have been given for you. To account such those blessed purposes he sent his grace into your heart, as that though you were once darkness, you are now light in the Lord. He made that happy change which you now feel in your souls, and by his Holy Spirit which he gave to you, he daily shows that principle of love which is cultivated by this review, and sets it with greater ardour than before. Thus far he hath supported you in your Christian course; and having obtained help from him, it is that you continue even to this day. He hath not only blessed you, but made you a blessing; and though you have not been so useful as it was the generosity of your heart which he has excited would have engaged you to desire, yet some good you have done in the station in which he has fixed you. Some of your brethren of mankind have been relieved, perhaps too some thoughtless creature reclaimed to virtue and happiness, by his blessing on your endeavours. Some in the way to heaven are praising God for you; and some, perhaps, already there are longing for your arrival, that they may thank you in nobler and more expressive forms for benefits, the importance of which they now sufficiently understand, though while here they could never conceive it.

§ 5. Christian, look round on the numberless blessings, of one kind and of another, with which you are already encompassed; and advance your prospect still further, to what faith yet discovers within the veil. Think of those now unknown transports with which thou shalt drop every burthen in the grave, and thy immortal spirit shall mount light and joyful, holy and happy, to God, its original, its support, and its hope; to God, the source of being, of holiness, and of pleasure, to Jesus, through whom all these blessings are derived to thee, and who will appoint thee a throne near to his own, to be for ever the spectator and partaker of his glory. Think of the rapture with which thou shalt attend his triumph in the resurrection day, and receive this poor mouldering corruptible body transformed into his glorious image; and then think, "These hopes are not mine alone, but the hopes of thousands and millions. Multitudes, whom I number among the dearest of my friends upon earth, are rejoicing with me in these apprehensions and views; and God gives me sometimes to see the smiles on their cheeks, the sweet humble hope that sparkles in their eyes, and shines through the tears of tender gratitude; and to hear that little of their inward complacency and joy, which language can express. Yea, and multitudes more, who were once equally dear to me with these, though I have laid them in the grave, and wept over their dust, are living to God, living to the possession of unconceivable delights, and drinking large draughts of the water of life which flow in perpetual streams at his right hand."

§ 6. O Christian, thou art still intimately united and allied to them. Death cannot break a friendship thus cemented and brought out to maturity (resembling in the happiness it gives the friendship of the happiness of those friends, by whose memory that relationship is formed). They live to God as his servants: they serve him, and see his face; and they make but a small part of that glorious assembly. Meditate gratefully on the esteem and affection with the tenderness in heart to heart beyond regrets, and will they not rejoice in their joy? And will thou not adore that overflowing spring of holiness and happiness from whence each of those streams is derived; yea, I would add, while the blessed angels are so kindly regarding us, while they are ministering to thee, O Christian, and hearing thee in their songs as an heir of salvation, wilt thou not rejoice in their felicity too; and will thou not adore that God who gives them all the superior glory of their more exalted nature, and gives them a heaven which fills them with blessedness, even while they seem to withdraw from it that they may attend on thee?

§ 7. Thus, and infinitely more than thus, the blessed God is, and was, and shall ever be. The felicities of the blessed spirits that surround his throne, and thy felicities, O Christian, are immortal. Those heavenly luminaries shall glow with an undecaying flame, and thou shalt shine and burn among them, when the sun and heavens are gone out. Still shall the unchanging Father of lights pour forth his bounties upon them; and the fountain they so love from him, and their happiness in him, shall be everlasting, shall be ever growing. How down, O thou child of God, thou heir of glory! bow down, and let all that is within thee unite in one act of grateful love; and let all that is around thee, all that is before thee in the prospects of an unbounded eternity, concur to elevate and transport thy soul; that thou mayst, as far as possible, begin the work and blessedness of heaven, in falling down before the God of it, in opening thy heart to his gracious influences, and in breathing out before him that incense of praise which those warm beams of his presence and love have so great a tendency to produce, and to ennoble with a fragrancy resembling that of his paradise above.

The grateful and rejoicing sense of the favours of providence and grace with pressing and tender hopes before God in prayer and supplication, are exercises of love and praise.

"O my God, it is enough!" I have mused, and the fire burneth! But oh, in what language shall the flame break forth? What can I say but this, that my heart adores thee, and adores thee and loves thee! My little vessel is as full as it can hold; and I would pour out all that fulness before thee, that it may grow capable of receiving more and more. Thou art my hope and my help, my glory and the lifter up of my head. My heart rejoiceth in thy salvation; and when I set myself, under the influences of thy good Spirit, to converse with thee, a thousand delightful thoughts spring up at once: a thousand sources of pleasure are unsealed, and flow in upon my soul with such refreshment and joy, that they seem to crowd into every moment the happiness of days, and weeks, and months.

"I bless thee, O God, for this soul of mine, which thou hast created; which thou hast taught to say, and I hope to the happiest purpose, Where is God my Maker? I bless thee for the knowledge with which thou hast adorned it. I bless thee for that grace, with which I trust I may (not without humble wonder) say, thou hast sanctified it; though alas, the celestial plant is fixed in too barren a soil, and does not flourish to the degree I could wish.

"I bless thee also for that body which thou hast given me, and which thou preservest as yet in its strength and vigour; not only capable of relishing the entertainments which thou providest for its various senses, but (which I esteem far more valuable than any of them for its own sake) capable of acting with some vivacity in thy service. I bless thee for that ease and freedom with which these limbs of mine move themselves, and obey the dictates of my spirit, I hope as guided by thine. I bless thee that the keepers of the house do not yet tremble, nor the strong men bow themselves; that they that look out of the windows are not yet darkened, nor the daughters of music brought low: I bless thee, O God of my life, that the silver cords are not yet loosed, nor the golden bowl broken. For it is thy hand that braces all my nerves, and thine infinite skill that prepares those spirits, which flow in so freely, and when exhausted, recruit so soon and so plentifully.

"I praise thee for that royal bounty, with which thou providest for the daily support of mankind in general, and for mine in particular; for the various table which thou spreadest before me, and for the overflowing cup which thou puttest into my hands. I bless thee, that these bounties of thy providence do not serve, as it were, to upbraid a disabled appetite, and are not like messes of meat set before the dead. I bless thee too, that I eat not my morsel alone, but share it with so many agreeable friends, who add the relish of a social life to that of the animal, at our seasons of common repast.—I thank thee for so many dear relatives at home; for so many kind friends abroad, who are capable of serving me in various instances, and disposed to make an obliging use of that capacity.

"Nor would I forget to acknowledge thy favour, in rendering me capable of serving others, and giving me in any instances to know, how much more blessed it is to give than to receive. I thank thee for a heart which feels the sorrows of the necessitous, and a mind which can make it my early care and refreshment to contrive, according to my little ability, for their relief. For this also cometh forth from thee, O Lord, the great author of every benevolent inclination, of every prudent scheme, of every successful attempt to spread happiness around us, or in any instance to lessen distress.

"And surely, O Lord, if I thus acknowledge the pleasures of sympathy with the afflicted, much more must I bless thee for those of sympathy with the happy, with those that are completely blessed. I adore thee for the streams that water paradise, and maintain it in ever-flourishing, ever-growing delight. I praise thee for the rest, the joy, the transport, thou art giving to many that were once dear to me on earth, whose sorrows it was my labour to soothe, and whose pain, especially in their last hour, was the delight of my heart to promote. I praise thee for the blessedness of every saint, and of every angel, that surrounds thy throne above; and I praise thee with accents of distinguished pleasure, for that reviving hope which thou hast implanted in my bosom, that I shall ere long know by clear sight, and by everlasting experience, what that felicity of theirs is, which I now only discover at a distance, through the comparatively obscure glass of faith. Even now, through thy grace, do I feel myself borne forward by thy supporting arm to those regions of blessedness. Even now am I waiting for thy salvation, with that ardent desire, on the one hand, which its sublime greatness cannot but inspire into the believing soul, and that calm resignation, on the other, which the immutability of thy promise establishes.

"And now, O my God, what shall I say unto thee? what, but that I love thee above all the powers of language to express? That I love thee for what thou art to thy creatures, who are, in their various forms, every moment deriving being, knowledge, and happiness, from thee, in measures and degrees far beyond what my narrow imagination can conceive. But oh, I adore and love thee yet far more, for what thou art in thyself, for those stores of perfection which creation has not diminished, and which can never be exhausted by all the effects of it which thou impartest to thy creatures; that infinite perfection, which makes thee thine own happiness, thine own end; amiable, infinitely amiable and venerable, were all derived excellence and happiness forgot.

"O thou first, thou greatest, thou fairest of all objects! thou only great, thou only fair, possess all my soul! And surely thou dost possess it. While I thus feel thy sacred Spirit breathing on my heart, and exciting these fervours of love to thee, I cannot doubt it any more than I can doubt the reality of this outward life, when I enjoy the actings of it and feel its sweetness. Surely, O ever I know the appetite of hunger, my soul hungers after righteousness, and longs for a greater conformity to thy blessed nature and holy will. If ever my palate felt thirst, my soul thirsteth for God, even for the living God, and panteth for the more abundant communication of his favour. If ever this body, when wearied with labours or pastimes knew what it was to wish for the refreshment of the bed, and rejoiced to rest there, my soul, with sweet acquiescence, rests upon thy gracious bosom, O my heavenly Father, and returns to its repose in the embraces of its God, who hath dealt so bountifully with it. And if ever I saw the face of a beloved friend with complacency and joy, I rejoice in beholding thy face, O Lord, and in calling thee my Father in Christ. Such thou art, and such thou wilt be, for time and for eternity. What have I more to do, but to commit myself to thee for both? Leaving it to thee to choose mine inheritance, and to order my affairs for me, while all my business is to serve thee, and all my delight to praise thee. My soul follows hard after God, because his right hand upholds me. Let it still bear me up, and I shall press on towards thee, till all my desires be accomplished in the eternal enjoyment of thee! Amen."

CHAP. XXVIII

The established Christian invited to exert himself to purposes of usefulness.

§ 1. SUCH as I have described in the former chapter, I trust, are and will be the frequent exercises of your soul before God. Thus will your love and gratitude breathe itself forth in the divine presence; and will, through Jesus the great mediator, come up before it as incense, and yield an acceptable savour. But then you must remember this will not be the only effect of that love to God, which I have supposed so warm in your heart. If it be sincere, it will not spend itself in words alone; but will discover itself in actions, and will produce, as its genuine fruit, an unfeigned love to your fellow-creatures, and an unwearied desire and labour to do them good continually.

§ 2. "Has the great Father of mercies," will you say, "looked upon me with so gracious an eye, has he not only forgiven me ten thousand offences, but enriched me with such a variety of benefits? O what shall I render to him for them all! Instruct me, O ye oracles of eternal truth! Instruct me, ye elder brethren in the family of my heavenly Father! Instruct me above all, O thou Spirit of wisdom and of love, what I may be able to do, to express my love to the great eternal Fountain of love, and to approve my fidelity to him who has already gone so much to engage it, and who will take so much pleasure in owning and rewarding it!"

§ 3. This, O Christian, is the command which we have heard from the beginning, and it will ever continue in unimpaired force, that he who loveth God, should love his brother also; and should express that love, not in word and profession alone, but in deed and in truth. You are to love your neighbour as yourself; to love the whole creation of God, and, so far as your influence can extend, must endeavour to make it happy.

§ 4. "Yes," will you say, "and I do love it. I feel the golden chain of divine love encircling us all, and binding us close to each other, joining us in one body, and diffusing as it were one soul through all. May happiness, true and sublime, perpetuated and ever growing happiness, reign through the whole world of God's rational and obedient creatures, in heaven and on earth! and may every revolted creature, that is capable of being recovered and restored, be made obedient! Yea, may the necessary punishment of those, who are irrecoverable, be overruled by infinite wisdom and love to the good of the whole!"

§ 5. These are right sentiments; and if they are indeed the sentiments of your heart, O reader, and not an empty form of vain words, they will be attended with a serious concern to act in subordination to this great scheme of divine Providence, according to your abilities, in their utmost extent. And to this purpose, they will put you on enquiring the peculiar circumstances of your life and being; that you may discover what opportunities of usefulness they now afford, and how those opportunities and capacities may be improved. Enter therefore into such a survey; not that you may pride yourself in the distinctions of divine Providence or grace towards you, or having received, may glory as if you had not received, but that you may deal faithfully with the great Proprietor, whose steward you are, and by whom you are intrusted with every talent which, with respect to any claim from your fellow-creatures, you may call your own. And here, having gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, let us hold the balance with an impartial hand, that so we may determine what it is that God requires of us, which is nothing less, than doing the most we can invent, contrive, and effect, for the general good. But oh, how seldom is this estimate faithfully made! and how much does the world around us, and how much do our own souls suffer, for want of that fidelity!

§ 6. Hath God given you genius and learning? It was not that you might amuse or deck yourself with it, and kindle a blaze which should only serve to attract and dazzle the eyes of men. It was intended to be the means of leading both yourself and them to the Father of lights. And it will be your duty, according to the peculiar turn of that genius and capacity, either to endeavour to improve and adorn human life, or by a more direct application of it to divine subjects, to plead the cause of religion, to defend its truths, to enforce and recommend its practice, to deter men from courses which would be dishonourable to God and fatal to themselves, and to try the utmost efforts of all the solemnity and tenderness with which you can clothe your addresses, to lead them into the paths of virtue and happiness.

§ 7. Has God invested you with power, whether it be in a larger or smaller society? Remember that this power was given you that God might be honoured, and those placed under your government, whether domestic or public, might be made happy. Be concerned therefore, that whether you be intrusted with the rod or the sword, it may not be borne in vain. Are you a magistrate? Have you any share in the great and tremendous charge of enacting laws? Reverence the authority of the supreme Legislator, the great Guardian of society. Promote none, consent to none, which you do not in your own conscience esteem, in present circumstances, an intimation of his will; and in the establishment of which you do not firmly believe you shall be his minister for good. Have you the charge of executing laws? Put life into them by a vigorous and strenuous execution, according to the nature of the particular office you bear. Retain not an empty name of authority. Permit not yourself, as it were, to fall asleep on the tribunal. Be active, be wakeful, be observant of what passes around you. Protect the upright and the innocent. Break in pieces the power of the oppressor. Unveil every dishonest art. Disgrace, as well as defeat, the wretch, that makes his distinguished abilities the disguise or protection of the wickedness which he ought rather to endeavour to expose, and to drive out of the world with abhorrence.

§ 8. Are you placed only at the head of a private family? Rule it for God. Administer the concerns of that little kingdom with the same views, and on the same principles, which I have been inculcating on the powerful and the great; if, by an unexpected accident, any of them should suffer their eyes to glance upon the passage above. Your children and servants are your natural subjects. Let good order be established among them, and keep them under a regular discipline. Let them be instructed in the principles of religion, that they may know how reasonable such a discipline is, and let them be accustomed to act accordingly. You cannot indeed change their hearts, but you may very much influence their conduct; and by that means may preserve them from many snares, may do a great deal to make them good members of society, and may set them, as it were, in the way of God's steps, if, peradventure, passing by, he may bless them with the riches of his grace. And fail not to do your utmost to convince them of their need of those blessings; labour to engage them to a high esteem of them, and to an earnest desire after them, as incomparably more valuable than any thing else.

§ 9. Again, Has God been pleased to raise you to esteem among your fellow-creatures, which is not always in proportion to a man's rank or possessions in human life? Are your counsels heard with attention? Is your company sought? Does God give you good acceptance in the eyes of men, so that they do not only put the fairest construction on your words, but overlook faults of which you are conscious to yourself, and consider your actions and performances in the most indulgent and favourable light? You ought to regard this, not only as a favour of Providence, and as an encouragement to you cheerfully to pursue your duty, in the several branches of it, for the time to come; but also, as giving you much greater opportunities of usefulness, than in your present station you could otherwise have had. If your character has any weight in the world, throw it into the right scale. Endeavour to keep virtue and goodness and countenance. Affectionately give your hand to modest worth, where it seems to be depressed or overlooked; though shining, when viewed in its proper light, with a lustre which you may think much superior to your own. Be an advocate for truth; be a counsellor of peace; be an example of candour; and do all you can to reconcile the hearts of men, and especially of good men, to each other, however they may differ in their opinions about matters which it is possible for good men to dispute. And let the caution and humility of your behaviour in circumstances of such superior eminence, and amidst so many tokens of general esteem, silently reprove the rashness and haughtiness of those who perhaps are remarkable for little else; or who, if their abilities were indeed considerable, must be despised; and whose talents must be, in a great measure, lost to the public, till that rashness and haughtiness of spirit be subdued. Nor suffer yourself to be interrupted in this generous and worthy course by the little attacks of envy and calumny which you may meet with in it. Be still attentive to the general good, steady and resolve to your efforts to persuade it, and leave it to Providence to guard it to secure your character from the base assaults of malice and falsehood; which will arise, without your being, entirely, themselves and keep upon the authors greater shame, or (if they are incorrigible to their greater misery) than your humanity will allow you to wish them.

¶ 10. Once more. Has God blessed you with riches? Has he placed you in such circumstances, that you have more than you absolutely need for the subsistence of yourself and your family? remember your approaching account. Remember what an encumbrance these things often prove to men in the way of their salvation and how often, according to our Lord's express declaration, they render it so difficult to enter into the kingdom of God, as it is for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. Let it therefore be your immediate, your earnest, and your daily, prayer, that riches may not be a snare and a stone to you, as they are to by far the greater part of their possessors. Appropriate, I beseech you, some certain part and proportion of your estate and revenue to charitable uses; with a provisional increase, as God shall prosper you, in any extraordinary instance. By this means you will always have a fund of charity at hand; and you will probably be more ready to communicate, when you look upon what is so deposited, as not in any sense your own; but as already actually given away to those uses, though not yet affixed to particular objects. It is not for me to say, what that proportion ought to be. To those who have large revenues and no children, perhaps a third or one half may be too little; to those whose incomes are small, and their charge considerable, though they have something more than is absolutely necessary, it is possible a tenth may be too much. But pray, that God would guide your mind; make a trial for one year, on such terms as in your conscience you think will be most pleasing to him; and let your observations on that, teach you to fix your proportion for the next; always remembering, that he requires justice in the first place, and alms-deeds only so far as may consist with that. Yet at the same time take heed of that treacherous, delusive, and in many instances destructive, imagination,—that justice to your own family requires that you should leave your children very rich; which has perhaps cost some parsimonious parents the lives of those darlings for whom they laid up the portion of the poor; and what fatal consequences of divine displeasure may attend it to those that yet survive, God only knows; and I heartily pray, that you or yours may never learn by experience.

¶ 11. And that your heart may yet be more opened, and that your charity may be directed to the best purposes let me kindly mention a variety of good uses, which may call for the consideration of those whom God has in this respect distinguished by an ability to do good. To some the heads I am to offer, may recur on the neighbourhood in which you live. Think how many honest, and industrious, perhaps too I might add religious, people are making very hard shifts to struggle through life. Think what a comfort that would be to them, which you might, without any inconvenience, spare from that superfluous which God hath given you. Hearken also to any extraordinary call of charity which may happen, especially those of a public nature; and help them forward with your example and your interest; which perhaps may be of much greater importance than the sum which you contribute, considered in itself.—Have a tongue to plead for the necessitous, as well as a hand to relieve them, and endeavour to discountenance those poor shameful excuses, which covetousness often dictates to those who art may indeed set some varnish on what they suggest, but so slight a one that the coarse ground will appear through it.—See how many poor children are wandering naked and ignorant about the streets, and in the way to all kinds of vice and misery; and consider what can be done towards clothing some of them at least, and instructing them in the principles of religion. Would every thriving family in a town which is able to afford help on such occasions, cast a pitying eye on one poor family in its neighbourhood, and take it under their patronage, to assist in feeding, and clothing, and teaching the children, in supporting it in affliction, in relieving it from wrongs, and in advising those that have the management of it, as circumstances may require, how great a difference would soon be produced in the appearance of things amongst us! Observe who are sick, that if there be no public infirmary at hand to which you can introduce them, (where your contributions will yield the largest increase) you may do something towards relieving them at home, and supplying them with advice and medicines as well as with proper diet and attendance. Consider also the spiritual necessities of men; in providing for which, I should particularly recommend to you the very important and noble charity of assisting young persons of genius and piety, with what is necessary to support the expenses of their education for the ministry, in a proper course of preparation at academical studies. And grudge not some proportion of what God hath given you to those, who resigning all temporal views to minister to you the gospel of Christ, have surely an equitable claim to be supported by you in a capacity of consecrating you those services, however laborious, to which, for your sakes, and that of our common Lord, they have devoted their lives. And while you are so abundantly satisfied with the goodness of God's house, even of his holy temple, have compassion on those that dwell in a desert land; and remember to do something towards sending among the distant nations of the heathen world, that glorious gospel which hath so long continued unknown to multitudes, though the knowledge of it, with becoming regard, be life everlasting.—These are a few important charities, which I would point out to those whom Providence has enriched with its peculiar bounties; and it renders gold more precious than it could appear in any other light, that it is capable of being employed for such purposes. But if you should not have gold to spare for them, contribute your silver; or as a farthing or a mite is not overlooked by God, when it is given from a truly generous and charitable heart, let that be cheerfully dropped into the treasury, where richer offerings cannot be afforded.

§ 12. And, that amidst so many pressing demands for charity, you may be better furnished to answer them, seriously reflect on your manner of living. I say not that God requires you should become one of the many poor relieved out of your income. The support of society, as at present established, will not only permit, but require, that some persons should allow themselves in the elegances and delights of life, by furnishing which, multitudes of poor families are much more creditably and comfortably subsisted, with greater advantage to themselves and safety to the public, than they could be, if the price of their labours, or of the commodities in which they deal, were to be given them as an alms; nor can I imagine it grateful to God, that his gifts should be refused, as if they were meant for snares and curses rather than benefits. This were to frustrate the benevolent purposes of the gracious Father of mankind, and, if carried to its rigour, would be a sort of conspiracy against the whole system of nature. Let the bounties of Providence be used; but let us carefully see to it, that it be in a moderate and prudent manner, lest, by your own folly, that which should have been for your welfare, become a trap. Let conscience say, my dear reader, with regard to yourself, what proportion of the good things you possess, your heavenly Father intends for yourself, and what for your brethren; and live not, as if you had no brethren, as if pleasing yourself in all the magnificence and luxury you can devise, were the end for which you were sent into the world. I fear this is the excess of the present age, and not an excess of rigour and mortification. Examine therefore your expenses, and compare them with your income. That may be shamefully extravagant in you, which may not only be pardonable, but commendable, in another of superior estate. Nor can you be sure that you do not exceed, merely because you do not plunge yourself in debt, nor render yourself incapable of laying up any thing for your family. If you be disabled from doing any thing for the poor, or any thing proportionable to your rank in life, by that genteel and elegant way of living which you affect, God must disapprove of such a conduct: and you ought as you will answer it to him, to retrench it. And though the divine indulgence will undoubtedly be exercised to those in whom there is a sincere principle of faith in Christ, and undissembled love to God and man, though it act not to that height of beneficence and excellence which might have been attained; yet be assured of this, that he who rendereth to every one according to his works, will have a strict regard to the degrees of goodness in the distribution of final rewards. So that every neglected opportunity draws after it an irreparable loss, which will go into eternity along with you. And let me add too, that every instance of negligence indulged, renders the mind still more and more indolent and weak, and consequently more indisposed to recover the ground which has been lost, or even to maintain that which has hitherto been kept.

§ 13. Complain not that this is imposing hard things upon you. I am only directing your pleasures into a nobler channel; and indeed that frugality, which is the source of such a generosity, so far from being at all injurious to your reputation, will rather, amongst wise and good men, greatly promote it. But you have far nobler motives before you than those which arise from their regards. I speak to you as to a child of God, and a member of Christ; as joined therefore by the most intimate union to all the poorest of those that believe in him. I speak to you as to an heir of eternal glory, who ought therefore to have sentiments great and sublime, in some proportion to that expected inheritance.

§ 14. Cast about therefore in your thoughts, what good is to be done, and what you can do, either in your own person, or by your interest with others; and go about it with resolution, as in the name and presence of the Lord. And as the Lord giveth wisdom, and out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding, go to the footstool of his throne, and there seek that guidance and that grace, which may suit your present circumstances, and may be effectual to produce the fruits of holiness and usefulness, to his more abundant glory, and to the honour of your Christian profession.

The established Christian breathes after more extensive usefulness.

"O holy and righteous Father, and sovereign Author of all good, whether natural or spiritual! I bless thee for the various talents with which thou hast enriched so undeserving a creature as I must acknowledge myself to be. My soul is in the deepest confusion before thee, when I consider to what little purpose I have hitherto improved them. Alas!

what have I done, in proportion to what thou might-est reasonably have expected with the gifts of nature which thou hast bestowed upon me, with my opportunities of life, with my time, with my possessions, with my influence over others? Alas! through my own negligence and folly I look back on a barren wilderness, where I might have seen a fruitful field and a springing harvest! Justly do I indeed de-serve to be stripped of all to be brought to an im-mediate account for all, to be condemned as in many respects unfaithful to thee, and to the world, and to my own soul; and in consequence of that condemnation, to be cast into the prison of eternal darkness; but thou, Lord, hast freely forgiven the dreadful debt of ten thousand talents. Adored be thy name for it! Accept, O Lord, accept that re-newed surrender which I would now make of my self, and of all I have, unto thy service! I acknow-ledge that it is of thine own that I give thee; make me, I beseech thee, a faithful steward for my great Lord, and may I think of no separate interest of my own, in opposition to thine!

"I adore thee, O thou God of all grace, if, while I am thus speaking to thee, I feel the love of thy creatures arising in my soul, if I feel my heart opening to embrace my brethren of mankind! O make me thy faithful almoner, in distributing to them all that thou hast lodged in mine hand for their relief! and in determining what is my own share, may I hold the balance with an equal hand, and judge impartially between myself and them! The proportion thou allowest may I thankfully take for myself, and those who are immediately mine! the rest may I distribute with wisdom, and fidelity, and cheerfulness! Guide mine hand, O ever mer-ciful Father, whilst thou dost me the honour to make me thine instrument in dealing out a few of thy bounties; that I may bestow them where they are most needed, and where they will answer the best end! And if it be thy gracious will, do thou mul-tiply the seed sown! Prosper me in my worldly affairs, that I may have more to impart to them that need it; and thus lead me on to the region of ever-lasting plenty and everlasting benevolence! There may I meet with many to whom I have been an affectionate benefactor on earth; and if it be thy blessed will, with many whom I have also been the means of conducting into the path to that blissful abode! There may they entertain me in their habi-tations of glory! And in time and eternity do thou, Lord, accept the praise of all, through Jesus Christ; at whose feet I would bow, and at whose feet after the most useful course I would at last die, with as much humility as if I were then exerting the first act of faith upon him, and had never had any oppor-tunity, by one tribute of obedience and gratitude to the services of life, to approve its sincerity!"

CHAP. XXIX.

The Christian rejoicing in the views of death and judgment.

[illegible]

§ 1. When the visions of the Lord were closing upon John, the beloved disciple in the island of Patmos, it is observable, that he who gave him that revelation, even Jesus the faithful and true witness, concludes with those lively and impatient words:—He who testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly: and John answers, with the greatest readiness and pleasure, Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus! come as thou hast said surely and quick-ly!—And remember, O Christian, whoever you are that are now reading these words, your divine Lord speaks in the same language to you. Behold, I come quickly.—Yes, very quickly will he come by death, to turn the key, to open the door of the grave for thine admittance thither, and to lead thee through it into the now unknown regions of the invisible world. Nor is it long before the Judge, who stand-eth at the door, will appear also to the universal judgment. And though perhaps not only scores but hundreds of years may lie between that period and the present moment, yet it is but a very small point of time to him, who at once views all the un-measurable ages of a past and future eternity. A thousand years are with him but as one day, and one day as a thousand years. In both these senses then does he come quickly. And I trust you can answer, with a glad Amen, that the warning is not terrible nor unpleasant to your ears, but rather that his coming, his certain, his speedy coming, is the object of your delightful hope, and of your longing expectation.

§ 2. I am sure, it is reasonable, it should be so; and yet perhaps nature, fond of life, and unwilling to part with a long known scene, to enter on a state to which it is entirely a stranger, may recoil from the thoughts of dying, or, struck with the awful pomp of an expiring and dissolving world, may look on the judgment day with some mixture of terror. And therefore, my dear brother in the Lord (for as such I can now esteem you), I would endeav-our with you a little on this head, and would entreat you to look more attentively on this solemn object, which will, I trust, soon lose disagreeableness to you as it is more familiarly viewed. Nay, I hope that instead of starting back from it, you will rather spring forward towards it with joy and delight.

§ 3. Think, O Christian, when Christ comes to call you away by death, he comes, to set you at liberty from your present sorrows, to deliver you from your struggles with remaining corruption, and to receive you to dwell with himself in complete holiness and joy. You shall be absent from the body, and be present with the Lord.

§ 4. He will indeed call you away from this world. But oh, what is this world that you should be fond of it, and cling to it with so much eagerness! How low are all those enjoyments that are peculiar to it, and how many its vexations, its snares, and its sorrows! Review your pilgrimage thus far, and though you must acknowledge that goodness and mercy have followed you all the days of your life, yet has not that very mercy itself planted some thorns in your paths, and given you some wise and necessary, yet painful, intimations, that this is not your rest? Review the monuments of your withered joys, of your blasted hopes, if there be yet any monuments of them remaining, more than a painful remembrance they have left behind in your afflicted heart. Look upon the graves that have swallowed up many of your dearest and most amiable friends, perhaps in the very bloom of life, and in the greatest intimacy of your converse with them; and reflect, that if you hold it out a few years more, death will renew its conquests at your expense, and devour the most precious of those that yet survive. View the living, as well as the dead, behold the state of human nature under the many grievous marks of its apostasy from God; and say, whether a wise and good man would wish to continue always here. Methinks, were I myself secure from being reached by any of the arrows that fly around me, I could not but mourn to see the wounds that are given by them, and to hear the groans of those that are continually falling under them. The diseases and calamities of mankind are so many, and, which is most grievous of all, the distempers of their minds are so various and so threatening, that the world appears almost like an hospital. And a man, whose heart is tender, is ready to feel his spirits broken as he walks through it, and surveys the sad scene; especially when he sees how little he can do for the recovery of those whom he pities. Are you a Christian and does it not pierce your heart to see how human nature is sunk in vice and in shame!—to see with what amazing insolence some are making themselves openly vile, and how the name of Christ is dishonoured by many, too, that call themselves his people!—to see the unlawful deeds and filthy practices of them that live ungodly, and to behold, at the same time, the infirmities, at least, and irregularities, of those concerning whom we have better hopes! And do you not wish to escape from such a world, where a righteous and compassionate soul must be vexed from day to day by so many spectacles of sin and misery!

§ 5. You to come nearer home, do you not feel something within you which you long to quit, and which would imbitter even paradise itself? something which, were it to continue, would grieve and distress even in the society of the blessed? Do you not feel a remainder of indwelling sin; the sad consequence of the original revolt of our nature from God! Are you not struggling every day with some residue of corruption, or at least mourning on account of the weakness of your graces? Do you not often find your spirits dull and languid, when you would desire to raise them to the greatest fervour in the service of God? Do you not find your hearts too often insensible of the richest instances of his love, and your hands feeble in his service, even when to will is present with you? Does not your life, in its best days and hours, appear a low unprofitable thing, when compared with what you are sensible it ought to be, and with what you wish that it were? Are you not frequently, as it were, stretching the pinions of the mind, and saying, Oh that I had wings like a dove, that I might fly away, and be at rest?

§ 6. Should you not then rejoice in the thought, that Jesus comes to deliver you from these complaints?—that he comes to answer your wishes, and to fulfil the largest desires of your hearts; those desires that he himself has inspired?—that he comes to open upon you a world of purity and joy, of active, exalted, and unwearied services!

§ 7. O Christian, how often have you cast a longing eye towards those happy shores, and wished to pass the sea, the boisterous, unpleasant, dangerous sea, that separates you from them! When your Lord has condescended to make you a short visit in his ordinances on earth, how have you blessed the time and the place, and pronounced it, amidst any other disadvantages of situation, to be the very gate of heaven! And is it so delightful to behold this gate, and will it not be much more so to enter into it! Is it so delightful to receive the visits of Jesus for an hour, and will it not be infinitely more so to dwell with him for ever! Lord, may you well say, when I dwell with thee, I shall dwell in holiness, for thou thyself art holiness; I shall dwell in love, for thou thyself art love; I shall dwell in joy, for thou art the fountain of joy, as thou art in the Father, and the Father in thee. Bid welcome to his approach, therefore, to take you at your word, and to fulfil to you that saying of his, on which your soul has so often rested with heavenly peace and pleasure: Father, I will that they whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me.

§ 8. Surely you may say in this view, "The sooner Christ comes the better." What though the residue of your days be cut off in the midst? What though you leave many expected pleasures in life untasted, and many schemes unaccomplished? Is it not enough, that what is taken from a mortal life shall be added to a glorious eternity; and that you shall spend those days and years in the presence and service of Christ in heaven, which you might otherwise have spent with him, and for him, in imperfect enjoyments and labours on earth?

§ 9. But your prospects reach not only beyond death, but beyond the separate state. For with regard to his final appearance to judgment our Lord says, Surely I come quickly, in the sense illustrated before: and so it will appear to us, if we compare this interval of time with the blissful eternity which is to succeed it; and, probably, if we compare it with those ages which have already passed, since the sun began to measure out to earth its days and its years. And will you not here also sing your part in the joyful anthem, Amen; even so, come, Lord Jesus!

§ 10. It is true, Christian, it is an awful day; a day in which nature shall be thrown into a confusion as yet unknown. No earthquake, no eruption of burning mountains, no desolation of cities by devouring flames, or of countries by overflowing rivers or seas, can give any just emblem of that dreadful day; when the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, as well as the earth, and all that is therein shall be burned up; when all nature shall flee away in amazement before the face of the universal Judge, and there shall be a great cry, far beyond what was known in the land of Egypt, when there was not a house in which there was not one dead. Your flesh may be ready to tremble at the view, yet your spirit must surely rejoice in God your Saviour. You may justly say, "Let this illustrious day come, even with all its horrors!" Yea, like the Christians described by the apostle, you may be looking for, and hastening to, that day of terrible brightness and universal doom. For your Lord will then come to vindicate the justice of those proceedings which have been in many instances so much obscured, and because they have been obscured, have been also blasphemed. He will come to display his magnificence, descending from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, taking his seat upon a throne infinitely exceeding that of earthly, or even of celestial, princes, clothed with his Father's glory and his own, surrounded with a numberless host of shining attendants, when coming to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe. His enemies shall also be produced to grace his triumph: the serpent shall be seen there rolling in the dust, and trodden under foot by him and by all his servants. Those who once condemned him, shall tremble at his presence; and those who bowed the knee before him in profane mockery, shall in wild despair call to the mountains to fall upon them, and to the rocks to hide them from the face of that Lamb of God, whom they once led away to the most inhuman slaughter.

§ 11. O Christian, does not your loyal heart bound at the thought? And are you not ready, even while you read these lines, to begin the victorious shout in which you are then to join? He justly expects, that your thoughts should be greatly elevated and impressed with the views of his triumph; but at the same time, he permits you to remember your own personal share in the joy and glory of that blessed day; and even now he has the view before him of what his power and love shall then accomplish for your salvation. And what shall it not accomplish? He shall come to break the bars of the grave, and to re-animate your sleeping clay. Your bodies must indeed be laid in the dust, and be lodged there as a testimony of God's displeasure against sin; against the first sin that ever was committed, from the sad consequences of which the dearest of his children cannot be exempted. But you shall then have an ear to hear the voice of the Son of God, and an eye to behold the lustre of his appearance; and shall shine forth like the sun arising in the clear heaven, which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber. Your soul shall be new dressed, to grace this high solemnity; and be clothed, not with the rags of mortality, but with the robes of glory: for he shall change this vile body, to fashion it like his own glorious body. And when you are thus royally arrayed, he shall confer public honours on you, and on all his people, before the assembled world. You may now, perhaps, be loaded with infamy, called by reproachful names, and charged with crimes, or with views, which your very soul abhors; but he will then bring forth your righteousness as the light, and your salvation as a lamp that burneth. Though you have been dishonoured by men, you shall be acknowledged by God; and though treated as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things, he will show you that he regards you as his treasure, in the day that he makes up his jewels. When he shall put away all the wicked of the earth like dross, you shall be pronounced righteous in that full assembly; and though indeed you have broken the divine law, and might in strict justice have been condemned, yet, being clothed with the righteousness of the great Redeemer, even that righteousness which is of God by faith, justice itself shall acquit you, and join with mercy in bestowing upon you a crown of life. Christ will confess you before men and angels, will pronounce you good and faithful servants, and call you to enter into the joy of your Lord: he will speak of you with endearment as his brethren, and will acknowledge the kindnesses which have been shown to you, as if he had received them in his own person. Yea, then shall you, O Christian, who may perhaps have sat in some of the lowest places in our assemblies, though (it may be) none of the rich and great of the earth would condescend to look upon, or to speak to you, be called to be assessors with Christ on his judgment-seat, and to join with him in the sentence he shall pass on wicked men and rebellious angels.

§ 12. Nor is it merely one day of glory and of triumph, but when the Judge arises and ascends to his Father's court, all the blessed shall ascend with him, and you among the rest: you shall ascend together with your Saviour, to his Father and your Father, to his God and your God. You shall go, to make your appearance in the New Jerusalem, in those new shining forms that you have received, which will no doubt be attended with a correspondent improvement of mind; and take up your perpetual abode in that fulness of joy, with which you shall be filled and satisfied in the presence of God, upon the consummation of that happiness, which the saints in the intermediate state have been wishing and waiting for. You shall go from the ruins of a dissolving world, to the new heavens and new earth, wherein righteousness for ever dwells. There all the number of God's elect shall be accomplished, and the happiness of each shall be completed. The whole society shall be presented before God, as the bride, the Lamb's wife, whom the eye of its celestial Bridegroom shall survey with unutterable delight, and confess to be without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; its character and state being just what he originally designed it to be, when he first engaged to give himself for it, to redeem it to God by his blood. So shall you ever be with each other, and with the Lord; and immortal ages shall roll away, and find you still unchanged: your happiness always the same, and your relish for it the same; or rather, ever growing, as your souls are approaching nearer and nearer to him, who is the source of happiness, and the centre of infinite perfection.

§ 13. And now, look round about upon earth, and single out, if you can, the enjoyments, or the hopes, for the sake of which you would say, Lord, delay thy coming, or for the sake of which you any more should hesitate to express your longing for it, and to cry, Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!

The Meditation and Prayer of a Christian, whose heart is warmed with these prospects.

"O blessed Lord! my soul is enkindled with these views, and rises to thee in the flame. Thou hast testified, thou comest quickly; and I repeat my joyful assent, Amen, even so, come, Lord Jesus! Come, for I long to have done with this low life; to have done with its burthens, its sorrows, and its snares! Come, for I long to ascend into thy presence, and to see the court thou art holding above!

"Blessed Jesus, death is transformed when I view it in this light. The king of terrors is seen no more as such, so near the King of glory and of grace. I hear with pleasure the sound of thy feet, approaching still nearer and nearer. Draw aside the veil whenever thou pleasest! Open the bars of my prison, that my eager soul may spring forth to thee, and cast itself at thy feet; at the feet of that Jesus, whom having not seen, I love; and in whom, though now I see thee not, yet believing, I rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory! Thou, Lord, shalt show me the path of life; thy hand shall guide me to thy blissful abode, where there is fulness of joy, and rivers of everlasting pleasure. Thou shalt assign me a habitation with thy faithful servants, whose separate spirits are now living with thee, while their bodies sleep in the dust. Many of them have been my companions in thy laborious work, and in the patience and tribulation of thy kingdom; my dear companions, and my brethren. O show me, blessed Saviour, how glorious and how happy thou hast made them! Show me, to what new forms of better life thou hast conducted them whom we call the dead! in what nobler and more extensive services thou hast employed them! that I may praise thee better than I now can, for thy goodness to them! And oh, give me to share with them in their blessings and their services, and to raise a song of grateful love, like that which they are breathing forth before thee!

"Yet, O my blessed Redeemer, even there will my soul be aspiring to a yet nobler and more glorious hope; and from this as yet unknown splendour and felicity, shall I be drawing new arguments to look and long for the day of thy final appearance. There shall I long more ardently than I now do, to see thy conduct vindicated, and thy triumph displayed; to see the dust of thy servants re-animated, and death, the last of their enemies and of thine, swallowed up in victory. I shall long for that superior honour that thou intendest me, and that complete bliss to which the whole body of thy people shall be conducted. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, will mingle itself with the songs of paradise, and sound from the tongues of all the millions of thy saints whom thy grace hath transplanted thither.

"In the mean time, O my divine Master, accept the homage which a grateful heart now pays thee, in a sense of the glorious hopes with which thou hast inspired it! It is thou that hast put this joy into it, and hast raised my soul to this glorious ambition, whereas I might otherwise have now been grovelling in the lowest trifles of time and sense, and been looking with horror on that hour, which is now the object of my most ardent wishes.

"Oh be with me always, even to the end of this mortal life! and give me, while waiting for thy salvation, to be doing thy commandments." May my loins be girded about, and my lamp burning; and mine ears be still watchful for the blessed signal of thine arrival; that my glowing soul may with pleasure spring to meet thee, and be strengthened by death to bear those visions of glory, under the ecstasies of which feeble mortality would now expire."

CHAP. XXX.

The Christian honouring God by his dying behaviour.

Reflections on the sincerity with which the preceding treatise has been given, § 1. The author's desires that it may prove useful to many, and assist the Christian in the hour of death and judgment, § 2, 3. With this view he is induced, 1. To lay down directions for serious cares, § 4. 2. To review the whole scheme of the way to the favour of God, and its application to the Church of Christ, § 5. 3. To form some particular godly resolutions, § 6. 4. To leave the world, to bear an honourable testimony to religion, § 7. 5. To give a solemn charge to survivors, friends, § 8, especially to continue in the faith of Christ, § 9, 10. To keep up a continual communion with God, § 11. And, 7. To commit the departing spirit to God, in the penitent, yet ease of gratitude and repentance, hope and charity, § 12, which are exemplified in the concluding meditation and prayer.

§ 1. THUS, my dear reader, I have endeavoured to lead you through a variety of circumstances; and those not fancied or imaginary, but such as do indeed occur in the human and Christian life. And I can truly and cheerfully say, that I have marked out to you the path which I myself have trod, and in which it is my desire still to go on. I have ventured my own everlasting interests on that foundation, on which I have directed you to adventure yours. What I have recommended as the grand business of your life, I desire to make the business of my own; and the most considerable enjoyments, which I expect or desire in the remaining days of my pilgrimage on earth, are such as I have directed you to seek, and endeavoured to assist you in attaining. Such love to God, such constant activity in his service, such pleasurable views of what lies beyond the grave, appear to me, (God is my witness,) a felicity incomparably beyond any thing else which can offer itself to our affection and pursuit; and I would not for ten thousand worlds resign my share in them, or consent even to the suspension of the delights which they afford, during the remainder of my abode here.

§ 2. I would humbly hope, through the divine blessing, that the hours you have spent in the review of these plain things may have turned to some profitable account, and that in consequence of what you have read, you have been either brought into the way of life and peace, or been induced to quicken your pace to it. Most heartily should I rejoice in being further useful to you, and that even to the last. Now there is one scene remaining, a scene through which you must infallibly pass; which has something in it so awful that I cannot but attempt doing a little to assist you in it; I mean, the dark valley of the shadow of death. I could earnestly wish, that for the credit of your profession, the comfort of your own soul, and the joy and edification of your surviving friends, you might die, not only safely, but honourably too: and therefore I would offer you a few parting advices. I am sensible, indeed, that Providence may determine the circumstances of your death in such a manner, as that you may have no opportunity of acting upon the hints I now give you. Some unexpected accident from without, or from within, may as it were whirl you to heaven before you are aware; and you may find yourself so suddenly there, that it may seem a translation, rather than a death. Or, it is possible, the force of a distemper may affect your understanding in such a manner, that you may be quite insensible of the circumstances in which you are; and so your dissolution (though others may see it visibly and certainly approaching) may be as great a surprise to you, as if you had died in full health.

§ 3. But as it is on the whole probable you may have a more sensible passage out of time into eternity, and as much may, in various respects, depend on your dying behaviour, give me leave to propose some plain directions with relation to it, to be practised, if God give you opportunity, and remind you of them. It may not be improper to look over the twenty-ninth chapter again, when you find the symptoms of any threatening disorder; and I the rather hope, that what I say may be useful to you, as methinks I find myself disposed to address you with something of that peculiar tenderness which we feel for a dying friend; to whom, as we expect that we shall speak to him no more, we send out, as it were, all our hearts in every word.

§ 4. I would advise then, in the first place, that, as soon as possible, you would endeavour to get rid of all further care with regard to your temporal concerns, by settling them in time in as reasonable and Christian a manner as you can. I could wish there may be nothing of that kind to hurry your mind when you are least able to bear it, or to distress or divide those who come after you. Do that which, in the presence of God, you judge most equitable, and which you verily believe will be most pleasing to him. Do it in as prudent and effectual a manner as you can: and then, consider the world as a place you have quite done with, and its affairs as nothing further to you, more than to one actually dead; unless as you may do any good to its inhabitants, while you yet continue among them; and may, by any circumstances in your last actions or words in life, leave a blessing behind you to those who have been your friends and fellow-travellers.

while you have been despatching that journey through it which you are now finishing.

§ 5. That you may be the more at leisure, and the better prepared for this, enter into some serious review of your own state, and endeavour to put your soul into as fit a posture as possible, for your solemn appearance before God. For a solemn thing indeed it is, to go into his immediate presence; to stand before him, not as a supplicant at the throne of his grace, but at his bar as a separate spirit, whose time of probation is over, and whose eternal state is to be immediately determined. Renew your humiliation before God for the imperfections of your life, though it has in the main been devoted to his service. Renew your application to the mercies of God as promised in the covenant of grace, and to the blood of Christ as the blessed channel in which they flow. Resign yourself entirely to the divine disposal and conduct, as willing to serve God, either in this world or the other, as he shall see fit. And, sensible of your sinfulness on the one hand, and of the divine wisdom and goodness on the other, summon up all the fortitude of your soul to bear, as well as you can, whatever his afflicting hand may further lay upon you, and to receive the last stroke of it, as one who would maintain the most entire subjection to the great and good Father of spirits.

§ 6. Whatever you suffer, endeavour to show yourself an example of patience. Let that amiable grace have its perfect work; and since it has so little more to do, let it close the scene nobly. Let there not be a murmuring word; and that there may not, watch against every repining thought; and when you feel any thing of that kind arising, look by faith upon a dying Saviour, and ask your own heart, "Was not his cross much more painful than the bed on which I lie? Was not his situation among blood-thirsty enemies infinitely more terrible, than mine amidst the tenderness and care of so many affectionate friends? Did not the heavy load of my sins press him in a much more overwhelming manner, than I am pressed by the load of these afflictions? And yet he bore all as a lamb that is brought to the slaughter." Let the remembrance of his sufferings be a means to sweeten yours; yea, let it cause you to rejoice, when you are called to bear the cross for a little while, before you wear the crown. Count it all joy, that you have an opportunity yet once more of honouring God by your patience, which is now acting its last part, and will in a few days, perhaps in a few hours, be superseded by complete and everlasting blessedness. And I am willing to hope, that in these views you will not only suppress all passionate complaints, but that your mouth will be filled with the praises of God; and that you will be speaking to those that are about you, not only of his justice, but of his goodness too. So that you will be enabled to communicate your inward joys in such a manner, as may be a lively and edifying comment upon those words of the apostle, Tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; even a hope which maketh not ashamed, while the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us.

§ 7. And now, my dear friend, now is the time, when it is especially expected from you that you bear an honourable testimony to religion. Tell those that are about you, as well as you can, (for you will never be able fully to express it,) what comfort and support you have found in it. Tell them, how it has brightened the darkest circumstances of your life; tell them, how it now reconciles you to the near views of death. Your words will carry with them a peculiar weight at such a season; there will be a kind of eloquence even in the infirmities with which you are struggling, while you give them utterance; and you will be heard with attention, with tenderness, with credit. And therefore, when the time of your departure is at hand, with unaffected freedom breathe out your joy, if you then feel (as I hope you will) a holy joy and delight in God. Breathe out, however, your inward peace and serenity of mind, if you be then peaceful and serene: others will mark it, and be encouraged to tread the steps which lead to so happy an end. Tell them what you feel of the vanity of the world, and they may learn to regard it less: tell them what you feel of the substantial supports of the gospel, and they may learn to value it more: for they cannot but know, that they must lie down on a dying bed too, and must then need all the relief which the gospel itself can give them.

§ 8. And to enforce the conviction the more, give a solemn charge to those that are about you, that they spend their lives in the service of God, and govern themselves by the principles of real religion. You may remember, that Joshua, and David, and other good men, did so; when they perceived that the days drew near in which they should die. And you know not how the admonitions of a dying friend, or (as it may be with respect to some) of a dying parent, may impress those who have disregarded what you and others may have said to them before. At least, make the trial; and die labouring to glorify God, to save souls, and generously to sow the seeds of goodness and happiness in a world, where you have no more harvests to reap. Perhaps they may spring up in a plentiful crop, when the clods of the valley are covering your body; but if not, God will approve it; and the angels that wait around your bed to receive your departing soul, will look upon each other with marks of approbation in their countenance, and own that this is to expire like a Christian, and to make a glorious improvement of mortality.

§ 9. And in this last address to your fellow-mortals, whoever they are that Providence brings near you, be sure that you tell them, how entirely and how cheerfully your hopes and dependence in this season of the last extremity are fixed, not upon your own merits and obedience, but on what the great Redeemer has done and suffered for sinners. Let them see, that you die as it were at the foot of the cross; nothing will be so comfortable to yourself, nothing so edifying to them. Let the name of Jesus, therefore, be in your mouth, while you are able to speak; and when you can speak no longer, let it be in your heart, and endeavour that the last act of your soul, while it continues in the body, may be an act of humble faith in Christ. Come unto God by him; enter into that which is within the veil, as with the blood of sprinkling fresh upon you. It is an awful thing for such a sinner (as you, my Christian friend, with all the virtues the world may have admired, know yourself to be) to stand before that infinitely pure and holy Being, who has seen all your ways, and all your heart, and has a perfect knowledge of every mixture of imperfection which has attended the best of your duties; but venture in that way, and you will find it both safe and pleasant.

§ 10. Once more, to give you comfort in a dying hour, and to support your feeble steps while you are travelling through this dark and painful way, take the word of God as a staff in your hand. Let books, and mortal friends, now do their last office for you. Call, if you can, some experienced Christian, who has felt the power of the word of God upon his own heart; and let him bring the Scripture, and turn you to some of those precious promises, which have been the food and rejoicing of his own soul. It is with this view, that I may carry the good office I am now engaged in as far as possible, I shall here give you a collection of a few such admirable scriptures, each of them infinitely more valuable than thousands of gold and silver. And to convince you of the degree in which I esteem them, I will take the freedom to add, that I desire they may (if God give an opportunity) be read over to me, as I lie on my dying bed, with short intervals between them, that I may pause upon each, and renew something of that delightful relish, which, I bless God, I have often found in them. May your soul and mine be then composed to a sacred silence, whatever be the commotion of animal nature, while the voice of God speaks to us, in language which he spake to his servants of old, or in which he instructed them how they should speak to him, in circumstances of the greatest extremity.

§ 11. Can any more encouragement be wanting, when he says, Fear not, for I am with thee, be not dismayed, for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee, yea, I will help thee, yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness. And he is not a man, that he should lie, or the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it; or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? This God is our God for ever and ever; he will be our guide even unto death. Therefore, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord. O continue thy loving-kindness unto them that know thee, and thy righteousness to the upright in heart: for with thee is the fountain of life; in thy light shall we see light. Thou wilt show me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy, at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore. As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness. For I know in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep what I have committed to him until that day. Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth; my flesh also shall rest in hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, those also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. I give unto my sheep eternal life, saith Jesus, the good shepherd,) and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. This is the will of him that sent me, that every one that believeth on me should have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day. Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you: I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you to myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. Go, tell my brethren, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God. Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me; that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them. He that testifieth these things saith, Surely, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus! O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

§ 12. Thus may that God, who knows the souls of his children in all their adversities, and in whose sight the death of his saints is precious, cheer and support you and me in those last extremities of nature! May he add us to the happy number of those who have been more than conquerors in death! And may he give us those supplies of his Spirit, which may enable us to pour out our departing souls in such sentiments as those I would now suggest; though we should be no longer able to utter words, or to understand them if they were to be read to us! Let us at least review them with all proper affections now, and lay up one prayer more for that awful moment! Oh that this, and all we have ever offered with regard to it, may then come in remembrance before God!

A Meditation and Prayer suited to the case of a dying Christian.

"O THOU Supreme Ruler of the visible and invisible worlds! thou Sovereign of life and of death, of earth and of heaven! blessed be thy name, I have often been taught to seek thee. And now once more do I pour out my soul, my departing soul, unto thee. Bow down thy gracious ear, O God, and let my cry come before thee with acceptance!

"The hour is come, when thou wilt separate me from this world, with which I have been so long and so familiarly acquainted, and lead me to another, as yet unknown. Enable me, I beseech thee, to make the exchange as becomes a child of Abraham, who, being called of thee to receive an inheritance, obeyed, and went out, though he knew not particularly whither he went; as becomes a child of God, who knows, that through sovereign grace, it is his Father's good pleasure to give him the kingdom!

"I acknowledge, O Lord, the justice of that sentence by which I am expiring; and own thy wisdom and goodness, in appointing my journey through this gloomy vale which is now before me. Help me to turn it into the happy occasion of honouring thee, and adorning my profession! and I will bless the pangs, by which thou art glorified, and this mortal and sinful part of my nature is dissolved.

"Gracious Father, I would not quit this earth of thine, and this house of clay in which I have sojourned during my abode upon the face of it, without my grateful acknowledgments to thee, for all that abundant goodness which thou hast caused to pass before me here. With my dying breath I bear witness to thy faithful care, I have wanted no good thing. I thank thee, O my God, that this guilty, forfeited, unprofitable life was so long spared: that it hath still been maintained by such a rich variety of thy bounty. I thank thee, that thou hast made this beginning of my existence so pleasant to me. I thank thee, for the mercies of my days and nights, of my months and years, which are now come to their period; I thank thee for the mercies of my infancy, and for those of my riper age; for all the agreeable friends whom thou hast given me in this house of my pilgrimage, the living and the dead, for all the help I have received from others, and for all the opportunities which thou hast given me of being helpful to the bodies and souls of my brethren of mankind.—Surely goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life, and I have reason to rise a thankful guest from the various and pleasant entertainments with which my table has been furnished by thee. Nor shall I have reason to repine or to grieve at quitting them: for, O my God, are thy bounties exhausted? I know that they are not. I will not wrong thy goodness and thy faithfulness so much as to imagine, that because I am going from this earth, I am going from happiness. I adore thy mercy, that thou hast taught me to entertain nobler views through Jesus thy Son.—I bless thee with all the powers of my nature, that I ever heard of his name, and heard of his death: and would fain exert a more vigorous act of thankful adoration than in this broken state I am capable of, while I am extolling thee for the riches of thy grace manifested in him; for his instructions and his example, for his blood and his righteousness, and for that blessed Spirit of thine which thou hast given me, to turn my sinful heart unto thyself, and to bring me into the bonds of thy covenant; of that covenant which is ordered in all things and sure, and which this death, though now separating my soul from my body, shall never be able to dissolve.

"I bless thee, O Lord, that I am not dying in an unregenerate and impenitent state; but that thou didst graciously awaken and convince me; that thou didst renew and sanctify my heart, and didst, by thy good Spirit, work in it an unfeigned faith, a real repentance, and the beginning of a divine life. I thank thee for ministers and ordinances: I thank thee for my sabbaths and my sacrament days; for the weekly and monthly refreshments which they gave me; I thank thee for the fruits of Canaan which were sent me in the wilderness, and are now sent me on the brink of Jordan. I thank thee for thy blessed word, and for those exceeding rich and precious promises of it which now lie as a cordial warm at my heart in this chilling hour; promises of support in death, and of glory beyond it, and of the resurrection of my body to everlasting life. O my God, I firmly believe them all, great and wonderful as they are, and am waiting for the accomplishment of them through Jesus Christ, in whom they are all yea and amen. Remember thy word unto thy servant, on which thou hast caused me to hope! I covenanted with thee not for worldly enjoyments, which thy love taught me comparatively to despise but for eternal life, as the gift of thy free grace through Jesus Christ my Lord: and now permit me in his name to enter my humble claim to it! Permit me to consign this departing spirit to thine hand; for thou hast redeemed it, O Lord God of truth! I am thine: save me and make me happy.

"But may I indeed presume to say, I am thine? O God, now I am standing on the borders of both worlds, now I view things as in the light of thy presence and of eternity, how unworthy do I appear, that I should be taken to dwell with thy angels and saints in glory! Alas, I have reason to look back with deep humiliation on a poor, unprofitable, sinful life, in which I have daily been deserving to be cast into hell. But I have this one comfortable reflection, that I have fled to the cross of Christ; and I now renew my application to it. To think of appearing before God in such an imperfect righteousness as my own, were ten thousand times worse than death. No, Lord! I come unto thee as a sinner, but as a sinner who has believed in thy Son for pardon and life: I fall down before thee as a guilty polluted wretch; but thou hast made him to be unto thy people for wisdom and righteousness, for sanctification and redemption. Let me have my lot among the followers of Jesus! Treat me as thou treatest those who are his friends and his brethren; for thou knowest my soul has loved him, and trusted him, and solemnly ventured itself on the security of his gospel. And I know in whom I have believed. The infernal lion may attempt to dismay me in the awful passage: but I rejoice that I am in the hands of the good Shepherd; and I defy all my spiritual enemies, in a cheerful dependence on his faithful care. I lift up my eyes and my heart to him, who was dead and is alive again; and behold, he lives for evermore, and hath the keys of death and of the unseen world. Blessed Jesus, I die by thine hand, and I fear no harm from the hand of a Saviour! I fear not that death which is allotted to me by the hand of my dearest Lord, who himself died to make it safe and happy. I come, Lord, I come not only with a willing, but with a joyful, consent. I thank thee, that thou remembrest me for good; that thou art breaking my chains, and calling me to the glorious liberty of the children of God. I thank thee, that thou wilt no longer permit me to live at a distance from thine arms; but, after this long absence, wilt have me at home, at home for ever.

"My feeble nature faints in the view of that glory, which is now dawning upon me: but thou knowest how, gracious Lord, to let it in upon my soul by just degrees, and to make thy strength perfect in my weakness. Once more, for the last time, would I look down on this poor world which I am going to quit, and breathe out my dying vows for its prosperity, and that of thy church in it. I have loved it, O Lord, as a living member of the body; and I love it to the last. I humbly beseech thee, therefore, that thou wilt guard it, and purify it, and unite it more and more! Send down more of thy blessed Spirit upon it, even the Spirit of wisdom, of holiness, and of love; till in due time the wilderness be turned into a garden of the Lord, and all flesh shall see thy salvation!

"And as for me, bear me, O my heavenly Father, on the wings of everlasting love, to that peaceful, that holy, that joyous abode, which thy mercy has prepared for me, and which the blood of my Redeemer hath purchased! Bear me to the general assembly and church of the first-born, to the innumerable company of angels, and to the spirits of just men made perfect! And whatever this flesh may suffer, let my steady soul be delightfully fixed on that glory to which it is rising! Let faith perform its last office in an honourable manner! Let my few remaining moments on earth be spent for thy glory; and so let me ascend, with love in my heart and praise on my faltering tongue, to the world where love and praise shall be complete! Be this my last song on earth, which I am going to tune in heaven—Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever! Amen."

A

PLAIN AND SERIOUS ADDRESS

TO THE

MASTER OF A FAMILY,

ON THE IMPORTANT SUBJECT OF FAMILY RELIGION.

A

PLAIN AND SERIOUS ADDRESS.

SIR,

You may easily apprehend, that the many interruptions to which personal visits are liable, make it difficult for ministers to find a convenient time, in which they may apply themselves suitably and largely to those committed to their care; or at least, if they resolve to do it, will necessarily make their progress through large congregations very slow. I therefore take this method of visiting you while alone, and of addressing you on the very important subject of Family Religion. For your own sake, and the sake of those dearest to you, I entreat you to give me a calm attentive hearing. And I would particularly desire, that if it be by any means practicable, (as with a little contrivance and resolution I hope it may,) you would secure one hour on the morning of the Lord's day after you receive it, not merely to run over this letter in a cursory manner, but deliberately to weigh and consider it, and to come to some determination, as in the sight of God, that you will, or that you will not, comply with the petition which it brings; if I may not rather say, with the demand which in his name it makes upon you.

As I purpose to deliver it to every master of a family under my stated care, or to every mistress where there is no master, (that no offence of any kind may be taken, which it is in my power to prevent,) I know it will come to many, who have long been exemplary for their diligence and zeal in the duties I am recommending; to many, whom their own experience hath instructed in the pleasures and advantages which flow from them; an experience, which will enforce them more effectually than any thing which it is possible for me to say. Such will, I hope, by what they read, be confirmed in pursuing the good resolutions they have taken, and the good customs they have formed; and will also be excited more earnestly to endeavour to contribute towards introducing the like into other families over which they have any influence, and especially into those which may branch out from their own, by the settlement of children or servants. In this view, as well as to awaken their thankfulness to divine grace, which hath inclined them to the discharge of their duty in so great, yet so frequently neglected, an article of it, I hope the heads of praying families will not peruse this letter in vain. But it is intended as an address to those, who have hitherto lived in the omission of it: and if there were but one such master of a family under my care, I would gladly submit to the labour in which I am now engaging for his sake alone. To such therefore I now turn myself; and oh that divine grace might engage every one of such a character to hear me with attention, and might enforce upon his conscience the weight of reasons, the evidence of which the lowest may receive, and to which it is impossible that the highest should find any thing solid to object!

Oh my dear friend, whoever you are, (for I know no one under my care to whom I may not address that appellation,) give me leave to tell you plainly, that while I write this I have that awakening scripture in my view: "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the families that call not on thy name." I appeal to you as a man of ordinary sense and understanding, (as it needs no more,) to judge whether this do not strongly imply, that it may be taken for granted every family, which is not a heathen family, which is not quite ignorant of the living and true God, will call upon his name. Well may it then pain my heart, to think that there should be a professedly Christian family, whom this dreadful character suits. Well may it pain my heart, to think of the divine fury, which may be poured out on the heads and on the members of it: and well may it make me desirous to do my utmost, to secure you and yours from every appearance, from every possibility, of such danger. Excuse the earnestness with which I may address you. I really fear, lest while you delay, the fire of the divine displeasure should fall upon you: and as I adore the patience of God in having thus long suspended the storm, I am anxious about every hour's delay, lest it should fall the heavier.

I will therefore, as plainly and seriously as I can, endeavour to convince you of your duty, if peradventure you are not already secretly convinced of it; as truly I believe most who neglect it, under the regular administration of gospel ordinances, are.—I will then touch on a few of those objections, which have been pleaded to excuse in some degree so shameful an omission.—And this will naturally lead me to conclude with a few hints, which may serve by way of direction, for the proper introduction and discharge of the services to which I am endeavouring to engage you.

I mean not to handle the subject at large, which would afford abundant matter for a considerable volume; as indeed several volumes have been written upon it, by divines of different denominations, who, however various in other opinions, agree here; as what intelligent Christian can disagree? But I mean to suggest a few plain things, which it is evident you have not sufficiently considered, and which if duly weighed, may, by the blessing of God, answer my present purpose. Now the arguments I shall propose will be such, that if you will not regard them, little is to be hoped from any other: for surely the mind of man can discover none of greater and more universal importance; though I readily acknowledge, that many others might enforce them with greater energy and address. Yet if the desire, the most earnest desire, of succeeding can add any of the proper arts of persuasion, they will not be wanting here. And I would fain speak, as one who considers, how much of the glory of God, how much of your own happiness, and that of your dear children, for time and eternity, depends on the success of what I am now to lay before you.

What I desire and entreat of you is, that you would honour and acknowledge God in your families, by calling them together every day, to hear some part of his word read to them, and to offer, for a few minutes at least, your united confessions, prayers, and praises to him. And is this a cause that should need to be pleaded at large by a great variety of united motives? Truly the petition seems so reasonable, and a compliance with it from one who has not quite renounced religion might seem so natural, that one would think the bare proposing it might suffice. Yet experience tells us, it is much otherwise. This letter will come into the hands of some, who, though they maintain a public profession of religion, have been again and again exhorted to it in vain, and that perhaps for succeeding years. I might say a great deal to upbraid such, especially, on account of this neglect; but I rather choose to entreat to the future performance of the duty: humbly hoping, that, criminal as former negligence has been, a gracious God will mercifully forgive it, to those who repent and desire to reform.

And oh that I could engage you to this, by representing in the plainest, kindest, and most affectionate manner, the reasonableness and advantage of this duty! For if it be reasonable, if it be evidently advantageous, there are numberless general precepts of Scripture, which must comprehend and enforce it, if it were less immediately supported than it is by particular passages; which yet, as I shall presently show, do many of them strongly recommend it to us.

Consider, Sir, for I address myself to every particular person, seriously consider the apparent reasonableness of family religion. Must not your consciences presently tell you, it is fit that persons who receive so many mercies together, should acknowledge them together? Can you in your own mind be satisfied, that you and your nearest relatives should pay no joint homage to that God, who hath set you in your family, and who hath given to you, and to the several members of it, so many domestic enjoyments? your Creator and theirs, your Preserver and theirs, your daily Benefactor and theirs? Can it be right, if you have any sense of these things each of you in your own hearts, that the sense of them should be concealed and smothered there, and that you should never join in your grateful acknowledgments to him? Can you imagine it reasonable, that when you have a constant dependence upon him for so many mercies, without the concurrence of which your family would be a scene of misery, you should never present yourselves together in his presence, to ask them at his hand? Upon what principles is public worship to be recommended and urged, if not by such as have their proportionable weight here?

Indeed the force of these considerations hath not only been known and acknowledged by the people of God in all ages; we have not only Noah and Abraham, Joshua and David, Job and Daniel, each under a much darker dispensation than ours, as examples of it; but we may venture to say, that wherever there has been a profession of any kind of religion, it has been brought into private houses as well as public temples. The poor heathens, as we certainly know, from the remaining monuments of them, had their lares and their penates, which were household images, some of them in private chapels, and others about the common hearth, where the family used to worship them by frequent prayers and sacrifices. And the brass, and wood, and stone, of which they consisted, shall, as it were, cry out against you, shall rise up against you and condemn you, if while you call yourselves the worshippers of the one living and eternal God, and boast in the revelation you have received by his prophets and by his Son, you presume to omit an homage, which the stupid worshippers of such vanities as these failed not to present to them, while they called them their gods. Be persuaded then, I beseech you, to be consistent in your conduct. Either give up all pretences to religion, or maintain a steady and uniform regard to it, at home as well as abroad, in the family, as well as in the closet, or at church. But the reasonableness of this duty, and the obligations which bind you in conscience to the practice of it, will further appear, if you consider,

The many advantages which will, by the divine blessing, attend a proper discharge of it. And here, I would more particularly represent the good influence, which family devotions are likely to have, —upon the young persons committed to your care,— upon your own hearts,—and upon the advancement of a general reformation, and the propagation of religion to those that are yet unborn.

Consider, in the first place, what is most obvious, the happy influence which the duty I am recommending might have upon the young members of your family, the children and servants committed to your care. For I now consider you as a parent and a master. The father of a family is a phrase, that comprehends both these relations; and with great propriety, as humanity obliges us to endeavour to take a parental care of all under our roof. And, indeed,

You ought to consider your servants, in this view, with a tender regard. They are probably in the flower of life, for that is the age which is commonly spent in service: and you should recollect how possible it is, that this may be, if rightly improved, the best opportunity their whole life may afford them for learning religion, and being brought under the power of it. If your servants are already instructed in it, by being brought up in families where these duties have been maintained; let them not, if they should finally miscarry, have cause to impute it to you, and to testify before God, in the day of their condemnation, "that it was under your roof that they learnt the neglect and forgetfulness of God, and of all that their pious parents, perhaps in a much inferior station of life to you, had in earlier days been attempting to teach them; to teach them, in moments taken from labour, or from repose almost necessary for their subsistence." On the other hand, if they come to you quite ignorant of religion, (as, if they come from prayerless families, it is very probable that they do,) have compassion upon them, I entreat you, and endeavour to give them those advantages which they never yet had; and which it is too probable, as things are generally managed, they never will have, if you will not afford them.

But I would especially, if I might be allowed to borrow the pathetic words of Job, entreat you by the children of your own body. I would now, as it were, present them all before you, and beseech you by all the bowels of paternal affection, (which I have myself so strongly felt,) that to all the other tokens of tenderness and love, you would not refuse to add this, without which many of the rest may be worse than in vain.

Give me leave to plead with you as the instruments of introducing them into being. Oh remember, it is indeed a debased and corrupted nature you have conveyed to them. Consider, that the world, into which you have been the means of bringing them, is a place in which they are surrounded with many temptations, and in which, as they advance in life, they must expect many more; so that, in plain terms, it is on the whole much to be feared, that they will perish in the ignorance and forgetfulness of God, if they do not learn from you to love and serve him. For how can it be expected they should learn this at all, if you give them no advantages for receiving and practising the lesson at home?

And let me further urge and entreat you to remember, that these dear children, whose tender age, and perhaps amiable forms and dispositions, might attract the affection and solicitude of strangers, are committed to your especial and immediate care by God their Creator. And he has made them thus dependent upon you, and others that have, in their infancy and childhood, the care of them, that there might be hereafter a better opportunity of forming their minds, and of influencing them to a right temper and conduct. And can this by any means be effectually done, if you do not at proper times call them together, to attend to the instructions of the word of God, and to join in solemn prayers and supplications to him? At least, is it possible it should be done any other way with equal advantage, if this be not added to the rest?

Family worship is a most proper way of teaching children religion, as you teach them language, by insensible degrees; a little one day and a little another; for to them line must be upon line, and precept upon precept. They may learn to conceive aright of the divine perfections, when they hear you daily acknowledging and adoring them: their hearts may be early touched with pious remorse for sin, when they hear your confessions poured out before God: they will know what mercies they are to ask for themselves, by observing what turn your petitions take: your intercessions may diffuse into their minds a spirit of love to mankind, a concern for the interest of the church, and of their country; and, what is not I think by any means to be neglected, sentiments of loyalty towards our sovereign and his family, when they hear you daily invoking the divine blessing upon them: and your solemn thanksgivings for the bounties of Providence, and for benefits of a spiritual nature, may affect their hearts with those gracious impressions towards the gracious Author of all, which may excite in their little breasts love to him, the most noble and genuine principle of all true and acceptable religion. Thus they may become Christians by insensible degrees, and grow in the knowledge and love of the truth, as they do in stature.

By observing your reverent and solemn deportment, (as reverent and solemn I hope it will at such seasons be,) they may get some notion of an invisible being, before they are of age to understand the definition of the term God; and may feel their minds secretly impressed with a humble awe and veneration, before they can explain to you their sense of it. And whatever instructions you give them concerning his nature and his will, and the way of obtaining his favour by Jesus Christ, all your admonitions relating to the importance of that invisible world we are going to, and the necessary preparation for it, will be greatly illustrated by the tenor of your daily devotions, as well as by those excellent lessons which the word of God, when solemnly read to them morning and evening, will afford. Nor is it by any means to be forgotten, that while they hear themselves, and their own concerns, mentioned before God in prayer, while they hear you earnestly pleading for the divine blessing upon them, (especially if it be in expressions wisely varied, as some particular occurrences in their lives and in yours may require,) it may very probably be a means of moving their impressible hearts; as it may powerfully convince them of your deep and tender concern for their good, and may add great weight to the instructions you may address to them: so that it may appear, even while you are praying for them, that God hears. And indeed I have known some instances of excellent persons, who have dated their conversion to God, even after they had begun visibly to degenerate, from the prayers, from the serious and pathetic prayers, which they have heard their pious fathers, perhaps I might add their pious mothers, presenting before God on their account.

Indeed, were this duty properly attended to, it might be expected that all Christian families would, according to their respective sizes and circumstances, become nurseries of piety; and you would see in the most convincing view, the wisdom of Providence, in making human infants so much more dependent on their parents, and so much more incapable to shift for themselves, than the offspring of inferior creatures are.

Let me then entreat you, my dear friend, to look on your children the very next time you see them, and ask your own heart, how you can answer it to God and to them, that you deprive them of such advantages as these: advantages, without which, it is to be feared, your care of them in other respects will turn to but little account, should they be ever so prosperous in life. For what is prosperity in life without the knowledge, and fear, and love of God? what, but the poison of the soul, which swells and kills it? what, but the means of making it more certainly, more deeply, more intolerably miserable, when all its transient and empty amusements are passed away like a dream when one awaketh? In short, not to mention the happy influence it may have on their temporal affairs, by drawing down the divine blessing, and by forming their minds to those virtues which pave the way to wealth and reputation, health and contentment, which make no enemies, and attract many friends; it is, with respect to the eternal world, the greatest cruelty to your children, thus to neglect giving them those advantages, which no other cares in education itself, exclusive of these, can afford; and it is impossible you should ever be able to give them any other equivalent. If you do your duty in this respect, they will have reason to bless you living and dying; and if you neglect it, take care that you and they come not, in consequence of that neglect, into a world, where (horrid as the thought may now seem) you will for ever be cursing each other. And thus I am fallen insensibly, because so naturally, from what I was saying of the concern and interest of those under your care, to your own, so far as it may be distinguished from theirs.

Let me therefore press you to consider, how much your own interest is concerned in the matter; the whole of your interest, both spiritual and temporal.

Your spiritual interest is infinitely the greatest, and therefore I will begin with that. And here let me seriously ask you, Do you not need those advantages for religion which the performance of family duty will give you, added to those of a more secret and a more public nature, if peradventure they are regarded by you? These instructions, these adorations, these confessions, these supplications, these intercessions, these thanksgivings, which may be so useful to your children and servants, may they not be useful to yourselves? May not your own hearts have some peculiar advantage for being impressed, when you are the mouth of others in these domestic devotions, beyond what in a private station of life it is otherwise possible you should have? Oh, these lessons of religion to your own souls, every morning and evening, might be (if I may be allowed the expression) either the seed or foretaste of salvation to you. Nay, the remoter influence they may have on your conduct in other respects, and at other times, when considered merely in the general as religious exercises performed by you in your family, is to be recollected as an argument of vast importance.

A sense of common decency would engage you, if you pray with your family, to avoid a great many evils, which would appear doubly evil in a father or a master, who kept up such religious exercises in his house. I will not now, Sir, speak of yourself, for I would not offend by supposing any thing grossly bad of you. But do you imagine, that if reading the Scripture and family prayer were introduced into the houses of some of your neighbours, drunkenness and lewdness, and cursing and swearing, and profaning the Lord's day, would not, like so many evil demons, be quickly driven out? The master of the family would not for shame indulge them, if he had nothing more than the form of duty kept up; and his reformation, though only external, and at first on a kind of constraint, would carry with it the reformation of many more, who have such a dependence on his favour as they would not sacrifice, though, by a madness very prevalent among the children of men, they can venture to sacrifice their souls to every trifle.

And may it not perhaps be your more immediate concern, to recollect, that if you prayed with your family, you would yourself be more careful to abstain from all appearance of evil? You would find out a way to suppress that turbulency of passion, which may now be ready to break out before you are aware, and other imprudences, in which your own heart would check you by saying, "Does this become one, that is by and by to kneel down with his domestics, his children and servants, and adore God with them, and pray against every thing which displeases God, and makes us unfit for the heavenly world?" I will not say this will cure every thing that is wrong; but I believe you are already persuaded, it would often have a very good influence. And I fear, it is the secret desire of indulging some irregularities without such a restraint, that, infamous as such a victory is, hath driven out family prayer from several houses where it was once maintained, and hath excluded it from others. But if you have any secret disinclination of heart rising against it in this view, it becomes you seriously to take the alarm; for, to speak plainly, I have hardly known a blacker symptom of damnation, than a fear of being restrained in the commission of sin.

After this it may seem a matter of smaller importance, to urge the good influence which a proper discharge of family duty may have upon your own temporal affairs; both by restraining you from many evils, and engaging you to a proper conduct yourself, and also by impressing your children and servants with a sense of religion. And it is certain, the more careful they are of their duty to God, the more likely they will be to perform their duty to you. Nor can any thing strengthen your natural authority among them more, than your presiding in such solemnities, if supported by a suitable conduct. But I would hope, nobler motives will have a superior weight. And therefore, waving this topic, I entreat you, as the last argument, to consider,

The influence it may have on a general reformation, and on the propagation of religion to those who are yet unborn. You ought to consider every child and servant in your family, as one who may be a source, not only of life, but (in some degree) of character and happiness, to those who are hereafter to arise into being; yea, whose conduct may in part affect those that are to descend from them in the following generation. If they grow up, while under your eye, ignorant of religion, they will certainly be much less capable of teaching it to others; for these are the years of discipline, and if they be neglected now, there is little probability of their receiving after-instruction. Nor is this all the evil consequence; for it is highly probable, that they will think themselves authorized by your example to a like negligence, and so you may entail heathenism under disregarded Christian forms, on your descendants and theirs in ages to come. Whereas your diligence and zeal might be remembered, and imitated by them, perhaps when you are in your grave; and the stock which they first received from you, might with rich improvements be communicated to great numbers, so that one generation after another might learn to fear and serve the Lord. On the whole, God only knows what a church may arise from one godly family, what a harvest may spring up from a single seed; and on the other hand, it is impossible to say, how many souls may at length perish by the treacherous neglect of a single person, and to speak plainly, by your own.

These, Sir, are the arguments I had to plead with you, and which I have selected out of many more; and now give me leave seriously to ask you, as in the presence of God, whether there be not, on the whole, an unanswerable force in them? And if there be, what follows, but that you immediately yield to that force, and set up family worship this very day. For, methinks, I would hardly thank you for a resolution to do it to-morrow, so little do I expect from that resolution. How can you excuse yourself in the continued omission? Bring the matter before God; he will be the final judge of it; and if you cannot debate the question as in his presence, it is a sign of a bad cause, and of a bad heart too; which is conscious of the badness of the cause, and yet will not give it up, nor comply with a duty, of your obligations to which you are secretly convinced, and yet in effect say, "I will go on in this sin, and venture the consequence." Oh it is a dreadful venture! and will be found in effect provoking the Lord to jealousy, as if you were stronger than he.

But perhaps there may arise in your mind some objections, which may in some degree break the force of this conviction, and which in that view it may be expedient for me to discuss a little before I dismiss the subject, and close my address to you. You may perhaps be ready to object,

1. "That family prayer is not in so many words commanded in Scripture; and, therefore, however expedient in some cases, it cannot be so universal and so important a duty, as we represent it."

I answer plainly, that it is strongly recommended in Scripture, and consequently commanded; as there are precepts which plainly include, though they do not particularly express, it. And I appeal to yourself in this matter. When God is represented as giving this reason to his angels for a particular favour to be bestowed on Abraham, because he knew that he would command his children and household to keep the way of the Lord, that he might obtain the promised blessing; did he not intend to declare his approbation of the care he took to support religion in his family? And can it be supported in a total neglect of prayer?—Again, do you not in your conscience think, that the Spirit of God meant that we should take Joshua for an example, when he tells us, that he resolved, and publicly declared the resolution, that he and his house would serve the Lord; which must express a religious care of his family too?—Do you not believe, that the blessed Spirit meant it as a commendation of Job, that he offered sacrifices for all his children, sacrifices undoubtedly attended with prayers, when he feared lest the gaiety of their hearts in their successive feastings might have betrayed them into some moral evil?—And was it not to do an honour to David, that the Scripture informs us, that he went home to bless his household; that is, to perform some solemn act of domestic worship, when he had been spending the whole day in public devotions?—What think you of the example of Daniel, who prayed in his house, and with his windows open toward Jerusalem, and would rather run the risk of being cast into the den of lions, and being torn in pieces by those cruel beasts, than he would either omit or conceal it?—And do you think, that when our blessed Lord, whose whole life was employed in religious services, so frequently took his disciples apart to pray with them, that he did not intend this as an example to us, of praying with those under our special care, or in other words, with the members of our own family, who are most immediately so?—Or can you, by any imaginable artifice, delude yourself so far as to think, that when we are solemnly charged and commanded to pray with all prayer and supplication, this kind of prayer is not included in that apostolical injunction?

On the whole, the question lies in a very little room. Have I proved by what I have said before, that family prayer is a reasonable thing? that it has a tendency to promote the honour of God, and the interest of religion, and your own salvation, with that of those who are committed to your care? If you are really convinced of this, then all the general precepts which require the love of God and your neighbour, all that recommend a regard to the interest of Christ, and a concern for our own everlasting happiness, bind it in this connexion as certainly upon us, as if it had been commanded in words as express as those in which we are required to enter into our closets, and there to pray to our Father which is in secret.*

And I will further add, that if the care of family religion be (as I suppose every man's conscience will secretly testify that it is) a proper part of a religious education, then all those many passages of Scripture which recommend this, must in all reason be understood as including that. But perhaps you may be ready to plead,

2. "That it is generally neglected."

Yet scarce can you have made or thought of this objection, but you will see at the first glance, that this must turn upon yourself, rather than on the whole appear favourable to your cause. It is the reproach of our age, if it be indeed generally neglected. And if it be generally excluded from the families of the rich and the great, (who too frequently set the fashion, where they are most apt to set it wrong,) let it rather awaken a generous indignation in our breast, to think that it is so excluded. At least, let it awaken a holy zeal to exert ourselves so much the more, as it is certain that no association in vice can secure those that join in it: for it is expressly said, though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished. So will your obedience be the more acceptable, in proportion to the degree in which it is singular. Were there not one praying family in the whole nation, in the whole world, methinks it should instigate you to the practice, rather than tempt you to the neglect, and you should press on as ambitious of the glory of leading the way: for what could be a nobler object of ambition, than to be pointed out by the blessed God himself, as Job was; of whom he said, with a kind of triumph, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the land, or even on the earth? But, blessed be God, this supposed universal neglect is far from being the case. Let it however rejoice us, if God may say, "There are such and such families, distinguishable from those in the neighbourhood on this account, as prevalent as the neglect of family prayer is, they have the resolution to practise it, and, like my servant Daniel, fear not the reproach and contempt which profane and ungodly men may cast upon them, if they may but honour me and engage my favour: I know them, I hearken and hear, and a book of remembrance is written before me for them that fear me, and think on my name." Nor should you urge,

* This part of the argument is enforced with peculiar strength by that great and excellent writer Mr. Howe, in his Posthumous Sermons on the subject, which I am happy to recommend to every reader that can get an opportunity of perusing them.

3. "That you have so much business of another kind, as not to be able to attend to this."

I might cut this objection short at once, by applying to your conscience, whether you have not time for many other things, which you know to be of much less importance. How many hours in a week do you find for amusement, while you have none for devotion in your family? And do you indeed hold the blessing of God so very cheap, and think it a matter of so little importance, that you conclude your business must succeed the worse, if a few minutes were daily taken solemnly to seek it together? Let me rather admonish you, that the greater your business is, the more need you have to pray earnestly, that your hearts may not be engrossed by it. And I would beg leave further to remind you, that if your hurry of business were indeed so great as the objection supposes, (which I believe is seldom the case,) prudence alone might suggest, that you should endeavour to contract it. For there are certain boundaries, beyond which a wise and faithful care cannot extend; and as an attempt to go beyond these boundaries has generally its foundation in avarice, it often has its end in poverty and ruin. But if you were ever so secure of succeeding for this world, how dear might you and your children pay for that success, if all the blessed consequences of family religion, for time, and for eternity, were to be given up as the price of that very small part of your gains, which is owing to the minutes you take from these exercises, that you may give them to the world! For you plainly perceive the question is only about them, and by no means about a strenuous application to the proper duties of your secular calling through the day. And if you will be rich upon such profane terms as are here supposed, (for truly I can call them no better than profane,) you will probably plunge yourself into final perdition, and may in the mean time pierce yourself through with many sorrows: while religious families learn by blessed experience, that the blessing of the Lord, which they are so often imploring together, maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow with it; or that a little, with the fear of the Lord, is better than great treasure, with that intermingled trouble, which in the neglect of God must necessarily be expected. But I conclude that yet more will be objecting,

4. "That they want ability for a work of this kind."

To this I must in the first place reply, that where the heart is rightly disposed, it does not require any uncommon abilities to discharge family worship in a decent and edifying manner. The heart of a wise and good man in this respect teacheth his mouth, and addeth knowledge to his lips; and out of the fulness of it, when it is indeed full of pious affections, the mouth will naturally speak. And if it speak naturally, and in the main properly, it is enough. There is no need at all of speaking elegantly. The plainest and simplest language, in addresses to the Majesty of Heaven, appears to me far preferable to laboured, pompous, and artificial expressions. Plain short sentences, uttered just as they rise in the mind, will be best understood by them that join with you. And it should on such occasions be our endeavour, to let ourselves down, as much as possible, to the understanding of the least and meanest of them: and this will in itself be more pleasing to God, than any thing which should proceed from ostentation and parade.

I must also desire you to consider how many helps you may easily procure. The Scripture is a large and noble magazine of the most proper sentiments, and most expressive language; which, if you will attend to with becoming regard, will soon furnish you for every good word and work, and most apparently for this. And besides this, we have in our language a great variety of excellent forms of prayer, for families as well as for private persons;* which you may use, at least at first, with great profit. And if it be too laborious to you to learn them by heart, or if having learnt them you dare not trust your memory, what should forbid your reading them reverently and devoutly? I hope I shall give no offence to any good Christian by saying, but on this occasion I should offend my conscience by not saying, that I have long thought an irreconcilable aversion to forms of prayer, even of human composition, as vain a superstition as a passionate attachment to them. And if any had rather that a family should be prayerless, than that a well chosen form should be gravely and solemnly read in it, I think he judges as absurdly, as if he would rather see them starving to death, than fed out of a dish whose materials or shape are disagreeable to him. The main thing is, that God be reverently and sincerely adored, that suitable blessings, temporal and spiritual, be sought from him for ourselves and others, and cordial thanksgivings returned to him for the various gifts of his continual bounty: and if this be done, the circumstances of doing it, though I cannot think them quite indifferent, are comparatively of small importance. I know by sure experience, in a great variety of instances, that it is very possible for Christians of no extraordinary genius, and with a very low education, to acquit themselves honourably in prayer without the assistance of forms: and they who at first need them may, and probably, if they seriously set about it, would, soon outgrow that need. But if they did not, God might be glorified, and families edified, by the continued use of such helps. And on the whole, if it be indeed come to this, that you will rather sacrifice all the benefits of family prayer, than submit to the trouble of reading, or appointing another to read, a well composed address, which perhaps, with a small portion of Scripture before it, might not take up one quarter of an hour's time, indeed, indeed, you must be condemned by God, and your own conscience. In such a view both must testify, that it is neither want of leisure, nor want of ability, that prevents your discharging your duty, but a stupid indifference about it, or rather a wretched aversion to it; the natural consequence of which might, if a little reflected upon, be sufficient to throw the most careless and arrogant sinner into an awful alarm, if not a trembling consternation.

* I must beg leave to [illegible] Dodd [illegible] Prayer Book, [illegible] Mr. Wesley's [illegible] Manual [illegible] Family Religion [illegible] Prayers [illegible] Amen.

I apprehend, that the most plausible objections have now been canvassed; for I suppose, few will be so weak and cowardly as to plead,

5. "That their domestics will not submit to the introduction of such orders as these."

But as this may be secretly thought of, where it would not be pleaded, especially where these duties have unhappily been omitted when families were first formed, and in their most flexible and pliant state, I will bestow a few words on this head.

And here I must desire, that you would not rashly conclude this to be the case with respect to your own. Do not think so unkindly of your domestics, if they be not extremely wicked indeed, as to imagine they would be secretly discontented with spending a little time daily in hearing the word of God, and being present at your domestic devotion; much less should you allow yourself to think, till it appears in fact, that they will have the arrogance openly to dispute so reasonable a determination as this. Perhaps, on the contrary, they are even now secretly wishing that God would put it into your heart to make the attempt; and thinking, with a kind of tender regret, "Why are we denied such a blessing, when the members of this and that family in the neighbourhood are favoured with it?"

But if it be indeed as you suppose, that they would think of it with a secret aversion, and come into it with apparent reluctance, if they can be induced to come into it at all; you would do well to reflect, whether this profaneness and perverseness may not, in a great measure at least, be owing to that very neglect which I am now pressing you to reform! Which if it be, it ought certainly to convince you in the most powerful and effectual manner, of the necessity of endeavouring to repair as soon as possible the mischief already done. And if there be really an opposition, you ought to let any in whom you discover it know, that your measures are fixed, and that you cannot and will not resign that just authority, which the laws of God and man give you in your own house, to the petulancy of their humour, or the impiety of their unhappy temper. Make the trial, whether they will dare to break with you, rather than submit to so easy a condition, as that of being present at your hours of family worship. If it be a servant that disputes it, you will no doubt think it a great blessing to your family to rid it of so detestable a member, in that relation. And if it be a child, grown up to years that should be years of discretion, that sets himself against this reformation, (and it is not possible that any others should oppose you,) though it is certain, that, wherever such a son of Belial be, he must be a great grief to your heart, you will be delivered from a great deal of distress, which the sight of his wickedness must daily give you, by refusing him a place in your own family, which he would only disgrace and corrupt, and leaving him to practise those irregularities and scandals which always go along with such a presumptuous contempt of religion, any where else rather than under your own roof.

I can think of but one objection more, and that is,

6. "That you may not know how to introduce a practice which you have so long neglected."

But this is an objection so very soon removed, that I hope, if nothing else lie in the way, your family will not continue another week in the unhappy circumstances in which your negligence has hitherto kept it. I were unworthy the name of a minister of the gospel, if, whatever my other engagements are, I were not willing to give you my utmost assistance, as soon as possible, in so good a work as the reformation of this great and lamentable evil. Far from thinking it a trouble to visit you, and spend an hour with you upon such an occasion; who would not esteem it a refreshment, and a blessing, to come and inform your domestics, when gathered together for this purpose, how wise and happy a resolution you had taken, to represent the reason they have to rejoice in it, and to bless God who had inspired you with it? And how sweet a work would it be to perform it, as for the first time, imploring the blessings of Providence and grace on you and yours, and entreating those assistances of his Holy Spirit, which may qualify you more abundantly for discharging your peculiar part in it, and may render it the successful means of planting, or of supporting and animating, a principle of true religion in every soul under your care! Nor would the joy and delight be confined to the minutes spent with you at such a season; it would be carried home to the study, and to the house of God, and the very remembrance of it would, for years to come, encourage to other attempts of usefulness, and strengthen our hands in the work of the Lord.

And oh, my dear friend, whoever you are, be not ashamed that a minister should on this occasion tell your children and servants, that you are sensible of your former neglect, and are determined, in the strength of God, to practise a duty, which it has indeed been criminal hitherto to omit. This is a mean and unworthy shame, and would prevent our reforming evils which are indeed shameful. It will be a glory to you, to be willing and solicitous to revive languishing religion; a glory, to give to other families an example, which, if they have the wisdom and courage to follow it, will undoubtedly bring down a rich variety of blessings on themselves, and, if followed by considerable numbers, on the public. At least, it will be an honour to you in the sight of men, and what is infinitely more, in the sight of God, to have made the generous effort; and not to make the guilty neglect of former years an excuse for continuing to neglect, what it should rather be a powerful argument immediately to practise.

But I would by no means insist upon it, that divine worship should be introduced into your family in the particular manner I have recommended. Use your own judgment, and pursue your own inclination; so that it be but effectually and immediately done. You may perhaps think it convenient to call them together, and read over this letter to them; telling them at the conclusion, that you are in your conscience convinced there is reason in it which cannot be answered, and that therefore you are resolved to act agreeably to it. You may then proceed to read a portion of Scripture, and to pray with them in such a manner as you may think most expedient. But in whatever manner it be done, you will remember, that it must be with reverence and solemnity, and with unfeigned fervour of devotion, as in the sight of the heart-searching God. And you will further remember, that when once introduced, it must be resolutely and constantly carried on; for to cast out this heavenly guest, will in some degree be more shameful, than not to admit it. But I hope, sweet experience of the pleasure of these duties will be instead of a thousand arguments, to engage your adherence to them. May God give you resolution immediately to make the attempt, and may he assist and accept you, and scatter down every desirable blessing of providence and of grace on you and yours! So that this day (for I hope it will be introduced this very day) may become memorable in your lives, as a season from whence you may date a prosperity and a joy hitherto unknown, how happy soever you may have been in former years: for very imperfect, I am sure, must that domestic happiness be, in which domestic religion has no part.

How shall I congratulate myself, if in consequence of the representation and address I have now been making to you, I may be the blessed instrument in the divine hand of inspiring you with such a resolution! What an additional bond will then be added to our friendship, while God continues us together in life! Yea, what an everlasting bond of a nobler friendship, in a future state; where it will be, before the throne of God, my joy to have given such admonitions as these, and yours, faithfully and obediently to have received them!

But if after all you will not be persuaded, but will hearken to the voice of cowardice, and sloth, and irreligion, in defiance of so many awakening and affecting reasons, you must answer it at large. If your children and servants grow up in the neglect of God, and pierce your heart with those sorrows, which such servants, and especially such children, are like to occasion; if they raise profane and profligate families; if they prove the curse of their country, as well as the torment and ruin of those most intimately related to them; the guilt is in part yours, and (I repeat it again) you must answer it to God at the great day, that you have omitted the proper and appointed method of preventing such fatal evils. In the mean time, you must answer the omission to your own conscience; which probably has not been easy in former days, and in future days may be yet more unquiet. Yes, Sir, the memory of this address may continue to torment you, if it cannot reform you: and if you do not forsake the house of God, as well as exclude God and his worship from your own house, you will meet with new wounds; for new exhortations and admonitions will arm reflection with new reproaches. And in this uncomfortable manner you will probably go on, till what has been the grief and shame of your life, become the affliction of your dying bed; nor dare I presume to assure you, that God will answer your last cries for pardon. The best you can expect under the consciousness of this guilt is, to pass trembling to your final doom:—but whatever that doom be, you must acquit your minister who has given you this faithful warning;* and this letter, transcribed as it were in the records of the Divine Omniscience, shall testify, that a matter of so great importance hath not been wholly neglected, hath not been coldly and slightly urged, by,

Dear Sir,

Your affectionate friend, and faithful servant,
in our common Lord,

Northampton, P. DODDRIDGE.
December 20, 1749.

* If this letter should be presented by any of my brethren as the ministers to any of their hearers, they may easily see, that this expression is applicable to them, as well as to those who may receive it from my hands.

POSTSCRIPT.

To prevent, as far as possible, any objection which might arise from not having any proper form just at hand, I shall here subjoin two which I will recommend to those who may happen not to be better provided. The first is, indeed, so far as I know, pretty peculiar; being intended for a family into which prayer is just going to be introduced, after having been long neglected. The other is for morning or evening, with such proper variations to suit either as common sense will direct. And I desire it may be observed, that it may well be used as a directory to those, who do not choose to use it as a form. And I appehend it may be most serviceable in this view; as my desire to reduce it within narrow limits, and yet to suggest as many thoughts as possible, hath obliged me to such conciseness of expression, that the ideas are carried faster than many capacities may conveniently admit. But I pray God to enlarge your heart, that you may expatiate upon these hints to your own edification, and that of all those that join with you.

A PRAYER,

Which may be used as an introduction to a stated course of Family Prayer, where it hath been formerly neglected.

O most great and glorious God! When we consider thee as the gracious Author of all those mercies which we enjoy, in our persons and in our family, we have great reason to humble ourselves before thee, that we have not more solemnly acknowledged that goodness on which we have so long and so comfortably subsisted. Justly mightest thou, O thou Almighty Jehovah, have poured out thy fury upon those, that herein have acted as if they knew thee not, even upon this family which hath not called on thy name. But confessing and lamenting this our sinful and inexcusable neglect, we earnestly entreat thee, through Jesus Christ, to pardon it, and to accept and strengthen the resolution which, in dependence on thy grace, we would now form, to be for the future diligent in it, and to do all we can in our respective stations to encourage and support it.

And we entreat thee to bless those religious opportunities, which as a family we may enjoy. Enable us to hear thy word with due attention: open our minds to all the instructions we receive from it, and bow our hearts to humble obedience.

Be favourably present with us, when we are offering our addresses to thy throne! While we are adoring thine infinite perfections, may we feel a reverent and joyful sense of them upon our hearts! While we confess our sins before thee, may we inwardly abhor them, and mourn over them, and be inspired with firm resolutions that we will never return to them any more, but will guard against every appearance of evil! Excite in our souls earnest desires after those spiritual blessings which we ask at thine hands! May we intercede for others with fervent charity! May we acknowledge thy mercies with the most lively gratitude, and devote ourselves to thee with full purpose of heart!

And on the whole, may every one of us find the divine life growing and advancing in our souls by every opportunity of this nature, that we may rejoice in each other and in thee; and that true religion being firmly established in our own hearts, may by our means be communicated to others, so far as our influence over them may extend; till at length, having worshipped thee together in such institutions as these in an holy and acceptable manner, we may join that large and blessed family above, which is for ever rejoicing in thy presence; through Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom, with thee, O Father, and thine Holy Spirit, be everlasting praises. Amen!

A PRAYER FOR A FAMILY.

To be used either morning or evening, with such variations as may easily be understood by any who are able to read it.

Most Great, Eternal, and Ever-blessed God! We, thine unworthy creatures, Adoration desire at this time with all humility to bow ourselves down in thine awful and majestic presence, acknowledging thine infinite perfections and glories. —[We adore thee as the first and the last, the greatest and the best, of beings; who art originally and necessarily possessed of knowledge and power, wisdom and righteousness, holiness and truth, mercy and goodness, in degrees which no other being can conceive.]—We pay thee our homage, as the author and support of universal nature, the Lord and life of the creation. We acknowledge ourselves thy creatures, whose bodies and souls have been formed by thine hand, and continually maintained and defended by thy care and favour.

Most justly mightest thou therefore, Confession O our heavenly Father, have expected from us the most constant gratitude, duty, and obedience: but we humbly confess before thee, (and we desire to do it with the deepest humiliation and shame, remorse and sorrow,) that we have been very much wanting in those returns; yea, that we have all most grievously offended thee.—[We confess, O thou Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God, that we are polluted and guilty creatures, and so most unworthy and unfit to appear in thy presence.]—We acknowledge, O Lord, that we were shapen in iniquity, and in sin did our mothers conceive us; and that we have, from our very childhood, been renewing our provocations and transgressions in our thoughts, our words, and actions; and all these attended with circumstances of high aggravation. [We own and lament, O thou most gracious Sovereign, that we have in numberless instances, negligently, yea, and presumptuously, broken those wise and holy laws which thou gavest us for our good; and that by the breach of them we have deserved thy righteous displeasure.]—So that we might have been made examples of justice, and spectacles of misery, to all thy rational creation. —[We might long since have been cut off from this pleasant abode which thy goodness has assigned us, and been sent down to everlasting darkness, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.]

Petition for pardon and grace in Christ.

But we humbly implore thy pardon and mercy in Christ Jesus our Lord, thine only-begotten and well-beloved Son; who hath, by thine appointment, O compassionate Father, visited this world of ours, not only to give it the most excellent instructions, confirmed by the most astonishing miracles, and recommended by the most amiable example; but also to redeem us to God by his blood, and to offer up his own life a sacrifice for us.—He was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification: and as he is now ascended into heaven, there to make a prevailing intercession for all that come unto God through him, we presume to approach thy sacred presence with all becoming regards to him, humbly pleading that atoning blood which he shed on the cross, and that all-perfect merit and righteousness of his, by which alone sinners may draw near unto thee with acceptance. And we entreat thee for his sake, and in regard to our relation to him, fully and freely to forgive us all our numberless transgressions, and to be graciously reconciled to us; yea, to take us, unworthy as we are, into the number of thy dear children. For his sake we also humbly entreat thee to free us from the power of sin, as well as from its guilt. Shed down, O thou God of all grace, thy Holy Spirit upon our hearts in a rich abundance, to inspire us with a hatred of every thing that is displeasing to thee, and to form us to a love of universal goodness, and a desire of making continual improvements in it!

[Fill us, O Lord, we humbly beseech thee, with a fervent love to thy blessed self. In all things may we be obedient to thy holy precepts, and submissive to thy wise and gracious disposal! May we be united to Christ by a sincere faith, which shall work by love, and show itself in keeping his commandments, as well as trusting his atonement, intercession, and grace! May we be always led by the Holy Spirit of God, and cherish his influence on our hearts as the Spirit of holiness and of love! To our brethren of mankind may we be strictly just, and affectionately kind, doing to others as we could reasonably desire they should do to us, and rejoicing in every opportunity of advancing their temporal or spiritual happiness!]

While we continue here in this uncertain world, give us, if it be thy blessed will, food to eat and raiment to put on, health of body and cheerfulness of mind, and whatever other enjoyments thou seest necessary to make our journey through life comfortable! But let us not have our portion on earth! May our hearts be more and more indifferent to it, and our views continually raised above it!—[May we learn to govern with strict authority our appetites and passions, and to deny ourselves wherever the precepts of thy gospel require it! On the whole, may every part of our conduct, in every relation and circumstance of life, adorn religion; and may the lustre of our good works engage many around us to glorify our Father in heaven!]—May we continually remember the shortness of time, and the importance of eternity; and behave in such a manner, that should we be summoned away ever so suddenly, death may not be a terrible, but a joyful, surprise! Support us, O Lord, in our dying behaviour! Receive our departing spirits to the embraces of thy mercy, and give us a triumphant part in the resurrection of the just!

Intercession

We pray for the advancement of thy gospel in the world, and for the conversion of Jews and Gentiles to the faith as it is in Jesus. We pray, O Lord, for the progress and improvement of the reformation, abroad and at home. We affectionately recommend to thee our rightful sovereign king George, and all the branches of his family; entreating thee to continue to us, by their means, the invaluable blessing of the protestant succession. We entreat thee by thy grace to animate all, who are distinguished by power, riches, or other advantages, that they may improve all their talents for the public good: and we earnestly pray, that the ministers of thy gospel of every denomination, may with united affection, ardent zeal, and eminent success, be carrying on the work of the Lord!

May it please thee, O thou God of mercy, to spread among Christians of every profession, a spirit of forbearance, candour, and love; and to visit all that are in any kind of affliction, whether personal or relative, of mind, body, or estate! Graciously support them under their sorrows, and in thine own time send them deliverance!

We beseech thee to bless us as a family; whether we preside over it, or belong to it, as children, sojourners, or servants, may we all be found in a faithful discharge of our duty to thee, and to each other! May our united and retired devotions be so performed, as to have the happiest influence on our temper and our conduct!

Thanksgiving

And now, O most gracious and merciful Father, we desire with all our hearts to bless and adore thine holy name, for all thy great and unmerited goodness to us, and to the whole human race. We praise thee for our creation and preservation, for health and ease, for food and raiment, for liberty and safety, for friends and success; and above all, for our redemption, for the inestimable privilege of approaching to thee through a Mediator, and for the rich and full provision thou hast made in him for the forgiveness of our daily sins, for our receiving all the supplies of grace we stand in need of here, and our enjoying everlasting happiness hereafter. And under a sense of thy mercies, we desire to devote ourselves to thee as the Lord our God, and renew our covenant with thee through our Lord Jesus Christ; humbly resolving, by the assistance of thy Spirit and grace, to serve thee with all good fidelity unto the end of our lives.

We particularly bless thee for the mercies of the day [or night] past, and would humbly commit ourselves to thy gracious protection and favour this night, [or day,] entreating thee to guard us from all evil, and to grant, that at our next assembling together we may have reason to unite our praises for the continuance of thy goodness. And may we be perpetually advancing in our preparation for that heavenly world, where we hope to worship thee without any of those imperfections which now attend us: which we ask and hope, through the merits of thy Son Christ Jesus, in whom we have righteousness and strength, and in whose name and words we conclude our addresses, calling on thee as Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name: thy kingdom come: thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven: give us this day our daily bread: and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us: and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen!

N. B. As this prayer may be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

SOME REMARKABLE PASSAGES

IN

THE LIFE

OF

THE HON. COLONEL JAMES GARDINER,

WHO WAS SLAIN AT THE BATTLE OF PRESTONPANS, SEPTEMBER, 21, 1745

WITH

AN APPENDIX,

RELATING TO THE ANCIENT FAMILY OF THE MUNROS OF FOWLIS.

TO

DAVID GARDINER, ESQ.

CORNET IN SIR JOHN COPE'S REGIMENT OF DRAGOONS.

DEAR SIR,

WHILE my heart is following you, with a truly paternal solicitude, through all the dangers of military life, in which you are thus early engaged, anxious for your safety amidst the instruments of death, and the far more dangerous allurements of vice; I feel a peculiar pleasure in being able at length, though after such long delays, to put into your hands the Memoirs with which I now present you. They contain many particulars, which would have been worthy of your attentive notice, had they related to a person of the most distant nation or age; but they will, I doubt not, command your peculiar regard, as they are sacred to the memory of that excellent man from whom you had the honour to derive your birth, and by whose generous and affectionate care you have been laid under all the obligations which the best of fathers could confer on a most beloved son.

Here, Sir, you see a gentleman, who with all the advantages of a liberal and religious education, added to every natural accomplishment that could render him most agreeable, entered, before he had attained the stature of a man, on those arduous and generous services to which you are devoted, and behaved in them with a gallantry and courage which will always give a splendour to his name among the British soldiery, and render him an example to all officers of his rank. But, alas! amidst all the intrepidity of the martial hero, you see him vanquished by the blandishments of pleasure, and in chace of it plunging himself into follies and vices, for which no want of education or genius could have been a sufficient excuse. You behold him urging the ignoble and fatal pursuit, unmoved by the terrors which death was continually darting around him, and the most signal deliverances by which Providence again and again rescued him from those terrors; till at length he was reclaimed by an ever-memorable interposition of divine grace. Then you have the pleasure of seeing him become in good earnest a convert to Christianity, and by speedy advances growing up into one of its brightest ornaments: his mind continually filled with the great ideas which the gospel of our Redeemer suggests, and bringing the blessed influence of its sublime principles into every relation of military and civil, of public and domestic, life. You trace him persevering in a steady and uniform course of goodness, through a long series of honourable and prosperous years, the delight of all that were so happy as to know him, and, in his sphere, the most faithful guardian of his country; till at last, worn out with honourable labours, and broken with infirmities which they had hastened upon him before the time, you see him forgetting them at once at the call of duty and Providence; with all the generous ardour of his most vigorous days rushing on the enemies of religion and liberty, sustaining their shock with the most deliberate fortitude, when deserted by those that should have supported him, and cheerfully sacrificing the little remains of a mortal life in the triumphant views of a glorious immortality.

This, Sir, is the noble object I present to your view; and you will, I hope, fix your eye continually upon it, and will never allow yourself for one day to forget, that this illustrious man is Colonel Gardiner, your ever-honoured father; who having approved his fidelity to the death, and received a crown of life, seems, as it were, by what you here read, to be calling out to you from amidst the cloud of witnesses with which you are surrounded, and urging you by every generous, tender, filial sentiment, to mark the footsteps of his Christian race, and strenuously to maintain that combat where the victory is through divine grace certain, and the prize an eternal kingdom in the heavens.

The last number of the Appendix introduces a most worthy triumvirate of your father's friends, following him through the same heroic path, to an end like his, and with pleasure pouring forth their lives in blood, for the rescue and preservation of their dearer country. And I trust, the eloquence of their examples will be prevalent with many, to emulate the many virtues for which they were conspicuous.

My hopes, Sir, that all these powerful motives will especially have their full efficacy on you, are greatly encouraged by the certainty which I have of your being well acquainted with the evidence of Christianity in its full extent; a criminal ignorance of which, in the midst of great advantages for learning them, leaves so many of our young people a prey to deism, and so to vice and ruin, which generally bring up its rear. My life would be a continued burthen to me, if I had not a conscientiousness in the sight of God, that during the years in which the important trust of your education was committed to my care, I had laid before you the proofs both of natural and revealed religion, in what I assuredly esteem to be, with regard to the judgment, if they are carefully examined, an irresistible light: and that I had endeavoured to attend them with those addresses which might be most likely to impress your heart. You have not, dear Sir, forgotten, and I am confident you can never entirely forget, the assiduity with which I have laboured to form your mind, not only to what might be ornamental to you in human life, but above all, to a true taste of what is really excellent, and an early contempt of those vanities by which the generality of our youth, especially in your station, are debased, enervated, and undone. My private as well as public addresses for this purpose will, I know, be remembered by you, and the tears of tenderness with which they have so often been accompanied; and may they be so remembered, that they who are most tenderly concerned, may be comforted under the loss of such an inestimable friend as Colonel Gardiner, by seeing that his character, in all its most amiable and resplendent parts, lives in you; and that how difficult soever it may be to act up to that height of expectation with which the eyes of the world will be fixed on the son of such a father, you are, in the strength of divine grace, attempting it; at least are following him with generous emulation and with daily solicitude, that the steps may be less unequal!

May the Lord God of your father, and I will add, of both your pious and honourable parents, animate your heart more and more with such views and sentiments as these! May he guard your life amidst every scene of danger, and be a protection and blessing to those that are yet unborn; and may he give you, in some far distant period of time, to resign it by a gentler dissolution than the hero from whom you sprung, or, if unerring wisdom appoint otherwise, to end it with equal glory!

I am, dear Sir,
Your ever faithful, affectionate friend,
and obliged humble servant,

Northampton, July 1, 1747. P. DODDRIDGE.

SOME REMARKABLE PASSAGES

IN

THE LIFE

OF THE

HON. COLONEL JAMES GARDINER.

§ 1. When I promised the public some larger account of the life and character of this illustrious person, than I could conveniently insert in my sermon on the sad event of his death, I was secure that if Providence continued my capacity of writing, I should not wholly disappoint the expectation. For I was furnished with a variety of particulars which appeared to me worthy of general notice, in consequence of that intimate friendship with which he had honoured me during the six last years of his life; a friendship, which led him to open his heart to me in repeated conversations with an unbounded confidence, (as he then assured me, beyond what he had used with any other man living,) so far as religious experiences were concerned; and I had also received several very valuable letters from him, during the time of our absence from each other, which contained most genuine and edifying traces of his Christian character. But I hoped further to learn many valuable particulars from the papers of his own closet, and from his letters to other friends, as well as from what they more circumstantially knew concerning him; I therefore determined to delay the execution of my promise till I could enjoy these advantages for performing it in the most satisfactory manner; nor have I, on the whole, reason to regret that determination.

§ 2. I shall not trouble the reader with all the causes which concurred to retard these expected assistances for almost a whole year; the chief of them were, the tedious languishing illness of his afflicted lady, through whose hands it was proper the papers should pass; together with the confusion into which the rebels had thrown them when they ransacked his seat at Bankton, where most of them were deposited. But having now received such of them as have escaped their voracious hands, and could conveniently be collected and transmitted, I set myself with the greatest pleasure to perform what I esteem, not merely a tribute of gratitude to the memory of my invaluable friend, (though never was the memory of any mortal man more precious and sacred to me,) but of duty to God and to my fellow-creatures; for I have a most cheerful hope that the narrative I am now to write will, under the divine blessing, be the means of spreading, what of all things in the world every benevolent heart will most desire to spread, a warm and lively sense of religion.

§ 3. My own heart has been so much edified and animated by what I have read in the memoirs of persons who have been eminent for wisdom and piety, that I cannot but wish the treasure may be more and more increased; and I would hope the world may gather the like valuable fruits from the Life I am now attempting; not only as it will contain very singular circumstances, which may excite a general curiosity, but as it comes attended with some other particular advantages.

§ 4. The reader is here to survey a character of such eminent and various goodness, as might demand veneration, and inspire him with a desire to imitate it too, had it appeared in the obscurest rank: but it will surely command some peculiar regard when viewed in so elevated and important a station; especially as it shone not in ecclesiastical, but military, life, where the temptations are so many, and the prevalency of the contrary character so great, that it may seem no inconsiderable praise and felicity to be free from dissolute vice, and to retain what in most other professions might be esteemed only a mediocrity of virtue. It may surely, with the highest justice, be expected that the title and bravery of Colonel Gardiner will invite many of our officers and soldiers, to whom his name has been long honourable and dear, to peruse this account of him with some peculiar attention; in consequence of which it may be a means of increasing the number, and brightening the character, of those who are already adorning their office, their country, and their religion; and of reclaiming those who will see rather what they ought to be than what they are. On the whole, to the gentlemen of the sword I would particularly offer these memoirs, as theirs by so distinguished a title; yet I am firmly persuaded there are none whose office is so sacred, or whose proficiency in the religious life is so advanced, but they may find something to demand their thankfulness, and to awaken their emulation.

§ 5. Colonel James Gardiner, of whom we write, was the son of Captain Patrick Gardiner, of the family of Torwoodhead, by Mrs. Mary Hodge, of the family of Gladsmuir. The captain, who was master of a handsome estate, served many years in the army of King William and Queen Anne, and died abroad with the British forces in Germany, quickly after the battle of Hochstet, through the fatigues he underwent in the duties of that celebrated campaign. He had a company in the regiment of foot, once commanded by Colonel Hodge, his valiant brother-in-law, who was slain at the head of that regiment (my memorial from Scotland says) at the battle of Steenkirk, which was fought in the year 1692.

§ 6. Mrs. Gardiner, our Colonel's mother, was a lady of a very valuable character; but it pleased God to exercise her with very uncommon trials: for she not only lost her husband and her brother in the service of their country, as before related, but also her eldest son, Mr. Robert Gardiner, on the day which completed the 16th year of his age, at the siege of Namur, in 1695. But there is great reason to believe God blessed these various and heavy afflictions, as the means of forming her to that eminent degree of piety which will render her memory honourable as long as it continues.

§ 7. Her second son, the worthy person of whom I am now to give a more particular account, was born at Carriden, in Linlithgowshire, on the 10th of January, A. D. 1687-8; the memorable year of that glorious revolution which he justly esteemed among the happiest of all events. So that when he was slain in the defence of those liberties which God then by so gracious a providence rescued from utter destruction, i. e. on the 21st of September, 1745, he was aged 57 years, 8 months, and 11 days.

§ 8. The annual return of his birth-day was observed by him, in the latter and better years of his life, in a manner very different from what is commonly practised: for, instead of making it a day of festivity, I am told, he rather distinguished it as a season of more than ordinary humiliation before God; both in commemoration of those mercies which he received in the first opening of life, and under an affectionate sense, as well of his long alienation from the great Author and support of his being, as of the many imperfections which he lamented, in the best of his days and services.

§ 9. I have not met with many things remarkable concerning the early years of his life, only that his mother took care to instruct him with great tenderness and affection in the principles of true Christianity. He was also trained up in humane literature at the school at Linlithgow, where he made a very considerable progress in the languages. I remember to have heard him quote some passages of the Latin classics very pertinently; though his employment in life, and the various turns which his mind took under different impulses in succeeding years, prevented him from cultivating such studies.

§ 10. The good effects of his mother's prudent and exemplary care were not so conspicuous as she wished and hoped, in the younger part of her son's life; yet there is great reason to believe they were not entirely lost. As they were probably the occasion of many convictions, which in his younger years were overborne; so I doubt not, that when religious impressions took that strong hold of his heart, which they afterwards did, that stock of knowledge which had been so early laid up in his mind was found of considerable service. And I have heard him make the observation, as an encouragement to parents and other pious friends, to do their duty, and to hope for those good consequences of it, which may not immediately appear.

§ 11. Could his mother, or a very religious aunt, (of whose good instructions and exhortations I have often heard him speak with pleasure,) have prevailed, he would not have thought of a military life; from which, it is no wonder, these ladies endeavoured to dissuade him, considering the mournful experience they had of the dangers attending it, and the dear relatives they had lost already by it. But it suited his taste; and the ardour of his spirit, animated by the persuasions of a friend who greatly urged it,* was not to be restrained. Nor will the reader wonder that, thus excited and supported, it easily overbore their tender remonstrances, when he knows that this lively youth fought three duels before he attained to the stature of a man, in one of which, when he was but eight years old, he received from a boy much older than himself, a wound in his right cheek, the scar of which was always very apparent. The false sense of honour which instigated him to it, might seem indeed something excusable in those unripened years, and considering the profession of his father, brother, and uncle; but I have often heard him mention this rashness with that regret, which the reflection would naturally give to so wise and good a man in the maturity of life. And I have been informed that, after his remarkable conversion, he declined accepting a challenge, with this calm and truly great reply, which, in a man of his experienced bravery, was exceeding graceful: "I fear sinning, though you know I do not fear fighting."

* I suppose this to have been Brigadier-General Rur, who had from his childhood a peculiar affection for him.

§ 12. He served first as a cadet, which must have been very early; and then, at fourteen years old, he bore an ensign's commission in a Scotch regiment in the Dutch service; in which he continued till the year 1702, when (if my information be right) he received an ensign's commission from Queen Anne, which he bore in the battle of Ramilies, being then in the 19th year of his age. In this ever-memorable action he received a wound in his mouth by a musket ball, which hath often been reported to be the occasion of his conversion. That report was a mistaken one: but as some very remarkable circumstances attended this affair, which I have had the pleasure of hearing more than once from his own mouth, I hope my reader will excuse me if I give him so uncommon a story at large.

§ 13. Our young officer was of a party in the forlorn hope, and was commanded on what seemed almost a desperate service, to dispossess the French of the church-yard at Ramilies, where a considerable number of them were posted to remarkable advantage. They succeeded much better than was expected: and it may well be supposed that Mr. Gardiner, who had before been in several encounters, and had the view of making his fortune to animate the natural intrepidity of his spirit, was glad of such an opportunity of signalizing himself. Accordingly, he had planted his colours on an advanced ground; and while he was calling to his men (probably in that horrid language, which is so peculiar a disgrace to our soldiery, and so absurdly common in such articles of extreme danger) he received a shot into his mouth; which, without beating out any of his teeth, or touching the fore part of his tongue, went through his neck, and came out about an inch and a half on the left side of the vertebræ. Not feeling at first the pain of the stroke, he wondered what was become of the ball, and in the wildness of his surprise began to suspect he had swallowed it; but dropping soon after, he traced the passage of it by his finger, when he could discover it no other way: which I mention as one circumstance, among many which occur, to make it probable that the greater part of those who fall in battle by these instruments of death, feel very little anguish from the most mortal wounds.

§ 14. This accident happened about five or six in the evening, on the 23d day of May, in the year 1706; and the army pursuing its advantages against the French, without ever regarding the wounded, (which was, it seems, the duke of Marlborough's constant method,) our young officer lay all night in the field, agitated, as may well be supposed, with a great variety of thoughts. He assured me, that when he reflected upon the circumstances of his wound, that a ball should, as he then conceived it, go through his head without killing him, he thought God had preserved him by miracle; and therefore assuredly concluded that he should live, abandoned and desperate as his state then seemed to be. Yet (which to me appeared very astonishing) he had little thoughts of humbling himself before God, and returning to him after the wanderings of a life so licentiously begun. But expecting to recover, his mind was taken up with contrivances to secure his gold, of which he had a pretty deal about him; and he had recourse to a very odd expedient, which proved successful. Expecting to be stripped, he first took a handful of that clotted gore, of which he was frequently obliged to clear his mouth, or he would have been choked, and putting it into his left hand, he took out his money, (which I think was about nineteen pistoles,) and shutting his hand, and besmearing the back part of it with blood, he kept it in this position till the blood dried in such a manner, that his hand could not easily fall open, though any sudden surprise should happen, in which he might lose the presence of mind which that concealment otherwise would have required.

§ 15. In the morning the French, who were masters of that spot, though their forces were defeated at some distance, came to plunder the slain; and seeing him to appearance almost expiring, one of them was just applying a sword to his breast, to destroy the little remainder of life; when in the critical moment, upon which all the extraordinary events of such a life as his afterwards proved were suspended, a cordelier, who attended the plunderers, interposed, taking him by his dress for a Frenchman; and said, "Do not kill that poor child." Our young soldier heard all that passed, though he was not able to speak one word; and opening his eyes, made a sign for something to drink. They gave him a sup of some spirituous liquor, which happened to be at hand; by which, he said, he found a more sensible refreshment than he could remember from any thing he had tasted either before or since. Then signifying to the friar to lean down his ear to his mouth, he employed the first efforts of his feeble breath in telling him (what, alas! was a contrived falsehood) that he was nephew to the governor of Huy, a neutral town in the neighbourhood, and that, if he could take any method of conveying him thither, he did not doubt but his uncle would liberally reward him. He had indeed a friend at Huy, (who, I think, was governor, and, if I mistake not, had been acquainted with the captain, his father,) from whom he expected a kind reception: but the relation was only pretended. On hearing this, they laid him on a sort of hand-barrow, and sent him by a file of musqueteers towards the place; but the men lost their way, and got into a wood towards the evening, in which they were obliged to continue all night. The poor patient's wound being still undressed, it is not to be wondered that by this time it raged violently. The anguish of it engaged him earnestly to beg, that they would either kill him outright, or leave him there to die, without the torture of any further motion; and indeed they were obliged to rest for a considerable time, on account of their own weariness. Thus he spent the second night in the open air, without any thing more than a common bandage to stanch the blood. He hath often mentioned it as a most astonishing providence, that he did not bleed to death; which, under God, he ascribed to the remarkable coldness of these two nights.

§ 16. Judging it quite unsafe to attempt carrying him to Huy, from whence they were now several miles distant, his convoy took him, early in the morning, to a convent in the neighbourhood; where he was hospitably received, and treated with great kindness and tenderness. But the cure of his wound was committed to an ignorant barber-surgeon, who lived near the house; the best shift that could then be made, at a time when it may easily be supposed persons of ability in their profession had their hands full of employment. The tent which this artist applied, was almost like a peg driven into the wound: and gentlemen of skill and experience, when they came to hear of the manner in which he was treated, wondered how he could possibly survive such management. But by the blessing of God on these applications, rough as they were, he recovered in a few months. The lady abbess, who called him her son, treated him with the affection and care of a mother; and he always declared, that every thing which he saw within these walls was conducted with the strictest decency and decorum. He received a great many devout admonitions from the ladies there; and they would fain have persuaded him to acknowledge what they thought so miraculous a deliverance, by embracing the catholic faith, as they were pleased to call it. But they could not succeed: for though no religion lay near his heart, yet he had too much of the spirit of a gentleman lightly to change that form of religion, which he wore (as it were) loose about him; as well as too much good sense, to swallow those monstrous absurdities of popery, which immediately presented themselves to him, unacquainted as he was with the niceties of the controversy.

§ 17. When his liberty was regained by an exchange of prisoners, and his health thoroughly established, he was far from rendering unto the Lord according to that wonderful display of divine mercy which he had experienced. I know very little of the particulars of those wild, thoughtless, and wretched years, which lay between the 19th and the 30th of his life; except it be, that he frequently experienced the divine goodness in renewed instances, particularly in preserving him in several hot military actions, in all which he never received so much as a wound after this, forward as he was in tempting danger; and yet, that all these years were spent in an entire alienation from God, and an eager pursuit of animal pleasure, as his supreme good. The series of criminal amours, in which he was almost incessantly engaged during this time, must probably have afforded some remarkable adventures and occurrences; but the memory of them is perished. Nor do I think it unworthy notice here, that amidst all the intimacy of our friendship, and the many hours of cheerful as well as serious converse which we spent together, I never remember to have heard him speak of any of these intrigues, otherwise than, in the general, with deep and solemn abhorrence. This I the rather mention, as it seemed a most genuine proof of his unfeigned repentance; which, I think, there is great reason to suspect, when people seem to take a pleasure in relating and describing scenes of vicious indulgence, which yet they profess to have disapproved and forsaken.

§ 18. Amidst all these pernicious wanderings from the paths of religion, virtue, and happiness, he approved himself so well in his military character, that he was made a lieutenant in that year, viz. 1706: and, I am told, he was very quickly after promoted to a cornet's commission in Lord Stair's regiment of the Scotch Greys; and on the 31st of January, in the year 1714-15, was made captain-lieutenant in Colonel Ker's regiment of dragoons. He had the honour of being known to the Earl of Stair some time before, and was made his aid-de-camp: and when, upon his lordship's being appointed ambassador from his late majesty to the court of France, he made so splendid an entrance into Paris, Captain Gardiner was his master of the horse: and I have been told, that a great deal of the care of that admirably well-adjusted ceremony fell upon him; so that he gained great credit by the manner in which he conducted it. Under the benign influences of his lordship's favour (which to the last day of his life he retained) a captain's commission was procured for him, dated July 22, in the year 1715, in the regiment of dragoons commanded by Colonel Stanhope; (then Earl of Harrington;) and, in the year 1717, he was advanced to the majority of that regiment; in which office he continued till it was reduced, on November the 10th, 1718; when he was put out of commission. But then his majesty, King George I. was so thoroughly apprized of his faithful and important services, that he gave him his sign-manual, entitling him to the first majority that should become vacant, in any regiment of horse or dragoons; which happened, about five years after, to be in Croft's regiment of dragoons, in which he received a commission, dated June the 1st, 1724; and on the 20th of July, the same year, he was made major of an older regiment, commanded by the Earl of Stair.

§ 19. As I am now speaking of so many of his military preferments, I will despatch the account of them by observing, that on the 24th of January, 1729-30, he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the same regiment, long under the command of Lord Cadogan; with whose friendship this brave and vigilant officer was also honoured for many years. And he continued in this rank, and regiment, till the 19th of April, 1743, when he received a colonel's commission over a regiment of dragoons, lately commanded by Brigadier Bland; at the head of which he valiantly fell, in the defence of his sovereign and his country, about two years and a half after he received it.

§ 20. We will now return to that period of his life which passed at Paris, the scene of such remarkable and important events. He continued, if I remember right, several years under the roof of the brave and generous Earl of Stair; to whom he endeavoured to approve himself by every instance of diligent and faithful service. And his lordship gave no inconsiderable proof of the dependence which he had upon him, when, in the beginning of the year 1715, he intrusted him with the important despatches, relating to a discovery, which, by a series of admirable policy he had made, of a design which the French king was then forming, for invading Great Britain in favour of the Pretender; in which the French apprehended they were so sure of success, that it seemed a point of friendship in one of the chief counsellors of that court, to dissuade a dependant of his from accepting some employment under his Britannic majesty, when proposed by his envoy there; because it was said, that in less than six weeks there would be a revolution, in favour of what they called the family of the Stuarts. The captain despatched his journey with the utmost speed; a variety of circumstances happily concurred to accelerate it; and they, who remember how soon the regiments which that emergency required were raised and armed, will, I doubt not, esteem it a memorable instance, both of the most cordial zeal in the friends of the government, and of the gracious care of divine Providence, over the House of Hanover, and the British liberties, so incomparably connected with its interest.

§ 21. While Captain Gardiner was at London, in one of the journeys he made upon this occasion, he, with that frankness which was natural to him, and which in those days was not always under the most prudent restraint, ventured to predict, from what he knew of the bad state of the French king's health, that he would not live six weeks. This was made known by some spies who were at St. James's, and came to be reported at the court of Versailles; for he received letters from some friends at Paris, advising him not to return thither, unless he could reconcile himself to a lodging in the Bastile. But he was soon free from that apprehension; for, if I mistake not, before half that time was accomplished Lewis XIV. died;* and, it is generally thought, his death was hastened by a very accidental circumstance, which had some reference to the Captain's prophecy. For the last time he ever dined in public, which was a very little while after the report of it had been made there, he happened to discover our British envoy among the spectators. The penetration of this illustrious person was too great, and his attachment to the interest of his royal master too well known, not to render him very disagreeable to that crafty and tyrannical prince, whom God had so long suffered to be the disgrace of monarchy, and the scourge of Europe. He at first appeared very languid, as indeed he was; but on casting his eye upon the Earl of Stair, he affected to appear before him in a much better state of health than he really was; and therefore, as if he had been awakened on a sudden from some deep reverie, he immediately put himself into an erect posture, called up a laboured vivacity into his countenance, and ate much more heartily than was by any means advisable, repeating it two or three times to a nobleman (I think the Duke of Bourbon) then in waiting, "Methinks I eat very well for a man who is to die so soon."† But this inroad upon that regularity of living, which he had for some time observed, agreed so ill with him, that he never recovered this meal, but died in less than a fortnight. This gave occasion for some humorous people to say, that old Lewis, after all, was killed by a Briton. But if this story be true, which I think there can be no room to doubt, as the colonel, from whom I have often heard it, though absent, could scarce be misinformed, it might more properly be said, that he fell by his own vanity; in which view I thought it so remarkable, as not to be unworthy a place in these memoirs.

* [illegible]

† [illegible]

§ 22. The Captain quickly returned, and continued with small interruptions at Paris at least till the year 1720, and how much longer I do not certainly know. The Earl's favour and generosity made him easy in his affairs, though he was, as has been observed before, part of the time out of commission, by breaking the regiment to which he belonged, of which before he was Major. This was, in all probability, the gayest part of his life, and the most criminal. Whatever wise and good examples he might find in the family where he had the honour to reside, it is certain that the French court, during the regency of the Duke of Orleans, was one of the most dissolute under heaven. What, by a wretched abuse of language, have been called intrigues of love and gallantry, were so entirely to the Major's then degenerate taste, that, if not the whole business, at least the whole happiness, of his life consisted in them; and he had now too much leisure, for one who was so prone to abuse it. His fine constitution, than which perhaps there was hardly ever a better, gave him great opportunities of indulging himself in these excesses; and his good spirits enabled him to pursue his pleasures, of every kind, in so alert and sprightly a manner, that multitudes envied him, and called him, by a dreadful kind of compliment, "The happy rake."

§ 23. Yet still the checks of conscience, and some remaining principles of so good an education, would break in upon his most licentious hours; and I particularly remember he told me, that when some of his dissolute companions were once congratulating him on his most distinguished felicity, a dog happening at that time to come into the room, he could not forbear groaning inwardly, and saying to himself, "Oh that I were that dog!" Such then was his happiness; and such perhaps is that of hundreds more who bear themselves highest in the contempt of religion, and glory in that infamous servitude which they affect to call liberty. But these remonstrances of reason and conscience were in vain; and, in short, he carried things so far, in this wretched part of his life, that I am well assured, some sober English gentlemen, who made no great pretences to religion, how agreeable soever he might have been to them on other accounts, rather declined than sought his company, as fearing they might have been insnared and corrupted by it.

§ 24. Yet I cannot find that, in these most abandoned days, he was fond of drinking. Indeed he never had any natural relish for that kind of intemperance, from which he used to think a manly pride might be sufficient to preserve persons of sense and spirit; as by it they give up every thing that distinguishes them from the meanest of their species, or indeed from animals the most below it. So that, if he ever fell into any excesses of this kind, it was merely out of complaisance to his company, and that he might not appear stiff and singular. His frank, obliging, and generous temper, procured him many friends; and these principles, which rendered him amiable to others, not being under the direction of true wisdom and piety, sometimes made him, in the ways of living he pursued, more uneasy to himself, than he might perhaps have been if he could entirely have overgrown them; especially as he was never a sceptic in his principles, but still retained a secret apprehension, that natural and revealed religion, though he did not much care to think of either, were founded in truth. And with this conviction, his notorious violations of the most essential precepts of both, could not but occasion some secret misgivings of heart. His continual neglect of the great Author of his being, of whose perfections he could not doubt, and to whom he knew himself to be under daily and perpetual obligations, gave him, in some moments of involuntary reflection, inexpressible remorse; and this, at times, wrought upon him to such a degree, that he resolved he would attempt to pay him some acknowledgments. Accordingly for a few mornings he did it; repeating in retirement some passages out of the Psalms, and perhaps other scriptures, which he still retained in his memory; and owning, in a few strong words, the many mercies and deliverances he had received, and the ill returns he had made for them.

§ 25. I find, among the other papers transmitted to me, the following verses, which I have heard him repeat, as what had impressed him a good deal in his unconverted state; and as I suppose they did something towards setting him on this effort towards devotion, and might probably furnish out a part of these orisons, I hope I need make no apology to my reader for inserting them, especially as I do not recollect that I have seen them any where else.

> Attend, my soul! the early birds inspire
> My grov'ling thought with pure celestial fire:
> They from their temp'rate sleep awake, and pay
> Their thankful anthems for the new born day.
> See, how the tuneful lark is mounted high,
> And just like saints the eastern sky!
> He warbles through the fragrant air his lays,
> And seems the heav'nly joys to praise:
> But man, more void of gratitude awakes,
> And gives no thanks for the sweet rest he takes,
> Looks on the glorious rising new kindled flame
> Without one thought of him from whom it came.
> The wretch unhallow'd does the day begin,
> Shakes off his sleep, but shakes not off his sin.

§ 26. But these strains were too devout to continue long in a heart as yet quite unsanctified; for how readily soever he could repeat such acknowledgments of the divine power, presence, and goodness, and own his own follies and faults, he was stopt short by the remonstrances of his conscience, as to the flagrant absurdity of confessing sins he did not desire to forsake, and of pretending to praise God for his mercies, when he did not endeavour to live to his service, and to behave in such a manner as gratitude, if sincere, would plainly dictate. A model of devotion, where such sentiments made no part, his good sense could not digest; and the use of such language before a heart-searching God, merely as a hypocritical form, while the sentiments of his soul were contrary to it, justly appeared to him such daring profaneness, that, irregular as the state of his mind was, the thought of it struck him with horror. He therefore determined to make no more attempts of this sort; and was perhaps one of the first that deliberately laid aside prayer, from some sense of God's omniscience, and some natural principle of honour and conscience.

§ 27. These secret debates with himself, and ineffectual efforts, would sometimes return: but they were overborne, again and again, by the force of temptation; and it is no wonder that, in consequence of them, his heart grew yet harder. Nor was it softened, or awakened, by some very memorable deliverances, which at this time he received. —He was in extreme danger by a fall from his horse, as he was riding post, I think in the streets of Calais, when going down a hill, the horse threw him over his head, and pitched over him; so that, when he rose, the beast lay beyond him, and almost dead. Yet, though he received not the least harm, it made no serious impression on his mind. In his return from England in the packet-boat, (if I remember right, but a few weeks after the former accident,) a violent storm, that drove them up to Harwich, tossed them from thence for several hours in a dark night on the coast of Holland, and brought them into such extremity, that the captain of the vessel urged him to go to prayers immediately, if he ever intended to do it at all; for he concluded, they would in a few minutes be at the bottom of the sea. In this circumstance he did pray, and that very fervently too: and it was very remarkable, that while he was crying to God for deliverance, the wind fell, and quickly after they arrived at Calais. But the Major was so little affected with what had befallen him, that, when some of his gay friends, on hearing the story, rallied him upon the efficacy of his prayers, he excused himself from the scandal of being thought much in earnest, by saying, "that it was at midnight, an hour when his good mother and aunt were asleep; or else he should have left that part of the business to them." A speech which I should not have mentioned, but as it shows in so lively a view the wretched situation of his mind at that time, though his great deliverance from the power of darkness was then nearly approaching. He recounted these things to me with the greatest humility, as showing how utterly unworthy he was of that miracle of divine grace, by which he was quickly after brought to so true, and so prevalent, a sense of religion.

§ 28. And now I am come to that astonishing part of his story, the account of his conversion; which I cannot enter upon, without assuring the reader that I have sometimes been tempted to suppress many circumstances of it; not only as they may seem incredible to some, and enthusiastical to others, but as I am very sensible they are liable to great abuses, which was the reason that he gave me for concealing the most extraordinary from many persons to whom he mentioned some of the rest. And I believe it was this, together with the desire of avoiding every thing that might look like ostentation on this head, that prevented his leaving a written account of it; though I have often entreated him to do it; as I particularly remember I did in the very last letter I ever wrote him; and pleaded the possibility of his falling amidst those dangers, to which I knew his valour might in such circumstances naturally expose him. I was not so happy as to receive any answer to this letter, which reached him but a few days before his death; nor can I certainly say, whether he had or had not complied with my request; as it is very possible a paper of that kind, if it were written, might be lost amidst the ravages which the rebels made when they plundered Bankton.

§ 29. The story however was so remarkable, that I had little reason to apprehend I should ever forget it; and yet, to guard against all contingencies of that kind, I wrote it down that very evening, as I had heard it from his own mouth. And I have now before me the memoirs of that conversation, dated August 14, 1739, which conclude with these words: (which I added, that if we should both have died that night, the world might not have lost this edifying and affecting history, or have wanted any attestation of it I was capable of giving:) "N. B. I have written down this account with all the exactness I am capable of, and could safely take an oath of it as to the truth of every circumstance, to the best of my remembrance, as the Colonel related it to me a few hours ago." I do not know that I had reviewed this paper since I wrote it, till I set myself thus publicly to record this extraordinary fact; but I find it punctually to agree with what I have often related from my memory, which I charged carefully with so wonderful and important a fact. It is with all solemnity that I now deliver it down to posterity, as in the sight and presence of God. And I choose deliberately to expose myself to those severe censures, which the haughty but empty scorn of infidelity, or principles nearly approaching it, and effectually doing its pernicious work, may very probably dictate upon the occasion; rather than to smother a relation, which may, in the judgment of my conscience, be like to conduce so much to the glory of God, the honour of the gospel, and the good of mankind. One thing more I will only premise, that I hope none who have heard the Colonel himself speak something of this wonderful scene, will be surprised if they find some new circumstances here; because he assured me at the time he first gave me the whole narration, which was in the very room in which I now write, that he had never imparted it so fully to any man living before. Yet at the same time he gave me full liberty to communicate it to whomsoever I should in my conscience judge it might be useful to do it, whether before or after his death. Accordingly I did, while he was alive, recount almost every circumstance I am now going to write, to several pious friends; referring them at the same time to the Colonel himself, whenever they might have an opportunity of seeing or writing to him, for a further confirmation of what I told them, if they judged it requisite. They glorified God in him; and I humbly hope many of my readers will also do it. They will soon perceive the reason of so much caution in my introduction to this story, for which therefore I shall make no further apology.*

§ 30. This memorable event happened towards the middle of July, 1719, but I cannot be exact as to the day. The Major had spent the evening, and, if I mistake not, it was the sabbath, in some gay company, and had an unhappy assignation with a married woman, of what rank or quality I did not particularly inquire, whom he was to attend exactly at twelve. The company broke up about eleven; and not judging it convenient to anticipate the time appointed, he went into his chamber to kill the tedious hour, perhaps with some amusing book, or some other way. But it very accidentally happened that he took up a religious book, which his good mother or aunt had, without his knowledge, slipped into his portmanteau. It was called, if I remember the title exactly, The Christian Soldier, or Heaven taken by Storm, and was written by Mr. Thomas Watson. Guessing by the title of it that he should find some phrases of his own profession spiritualized, in a manner which he thought might afford him some diversion, he resolved to dip into it; but he took no serious notice of any thing he read in it; and yet, while this book was in his hand, an impression was made upon his mind, perhaps God only knows how, which drew after it a train of the most important and happy consequences.

§ 31. There is indeed a possibility, that while he was sitting in this attitude, and reading in this careless and profane manner, he might suddenly fall asleep, and only dream of what he apprehended he saw. But nothing can be more certain than that, when he gave me this relation, he judged himself to have been as broad awake, during the whole time, as he ever was in any part of his life; and he mentioned it to me several times afterwards, as what undoubtedly passed, not only in his imagination, but before his eyes.†

§ 32. He thought he saw an unusual blaze of light fall on the book while he was reading, which he at first imagined might happen by some accident in the candle. But lifting up his eyes, he apprehended, to his extreme amazement, that there was before him, as it were suspended in the air, a visible representation of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross, surrounded on all sides with a glory; and was impressed as if a voice, or something equivalent to a voice, had come to him to this effect, for he was not confident as to the very words; "O sinner, did I suffer this for thee, and are these the returns?" But whether this were an audible voice, or only a strong impression on his mind equally striking, he did not seem very confident; though, to the best of my remembrance, he rather judged it to be the former. Struck with so amazing a phenomenon as this, there remained hardly any life in him, so that he sunk down in the arm-chair in which he sat, and continued, he knew not exactly how long, insensible; which was one circumstance that made me several times take the liberty to suggest that he might possibly be all this while asleep: but however that were, he quickly after opened his eyes, and saw nothing more than usual.

§ 33. It may easily be supposed, he was in no condition to make any observation upon the time in which he had remained in an insensible state. Nor did he, throughout all the remainder of the night, once recollect that criminal and detestable assignation, which had before engrossed all his thoughts. He rose in a tumult of passions not to be conceived; and walked to and fro in his chamber, till he was ready to drop down, in unutterable astonishment and agony of heart; appearing to himself the vilest monster in the creation of God, who had all his life time been crucifying Christ afresh by his sins, and now saw, as he assuredly believed, by a miraculous vision, the horror of what he had done. With this was connected such a view, both of the majesty and goodness of God, as caused him to loathe and abhor himself, and to repent as in

* It is remarkable that from the time I wrote this before-mentioned Letter from the Rev. Mr. Spears, minister of the parish of Bonhill, dated June 14, 1748, which he returned to me this whole story as read by him, the Colonel never mentioned one word of it to me, though I was frequently with him, and he gave me the most free and unreserved access to him. I have indeed a single word or two in either of my conversations with him, and every one of the particulars in these several accounts, and afterwards in the same manner almost in the same words, and very circumstantial as well. I shall add a short remark after I come to it. A few days after I was with him after Lady Frances Gardiner, at her desire, and afterwards with a gentleman from our own house, in order to collect a circumstantial attestation how he recorded it was to those persons to whom he first communicated it, before he heard the Colonel gave it a further.

† Mr. Spears, in the letter mentioned above, where he endeavours the Colonel to bring his story into three words: "All of a sudden there was represented to my view, or he was moved to a representation of him [Christ] Redeemer." So—And then, thereupon such an impression thereon." It was so lively and striking, that he could not tell whether it was by the bodily eyes, or by some such like method." I was indeed very much struck when I first read this account of various gentlemen, &c. "as being what must have suggested to me the unfavourable notion that I entertained of his extraordinary. I had some reason to repent him. Yet still I am persuaded, in general upon the whole, whether it were before the eyes or in the mind, and not any doubt.

dust and ashes. He immediately gave judgment against himself, that he was most justly worthy of eternal damnation: he was astonished that he had not been immediately struck dead in the midst of his wickedness: and, which I think deserves particular remark, though he assuredly believed that he should ere long be in hell, and settled it as a point with himself for several months, that the wisdom and justice of God did almost necessarily require, that such an enormous sinner should be made an example of everlasting vengeance, and a spectacle as such both to angels and men, so that he hardly durst presume to pray for pardon; yet what he then suffered, was not so much from the fear of hell, though he concluded it would soon be his portion, as from a sense of that horrible ingratitude he had shown to the God of his life, and to that blessed Redeemer, who had been in so affecting a manner set forth as crucified before him.

§ 34. To this he refers in a letter, dated from Douglas, April 1, 1725, communicated to me by his lady,* but I know not to whom it was addressed. His words are these: "One thing relating to my conversion, and a remarkable instance of the goodness of God to me, the chief of sinners, I do not remember that I ever told to any other person. It was this; that after the astonishing sight I had of my blessed Lord, the terrible condition in which I was, proceeded not so much from the terrors of the law, as from a sense of having been so ungrateful a monster to him whom I thought I saw pierced for my transgressions." I the rather insert these words, as they evidently attest the circumstance which may seem most amazing in this affair, and contain so express a declaration of his own apprehension concerning it.

§ 35. In this view it may naturally be supposed, that he passed the remainder of the night waking; and he could get but little rest in several that followed. His mind was continually taken up in reflecting on the divine purity and goodness; the grace which had been proposed to him in the gospel, and which he had rejected; the singular advantages he had enjoyed and abused; and the many favours of Providence which he had received, particularly in rescuing him from so many imminent dangers of death, which he now saw must have been attended with such dreadful and hopeless destruction. The privileges of his education, which he had so much despised, now lay with an almost insupportable weight on his mind; and the folly of that career of sinful pleasure, which he had so many years been running with desperate eagerness and unworthy delight, now filled him with indignation against himself, and against the great deceiver, by whom, to use his own phrase, he had been "so wretchedly and scandalously befooled." This he used often to express in the strongest terms; which I shall not repeat so particularly as I can recollect some of them. But, on the whole, it is certain, that by what passed before he left his chamber the next day, the whole frame and disposition of his soul was new-modelled and changed; so that he became, and continued to the last day of his exemplary and truly Christian life, the very reverse of what he had been before. A variety of particulars, which I am afterwards to mention, will illustrate this in the most convincing manner. But I cannot proceed to them, without pausing awhile to adore so illustrious an instance of the power and freedom of divine grace, and entreating my reader seriously to reflect upon it, that his own heart may be suitably affected: for surely, if the truth of the fact be admitted, in the lowest views in which it can be placed, that is, supposing the first impression to have passed in a dream, it must be allowed to have been little, if any thing, less than miraculous. It cannot in the course of nature be imagined, how such a dream should arise in a mind full of the most impure ideas and affections, and, as he himself often pleaded, more alienated from the thoughts of a crucified Saviour, than from any other object that can be conceived; nor can we surely suppose it should, without a mighty energy of the divine power, be effectual to produce not only some transient flow of passion, but so entire and so permanent a change in character and conduct.

§ 36. On the whole, therefore, I must beg leave to express my own sentiments of the matter, by repeating on this occasion what I wrote several years ago, in my eighth Sermon on Regeneration, in a passage dictated chiefly by the circumstantial knowledge which I had of this amazing story, and methinks sufficiently vindicated by it, if it stood entirely alone; which yet, I must take the liberty to say, it does not; for I hope the world will be particularly informed, that there is at least a second, that very nearly approaches it, whenever the established church of England shall lose one of its brightest living ornaments, and one of the most useful members which that, or perhaps any other Christian communion, can boast: in the mean time, may his exemplary life be long continued, and his zealous ministry abundantly prospered! I beg my reader's pardon for this digression. The passage I referred to above is remarkably, though not equally, applicable to both the cases, as it stands in page 265, of the first edition, and page 160, of the second; under that head, where I am showing, that God sometimes accomplishes the great work of which we speak, by secret and immediate impressions on the mind. After preceding illustrations, there are the following words, on which the Colonel's conversion will throw the justest light: "Yea, I have known those of distinguished genius, polite manners, and great experience in human affairs, who, after having outgrown all the impressions of a religious education, after having been hardened, rather than subdued, by the most singular mercies, even various, repeated, and astonishing deliverances, which have appeared to themselves no less than miraculous; after having lived for years without God in the world, notoriously corrupt themselves, and labouring to the utmost to corrupt others; have been stopt on a sudden in the full career of their sin, and have felt such rays of the divine presence, and of redeeming love, darting in upon their minds, almost like lightning from heaven, as have at once roused, overpowered, and transformed them; so that they have come out of their secret chambers with an irreconcilable enmity to those vices, to which, when they entered them, they were the tamest and most abandoned slaves; and have appeared from that very hour the votaries, the patrons, the champions of religion; and after a course of the most resolute attachment to it, in spite of all the reasonings or the railleries, the importunities or the reproaches, of its enemies, they have continued to this day some of its brightest ornaments: a change, which I behold with equal wonder and delight, and which, if a nation should join in deriding it, I would adore as the finger of God."

* N. B. Where I make any extracts as from Colonel Gardiner's letters, they are either from originals, which I have in my own hands, or from copies, which were transcribed for me from persons of undoubted credit, chiefly by the Right Honourable the Lady Frances Gardiner, through the hand of the Rev. Mr Webster, one of the ministers of Edinburgh. Thus I rather mention, because some others have been brought to me as Colonel Gardiner's, concerning which I have not only been very dubious, but morally certain, that they could not have been written by him. I have also heard of many, who have been fond of assuring the world, that they were well acquainted with him, and were near him when he fell, whose reports have been most inconsistent with each other, as well as contrary to that testimony relating to the circumstances of his death, which, on the whole, appeared to be beyond controversy the most natural and authentic: from whence therefore I shall take my account of that affecting scene.

§ 37. The mind of Major Gardiner continued from this remarkable time till towards the end of October, that is, rather more than three months, but especially the two first of them, in an extraordinary a situation as one can well imagine. He knew nothing of the joys arising from a sense of pardon; but, on the contrary, for the greater part of that time, and with very short intervals of hope toward the end of it, took it for granted, that he must, in all probability, quickly perish. Nevertheless, he had such a sense of the evil of sin, of the goodness of the divine Being, and of the admirable tendency of the Christian revelation, that he resolved to spend the remainder of his life, while God continued him out of hell, in as rational and as useful a manner as he could, and to continue casting himself at the feet of divine Mercy, every day, and often in a day, if peradventure there might be hope of pardon, of which all that he could say was, that he did not absolutely despair. He had at that time such a sense of the degeneracy of his own heart, that he hardly durst form any determinate resolution against sin, or pretend to engage himself by any vow in the presence of God; but he was continually crying to him, that he would deliver him from the bondage of corruption. He perceived in himself a most surprising alteration with regard to the dispositions of his heart; so that, though he felt little of the delight of religious duties, he extremely desired opportunities of being engaged in them; and those licentious pleasures, which had before been his heaven, were now absolutely his aversion. And indeed, when I consider how habitual all those criminal indulgences were grown to him, and that he was now in the prime of life, and all this while in high health too, I cannot but be astonished to reflect upon it, that he should be so wonderfully sanctified in body, as well as in soul and spirit, as that, for all the future years of his life, he, from that hour, should find so constant a disinclination to, and abhorrence of, those criminal sensualities, to which he fancied he was before so invincibly impelled by his very constitution, that he was used strangely to think, and to say, that omnipotence itself could not reform him, without destroying that body, and giving him another.*

§ 38. Nor was he only delivered from that bondage of corruption, which had been habitual to him for so many years, but felt in his breast so contrary a disposition, that he was grieved to see human nature, in those to whom he was most [illegible] a stranger, prostituted to such low and contemptible pursuits. He therefore exerted his natural courage in a very new kind of conflict, and became an open advocate for religion, in all its principles, so far as he was acquainted with them, and all its precepts, relating to sobriety, righteousness, and godliness. Yet he was very desirous and cautious that he might not run into an extreme, and made it one of his first petitions to God, the very day after these amazing impressions had been wrought in his mind, that he might not be suffered to behave with such an affected strictness and preciseness, as would lead others about him into mistaken notions of religion, and expose it to reproach or suspicion, as if it were an unlovely or uncomfortable thing. For this reason he endeavoured to appear as cheerful in conversation as he conscientiously could; though, in spite of all his precautions, some traces of that deep inward sense which he had of his guilt and misery would at times appear. He made no secret of it, however, that his views were entirely changed, though he concealed the particular circumstances attending that change. He told his most intimate companions freely, that he had reflected on the course of life in which he had so long joined them, and found it to be folly and madness, unworthy a rational creature, and much more unworthy persons calling themselves Christians. And he set up his standard, upon all occasions, against principles of infidelity, and practices of vice, as determinately, and as boldly, as ever he displayed or planted his colours, when he bore them with so much honour in the field.

* Mr. Spears expresses [illegible] remarkable words: "I was sure that Colonel [illegible] and I immediately [illegible] that [illegible] Colonel [illegible] Gardiner [illegible] Colonel [illegible] Gardiner [illegible] Colonel [illegible] Gardiner

§ 39. I cannot forbear mentioning one struggle of this kind, which he described to me, with a large detail of circumstances, the first day of our acquaintance. There was at that time in Paris a certain lady, whose name, then well known in the grand and the gay world, I must beg leave to conceal, who had imbibed the principles of deism, and valued herself much upon being an avowed advocate for them. The Major, with his usual frankness, though I doubt not with that politeness of manners which was so habitual to him, and which he retained throughout his whole life, answered her like a man who perfectly saw through the fallacy of her arguments, and was grieved to the heart for her delusion. On this she briskly challenged him to debate the matter at large, and to fix upon a day for that purpose, when he should dine with her, attended with any clergyman he might choose, whether of the protestant or catholic communion. A sense of duty would not allow him to decline this challenge; and yet he had no sooner accepted it, but he was thrown into great perplexity and distress, lest being, as I remember he expressed it when he told me the story, only a Christian of six weeks old, he should prejudice so good a cause, by his unskilful manner of defending it. However, he sought his refuge in earnest and repeated prayers to God, that he who can ordain strength, and perfect praise, out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, would graciously enable him, on this occasion, to vindicate his truths in a manner which might carry conviction along with it. He then endeavoured to marshal the arguments in his own mind, as well as he could; and apprehending that he could not speak with so much freedom before a number of persons, especially before such, whose province he might in that case seem to invade, if he had not devolved the principal part of the discourse upon them, he easily admitted the apology of a clergyman or two, to whom he mentioned the affair, and waited on the lady alone upon the day appointed. But his heart was so set upon the business, that he came earlier than he was expected, and time enough to have two hours' discourse before dinner; nor did he at all decline having two young persons, nearly related to the lady, present during the conference.

§ 40. The Major opened it, with a view of such arguments for the Christian religion as he had digested in his own mind, to prove that the apostles were not mistaken themselves, and that they could not have intended to impose upon us, in the accounts they give of the grand facts they attest; with the truth of which facts, that of the Christian religion is most apparently connected. And it was a great encouragement to him to find that, unaccustomed as he was to discourses of this nature, he had an unusual command, both of thought and expression; so that he recollected and uttered every thing as he could have wished. The lady heard with attention; and though he paused between every branch of the argument, she did not interrupt the course of it, till he told her he had finished his design, and waited for her reply. She then produced some of her objections, which he took up and canvassed in such a manner, that at length she burst out into tears, allowed the force of his arguments and replies, and appeared, for some time after, so deeply impressed with the conversation, that it was observed by several of her friends; and there is reason to believe that the impression continued, at least so far as to prevent her from ever appearing under the character of an unbeliever or a sceptic.

§ 41. This is only one specimen, among many, of the battles he was almost daily called out to fight in the cause of religion and virtue: with relation to which I find him expressing himself thus, in a letter to Mrs. Gardiner, his good mother, dated from Paris, the 25th of January following, that is, 1719-20, in answer to one, in which she had warned him to expect such trials. "I have," says he, "already met with them, and am obliged to fight, and to dispute every inch of ground: but all thanks and praise to the great Captain of my salvation, he fights for me; and then it is no wonder that I come off more than conqueror," by which last expression I suppose he meant to insinuate, that he was strengthened and established, rather than overborne, by this opposition. Yet it was not immediately that he gained such fortitude. He has often told me, how much he felt in those days of the emphasis of those well-chosen words of the apostle, in which he ranks the trial of cruel mockings, with scourgings, and bonds, and imprisonments. The continual railleries with which he was received, in almost all companies where he had been most familiar before, did often distress him beyond measure; so that he has several times declared, he would much rather have marched up to a battery of the enemy's cannon, than have been obliged, so continually as he was, to face such artillery as this. But, like a brave soldier in the first action wherein he is engaged, he continued resolute, though shuddering at the terror of the assault; and quickly overcame those impressions, which it is not perhaps in nature wholly to avoid: and therefore I find him in the letter referred to above, which was written about half a year after his conversion, "quite ashamed to think of the uneasiness which these things once gave him." In a word, he went on, as every resolute Christian by divine grace may do, till he turned ridicule and opposition into respect and veneration.

§ 42. But this sensible triumph over these difficulties was not till his Christian experience had been abundantly advanced, by the blessing of God on the sermons he heard, particularly in the Swiss chapel, and on the many hours which he spent in devout retirement, pouring out his whole soul before God in prayer. He began, within about two months after his first memorable change, to perceive some secret dawnings of more cheerful hope, that vile as he saw himself to be, and I believe no words can express how vile that was, he might nevertheless obtain mercy through a Redeemer. And at length, if I remember right, about the end of October, 1719, he found all the burthen of his mind taken off at once by the powerful impression of that memorable scripture upon his mind; Rom. iii. 25, 26. Whom God hath set forth for a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness in the remission of sins—that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. He had used to imagine, that the justice of God required the damnation of so enormous a sinner as he saw himself to be: but now he was made deeply sensible, that the divine justice might be, not only vindicated, but glorified, in saving him by the blood of Jesus, even that blood which cleanseth us from all sin. Then did he see and feel the riches of redeeming love and grace in such a manner as not only engaged him, with the utmost pleasure and confidence, to venture his soul upon it; but even swallowed up, as it were, his whole heart in the returns of love, which from that blessed time became the genuine and delightful principle of his obedience, and animated him with an enlarged heart to run the way of God's commandments. Thus God was pleased, as he himself used to speak, in an hour to turn his captivity. All the terrors of his former state were changed into unutterable joy, which kept him almost continually waking for three nights together, and yet refreshed him as the noblest of cordials. His expressions, though naturally very strong, always seemed to be swallowed up, when he would describe the series of thought through which he now passed, under the rapturous experience of that joy unspeakable and full of glory, which then seemed to overflow his very soul: as indeed there was nothing he seemed to speak of with greater relish. And though the first ecstasies of it afterwards subsided into a more calm and composed delight; yet were the impressions so deep and so permanent, that he assured me on the word of a Christian and a friend, wonderful as it might seem, that for about seven years after this he enjoyed almost a heaven upon earth. His soul was so continually filled with a sense of the love of God in Christ, that it knew little interruption, but when necessary converse, and the duties of his station, called off his thoughts for a little time; and when they did so, as soon as he was alone, the torrent returned into its natural channel again; so that, from the minute of his awakening in the morning, his heart was rising to God, and triumphing in him; and these thoughts attended him through all the scenes of life, till he lay down on his bed again, and a short parenthesis of sleep (for it was but a very short one that he allowed himself) invigorated his animal powers, for renewing them with greater intenseness and sensibility.

§ 43. I shall have an opportunity of illustrating this in the most convincing manner below, by extracts from several letters which he wrote to intimate friends during this happy period of time; letters which breathe a spirit of such sublime and fervent piety, as I have seldom met with any where else. In these circumstances, it is no wonder that he was greatly delighted with Dr. Watts's imitation of the 126th Psalm; since it may be questioned whether there ever was a person to whom the following stanzas of it were more suitable.

I.

When God revealed his gracious name
And changed my mournful state,
My rapture seemed a pleasing dream,
Thy grace appear'd so great.

II.

The world beheld the glorious change,
And did thine hand confess;
My tongue broke out in unknown strains,
And sung surprising grace.

III.

"Great is the work," my neighbours cried,
And owned the power divine:
"Great is the work," my heart replied,
"And be the glory thine."

IV.

The Lord can change the darkest skies,
Can give us day for night,
Make floods of sacred sorrow rise
To rivers of delight.

V.

Let those that sow in sadness wait
Till the fair harvest come:
They shall confess their sheaves are great,
And shout the blessings home.

§ 44. I have been so happy as to get the sight of five original letters, which he wrote to his mother about this time; which do, in a very lively manner, illustrate the surprising change made in the whole current of his thoughts and temper of his mind. Many of them were written in the most hasty manner, just as the courier who brought them was, perhaps unexpectedly, setting out; and they relate chiefly to affairs in which the public is not at all concerned; yet there is not one of them in which he has not inserted some warm and genuine sentiment of religion. And indeed it is very remarkable that, though he was pleased to honour me with a great many letters, and I have seen several more which he wrote to others, some of them on journeys, where he could have but a few minutes at command, yet I cannot recollect that I ever saw any one in which there was not some trace of piety. And the Reverend Mr. Webster, who was employed to review great numbers of them, that he might select such extracts as he should think proper to communicate to me, has made the same observation.*

§ 45. The Major, with great justice, tells the good lady, his mother, "that, when she saw him again, she would find the person indeed the same, but every thing else entirely changed." And she might easily have perceived it of herself, by the whole tenor of those letters, which every where breathe the unaffected spirit of a true Christian. They are taken up, sometimes with giving advice and directions concerning some pious and charitable contributions, one of which, I remember, amounted to ten guineas, though, as he was then out of commission, and had not formerly been very frugal, it cannot be supposed he had much to spare; sometimes in speaking of the pleasure with which he attended sermons, and expected sacramental opportunities; and at other times in exhorting her, established as she was in religion, to labour after a yet more exemplary character and conduct, or in recommending her to the divine presence and blessing, as well as himself to her prayers. What satisfaction such letters as these must give to a lady of her distinguished piety, who had so long wept over this dear and amiable son, as quite lost to God, and on the verge of final destruction, it is not for me to describe, or indeed to conceive. But hastily as these letters were written, only for private view, I will give a few specimens from them in his own words; which will serve to illustrate, as well as confirm, what I have hinted above.

§ 46. "I must take the liberty," says he, in a letter dated on the first day of the new year, or according to the old style, Dec. 21, 1719, "to entreat you, that you would receive no company on the Lord's day. I know you have a great many good acquaintance, with whose discourses one might be very well edified: but as you cannot keep out, and let in, whom you please, the best way, in my humble opinion, will be to see none." In another, of Jan. 25, "I am happier than any one can imagine, except I could put him exactly in the same situation with myself; which is what the world cannot give, and no man ever attained it, unless it were from above." In another, dated March 30, which was just before sacrament day, "To-morrow, if it please God, I shall be happy; my soul being to be fed with the bread of life, which came down from heaven. I shall be mindful of you all there." In another, of Jan. 29, he thus expresses that indifference for worldly possessions, which he so remarkably carried through all the remainder of his life: "I know the rich are only stewards for the poor, and must give an account of every penny; therefore the less I have, the more easy will it be to render a faithful account of it." And to add no more from these letters at present, in the conclusion of one of them he has these comprehensive and solemn words: "Now that He, who is the ease of the afflicted, the support of the weak, the wealth of the poor, the teacher of the ignorant, the anchor of the fearful, and the infinite reward of all faithful souls, may pour out upon you all his richest blessings, shall always be the prayer of him who is entirely yours," &c.

§ 47. To this account of his correspondence with his excellent mother, I should be glad to add a large view of another, to which she introduced him, with that reverend and valuable person, under whose pastoral care she was placed, I mean, the justly celebrated Dr. Edmund Calamy, to whom she could not but early communicate the joyful news of her son's conversion. I am not so happy as to be possessed of the letters which passed between them, which I have reason to believe would make a curious and valuable collection; but I have had the pleasure of receiving, from my worthy and amiable friend, the Reverend Mr. Edmund Calamy, one of the letters which the Doctor, his father, wrote to the Major on this wonderful occasion. I perceive by the contents of it that it was the first; and indeed it is dated as early as the third of August, 1719, which must be but a few days after his own account, dated August 1, N. S. could reach England. There is so much true religion and good sense in this paper, and the counsel it suggests may be so seasonable to other persons in circumstances which bear any resemblance to his, that I make no apology to my reader for inserting a large extract from it.

* His words are these: "I have read over a vast number of the Colonel's letters, and have not found any one of them, however short and wrot in the most passing manner, even when posting, but what is expressive of the most passionate breathings towards his God and Saviour. If the letter consists but of two sentences, religion is not forgot, which, doubtless deserves to be carefully remarked as the most uncontested evidence of a pious mind, even under the strongest impressions of divine things."

"Sir, "Dear Sir, — I conceive it will not much surprise you to understand that your good mother communicated to me your letter to her, dated Aug. 4, N. S. which brought her the news you conceive would be so acceptable to her. I, who have often been a witness to her concern for you on a spiritual account, can attest with what joy this news was received by her, and imparted to me as a special friend, who she knew would bear a part with her on such an occasion. And indeed, if (as our Saviour intimates, Luke xv. 7, 10.) there is in such cases joy in heaven, and among the angels of God, it may well be supposed that of a pious mother, who has spent so many prayers and tears upon you, and has, as it were, travailed in birth with you again, till Christ was formed in you, could not be small. You may believe me if I add, that I also, as a common friend of hers and yours, and which is much more, of the Prince of Light, whom you now declare you heartily fall in with, in opposition to that of the dark kingdom, could not but be tenderly affected with an account of it under your own hand. My joy on this account was the greater, considering the importance of your capacity, interests, and prospects; which in such an age as this may promise most happy consequences, on your heartily appearing on God's side, and embarking in the interest of our dear Redeemer. If I have hitherto at all remembered you at the throne of grace, at your good mother's desire, which you are pleased to take notice of with so much respect, I can assure you I shall henceforward be led to do it with more concern and particularity, both by duty and inclination. And if I were capable of giving you any little assistance in the noble design you are engaging in, by corresponding with you by letter, while you are at such a distance, I should do it most cheerfully. And perhaps such a motion may not be altogether unacceptable; for I am inclinable to believe, that when some, whom you are obliged to converse with, observe your behaviour so different from what it formerly was, and banter you upon it as mad and fanciful, it may be some little relief to correspond with one who will take a pleasure in heartening and encouraging you. And when a great many things frequently offer, in which conscience may be concerned, where duty may not always be plain, nor suitable persons to advise with at hand, it may be some satisfaction to you to correspond with one with whom you may use a friendly freedom in all such matters, and on whose fidelity you may depend. You may therefore command me in any of these respects, and I shall take a pleasure in serving you. One piece of advice I shall venture to give you, though your own good sense will make my enlarging upon it less needful; I mean, that you would, from your first setting out, carefully distinguish between the essentials of real religion, and those things which are commonly reckoned by its professors to belong to it. The want of this distinction has had very unhappy consequences from one age to another, and perhaps in none more than the present. But your daily converse with your Bible, which you mention, may herein give you great assistance. I move also, that since infidelity so much abounds, you would not only, by close and serious consideration, endeavour to settle yourself well in the fundamental principles of religion; but also that, as opportunity offers, you would converse with those books which treat most judiciously on the divine original of Christianity, such as Grotius, Abadie, Baxter, Bates, Du Plessis, &c. which may establish you against the cavils that occur in almost all conversations, and furnish you with arguments, which, when properly offered, may be of use to make some impressions on others. But being too much straitened to enlarge at present, I can only add, that if your hearty falling in with serious religion should prove any hinderance to your advancement in the world, which I pray God it may not, unless such advancement would be a real snare to you, I hope you will trust our Saviour's word, that it shall be no disadvantage to you in the final issue. He has given you his word for it, Matt. xix. 29. upon which you may safely depend; and I am satisfied, none that ever did so at last repented of it. May you go on and prosper, and the God of all grace and peace be with you!"

§ 49. I think it very evident, from the contents of this letter, that the Major had not imparted to his mother the most singular circumstances attending his conversion; and, indeed, there was something so peculiar in them, that I do not wonder he was always cautious in speaking of them, and, especially, that he was at first much on the reserve. We may also naturally reflect, that there seems to have been something very providential in this letter, considering the debate in which our illustrious convert was so soon engaged; for it was written but about three weeks before his conference with the lady above mentioned, in the defence of Christianity; or, at least, before the appointment of it. And as some of the books recommended by Dr. Calamy, particularly Abadie and Du Plessis, were undoubtedly within his reach, if our English advocates were not, this might, by the divine blessing, contribute considerably towards arming him for that combat, in which he came off with such happy success. And as in this instance, so in many others, they who will observe the coincidence and concurrence of things, may be engaged to adore the wise conduct of Providence in events, which, when taken singly and by themselves, have nothing very remarkable in them.

§ 50. I think it was about this time that this resolute and exemplary Christian entered upon that methodical manner of living, which he pursued through so many succeeding years of his life, and I believe, generally, so far as the broken state of his health would allow it in his latter days, to the very end of it. He used constantly to rise at four in the morning, and to spend his time till six in the secret exercises of devotion, reading, meditation, and prayer; in which last he contracted such a fervency of spirit, as I believe few men living ever obtained. This certainly tended very much to strengthen that firm faith in God, and reverent animating sense of his presence, for which he was so eminently remarkable, and which carried him through the trials and services of life with such steadiness, and with such activity; for he indeed endured, and acted as always seeing him who is invisible. If at any time he was obliged to go out before six in the morning, he rose proportionably sooner: so that when a journey, or a march, has required him to be on horseback by four, he would be at his devotions at furthest by two. He likewise secured time for retirement in an evening; and that he might have it the more at command, and be the more fit to use it properly, as well as the better able to rise early the next morning, he generally went to bed about ten: and, during the time I was acquainted with him, he seldom ate any supper, but a mouthful of bread with one glass of wine. In consequence of this, as well as of his admirably good constitution, and the long habit he had formed, he required less sleep than most persons I have known: and I doubt not but his uncommon progress in piety was in a great measure owing to these resolute habits of self-denial.

§ 51. A life any thing like this, could not, to be sure, be entered upon, in the midst of such company as he had been accustomed to keep, without great opposition; especially, as he did not entirely withdraw himself from all the circle of cheerful conversation; but, on the contrary, gave several hours every day to it, lest religion should be reproached as having made him morose. He, however, early began a practice, which to the last day of his life he retained, of reproving vice and profaneness; and was never afraid to debate the matter with any, under the consciousness of such superiority in the goodness of his cause.

§ 52. A remarkable instance of this happened, if I mistake not, about the middle of the year 1720, though I cannot be very exact as to the date of the story. It was however on his first return to make any considerable abode in England, after this remarkable change. He had heard, on the other side of the water, that it was currently reported among his companions at home, that he was stark mad: a report, at which no reader who knows the wisdom of the world in these matters, will be much surprised, any more than himself. He concluded therefore that he should have many battles to fight, and was willing to despatch the business as fast as he could. And therefore, being to spend a few days at the country house of a person of distinguished rank, with whom he had been very intimate, whose name I do not remember that he told me, nor did I think it proper to inquire after it, he begged the favour of him that he would contrive matters so, that a day or two after he came down several of their former gay companions might meet at his lordship's table; that he might have an opportunity of making his apology to them, and acquainting them with the nature and reasons of his change. It was accordingly agreed to, and a pretty large company met on the day appointed, with previous notice that Major Gardiner would be there. A good deal of raillery passed at dinner, to which the Major made very little answer. But when the cloth was taken away and the servants retired, he begged their patience for a few minutes, and then plainly and seriously told them what notions he entertained of virtue and religion, and on what considerations he had absolutely determined, that by the grace of God he would make it the care and business of life, whatever he might lose by it, and whatever censure and contempt he might incur. He well knew how improper it was in such company to relate the extraordinary manner in which he was awakened; which they would probably have interpreted to a demonstration of lunacy, against all the gravity and solidity of his discourse: but he contented himself with such a rational defence of a righteous, sober, and godly life, as he knew none of them could with any shadow of reason contest. He then challenged them to propose any thing they could urge, to prove that a life of irreligion and debauchery was preferable to the fear, love, and worship, of the eternal God, and a conduct agreeable to the precepts of his gospel. And he failed not to bear his testimony from his own experience, (to one part of which many of them had been witnesses,) that after having run the widest round of sensual pleasure, with all the advantages the best constitution and spirits could give him, he had never tasted any thing that deserved to be called happiness, till he had made religion his refuge and his delight. He testified, calmly and boldly, the habitual serenity and peace that he now felt in his own breast, (for the most elevated delights he did not think fit to plead, lest they should be esteemed enthusiasm,) and the composure and pleasure with which he looked forward to objects, which the gayest sinner must acknowledge to be equally unavoidable and dreadful.

§ 53. I know not what might be attempted by some of the company to answer to this: but I well remember he told me, the master of the table, a person of a very frank and candid disposition, cut short the debate, and said, "Come, let us call another cause: we thought this man mad, and he is in good earnest proving that we are so." On the whole, this well judged circumstance saved him a great deal of future trouble. When his former acquaintance observed, that he was still conversable and innocently cheerful, and that he was unmovable in his resolutions, they desisted from further importunity. And he has assured me, that, instead of losing any one valuable friend by this change in his character, he found himself much more esteemed and regarded, by many who could not persuade themselves to imitate his example.

§ 54. I have not any memoirs of Colonel Gardiner's life, or any other remarkable event befalling him in it, from the time of his return to England, till his marriage, in the year 1726, except the extracts which have been sent me from some letters, which he wrote to his religious friends during this interval, and which I cannot pass by without a more particular notice. It may be recollected, that in consequence of the reduction of that regiment of which he was major, he was out of commission from November the 10th, 1718, till June the 1st, 1724, and after he returned from Paris, I find all his letters, during this period, dated from London, where he continued, in communion with the Christian society under the pastoral care of Doctor Calamy. As his good mother also belonged to the same, it is easy to imagine, it must be an unspeakable pleasure to her, to have such frequent opportunities of conversing with such a son, of observing in his daily conduct and discourses the blessed effects of that change which divine grace had made in his heart, and of sitting down with him monthly at that sacred feast, where Christians so frequently enjoy the divinest entertainments which they expect on this side of heaven. I the rather mention this ordinance, because as this excellent lady had a very high esteem for it, so she had an opportunity of attending it, but the very Lord's day immediately preceding her death, which happened on Thursday, Oct. 7, 1725, after her son had been removed from her almost a year. He had manifested her handsomely out of that very moderate income, on which he subsisted since his regiment had been disbanded; and when she expressed her gratitude to him for it, he assured her, I think in one of the last letters she ever received from him, "that he esteemed it a great honour, that God put it into his power to make," what he called, "a very small acknowledgment of all her care for him, and especially of the many prayers she had offered on his account, which had already been remarkably answered, and the benefit of which he hoped ever to enjoy."

§ 55. I apprehend that the Earl of Stair's regiment, to the majority of which he was promoted on the 20th of July, 1724, was then quartered in Scotland: for all the letters in my hand, from that time to the 6th of February, 1726, are dated from thence, and particularly from Douglas, Stranrawen, Hamilton, and Ayr: but I have the pleasure to find, from comparing these with others of an earlier date from London and the neighbouring parts, that neither the detriment which he must suffer by being so long out of commission, nor the hurry of affairs while charged with it, could prevent or interrupt that intercourse with heaven, which was his daily feast, and his daily strength.

§ 56. These were most eminently the happy years of his life: for he had learned to estimate his happiness, not by the increase of honour, or the possession of wealth, or by what was much dearer to his generous heart than either, the converse of the dearest and worthiest human friends; but by nearness to God, and by opportunities of humble converse with him, in the lively exercise of contemplation, praise, and prayer. Now there was no period of his life in which he was more eminently favoured with these: nor do I find any of his letters so overflowing with transports of holy joy, as those which were dated during this time. There are indeed in some of them such very sublime passages, that I have been dubious whether I should communicate them to the public or not; lest I should administer matters of profane ridicule to some, who look upon all the elevations of devotion as a contemptible enthusiasm. And it has also given me some apprehensions, lest it should discourage some pious Christians, who, after having spent several years in the service of God, and in humble obedience to the precepts of his gospel, may not have attained to any such heights as these. But, on the whole, I cannot satisfy myself to suppress them; not only as I number some of them, considered in a devotional view, among the most extraordinary pieces of the kind I have ever met with; but as some of the most excellent and judicious persons I any where know, to whom I have read them, have assured me, that they felt their hearts in an unusual manner impressed, quickened, and edified by them.

§ 57. I will therefore draw back the veil and show my much honoured friend in his most secret recesses: that the world may see what those springs were, from whence issued that clear, permanent, and living stream of wisdom, piety, and virtue, which so apparently ran through all that part of his life which was open to public observation. It is not to be imagined, that letters written in the intimacy of Christian friendship, some of them with the most apparent marks of haste, and amidst a variety of important public cares, should be adorned with any studied elegance of expression, about which the greatness of his soul would not allow him to be at any time very solicitous; for he generally, so far as I could observe, wrote as fast as his pen could move, which happily, both for him, and his many friends, was very freely. Yet here the grandeur of his subject has sometimes clothed his ideas with a language more elevated than is ordinarily to be expected in an epistolary correspondence. The proud scorners, who may deride sentiments and enjoyments like those which this truly great man so experimentally and pathetically describes, I pity from my heart; and grieve to think how unfit they must be for the hallelujahs of heaven, who pour contempt upon the nearest approaches to them: nor shall I think it any misfortune, to share with so excellent a person in their profane derision. It will be infinitely more than an equivalent for all that such ignorance and petulancy can think and say, if I may convince some, who are as yet strangers to religion, how real, and how noble, its delights are; if I may engage my pious readers to glorify God for so illustrious an instance of his grace; and finally, if I may quicken them, and above all may rouse my own too indulgent spirit, to follow with less unequal steps an example, to the sublimity of which, I fear, few of us shall after all be able fully to attain. And that we may not be too much discouraged under the deficiency, let it be recollected, that few have the advantage of a temper naturally so warm; few have an equal command of retirement; and perhaps hardly any one, who thinks himself most indebted to the riches and freedom of divine grace, can trace interpositions of it in all respects equally astonishing.

§ 58. The first of these extraordinary letters which have fallen into my hand, is dated near three years after his conversion, and addressed to a lady of quality. I believe it is the first the Major ever wrote so immediately on the subject of his religious consolations and converse with God in devout retirement. For I well remember, that he once told me, he was so much afraid that something of spiritual pride should mingle itself with the relation of such kind of experiences, that he concealed them a long time: but observing with how much freedom the sacred writers open all the most secret recesses of their hearts, especially in the Psalms, his conscience began to be burthened, under an apprehension that, for the honour of God, and in order to engage the concurrent praises of some of his people, he ought to disclose them. On this he set himself to reflect, who, among all his numerous acquaintance, seemed at once the most experienced Christian he ever knew, (to whom therefore such things as he had to communicate might appear solid and credible,) and who the humblest. He quickly thought of the Lady Marchioness of Douglas in this view: and the reader may well imagine, that it struck my mind very strongly, to think that now, more than twenty-four years after it was written, Providence should bring to my hands, as it has done within these few days, what I assuredly believe to be a genuine copy of that very letter; which I had not the least reason to expect I should ever have seen, when I learnt from his own mouth, amidst the freedom of an accidental conversation, the occasion and circumstances of it.

§ 59. It is dated from London, July 21, 1722, and the very first lines of it relate to a remarkable circumstance, which from others of his letters I find to have happened several times. I mean, that when he had received from any of his Christian friends a few lines which particularly affected his heart, he could not stay till the stated return of his devotional hour, but immediately retired to pray for them, and to give vent to those religious emotions of mind which such a correspondence raised. How invaluable was such a friend! And how great reason have those of us who once possessed a large share in his heart, and in those retired and sacred moments, to bless God for so singular a liberty, and to comfort ourselves in a pleasing hope that we may yet reap future blessings, as the harvest of those petitions which he can no more repeat!

§ 60. His words are these: "I was so happy as to receive yours just as I arrived; and I had no sooner read it, but I shut my door and sought him whom my soul loveth. I sought him, and found him; and would not let him go till he had blessed us all. It is impossible to find words to express what I obtained; but I suppose it was something like that which the disciples got as they were going to Emmaus, when they said, Did not our hearts burn within us, &c. or rather like what Paul felt, when he could not tell whether he was in the body or out of it." He then mentions his dread of spiritual pride, from which he earnestly prays that God may deliver and preserve him. "This," says he, "would have hindered me from communicating these things if I had not such an example before me as the man after God's own heart, saying, I will declare what God hath done for my soul; and, elsewhere, The humble shall hear thereof and be glad: now I am well satisfied that your ladyship is of that number." He then adds, "I had no sooner finished this exercise," that is, of prayer above mentioned, "but I sat down to admire the goodness of my God, that he would vouchsafe to influence by his free Spirit so undeserving a wretch as I, and to make me thus to mount up with eagle's wings. And here I was lost again, and got into an ocean where I could find neither bound nor bottom: but was obliged to cry out with the apostle, Oh the breadth, the length, the depth, the height, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge.' But if I give way to this strain I shall never have done. That the God of hope may fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that you may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost, shall always be the prayer of him, who is, with the greatest sincerity and respect, your ladyship's," &c.

§ 61. Another passage to the same purpose I find in a memorandum which he seems to have written for his own use, dated Monday, March 11, which I perceive, from many concurrent circumstances, must have been in the year 1722-3. "This day," says he, "having been to visit Mrs. G. at Hampstead, I came home about two, and read a sermon on these words, Psalm cxxx. 4. But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared; about the latter end of which there is a description of the miserable condition of those that are slighters of pardoning grace. From a sense of the great obligations I lay under to the Almighty God, who hath made me to differ from such, from what I was, and from the rest of my companions, I knelt down to praise his holy name; and I know not that in my lifetime I ever lay lower in the dust, never having had a fuller view of my unworthiness. I never pleaded more strongly the merits and intercession of him who I know is worthy, never vowed more sincerely to be the Lord's, and to accept of Christ as he is offered in the gospel, as my King, Priest, and Prophet; never had so strong a desire to depart, that I might sin no more; but—my grace is sufficient—curbed that desire. I never pleaded with greater fervency for the Comforter, which our blessed Lord hath promised shall abide with us for ever. For all which I desire to ascribe glory, &c. to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb."

§ 62. There are several others of his papers which speak much the same language; which, had he kept a diary, would, I doubt not, have filled many sheets. I believe my devout readers would not soon be weary of reading extracts of this kind: but that I may not exceed in this part of my narrative, I shall mention only two more, each of them dated some years after; that is, one from Douglas, April 1st, 1725, and the other from Stranrawen, the 25th of May following.

§ 63. The former of these relates to the frame of his spirit on a journey. On the mention of which I cannot but recollect how often I have heard him say, that some of the most delightful days of his life were days in which he travelled alone, that is, with only a servant at a distance; when he could, especially in roads not much frequented, indulge himself in the pleasures of prayer and praise. In the exercise of which last he was greatly assisted by several psalms and hymns, which he had treasured up in his memory, and which he used not only to repeat aloud, but sometimes to sing. In reference to this I remember the following passage, in a letter which he wrote to me many years after, when, on mentioning my ever dear and honoured friend, the Rev. Dr. Watts, he says, "How often in singing some of his psalms, hymns, or lyrics, on horseback, and elsewhere, has the evil spirit been made to flee!

"Whene'er my heart to tune was found
Like David's harp of solemn sound."

§ 64. Such was the first of April above mentioned, in the evening of which he writes thus to an intimate friend: "What would I have given this day, upon the road, for paper, pen, and ink, when the Spirit of the Most High rested upon me! Oh for the pen of a ready writer, and the tongue of an angel, to declare what God hath done this day for my soul! But in short, it is in vain to attempt it: all that I am able to say, is only this, that my soul has been for some hours joining with the blessed spirits above, in giving glory, and honour, and praise, unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever. My praises began from a renewed view of him, whom I saw pierced for my transgressions. I summoned the whole hierarchy of heaven to join with me; and I am persuaded, they all echoed back praise to the Most High. Yea, one would have thought the very larks joined me with emulation. Sure then I need not make use of many words to persuade you that are his saints, to join me in blessing and praising his holy name." He concludes, "May the blessing of the God of Jacob rest upon you all! Adieu. Written in great haste, late, and weary."

§ 65. Scarce can I here refrain from breaking out into more copious reflections on the exquisite pleasures of true religion, when risen to such eminent degrees; which can thus feast the soul in its solitude, and refresh it on journeys; and bring down so much of heaven to earth, as this delightful letter expresses. But the remark is so obvious, that I will not enlarge upon it; but proceed to the other letter above mentioned, which was written the next month, on the Tuesday after a sacrament day.

§ 66. He mentions the pleasure with which he had attended a preparation sermon the Saturday before, and then he adds, "I took a walk upon the mountains that are over against Ireland, and I persuade myself, that were I capable of giving you a description of what passed there, you would agree, that I had much better reason to remember my God from the hills of Port Patrick, than David from the land of Jordan and of the Hermonites, from the hill Mizar." I suppose he means in reference to the clearer discoveries of the gospel with which we are favoured. "In short," says he immediately afterwards, in that Scripture phrase which was become so familiar to him, "I wrestled some hours with the angel of the covenant, and made supplication to him with floods of tears and cries—until I had almost expired: but he strengthened me so, that, like Jacob, I had power with God, and prevailed. This," adds he, "is but a very faint description, you will be more able to judge of it by what you have felt yourself upon the like occasions. After such preparatory work, I need not tell you how blessed the solemn ordinance of the Lord's supper proved to me; I hope it was so to many. You may believe, I should have been exceeding glad if my gracious Lord had ordered it so that I might have made you a visit, as I proposed: but I am now glad it was ordered otherwise, since he hath caused so much of his goodness to pass before me. Were I to give you an account of the many favours my God hath loaded me with since I parted from you, I must have taken up many days in nothing but writing. I hope you will join with me in praises for all the goodness he has shown to your unworthy brother in the Lord."

§ 67. Such were the ardours and elevations of his soul: but while I record these memorials of them, I am very sensible there are many who will be inclined to censure them as the flights of enthusiasm; for which reason I must beg leave to add a remark or two on the occasion, which will be illustrated by several other extracts, which I shall introduce into the sequel of these memoirs. The one is, that he never pretends, in any of the passages cited above, or elsewhere, to have received any immediate revelations from God, which should raise him above the ordinary methods of instruction, or discover any thing to him, whether of doctrines or facts. No man was further from pretending to predict future events, except it were from the moral prognostications of causes naturally tending to produce them; in tracing of which he had indeed an admirable sagacity, as I have seen in some very remarkable instances. Neither was he at all inclinable to govern himself by secret impulses upon the mind, leading him to things for which he could assign no reason but the impulse itself. Had he ventured, in a presumption on such secret agitations of mind, to teach or to do any thing not warranted by the dictates of sound sense and the word of God, I should readily have acknowledged him an enthusiast, unless he could have produced some other evidence than his own persuasion to have supported the authority of them. But these ardent expressions, which some may call enthusiasm, seem only to evidence a heart deeply affected with a sense of the divine presence and perfections, and of that love which passeth knowledge; especially as manifested in our redemption by the Son of God, which did inflame his whole soul. And he thought he might reasonably ascribe the strong impressions to which men are generally such strangers, and of which he had long been entirely destitute, to the agency or influence of the Spirit of God upon his heart; and that, in proportion to the degree in which he felt them, he might properly say, God was present with him, and he conversed with God.* Now, when we consider the scriptural phrases of walking with God, of having communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, of Christ's coming to them that open the door of their hearts to him, and supping with them, of God's shedding abroad his love in the heart by his Spirit, of his coming with Jesus Christ, and making his abode with any man that loves him, of his meeting him that worketh righteousness, of his making us glad by the light of his countenance, and a variety of other equivalent expressions, I believe we shall see reason to judge much more favourably of such expressions as those now in question, than persons who are themselves strangers to elevated devotion, and perhaps converse but little with their Bible, are inclined to do; especially if they have, as many such persons have, a temper that inclines them to cavil and find fault. And I must further observe, that, amidst all those freedoms with which this eminent Christian opens his devout heart to the most intimate of his friends, he still speaks with profound awe and reverence of his heavenly Father, and his Saviour, and maintains, after the example of the sacred writers themselves, a kind of dignity in his expressions suitable to such a subject, without any of that fond familiarity of language, and degrading meanness of phrase, by which it is, especially of late, grown fashionable among some (who, nevertheless, I believe, mean well) to express their love and their humility.

§ 68. On the whole, if habitual love to God, firm faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, a steady dependence on the divine promises, a full persuasion of the wisdom and goodness of all the dispensations of Providence, a high esteem for the blessings of the heavenly world, and a sincere contempt for the vanities of this, can properly be called enthusiasm: then was Colonel Gardiner, indeed, one of the greatest enthusiasts our age has produced; and in proportion to the degree in which he was so, I must esteem him one of the wisest and happiest of mankind. Nor do I fear to tell the world, that it is the design of my writing these memoirs, and of every thing else that I undertake in life, to spread this glorious and blessed enthusiasm; which I know to be the anticipation of heaven, as well as the most certain way to it.

* The expression used by Mr. Gardiner, I know, is [illegible]

§ 69. But lest any should possibly imagine, that allowing the experiences which have been described above to have been ever so solid and important, yet there may be some appearance of boasting in so free a communication of them; I must add to what I have hinted in reference to this above, that I find in many of the papers before me very genuine expressions of the deepest humility and self-abasement; which indeed such holy converse with God in prayer and praise, does above all things in the world tend to inspire and promote. Thus in one of his letters he says, "I am but as a beast before him." In another he calls himself a miserable hell-deserving sinner: and in another he cries out, "O, how good a Master do I serve! but alas, how ungrateful am I! What can be so astonishing as the love of Christ to us, unless it be the coldness of our sinful hearts towards such a Saviour?" With many other clauses of the like nature, which I shall not set myself more particularly to trace, through the variety of letters in which they occur.

§ 70. It is a further instance of this unfeigned humility, that when (as his lady with her usual propriety of language expresses it, in one of her letters to me concerning him) "these divine joys and consolations were not his daily allowance," he with equal freedom, in the confidence of Christian friendship, acknowledges and laments it. Thus, in the first letter I had the honour of receiving from him, dated from Leicester, July 9, 1739, when he had been mentioning the blessing with which it had pleased God to attend my last address to him, and the influence it had upon his mind, he adds, "Much do I stand in need of every help, to awaken me out of that spiritual deadness which seizes me so often. Once indeed it was quite otherwise with me, and that for many years,

> 'Then was my health, my day was bright,
> And I presumed it still so or by night
> Fondly I said within my heart,
> Pleasure and peace shall never depart:
> But I forgot thine arm was strong,
> Which made my mountain stand so long;
> Soon as thy face began to hide,
> My health was gone, my comforts died.'

And here," adds he, "lies my sin and my folly."

§ 71. I mention this, that the whole matter may seem just as it was, and that other Christians may not be discouraged if they feel some abatement of that fervour, and of those holy joys, which they may have experienced during some of the first months or years of their spiritual life. But with relation to the Colonel, I have great reason to believe, that these which he laments as his days of spiritual deadness were not unanimated; and that quickly after the date of this letter, and especially nearer the close of his life, he had further revivings, as the joyful anticipation of those better things in reserve, which were then nearly approaching. And thus Mr. Spears, in the letter I mentioned above, tells us he related the matter to him: (for he studies as much as possible to retain the Colonel's own words:) "However," says he, "after that happy period of sensible communion, though my joys and enlargements were not so overflowing and sensible, yet I have had habitual real communion with God from that day to this;" the latter end of the year 1743; "and I know myself, and all that know me see, that through the grace of God, to which I ascribe all, my conversation has been becoming the gospel; and let me die whenever it shall please God, or wherever it shall be, I am sure I shall go to the mansions of eternal glory," &c. And this is perfectly agreeable to the manner in which he used to speak to me on this head, which we have talked over frequently and largely.

§ 72. In this connexion I hope my reader will forgive my inserting a little story, which I received from a very worthy minister in Scotland, and which I shall give in his own words. "In this period," meaning that which followed the first seven years after his conversion, "when his complaint of comparative deadness and languor in religion began, he had a dream; which, though he had no turn at all for taking notice of dreams, yet made a very strong impression upon his mind. He imagined that he saw his blessed Redeemer on earth, and that he was following him through a large field, following him whom his soul loved, but much troubled, because he thought his blessed Lord did not speak to him; till he came up to the gate of a burying-place, when turning about he smiled upon him, in such a manner as filled his soul with the most ravishing joy; and on after-reflection animated his faith, in believing that whatever storms and darkness he might meet with in the way, at the hour of death his glorious Redeemer would lift up upon him the light of his life-giving countenance." My correspondent adds a circumstance, for which he makes some apology, as what may seem whimsical, and yet made some impression on himself; "that there was a remarkable resemblance in the field in which this brave man met death, and that he had represented to him in the dream." I did not fully understand this at first; but a passage in that letter from Mr. Spears which I have mentioned more than once, has cleared it. "Now observe, Sir, this seems to be a literal description of the place where this Christian hero ended his sorrows and conflicts, and from which he entered triumphantly into the joy of his Lord." For after he fell in the battle, fighting gloriously for his king, and the cause of his God, his wounded body, while life was yet remaining, was carried from the field of battle, by the east side of his own enclosure, till he came to the church-yard of Tranent, and was brought to the minister's house; where he soon after breathed his soul into the hands of his Lord, and was conducted to his presence, where there is fulness of joy, without any cloud or interruption for ever."

§ 73. I well know that in dreams there are diverse vanities, and readily acknowledge that nothing certain could be inferred from this; yet it seems at least to show which way the imagination was working, even in sleep; and I cannot think it unworthy of a wise and good man, sometimes to reflect with complacency on any images, which, passing through his mind even in that state, may tend either to express, or to quicken, his love to the great Saviour. Those eminently pious divines of the church of England, Bishop Bull and Bishop Kenn, do both intimate it as their opinion, that it may be a part of the service of ministering angels to suggest devout dreams:* and I know that the worthy person of whom I speak was well acquainted with that midnight hymn of the latter of those excellent writers, which has these lines:

> "Lord, lest the tempter me surprise,
> Watch over thine own sacrifice!
> All loose, all idle thoughts cast out,
> And make my very dreams devout!"

Nor would it be difficult to produce other passages much to the same purpose,† if it would not be deemed too great a digression from our subject, and too laboured a vindication of a little incident of very small importance, when compared with most of those which make up this narrative.

§ 74. I meet not with any other remarkable event relating to Major Gardiner, which can properly be introduced here, till the year 1726; when, on the 11th day of July, he was married to the Right Honourable the Lady Frances Erskine, daughter to the late Earl of Buchan, by whom he had thirteen children, five only of whom survived their father, two sons and three daughters: whom I cannot mention without the most fervent prayers to God for them, that they may always behave worthy the honour of being descended from such parents; and that the God of their father, and of their mother, may make them perpetually the care of his providence, and yet more eminently happy in the constant and abundant influences of his grace!

§ 75. As her ladyship is still living, (and for the sake of her dear offspring, and numerous friends, may she long be spared,) I shall not here indulge myself in saying any thing of her; except it be, that the Colonel assured me, when he had been happy in this intimate relation to her more than fourteen years, that the greatest imperfection he knew in her character was, "that she valued and loved him much more than he deserved." And little did he think, in the simplicity of heart with which he spoke this, how high an encomium he was making upon her, and how lasting an honour such a testimony must leave upon her name, long as the memory of it shall continue.

§ 76. As I do not intend in these memoirs a laboured essay on the character of Colonel Gardiner, digested under the various virtues and graces which Christianity requires; which would, I think, be a little too formal for a work of this kind, and would give it such an air of panegyric as would neither suit my design, nor be at all likely to render it more useful; I shall now mention what I have either observed in him, or heard concerning him, with regard to those domestic relations, which commenced about this time, or quickly after. And here my reader will easily conclude, that the resolution of Joshua was from the first adopted and declared, As for me, and my house, we will serve the Lord. It will naturally be supposed, that as soon as he had a house, he erected an altar in it; that the word of God was read there, and prayers and praises were constantly offered. These were not to be omitted on account of any guest; for he esteemed it a part of due respect to those that remained under his roof, to take it for granted they would look upon it as a very bad compliment, to imagine they would have been obliged by neglecting the duties of religion on their account. As his family increased, he had a minister statedly resident in his house, who both discharged the office of a tutor to his children, and of a chaplain; and who was always treated with a becoming kindness and respect. But in his absence, the Colonel himself led the devotions of the family; and they were happy who had an opportunity of knowing with how much solemnity, fervour, and propriety, he did it.

§ 77. He was constant in attendance upon public worship, in which an exemplary care was taken that the children and servants might accompany the heads of the family. And how he would have re-

* Bishop Bull has these remarkable words: "Although I am no doter on dreams, yet I verily believe that some dreams are monitory, above the power of fancy, and impressed upon us by some superior influence. For of such dreams we have plain and undeniable instances in history, both sacred and profane, and in our own age and observation. Nor shall I so value the laughter of sceptics and the scoffs of the Epicureans as to be ashamed to profess that I myself have had some convincing experiments of such impressions." — Bishop Bull's Serm. and Dis. Vol. II. p. 189, 190.

† If I mistake not, the same Bishop Kenn is the author of a midnight hymn, concluding with the words,

> "May my æthereal guardian kindly spread
> His wings, and from the tempter screen my head;
> Grant of celestial light some piercing beams,
> To bless my sleep, and sanctify my dreams."

As he certainly was of those exactly parallel lines

> "Oh may my guardian, while I sleep,
> Close to my bed his vigils keep,
> His love-angelic watch maintain,
> Shut all the avenues of ill!
> May he celestial joys recharge,
> And thought to thought with me converse.

sented the non-attendance of any member of it very easily be conjectured, from a free but lively passage in a letter to one of his intimate friends, on an occasion which it is not material to mention. "Oh, Sir, had a child of yours under my roof but once neglected the public worship of God, when he was able to attend it, I should have been ready to conclude he had been distracted, and should have thought of shaving his head, and confining him in a dark room."

§ 78. He always treated his lady with a manly tenderness, giving her the most natural evidences of a cordial habitual esteem, and expressing a most affectionate sympathy with her, under the infirmities of a very delicate constitution, much broken, at least towards the latter years of their marriage, in consequence of so frequent pregnancy. He had at all times a most faithful care of all her interests, and especially those relating to the state of religion in her mind. His conversation and his letters concurred to cherish those sublime ideas which Christianity suggests, to promote our submission to the will of God, to teach us to centre our happiness in the great Author of our being, and to live by faith in the invisible world. These, no doubt, were frequently the subjects of mutual discourse: and many letters, which her ladyship has had the goodness to communicate to me, are most convincing evidences of the degree in which this noble and most friendly care filled his mind in the days of their separation; days, which so entire a mutual affection must have rendered exceeding painful, had they not been supported by such exalted sentiments of piety, and sweetened by daily communion with an ever present and ever gracious God.

§ 79. The necessity of being so many months together distant from his family, hindered him from many of those condescending labours in cultivating the minds of his children in early life, which to a soul so benevolent, so wise, and so zealous, would undoubtedly have afforded a very exquisite pleasure. The care of his worthy consort, who well knew that it is one of the brightest parts of a mother's character, and one of the most important views in which the sex can be considered, made him the easier under such a circumstance: but when he was with them he failed not to instruct and admonish them: and the constant deep sense with which he spoke of divine things, and the real unaffected indifference which he always showed for what this vain world is most ready to admire, were excellent lessons of daily wisdom, which I hope they will recollect with advantage in every future scene of life. And I have seen such hints in his letters relating to them, as plainly show with how great a weight they lay on his mind, and how highly he desired, above all things, that they might be the faithful disciples of Christ, and acquainted betimes with the unequalled pleasures and blessings of religion. He thought an excess of delicacy and of indulgence one of the most dangerous faults in education, by which he every where saw great numbers of young people undone: yet he was solicitous to guard against a severity which might terrify or discourage: and, though he endeavoured to take all prudent precautions to prevent the commission of faults, yet, when they had been committed, and there seemed to be a sense of them, he was always ready to make the most candid allowances for the thoughtlessness of unripened years, and tenderly to cherish every purpose of a more proper conduct for the time to come.

§ 80. It was easy to perceive, that the openings of genius in the young branches of his family gave him great delight, and that he had a secret ambition to see them excel in what they undertook. Yet he was greatly cautious over his heart, lest it should be too fondly attached to them; and, as he was one of the most eminent proficients I ever knew in the blessed science of resignation to the divine will, so there was no effect of that resignation which appeared to me more admirable than what related to the life of his children. An experience, which no length of time will ever efface out of my memory, has so sensibly taught me how difficult it is fully to support the Christian character here, that I hope my reader will pardon me (I am sure at least the heart of wounded parents will) if I dwell a little longer upon so interesting a subject.

§ 81. When he was in Herefordshire, in the month of July, in the year 1734, it pleased God to visit his little family with the small-pox. Five days before the date of the letter I am just going to mention, he had received the agreeable news, that there was a prospect of the recovery of his son, then under that awful visitation; and he had been expressing his thankfulness for it in a letter which he had sent away but a few hours before he was informed of his death; the surprise of which, in this connexion, must naturally be very great. But behold (says the reverend and worthy person from whom I received the copy) his truly filial submission to the will of his heavenly Father in the following lines, addressed to the dear partner of his affliction: "Your resignation to the will of God under this dispensation gives me more joy than the death of the child has given me sorrow. He, to be sure, is happy; and we shall go to him, though he shall not return to us. Oh that we had our latter end always in view!—We shall soon follow: and oh what reason have we to long for that glorious day, when we shall get quit of this body of sin and death, under which we now groan, and which renders this life so wretched! I desire to bless God, that —— [another of his children] is in so good a way: but I have resigned her. We must not choose for our selves; and it is well we must not, for we should often make a very bad choice. And therefore it is our wisdom, as well as our duty, to leave all with a gracious God; who hath promised that all things shall work together for good to those that love him: and he is faithful that hath promised, who will infallibly perform it if our unbelief does not stand in the way."

§ 82. The greatest trial of this kind that he ever bore, was in the removal of his second son, who was one of the most amiable and promising children that has been known. The dear little creature was the darling of all that knew him; and promised very fair, so far as a child could be known by its doings, to have been a great ornament to the family, and blessing to the public. The suddenness of the stroke must, no doubt, render it the more painful; for this beloved child was snatched away by an illness which seized him but about fifteen hours before it carried him off. He died in the month of October, 1733, at near six years old. Their friends were ready to fear that his affectionate parents would be almost overwhelmed with such a loss: but the happy father had so firm a persuasion, that God had received the dear little one to the felicities of the celestial world; and at the same time had so strong a sense of the divine goodness, in taking one of his children, and that too one who lay so near his heart, so early to himself; that the sorrows of nature were quite swallowed up in the sublime joy which these considerations administered. When he reflected what human life is, how many its snares and temptations are, and how frequently children, who once promised well, are insensibly corrupted, and at length undone; with Solomon, he blessed the dead already dead, more than the living who were yet alive; and felt an unspeakable pleasure in looking after the lovely infant, as safely and delightfully lodged in the house of its heavenly Father. Yea, he assured me, that his heart was at this time so entirely taken up with these views, that he was afraid they who did not thoroughly know him, might suspect that he was deficient in the natural affections of a parent; while thus borne above the anguish of them, by the views which faith administered to him, and which divine grace supported in his soul.

§ 83. So much did he, on one of the most trying occasions of life, manifest of the temper of a glorified saint; and to such happy purposes did he retain those lessons of submission to God, and acquiescence in him, which I remember he once inculcated in a letter he wrote to a lady of quality, under the apprehension of a breach in her family with which Providence seemed to threaten her, which I am willing to insert here, though a little out of what might seem its most proper place, rather than entirely to omit it. It is dated from London, June 16, 1722, when speaking of the dangerous illness of a dear relative, he has these words: "When my mind runs hither," that is, to God, as its refuge and strong defence, as the connexion plainly determines it, "I think I can bear any thing, the loss of all, the loss of health, of relations on whom I depend, and whom I love, all that is dear to me, without repining or murmuring. When I think, that God orders, disposes, and manages all things, according to the counsel of his own will; when I think of the extent of his providence, that it reaches to the minutest things; then, though a useful friend or dear relative be snatched away by death, I recall myself, and check my thoughts with these considerations. Is he not God, from everlasting, and to everlasting? And has he not promised to be a God to me? a God in all his attributes, a God in all his persons, a God in all his creatures, and providences? And shall I dare to say, What shall I do? Was not he the infinite cause of all I met with in the creatures? And were not they the finite effects of his infinite love and kindness? I have daily experienced, that the instrument was, and is, what God makes it to be; and I know, that this God hath the hearts of all men in his hands; and the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. If this earth be good for me, I shall have it; for my Father hath it all in possession. If favour in the eyes of men be good for me, I shall have it; for the spring of every motion in the heart of man is in God's hand. My dear —— seems now to be dying; but God is all-wise, and every thing is done by him for the best. Shall I hold back any thing that is his own, when he requires it? No, God forbid! When I consider the excellency of his glorious attributes, I am satisfied with all his dealings." I perceive by the introduction, and by what follows, that most, if not all, of this, is a quotation from something written by a lady; but whether from some manuscript, or a printed book, whether exactly transcribed, or quoted from memory, I cannot determine: and therefore I thought proper to insert it, as the Major, (for that was the office he bore then,) by thus interweaving it with his letter, makes it his own; and as it seems to express in a very lively manner the principles which bore him on to a conduct so truly great and heroic, in circumstances that have overwhelmed many a heart that could have faced danger and death with the greatest intrepidity.

§ 84. I return now to consider his character in the domestic relation of a master, on which I shall not enlarge. It is however proper to remark, that as his habitual meekness, and command of his passions, prevented indecent sallies of ungovernable anger towards those in the lowest state of subjection to him, (by which some in high life do strangely debase themselves, and lose much of their authority,) so the natural greatness of his mind made him solicitous to render their inferior stations as easy as he could; and so much the rather, because he considered all the children of Adam as standing upon a level before their great Creator, and had also a deeper sense of the dignity and worth of every immortal soul, how meanly soever it might chance to be lodged, than most persons I have known. This engaged him to give his servants frequent religious exhortations and instructions, as I have been assured by several who were so happy as to live with him under that character. One of the first letters after he entered on his Christian course, expresses the same disposition; in which with great tenderness he recommends a servant, who was in a bad state of health, to his mother's care, as he was well acquainted with her condescending temper; mentioning at the same time the endeavours he had used to promote his preparation for a better world, under an apprehension that he would not continue long in this. And we shall have an affecting instance of the prevalency of the same disposition, in the closing scene of his life, and indeed in the last words he ever spoke, which expressed his generous solicitude for the safety of a faithful servant, who was then near him.

§ 85. As it was a few years after his marriage that he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, in which he continued till he had a regiment of his own, I shall for the future speak of him by that title; and may not perhaps find any more proper place, in which to mention what it is proper for me to say of his behaviour and conduct as an officer. I shall not here enlarge on his bravery in the field, though that was very remarkable, as I have heard from others; I say from others, for I never heard any thing of that kind from himself, nor knew, till after his death, that he was present at almost every battle that was fought in Flanders while the illustrious Duke of Marlborough commanded the allied army there. I have also been assured from several very credible persons, some of whom were eye-witnesses, that at the skirmish with the rebels at Preston in Lancashire (thirty years before that engagement at the other Preston, which deprived us of this gallant guardian of his country) he signalized himself very particularly: for he headed a little body of men, I think about twelve, and set fire to the barricado of the rebels in the face of their whole army, while they were pouring in their shot, by which eight of the twelve that attended him fell. This was the last action of the kind in which he was engaged before the long peace which ensued; and who can express how happy it was for him, and indeed for his country, of which he was ever so generous, and in his latter years so important, a friend, that he did not fall then, when the profaneness which mingled itself with his martial rage seemed to rend the heavens, and shocked some other military gentlemen, who were not themselves remarkable for their caution in this respect!

§ 86. But I insist not on things of this nature, which the true greatness of his soul would hardly ever permit him to mention, unless when it tended to illustrate the divine care over him in these extremities of danger, and the grace of God in calling him from so abandoned a state. It is well known that the character of an officer is not only to be approved in the day of combat. Colonel Gardiner was truly sensible that every day brought its duties along with it; and he was constantly careful, that no pretence of amusement, friendship, or even devotion itself, might prevent their being discharged in their season.

§ 87. I doubt not but the noble persons in whose regiment he was lieutenant-colonel, will always be ready to bear an honourable and grateful testimony to his exemplary diligence and fidelity, in all that related to the care of the troops over which he was set; whether with regard to the men, or the horses. He knew that it is incumbent on those who have the honour of presiding over others, whether in civil, ecclesiastical, or military offices, not to content themselves with doing only so much as may preserve them from the reproach of gross and visible neglect; but seriously to consider, how much they can possibly do, without going out of the proper sphere, to serve the public, by the due inspection of those committed to their care. The duties of the closet, and of the sanctuary, were so adjusted as not to interfere with those of the parade, or any other place where the welfare of the regiment called him. On the other hand, he was solicitous not to suffer these things to interfere with religion; a due attendance to which he apprehended to be the surest method of attaining all desirable success in every other interest and concern in life. He therefore abhorred every thing that should look like a contrivance to keep his soldiers employed about their horses and their arms at the season of public worship: (an indecency which I wish there were no room to mention): far from that, he used to have them drawn up just before it began, and from the parade they went off to the house of God. He understood the rights of conscience too well to impose his own particular profession in religion on others, or to use those who differed from him in the choice of its modes, the less kindly or respectfully on that account. But, as most of his own company, and many of the rest, chose, when in England, to attend him to the dissenting chapel, he used to march them thither in due time, so as to be there before the worship began. And I must do them the justice to say, that so far as I could ever discern, when I have seen them in large numbers before me, they behaved with as much reverence, gravity, and decorum, during the time of divine service, as any of their fellow-worshippers.

§ 88. That his remarkable care to maintain good discipline among them (of which we shall afterwards speak) might be the more effectual, he made himself on all proper occasions accessible to them, and expressed a great concern for their interest; which being so genuine and sincere, naturally discovered itself in a variety of instances. I remember, I had once occasion to visit one of his dragoons, in his last illness, at Harborough, and I found the man upon the borders of eternity; a circumstance which, as he apprehended it himself, must add some peculiar weight and credibility to his discourse. And he then told me, in his colonel's absence, that he questioned not but he should have everlasting reason to bless God on Colonel Gardiner's account, for he had been a father to him in all his interests, both temporal and spiritual. He added, that he had visited him almost every day during his illness, with religious advice and instruction, as well as taken care that he should want nothing that might conduce to the recovery of his health. And he did not speak of this as the result of any particular attachment to him, but as the manner in which he was accustomed to treat those under his command. It is no wonder that this engaged their affection to a very great degree. And I doubt not, that if he had fought the fatal battle of Prestonpans at the head of that gallant regiment, of which he had the care for so many years, and which is allowed by most unexceptionable judges to be one of the finest in the British service, and consequently in the world, he had been supported in a much different manner; and had found a much greater number, who would have rejoiced in an opportunity of making their own breasts a barrier in the defence of his.

§ 89. It could not but greatly endear him to his soldiers, that so far as preferments lay in his power, or were under his influence, they were distributed according to merit; which he knew to be as much the dictate of prudence, as of equity. I find by one of his letters before me, dated but a few months after his happy change, that he was solicited to improve his interest with the Earl of Stair, in favour of one whom he judged a very worthy person; and that it had been suggested by another who recommended him, that if he succeeded he might expect some handsome acknowledgment. But he answers with some degree of indignation, "Do you imagine I am to be bribed to do justice?" For such it seems he esteemed it, to confer the favour which was asked from him, on one so deserving. Nothing can more effectually tend to humble the enemies of a state, than that such maxims should universally prevail in it: and if they do not prevail, the worthiest men in an army or fleet may be sunk under repeated discouragements, and the basest exalted, to the infamy of the public, and perhaps to its ruin.

§ 90. In the midst of all the gentleness which Colonel Gardiner exercised towards his soldiers, he made it very apparent, that he knew how to reconcile the tenderness of a real, faithful, and condescending friend, with the authority of a commander. Perhaps hardly any thing conduced more generally to the maintaining of this authority, than the strict decorum and good manners with which he treated even the private gentlemen of his regiment; which has always a great efficacy towards keeping inferiors at a proper distance, and forbids, in the least offensive manner, familiarities, which degrade the superior, and enervate his influence. The calmness and steadiness of his behaviour on all occasions, did also greatly tend to the same purpose. He knew how mean a man looks in the transports of passion, and would not use so much freedom with any of his men, as to fall into such transports before them; well knowing, that persons in the lowest rank of life are aware, how unfit they are to govern others who cannot govern themselves. He was also sensible, how necessary it is in all who preside over others, and especially in military officers, to check irregularities, when they first begin to appear: and that he might be able to do it, he kept a strict inspection over his soldiers; in which view it was observed, that as he generally chose to reside among them as much as he could, (though in circumstances which sometimes occasioned him to deny himself in some interests which were very dear to him,) so, when they were around him, he seldom staid long in a place; but was frequently walking the streets, and looking into their quarters and stables, as well as reviewing and exercising them himself. It has often been observed, that the regiment of which he was so many years lieutenant-colonel, was one of the most regular and orderly regiments in the public service; so that perhaps none of our dragoons were more welcome than they to the towns where their character was known. Yet no such bodies of men are so blameless in their conduct, but something will be found, especially among such considerable numbers, worthy of censure, and sometimes of punishment. This Colonel Gardiner knew how to inflict with a becoming resolution, and with all the severity which he judged necessary: a severity the more awful and impressing, as it was always attended with meekness; for he well knew, that when things are done in a passion, it seems only an accidental circumstance that they are acts of justice, and that such indecencies greatly obstruct the ends of punishment, both as it relates to reforming offenders, and to deterring others from an imitation of their faults.

§ 91. One instance of his conduct, which happened at Leicester, and was related by the person chiefly concerned, to a worthy friend from whom I had it, I cannot forbear inserting. While part of the regiment was encamped in the neighbourhood of that place, the Colonel went incognito to the camp in the middle of the night; for he sometimes lodged at his quarters in the town. One of the centinels then on duty had abandoned his post, and on being seized broke out into some oaths, and profane execrations, against those that discovered him: a crime of which the Colonel had the greatest abhorrence, and on which he never failed to animadvert. The man afterwards appeared much ashamed and concerned for what he had done. But the Colonel ordered him to be brought early the next morning to his own quarters, where he had prepared a piquet, on which he appointed him a private sort of penance: and while he was put upon it, he discoursed with him seriously and tenderly upon the evils and aggravations of his fault; admonished him of the divine displeasure, which he had incurred; and urged him to argue from the pain which he then felt, how infinitely more dreadful it must be, to fall into the hands of the living God, and indeed to meet the terrors of that damnation, which he had been accustomed impiously to call for on himself and his companions. The result of this proceeding was, that the offender accepted his punishment, not only with submission, but with thankfulness. He went away with a more cordial affection for his colonel than ever he had before; and spoke of it some years after to my friend, in such a manner, that there seemed reason to hope it had been instrumental in producing, not only a change in his life, but in his heart.

§ 92. There cannot, I think, be a more proper place for mentioning the great reverence this excellent officer always expressed for the name of the blessed God, and the zeal with which he endeavoured to suppress, and, if possible, to extirpate, that detestable sin of swearing and cursing, which is every where so common, and especially among our military men. He often declared his sentiments with respect to this enormity, at the head of his regiment, and urged his captains and their subalterns, to take the greatest care that they did not give the sanction of their example to that which by their office they were obliged to punish in others. And indeed this zeal on these occasions wrought in a very active, and sometimes in a remarkably successful, manner, not only among his equals, but sometimes among his superiors too. An instance of this in Flanders I shall have an opportunity hereafter to produce, at present I shall only mention his conduct in Scotland a little before his death, as I have it from a very valuable young minister of that country, on whose testimony I can thoroughly depend; and I wish it may excite many to imitation.

§ 93. The commanding officer of the king's forces then about Edinburgh, with the other colonels, and several other gentlemen of rank in their respective regiments, favoured him with their company at Bankton, and took a dinner with him. He too well foresaw what might happen amidst such a variety of tempers and characters; and fearing lest his conscience should have been insnared by a sinful silence, or that, on the other hand, he might seem to pass the bounds of decency, and infringe upon the laws of hospitality, by animadverting on guests so justly entitled to his regard, he happily determined on the following method of avoiding each of these difficulties. As soon as they were come together, he addressed them with a great deal of respect, and yet at the same time with a very frank and determined air; and told them, that he had the honour in that district to be a justice of the peace, and consequently that he was sworn to put the laws in execution, and among the rest those against swearing; that he could not execute them upon others with any confidence, or by any means approve himself as a man of impartiality and integrity to his own heart, if he suffered them to be broken in his presence by persons of any rank whatsoever; and that therefore he entreated all the gentlemen who then honoured him with their company, that they would please to be upon their guard; and that if any oath or curse should escape them, he hoped they would consider his legal animadversions upon it as a regard to the duties of his office, and the dictates of his conscience, and not as owing to any want of deference to them. The commanding officer immediately supported him in this declaration, as entirely becoming the station in which he was, assuring him that he would be ready to pay the penalty, if he inadvertently transgressed; and when Colonel Gardiner on any occasion stepped out of the room, he himself undertook to be the guardian of the law in his absence; and as one of the inferior officers offended during this time, he informed the Colonel, so that the fine was exacted, and given to the poor,* with the universal approbation of the company. The story spread in the neighbourhood, and was perhaps applauded highly by many who wanted the courage to go and do likewise. But it may be said of the worthy person of whom I write, with the utmost propriety, that he feared the face of no man living where the honour of God was concerned. In all such cases he might be justly said, in Scripture phrase, to set his face like a flint; and I assuredly believe, that had he been in the presence of a sovereign prince, who had been guilty of this fault, his looks at least would have testified his grief and surprise; if he had apprehended it unfit to have borne his testimony any other way.

* It is remarkable, that the money which was exacted on this occasion by the same officer, whose humane and pious regard to the honour of God, and the good of his fellow-creatures, gave them the kindest pressing invitation to pay their money into his hands, was by the Colonel's command laid out in a book for the poor, and kept for a good while, with this title, "The Swearers' Box."

§ 94. Lord Cadogan's regiment of dragoons, during the years I have mentioned, while he was lieutenant-colonel of it, was quartered in a great variety of places, both in England and Scotland, from many of which I have letters before me: particularly from Hamilton, Ayr, Carlisle, Hereford, Maidenhead, Leicester, Warwick, Coventry, Stamford, Harborough, Northampton, and several other places, especially in our inland parts. The natural consequence was, that the Colonel, whose character was on many accounts so very remarkable, had a very extensive acquaintance: and I believe I may certainly say, that wherever he was known by persons of wisdom and worth, he was proportionably respected, and left behind him traces of unaffected devotion, humility, benevolence, and zeal, for the support and advancement of religion and virtue.

§ 95. The equable tenor of his mind in these respects, is illustrated by his letters from several of these places; and though it is but comparatively a small number of them which I have now in my hands, yet they will afford some valuable extracts; which I shall therefore here lay before my reader, that he may the better judge as to his real character, in particulars of which I have already discoursed, or which may hereafter occur.

§ 96. In a letter to his lady, dated from Carlisle, Nov. 19, 1733, when he was on his journey to Herefordshire, he breathes out his grateful, cheerful soul in these words: "I bless God, I was never better in my life-time; and I wish I could be so happy as to hear the same of you; or rather, in other words, to hear that you had obtained an entire trust in God: that would infallibly keep you in perfect peace; for the God of truth hath promised it. Oh, how ought we to be longing to be with Christ, which is infinitely better than any thing we can propose here! To be there, where all complaints shall be for ever banished; where no mountains shall separate between God and our souls: and I hope, it will be some addition to our happiness, that you and I shall be separated no more; but that as we have joined in singing the praises of our glorious Redeemer here, we shall sing them in a much higher key through an endless eternity. Oh eternity, eternity! What a wonderful thought is eternity!"

§ 97. From Leicester, August 6, 1739, he writes thus to his lady: "Yesterday I was at the Lord's table, where you and the children were not forgotten: but how wonderfully was I assisted when I came home, to plead for you all with many tears!" And then, speaking of some intimate friends, who were impatient (as I suppose by the connexion) for his return to them, he takes occasion to observe the necessity "of endeavouring to compose our minds, and to say with the Psalmist, My soul, wait thou only upon God." Afterwards, speaking of one of his children, of whom he heard that he made a commendable progress in learning, he expresses his satisfaction in it, and adds, "But how much greater joy would it give me, to hear that he was greatly advanced in the school of Christ! Oh that our children may but be wise to salvation; and may grow in grace as they do in stature!"

§ 98. These letters, which to so familiar a friend evidently lay open the heart, and show the ideas and affections which were lodged deepest there, are sometimes taken up with an account of sermons he had attended, and the impressions they had made upon his mind. I shall mention one only as a specimen of many more, which was dated from a place called Cohorn, April 15: "We had here a minister from Wales, who gave us two excellent discourses on the love of Christ to us, as an argument to engage our love to him. And indeed, next to the greatness of his love to us, methinks there is nothing so astonishing as the coldness of our love to him. Oh that he would shed abroad his love upon our hearts by his Holy Spirit, that ours might be kindled into a flame! May God enable you to trust in him, and then you will be kept in perfect peace!"

§ 99. We have met with many traces of that habitual gratitude to the blessed God, as his heavenly Father and constant friend, which made his life probably one of the happiest that ever was spent on earth. I cannot omit one more, which appears to me the more worthy of notice, as being a short turn in as hasty a letter as any I remember to have seen of his, which he wrote from Leicester, in June 1739. "I am now under the deepest sense of the many favours the Almighty has bestowed upon me: surely you will help me to celebrate the praises of our gracious God and kind Benefactor." This exuberance of grateful affection, which, while it was almost every hour pouring itself forth before God in the most genuine and emphatical language, felt itself still, as it were, straitened for want of a sufficient vent, and therefore called on others to help him with their concurrent praises, appears to me the most glorious and happy state in which a human soul can find itself on this side heaven.

§ 100. Such was the temper which this excellent man appears to have carried along with him through such a variety of places and circumstances; and the whole of his deportment was suitable to these impressions. Strangers were agreeably struck with his first appearance, there was so much of the Christian, the well-bred man, and the universal friend in it; and as they came more intimately to know him, they discovered more and more the uniformity and consistency of his whole temper and behaviour: so that, whether he made only a visit for a few days to any place, or continued there for many weeks or months, he was always beloved and esteemed, and spoken of with that honourable testimony from persons of the most different denominations and parties, which nothing but true sterling worth, (if I may be allowed the expression,) and that in an eminent degree, can secure.

§ 101. Of the justice of this testimony, which I had so often heard from a variety of persons, I myself began to be a witness about the time when the last-mentioned letter was dated. In this view I believe I shall never forget that happy day, June 13, 1739, when I first met him at Leicester. I remember, I happened that day to preach a lecture from Psalm cxix. 158. I beheld the transgressors, and was grieved, because they kept not thy law. I was large in describing that mixture of indignation and grief (strongly expressed by the original word there) with which the good man looks on the daring transgressors of the divine law; and in tracing the causes of that grief, as arising from a regard to the divine honour, and the interest of a Redeemer, and a compassionate concern for the misery such offenders bring on themselves, and for the mischief they do to the world about them. I little thought how exactly I was drawing Colonel Gardiner's character under each of those heads; and I have often reflected upon it as a happy Providence, which opened a much speedier way than I could have expected, to the breast of one of the most amiable and useful friends which I ever expect to find upon earth. We afterwards sung a hymn, which brought over again some of the leading thoughts in the sermon, and struck him so strongly, that, on obtaining a copy of it, he committed it to his memory, and used to repeat it with so forcible an accent, as showed how much every line expressed of his very soul. In this view the reader will pardon my inserting it; especially, as I know not when I may get time to publish a volume of these serious, though artless, composures, which I sent him in manuscript some years ago, and to which I have since made very large additions.

I.

Arise, my tenderest thoughts, arise,
To torrents melt my streaming eyes;
And thou, my heart, with anguish feel
Those evils which thou canst not heal.

II.

See human nature sunk in shame!
See scandals poured on Jesu's name!
The Father wounded through the Son,
The world abused, the soul undone.

III.

See the short course of vain delight
Closing in everlasting night!
In flames, that no abatement know,
The briny tears for ever flow.

IV.

My God, I feel the mournful scene;
My bowels yearn o'er dying men:
And fain my pity would reclaim,
And snatch the fire-brands from the flame.

V.

But feeble my compassion proves,
And can but weep, where most it loves.
Thine own all-saving arm employ,
And turn these drops of grief to joy!

§ 102. The Colonel, immediately after the conclusion of the service, met me in the vestry, and embraced me in the most obliging and affectionate manner, as if there had been a long friendship between us; assured me, that he had for some years been intimately acquainted with my writings; and desired that we might concert measures for spending some hours together before I left the town. I was so happy as to be able to secure an opportunity of doing it; and I must leave it upon record, that I cannot recollect I was ever equally edified by any conversation I remember to have enjoyed. We passed that evening and the next morning together; and it is impossible for me to describe the impression which the interview left upon my heart. I rode alone all the remainder of the day; and it was my unspeakable happiness that I was alone, since I could be no longer with him; for I can hardly conceive what other company would not then have been an encumbrance. The views which he gave me even then, (for he began to repose a most obliging confidence in me, though he concealed some of the most extraordinary circumstances of the methods by which he had been recovered to God and happiness,) with those cordial sentiments of evangelical piety and extensive goodness, which he poured out into my bosom with so endearing a freedom, fired my very soul; and I hope I may truly say, (what I wish and pray many of my readers may also adopt for themselves,) that I glorified God in him. Our epistolary correspondence immediately commenced upon my return; and though, through the multiplicity of business on both sides, it suffered many interruptions, it was in some degree the blessing of all the following years of my life, till he fell by those unreasonable and wicked men, who had it in their hearts with him to have destroyed all our glory, defence, and happiness.

§ 103. The first letter I received from him was so remarkable, that some persons of eminent piety, to whom I communicated it, would not be content without copying it out, or making some extracts from it. I persuade myself, that my devout reader will not be displeased that I insert the greatest part of it here; especially, as it serves to illustrate the affectionate sense which he had of the divine goodness in his conversion, though more than twenty years had passed since that memorable event happened. Having mentioned my ever dear and honoured friend, Dr. Isaac Watts, on an occasion which I hinted at above, (§ 70.) he adds, "I have been in pain these several years, lest that excellent person, that sweet singer in our Israel, should have been called to heaven, before I had an opportunity of letting him know, how much his works have been blessed to me, and of course, of returning him my hearty thanks: for though it is owing to the operation of the blessed Spirit, that any thing works effectually upon our hearts, yet if we are not thankful to the instrument which God is pleased to make use of, whom we do see, how shall we be thankful to the Almighty, whom we have not seen? I desire to bless God for the good news of his recovery, and entreat you to tell him, that although I cannot keep pace with him here, in celebrating the high praises of our glorious Redeemer, which is the greatest grief of my heart; yet I am persuaded, that when I join the glorious company above, where there will be no drawbacks, none will out-sing me there: because I shall not find any that will be more indebted to the wonderful riches of divine grace than I.

'Give me a place at thy saints' feet
Or some fall'n angel's vacant seat
I'll strive to sing as loud as they,
Who sit above in brighter day.'

I know, it is natural for every one who has felt the Almighty power which raised our glorious Redeemer from the grave, to believe his case singular; but I have made every one in this respect submit, as soon as he has heard my story. And if you seemed so surprised at the account which I gave you, what will you be when you hear it all?

'Oh! if I had an angel's voice,
And could be heard from pole to pole,
I would tell all the listening world
Proclaim thy goodness to my soul.'

He then concludes, after some expressions of endearment, (which, with whatever pleasure I review them, I must not here insert,) "If you knew what a natural aversion I have to writing, you would be astonished at the length of this letter, which is I believe the longest I ever wrote. But my heart warms when I write to you, which makes my pen move the easier. I hope it will please our gracious God long to preserve you a blessed instrument in his hand of doing great good in the church of Christ; and that you may always enjoy a thriving soul in a healthful body, shall be the continual prayer of." &c.

§ 104. As our intimacy grew, our mutual affection increased, and "My dearest friend," was the form of address with which most of his epistles of the last years were begun and ended. Many of them are filled up with his sentiments of those writings which I published during these years, which he read with great attention, and of which he speaks in terms which it becomes me to suppress, and to impute in a considerable degree to the kind prejudices of so endeared a friendship. He gives me repeated assurances, "that he was daily mindful of me in his prayers;" a circumstance which I cannot recollect without the greatest thankfulness; the loss of which I should more deeply lament, did I not hope, that the happy effect of these prayers might still continue, and might run into all my remaining days.

§ 105. It might be a pleasure to me to make several extracts from many others of his letters; but it is a pleasure which I ought to suppress, and rather to reflect with unfeigned humility, how unworthy I was of such regards from such a person, and of that divine goodness which gave me such a friend in him. I shall therefore only add two general remarks, which offer themselves from several of his letters. The one is, that there is in some of them, as our freedom increased, an agreeable vein of humour and pleasantry, which shows how easy religion sat upon him, and how far he was from placing any part of it in a gloomy melancholy, or stiff formality. The other is, that he frequently refers to domestic circumstances, such as the illness or recovery of his children, &c. which I am surprised how a man of his extensive and important business could so distinctly bear upon his mind. But his memory was good, and his heart was yet better; and his friendship was such, that nothing which sensibly affected the heart of one whom he honoured with it, left his own but slightly touched. I have all imaginable reason to believe, that in many instances his prayers were not only offered for us in general terms, but varied as our particular situation required. Many quotations might verify this: but I decline troubling the reader with an enumeration of passages, in which it was only the abundance of friendly sympathy that gave this truly great as well as good man so cordial a concern.

§ 106. After this correspondence, carried on for the space of about three years, and some interviews which we had enjoyed at different places, he came to spend some time with us at Northampton, and brought with him his lady and his two eldest children. I had here an opportunity of taking a much nearer view of his character, and surveying it in a much greater variety of lights than before; and my esteem for him increased, in proportion to these opportunities. What I have wrote above, with respect to his conduct in relative life, was in a great measure drawn from what I now saw: and I shall mention here some other points in his behaviour, which particularly struck my mind; and likewise shall touch on his sentiments on some topics of importance, which he freely communicated to me, and which I remarked on account of that wisdom and propriety which I apprehended in them.

§ 107. There was nothing more openly observable in Colonel Gardiner than the exemplary gravity, composure, and reverence, with which he attended public worship. Copious as he was in his secret devotions before he engaged in it, he always began them so early, as not to be retarded by them, when he should resort to the house of God. He, and all his soldiers who chose to worship with him, were generally there (as I have given a limited) before the service began; that the entrance of so many of them at once might not disturb the congregation already engaged in devotion, and that there might be the better opportunity for bringing the mind to a becoming attention, and preparing it for converse with the divine Being. While acts of worship were going on, whether of prayer or singing, he always stood up; and whatever regard he might have for persons who passed by him at that time, though it were to come into the same pew, he never paid any compliment to them: and often has he expressed his wonder, at the indecency of breaking off our address to God to bow to a fellow-creature, which he thought a much greater indecency, than it would be, on a little occasion and circumstance, to interrupt an address to our prince. During the time of preaching, his eye was commonly fixed upon the minister, though sometimes turned round upon the auditory, where if he observed any to trifle, it filled him with just indignation. And I have known instances, in which, upon making the remark, he has communicated it to some friend of the persons who were guilty of it, that proper application might be made to prevent it for the time to come.

§ 108. A more devout communicant at the table of the Lord has perhaps seldom been any where known. Often have I had the pleasure to see that manly countenance softened to all the marks of humiliation and contrition on this occasion; and to discern, in spite of all his efforts to conceal them, streams of tears flowing down from his eyes, while he has been directing them to those memorials of his Redeemer's love. And some, who have conversed intimately with him after he came from that ordinance, have observed a visible abstraction from surrounding objects; by which there seemed reason to imagine that his soul was engaged in holy contemplation. And I particularly remember, that when we had once spent good part of the following Monday in riding together, he made an apology to me for being so absent as he seemed, by telling me, that his heart was flown upwards, before he was aware, to him whom not having seen he loved;* and that he was rejoicing in him with such unspeakable joy, that he could not hold it down to creature-converse.

§ 109. In all the offices of friendship he was remarkably ready, and had a most sweet and engaging manner of performing them, which greatly heightened the obligations he conferred. He seemed not to set any high value upon any benefit he bestowed; but did it without the least parade, as a thing which in those circumstances came of course, where he had professed love and respect. Which he was not over-forward to do, though he treated strangers, and those who were most his inferiors, very courteously, and always seemed, because he in truth always was, glad of any opportunity of doing them good.

§ 110. He was particularly zealous in vindicating the reputation of his friends in their absence: and though I cannot recollect that I had ever an opportunity of observing this immediately, as I do not know that I ever was present with him when any ill was spoken of others at all; yet by what I have heard him say, with relation to attempts to injure the character of worthy and useful men, I have reason to believe, that no man living was more sensible of the baseness and infamy, as well as the cruelty, of such a conduct. He knew and despised the low principles of resentment for unreasonable expectations disappointed, of personal attachment to men of some crossing interests, of envy, and of party zeal, from whence such a conduct often proceeds: and was particularly offended, when he found it (as he frequently did) in persons that set up for the greatest patrons of liberty, virtue, and candour. He looked upon the murderers of reputation and usefulness, as some of the vilest pests of society; and plainly showed, on every proper occasion, that he thought it the part of a generous, benevolent, and courageous man, to exert himself in tracing and hunting down the slander, that the authors or abettors of it might be less capable of doing mischief for the future.

§ 111. The most plausible objection that I ever heard to Colonel Gardiner's character is, that he was too much attached to some religious principles, established indeed in the churches both of England and Scotland, but which have of late years been much disputed, and from which, it is at least generally supposed, not a few in both have thought proper to depart, whatever expedients they may have found to quiet their consciences, in subscribing those formularies in which they are plainly tangled. His zeal was especially apparent in opposition to those doctrines which seemed to derogate from the divine honours of the Son and Spirit of God, and from the freedom of divine grace, or the reality and necessity of its operations in the conversion and salvation of sinners.

* N.B. [illegible] Saturday [illegible]

§ 112. With relation to these I must observe, that it was his most stedfast persuasion, that all those notions which represent our blessed Redeemer and the Holy Spirit as mere creatures, or which set aside the atonement of the former, or the influences of the latter, do sap the very foundation of Christianity, by rejecting the most glorious doctrines peculiar to it. He had attentively observed (what indeed is too obvious) the unhappy influence which the denial of these principles often has on the character of ministers, and on their success; and was persuaded, that an attempt to substitute that mutilated form of Christianity which remains, when these essentials of it are taken away, has proved one of the most successful methods which the great enemy of souls has ever taken in these latter days, to lead men by insensible degrees into deism, vice, and perdition. He also sagaciously observed the artful manner in which obnoxious tenets are often maintained or insinuated, with all that mixture of zeal and address with which they are propagated in the world, even by those who had most solemnly professed to believe, and engaged to teach, the contrary; and, as he really apprehended that the glory of God and the salvation of souls was concerned, his piety and charity made him eager and strenuous in opposing what he judged to be errors of so pernicious a nature. Yet I must declare, that, according to what I have known of him, (and I believe he opened his heart on these topics to me with as much freedom as to any man living,) he was not ready upon light suspicions to charge tenets which he thought so pernicious on any, especially where he saw the appearances of a good temper and life, which he always reverenced and loved in persons of all sentiments and professions. He severely condemned causeless jealousies, and evil surmisings of every kind; and extended that charity in this respect, both to clergy and laity, which good Bishop Burnet was so ready, according to his own account, to limit the latter, "of believing every man good till he knew him to be bad, and his notions right till he knew them wrong." He could not but be very sensible of the unhappy consequences which may follow on attacking the characters of men, especially of those who are ministers of the gospel: and if, through a mixture of human frailty, from which the best of men in the best of their meanings and intentions are not entirely free, he has ever, in the warmth of his heart, dropped a word which might be injurious to any on that account, (which I believe very seldom happened,) he would gladly retract it on better information; which was perfectly agreeable to that honest and generous frankness of temper, in which I never knew any man who exceeded him.

§ 113. On the whole, it was indeed his deliberate judgment that the Arian, Socinian, and Pelagian doctrines were highly dishonourable to God, and dangerous to the souls of men; and that it was the duty of private Christians to be greatly on their guard against those ministers by whom they are entertained, lest their minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. Yet he sincerely abhorred the thought of persecution for conscience' sake; of the absurdity and iniquity of which, in all its kinds and degrees, he had as deep and rational a conviction as any man I could name. And indeed the generosity of his heroic heart could hardly bear to think that those glorious truths, which he so cordially loved, and which he assuredly believed to be capable of such fair support, both from reason and the word of God, should be disgraced by methods of defence and propagation, common to the most impious and ridiculous falsehoods. Nor did he by any means approve of passionate and furious ways of vindicating the most vital and important doctrines of the gospel; for he knew, that to maintain the most benevolent religion in the world, by such malevolent and infernal methods, was destroying the end to accomplish the means; and that it was as impossible that true Christianity should be supported thus, as it is that a man should long be nourished by eating his own flesh. To display the genuine fruits of Christianity in a good life, to be ready to plead with meekness and sweetness for the doctrines it teaches, and to labour by every office of humanity and goodness to gain upon them that oppose it, were the weapons with which this good soldier of Jesus Christ faithfully fought the battles of the Lord. These weapons will always be victorious in his cause; and they who have recourse to others of a different temperature, how strong soever they may seem, and how sharp soever they may really be, will find they break in their hands when they exert them most furiously, and are much more likely to wound themselves, than to conquer the enemies they oppose.

§ 114. But while I am speaking of Colonel Gardiner's charity in this respect, I must not omit that of another kind, which has indeed engrossed the name of charity much more than it ought, excellent as it is; I mean almsgiving, for which he was very remarkable. I have often wondered how he was able to do so many generous things this way: but his frugality fed the spring. He made no pleasurable expense on himself, and was contented with a very decent appearance in his family, without affecting such an air of grandeur as could not have been supported without sacrificing to it satisfactions far nobler, and, to a temper like his, far more delightful. The lively and tender feelings of his heart in favour of the distressed and afflicted, made it a self-indulgence to him to relieve them; and the deep conviction he had of the vain and transitory nature of the enjoyments of this world: together with the sublime view he had of another, engaged him to dispense his bounties with a very liberal hand, and even to seek out proper objects of them: and, above all his seasons and ardent love to the Lord Jesus Christ engaged him to feel, with a true sympathy, the concerns of his poor members. In consequence of this, he honoured several of his friends with commissions for the relief of the poor; and particularly with relation to some under my pastoral care, he referred it to my discretion to supply them with what I should judge expedient, and frequently pressed me in his letters to be sure not to let them want. And where persons standing in need of his charity happened, as they often did, to be persons of remarkably religious dispositions, it was easy to perceive that he not only loved but honoured them; and really esteemed it an honour which Providence conferred upon him, that he should be made, as it were, the almoner of God for the relief of such.

§ 115. I cannot forbear relating a little story here, which, when the Colonel himself heard it, gave him such exquisite pleasure, that I hope it will be acceptable to several of my readers. There was in a village about three miles from Northampton, and in a family which of all others near me was afterwards most indebted to him, (though he had never then seen any member of it,) an aged and poor, but eminently good, woman, who had, with great difficulty, in the exercise of much faith and patience, diligence and humility, made shift to educate a large family of children, after the death of her husband, without being chargeable to the parish; which, as it was quite beyond her hope, she often spoke of with great delight. At length, when worn out with age and infirmities, she lay upon her dying bed, she did in a most lively and affecting manner express her hope and joy in the views of approaching glory. Yet, amidst all the triumph of such a prospect, there was one remaining care and distress which lay heavy on her mind; which was, that, as her journey and her stock of provisions were both ended together, she feared that she must either be buried at the parish expense, or leave her most dutiful and affectionate daughters the house stripped of some of the few movables which remained in it, to perform the last office of duty to her, which she had reason to believe they would do. While she was combating with this only remaining anxiety, I happened, though I knew not the extremity of her illness, to come in, and to bring with me a guinea, which the generous Colonel had sent by a special message on hearing the character of the family, for its relief. A present like this (probably the most considerable they had ever received in their lives) coming in this manner from an entire stranger, at such a crisis of time, threw my dying friend [illegible] such amidst all her poverty, I removed to call her into a perfect transport of joy. She esteemed it a singular favour of Providence, sent to her in her last moments as a token of good, and greeted it as a special mark of that living kindness of God which should attend her for ever. She might even be so raised up in her bed, that she might bless God for it upon her knees, and with her last breath pray for her kind and generous benefactor, and for him who had been the instrument of directing his bounty into this channel. After which she soon expired, with such tranquillity and sweetness as could not but most sensibly delight all who beheld her, and occasioned many, who knew the circumstances, to glorify God on her behalf.

§ 116. The Colonel's last residence at Northampton was in June and July, 1742, when Lord Cadogan's regiment of dragoons was quartered here: and I cannot but observe, that wherever that regiment came, it was remarkable, not only for the fine appearance it made, and for the exactness with which it performed its various exercises, (of which it had about this time the honour to receive the most illustrious testimonials,) but also for the great sobriety and regularity of the soldiers. Many of the officers copied also the excellent pattern which they had daily before their eyes; and a considerable number of the private men seemed to be persons, not only of strict virtue, but of serious piety. And I doubt not, but they found their abundant account in it; not only in the serenity and happiness of their own minds, which is beyond comparison the most important consideration; but also, in some degree, in the obliging and respectful treatment which they generally met with in their quarters. And I mention this, because I am persuaded, that if gentlemen of their profession knew, and would reflect, how much more comfortable they make their own quarters by a sober, orderly, and obliging conduct, they would be regular out of mere self-love: if they were not influenced, as I heartily wish they may always be, by a nobler principle.

§ 117. Towards the latter end of this year he embarked for Flanders, and spent some considerable time with the regiment at Ghent, where he much lamented the want of those religious conferences and opportunities which had made his other absence so delightful. But, as he had made so eminent a progress in that divine life which they are all intended to promote, he could not be inactive in the cause of God. I have now before me a letter dated from thence October 16, 1742, in which he writes: "As for me, I am indeed in a dry and barren land, where no water is. Rivers of waters run down mine eyes because nothing is to be heard in our Sodom but blaspheming the name of my God: and I am not honoured as the instrument of doing any great service. Last week, I have rebuked six or seven field-officers of swearing. I dine every day with them, and have entered them into a voluntary contract to pay a shilling to the poor for every oath: and it is wonderful to observe the effect it has had already. One of them told me this day at dinner, that it had really such an influence upon him, that, being at cards last night when another officer fell a swearing, he was not able to bear it, but rose up and left the company. So, you see, restraints at first arising from a low principle may improve into something better."

§ 118. During his abode here he had a great deal of business upon his hands; and had also, in some marches, the care of more regiments than his own: and it has been very delightful to me to observe what a degree of converse with heaven, and the God of it, he maintained amidst these scenes of hurry and fatigue; of which the reader may find a remarkable specimen in the following letter, dated from Lichwick, in the beginning of April, 1743, which was one of the last I received from him while abroad, and begins with these words: "Yesterday being the Lord's day, at six in the morning, I had the pleasure of receiving yours at Nortonick; and it proved a sabbath-day's blessing to me. Some time before it reached me" (from whence by the way it may be observed, that his former custom of rising so early to his devotions was still retained) "I had been wrestling with God with many tears; and when I had read it, I returned to my knees again, to give hearty thanks to him for all his goodness to you and yours, and also to myself, in that he hath been pleased to stir up so many who are dear to him, to be mindful of me at the throne of grace." And then, after the mention of some other particulars, he adds, "Blessed and adored for ever be the holy name of my heavenly Father, who holds my soul in life, and my body in perfect health! Were I to recount his mercy and goodness to me even in the midst of all these hurries, I should never have done.—I hope your Master will still encourage you in his work, and make you a blessing to many. My dearest friend, I am much more yours than I can express, and shall remain so while I am J. G."

§ 119. In this correspondence I had a further opportunity of discovering that humble resignation to the will of God, which made so amiable a part of his character, and of which before I had seen so many instances. He speaks, in the letter from which I have just been giving an extract, of the hope he had expressed in a former, of seeing us again that winter; and he adds, "To be sure, it would have been a great pleasure to me: but we poor mortals form projects, and the Almighty Ruler of the universe disposes of all as he pleases. A great many of us were getting ready for our return to England, when we received an order to march towards Frankfort, to the great surprise of the whole army, neither can any of us comprehend what we are to do there; for there is no enemy in that country, the French army being marched into Bavaria, where I am sure we cannot follow them. But it is the will of the Lord; and his will be done! I desire to bless and praise my heavenly Father, that I am entirely resigned to it. It is no matter where I go, or what becomes of me, so that God may be glorified, in my life, or my death. I should rejoice much to hear that all my friends were equally resigned."

§ 120. The mention of this article reminds me of another, relating to the views which he had of obtaining a regiment for himself. He endeavoured to deserve it by the most faithful services; some of them indeed beyond what the strength of his constitution would well bear: for the weather in some of these marches proved exceeding bad, and yet he would be always at the head of his people, that he might look to every thing that concerned them with the exactest care. This obliged him to neglect the beginnings of a feverish illness: the natural consequence of which was, that it grew very formidable, forced a long confinement upon him, and gave animal nature a shock which it never recovered.

§ 121. In the mean time, as he had the promise of a regiment before he quitted England, his friends were continually expecting an occasion of congratulating him on having received the command of one. But still they were disappointed; and on some of them the disappointment seemed to sit heavy. As for the Colonel himself, he seemed quite easy about it; and appeared much greater in that easy situation of mind than the highest military honours and preferments could have made him. With great pleasure do I at this moment recollect the unaffected serenity, and even indifference, with which he expresses himself upon this occasion, in a letter to me, dated about the beginning of April, 1743. "The disappointment of a regiment is nothing to me; for I am satisfied that, had it been for God's glory, I should have had it; and I should have been sorry to have had it on any other terms. My heavenly Father has bestowed upon me infinitely more than if he had made me emperor of the whole world."

§ 122. I find several parallel expressions in other letters; and those to his lady about the same time were just in the same strain. In an extract from one which was written from Aix la Chapelle, April 21, the same year, I meet with these words: "People here imagine I must be sadly troubled that I have not got a regiment (for six out of seven counsel are now disposed of;) but they are strangely mistaken, for it has given me no sort of trouble. My heavenly Father knows what is best for me, and blessed and for ever adored be his name, he has given me an entire resignation to his will; besides,

I do not know that ever I met with any disappointment since I was a Christian, but it pleased God to discover to me that it was plainly for my advantage, by bestowing something better upon me afterwards: many instances of which I am able to produce; and therefore I should be the greatest of monsters if I did not trust in him."

§ 123. I should be guilty of a great omission if I were not to add how remarkably the event corresponded with his faith on this occasion. For whereas he had no intimation or expectation of any thing more than a regiment of foot, his Majesty was pleased, out of his great goodness, to give him a regiment of dragoons, which was then quartered just in his own neighbourhood. And it is properly remarked by the reverend and worthy person through whose hand this letter was transmitted to me, that when the Colonel thus expressed himself, he could have no prospect of what he afterwards so soon obtained; as General Bland's regiment, to which he was advanced, was only vacant on the 19th of April, that is, two days before the date of this letter, when it was impossible he should have any notice of that vacancy. And it also deserves observation, that some few days after the Colonel was thus unexpectedly promoted to the command of these dragoons, Brigadier Cornwallis's regiment of foot, then in Flanders, became vacant: now had this happened before his promotion to General Bland's, Colonel Gardiner in all probability would only have had that regiment of foot, and so have continued in Flanders. When the affair was issued, he informs Lady Frances of it, in a letter dated from a village near Frankfort, May 3, in which he refers to his former of the 21st of April, observing how remarkably it was verified in God's having given him (for so he expresses it, agreeably to the views he continually maintained of the universal agency of divine Providence) "what he had no expectation of, and what was so much better than that which he had missed, a regiment of dragoons quartered at his own door."

§ 124. It appeared to him, that by this remarkable event Providence called him home. Accordingly, though he had other preferments offered him in the army, he chose to return; and, I believe, the more willingly, as he did not expect there would have been any action. Just at this time it pleased God to give him an awful instance of the uncertainty of human prospects and enjoyments, by that violent fever which seized him at Ghent in his way to England; and perhaps the more severely, for the efforts he made to push on his journey, though he had for some days been much indisposed. It was, I think, one of the first fits of severe illness he had ever met with, and he was ready to look upon it as a sudden call into eternity: but it gave him no painful alarm in that view. He committed himself to the God of his life, and in a few weeks he was so well recovered as to be capable of pursuing his journey, though not without difficulty: and I cannot but think it might have conduced much to a more perfect recovery than he ever attained, to have allowed himself a longer repose, in order to recruit his exhausted strength and spirits. But there was an activity in his temper not easy to be restrained, and it was now stimulated, not only by a desire of seeing his friends, but of being with his regiment; that he might omit nothing in his power to regulate their morals and their discipline, and to form them for public service. Accordingly, he passed through London about the middle of June, 1743, where he had the honour of waiting on their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and of receiving from both the most obliging tokens of favour and esteem. He arrived at Northampton on Monday the 20th of June, and spent part of three days here. But the great pleasure which his return and preferment gave us, was much abated by observing his countenance so sadly altered, and the many marks of languor, and remaining disorder, which evidently appeared; so that he really looked ten years older than he had done ten months before. I had however a satisfaction, sufficient to counterbalance much of the concern which this alteration gave me, in a renewed opportunity of observing, indeed more sensibly than ever, in how remarkable a degree he was dead to the enjoyments and views of this mortal life. When I congratulated him on the favourable appearance of Providence for him in the late event, he briefly told me the remarkable circumstances that attended it, with the most genuine impressions of gratitude to God for them; but added, "that, as his account was increased with his income, power, and influence, and his cares were proportionably increased too, it was as to his own personal concern much the same to him, whether he had remained in his former station, or been elevated to this; but that, if God should by this means honour him as an instrument of doing more good than he could otherwise have done, he should rejoice in it."

§ 125. I perceived that the near views he had taken of eternity, in the illness from which he was then so imperfectly recovered, had not in the least alarmed him; but that he would have been entirely willing, had such been the determination of God, to have been cut short in a foreign land, without any earthly friend near him, and in the midst of a journey, undertaken with hopes and prospects so pleasing to nature, which appeared to me no inconsiderable evidence of the strength of his faith. But we shall wonder the less at this extraordinary resignation, if we consider the joyful and assured prospect which he had of a happiness infinitely superior beyond the grave, of which that worthy minister of the church of Scotland, who had an opportunity of conversing with him quickly after his return, and having the memorable story of his conversion from his own mouth, (as I have hinted above,) writes thus in his letter to me, dated January 14, 1746-7.—"When he came to review his regiment at Linlithgow, in summer 1743, after having given me the wonderful story as above, he concluded in words to this purpose;—Let me die whenever it shall please God, or wherever it shall be, I am sure I shall go to the mansions of eternal glory, and enjoy my God and my Redeemer in heaven for ever."

§ 126. While he was with us at this time he appeared deeply affected with the sad state of things as to religion and morals; and seemed to apprehend that the rod of God was hanging over so sinful a nation. He observed a great deal of disaffection, which the enemies of the government had, by a variety of artifices, been raising in Scotland for some years; and the number of Jacobites there, together with the defenceless state in which our island then was, with respect to the number of its forces at home, (of which he spoke at once with great concern and astonishment,) led him to expect an invasion from France, and an attempt in favour of the Pretender, much sooner than it happened. I have heard him say, many years before it came so near being accomplished, "that a few thousands might have a fair chance for marching from Edinburgh to London uncontrolled, and throw the whole kingdom into an astonishment." And I have great reason to believe, that this was one main consideration which engaged him to make such haste to his regiment, then quartered in those parts; as he imagined there was not a spot of ground where he might be more likely to have a call to expose his life in the service of his country; and perhaps, by appearing on a proper call early in its defence, be instrumental in suppressing the beginnings of most formidable mischief. How rightly he judged in these things, the event did too evidently show.

§ 127. The evening before our last separation, as I knew I could not entertain the invaluable friend who was then my guest more agreeably, I preached a sermon in my own house, with some particular reference to his case and circumstances, from those ever-memorable words, than which I have never felt any more powerful and more comfortable, Psalm xci. 14, 15, 16. Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble, I will deliver him and honour him: with long life (or length of days) will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation. This Scripture could not but lead our meditations to survey the character of the good man, as one who so knows the name of the blessed God, has such a deep apprehension of the glories and perfections of his nature) as determinately to set his love upon him, to make him the supreme object of his most ardent and constant affection. And it suggested the most sublime and animating hopes to persons of such a character, that their prayers shall be always acceptable to God; that though they may, and must, be called out to their share in the troubles and calamities of life, yet they may assure themselves of the divine presence in all; which shall issue in their deliverance, in their exaltation, sometimes to distinguished honour and esteem among men, and, it may be, in a long course of useful and happy years on earth; at least, which shall undoubtedly end in seeing, to their perpetual delight, the complete salvation of God, in a world where they shall enjoy length of days for ever and ever, and employ them all in adoring the great Author of their salvation and felicity. It is evident that these natural thoughts on such a Scripture were matters of universal concern. Yet had I known that this was the last time I should ever address Colonel Gardiner as a minister of the gospel, and had I foreseen the scenes through which God was about to lead him, I hardly know what considerations I could have suggested with more peculiar propriety. The attention, elevation, and delight, with which he heard them, was very apparent; and the pleasure which the observation of it gave me, continues to this moment. And let me be permitted to digress so far as to add, that this is indeed the great support of a Christian minister under the many discouragements and disappointments which he meets with in his attempts to [illegible] on the thoughtless part of mankind a deep sense of religious truth; that there is another important part of his work, in which he may hope to be more generally successful; as by plain, artless, but serious discourses, the great principles of Christian duty and hope may be nourished and invigorated in good men, their graces watered as at the root, and their souls animated both to persevere and improve in holiness. And when we are effectually performing such benevolent offices, so well suiting our immortal natures, to persons whose hearts are cemented with ours in the bonds of the most endearing and sacred friendship, it is too little to say it overpays the fatigue of our labours; it even swallows up all sense of it in the most rational and sublime pleasure.

§ 128. An incident occurs to my mind which happened that evening, which at least for the oddness of it may deserve a place in these memoirs. I had then with me one Thomas Porter, a poor but very honest and religious man, (now living at Hatfield Broadoak, in Essex,) who is quite unacquainted with letters, so as not to be able to distinguish one from another; yet is master of the contents of the Bible in so extraordinary a degree, that he has not only fixed an immense number of texts in his memory, but merely by hearing them quoted in sermons, has registered there the chapter and verse in which these passages are to be found: this is attended with a marvellous facility in directing those that can read to turn to them, and a most unaccountable talent of fixing on such as suit almost every imaginable variety of circumstances in common life. There are two considerations in his case which make it the more wonderful: the one, that he is a person of a very low genius, having, besides a stammering which makes his speech almost unintelligible to strangers, so wild and awkward a manner of behaviour, that he is frequently taken for an idiot, and seems in many things to be indeed so; the other, that he grew up to manhood in a very licentious course of living, and an entire ignorance of divine things, so that all these exact impressions on his memory have been made in his riper years. I thought it would not be disagreeable to the Colonel to introduce to him this odd phænomenon, which many hundreds of people have had a curiosity to examine; and among all the strange things I have seen in him, I never remember any which equalled what passed on this occasion. On hearing the Colonel's profession, and receiving some hints of his religious character, he ran through a vast variety of Scriptures, beginning at the Pentateuch and going on to the Revelations, relating either to the dependence to be fixed on God for the success of military preparations, or to the instances and promises occurring there of his care of good men in the most imminent dangers, or to the encouragement to despise perils and death while engaged in a good cause, and supported by the views of a happy immortality. I believe he quoted more than twenty of these passages; and I must freely own, that I know not who could have chose them with greater propriety. If my memory do not deceive me, the last of his catalogue was that from which I afterwards preached on the lamented occasion of this great man's fall: Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. We were all astonished at so remarkable a fact; and I question not but many of my readers will think the memory of it worthy of being thus preserved.

§ 129. But to return to my main subject: the next day after the sermon and conversation of which I have been speaking, I took my last leave of my inestimable friend, after attending him some part of his way northward. The first stage of our journey was to the cottage of that poor, but very religious, family which I had occasion to mention above, as relieved, and indeed in a great measure subsisted, by his charity. And nothing could be more delightful than to observe the condescension with which he conversed with these his humble pensioners. We there put up our last united prayers together; and he afterwards expressed, in the strongest terms I ever heard him use on such an occasion, the singular pleasure with which he had joined in them. Indeed it was no small satisfaction to me to have an opportunity of recommending such a valuable friend to the divine protection and blessing, with that particular freedom, and enlargement on what was peculiar in his circumstances, which hardly any other situation, unless we had been quite alone, could so conveniently have admitted. We went from thence to the table of a person of distinction in the neighbourhood, where he had an opportunity of showing in how decent and graceful a manner he could unite the Christian and the gentleman, and give conversation an improving and religious turn, without violating any of the rules of polite behaviour, or saying or doing any thing which looked at all constrained or affected. Here we took our last embrace, committed each other to the care of the God of heaven; and the Colonel pursued his journey to the north, where he spent all the remainder of his days.

§ 130. The more I reflect upon this appointment of Providence, the more I discern of the beauty and wisdom of it; not only as it led directly to that glorious period of life with which God had determined to honour him, and in which I think it becomes all his friends to rejoice; but also, as the retirement on which he entered could not but have a happy tendency to favour his more immediate and complete preparation for so speedy a remove. To which we may add, that it must probably have a very powerful influence to promote the interests of religion (incomparably the greatest of all interests) among the members of his own family; who must surely edify much by such daily lessons as they received from his lips, when they saw them illustrated and enforced by so admirable an example, and this for two complete years. It is the more remarkable, as I cannot find from the memoirs of his life in my hands, that he had ever been so long at home since he had a family, or indeed, from his childhood, ever so long at a time in any one place.

§ 131. With how clear a lustre his lamp shone, and with what holy vigour his loins were girded up in the service of his God, in these his latter days, I learn in part from the letters of several excellent persons, in the ministry, or in secular life, with whom I have since conversed or corresponded. And in his many letters, dated from Bankton, during this period, I have still further evidence how happy he was amidst those infirmities of body which his tenderness for me would seldom allow him to mention; for it appears from them what a daily intercourse he kept up with heaven, and what delightful communion with God crowned his attendance on public ordinances and his sweet hours of devout retirement. He mentions his sacramental opportunities with peculiar relish, crying out as in a holy rapture, in reference to one and another of them, "O how gracious a Master do we serve! how pleasant is his service! how rich the entertainments of his love! Yet, oh how poor, and cold, are our services!"—But I will not multiply quotations of this sort, after those I have given above, which may be a sufficient specimen of many more in the same strain. This hint may suffice to show, that the same ardour of soul held out in a great measure to the last; and indeed it seems that, towards the close of life, like the flame of a lamp almost expiring, it sometimes exerted an unusual blaze.

§ 132. He spent much of his time at Bankton in religious solitude; and one most intimately conversant with him assures me, that the traces of that delightful converse with God which he enjoyed in it, might easily be discerned in that solemn yet cheerful countenance with which he often came out of his closet. Yet his exercises there must sometimes have been very mournful, considering the melancholy views which he had of the state of our public affairs. "I should be glad," says he, (in a letter which he sent me about the close of the year 1743,) "to hear what wise and good people among you think of the present circumstances of things. For my own part, though I thank God I fear nothing for myself, my apprehensions for the public are very gloomy, considering the deplorable prevalency of almost all kinds of wickedness amongst us; the natural consequence of the contempt of the gospel. I am daily offering my prayers to God for this sinful land of ours, over which his judgments seem to be gathering; and my strength is sometimes so exhausted with those strong cries and tears which I pour out before God on this occasion, that I am hardly able to stand when I arise from my knees." If we have many remaining to stand in the breach with equal fervency, I hope, crying as our provocations are, God will still be entreated for us, and save us.

§ 133. Most of the other letters I had the pleasure of receiving from him, after our last separation, are either filled, like those of former years, with tender expressions of affectionate solicitude for my domestic comfort and public usefulness, or relate to the writings I published during this time, or to the affairs of his eldest son, then under my care. But these are things which are by no means of a nature to be communicated here. It is enough to remark in the general, that the Christian was still mingled with all the care of the friend and the parent.

§ 134. But I think it incumbent upon me to observe, that during this time, and some preceding years, his attention, ever wakeful to such concerns, was much engaged by some religious appearances, which happened about this time, both in England and Scotland; with regard to which some may be curious to know his sentiments. He communicated them to me with the most unreserved freedom; and I cannot apprehend myself under any engagements to conceal them, as I am persuaded that it will be no prejudice to his memory that they should be publicly known.

§ 135. It was from Colonel Gardiner's pen that I received the first notice of that ever-memorable scene which was opened at Kilsyth, under the ministry of the Reverend Mr. Maeculloch, in the month of February, 1741-2. He communicated to me the copy of two letters from that eminently favoured servant of God, giving an account of that extraordinary success which had within a few days accompanied his preaching; when, as I remember, in a little more than a fortnight a hundred and thirty souls, who had before continued in long insensibility under the faithful preaching of the gospel, were awakened on a sudden to attend it, as if it had been a new revelation brought down from heaven, and attested by as astonishing miracles as ever were wrought by Peter or Paul; though they heard it only from a person under whose ministry they have sat for several years. Struck with a power and majesty in the word of God, which they had never felt before, they crowded his house night and day, making their applications to him for spiritual direction and assistance with an earnestness and solicitude, which floods of tears and cries, that swallowed up their own words and his, could not sufficiently express. The Colonel mentioned this at first to me as matter of eternal praise, which he knew would rejoice my very soul; and when he saw it spread in the neighbouring parts, and observed the glorious reformation which it produced in the lives of great multitudes, and the abiding fruits of it for succeeding months and years, it increased and confirmed his joy. But the facts relating to this matter have been laid before the world in so authentic a manner, and the agency of divine grace in them has been so rationally vindicated and so pathetically represented in what the reverend and judicious Mr. Webster has written upon that subject, that it is altogether superfluous for me to add any thing further than my hearty prayers, that the work may be as extensive as it was apparently glorious and divine.

§ 136. It was with great pleasure that he received any intelligence of a like kind from England; whether the clergy of the established church or dissenting ministers, whether our own countrymen or foreigners, were the instruments of it. And, whatever weaknesses or errors might mingle themselves with valuable qualities in such as were active in such a work, he appeared to love and honour them in proportion to the degree he saw reason to believe their hearts were devoted to the service of Christ, and their attempts owned and succeeded by him.

I remember that, mentioning one of these gentlemen, who had been remarkably successful in his ministry, and seemed to have met with some very unkind usage, he says, "I had rather be that despised persecuted man, to be an instrument in the hand of the Spirit, in converting so many souls, and building up so many in their holy faith, than I would be emperor of the whole world." Yet this steady and judicious Christian, (for such he most assuredly was,) at the same time that he esteemed a man for his good intention and his worthy qualities, did not suffer himself to be hurried away into all the singularity of his sentiments, or to admire his imprudences or excesses. On the contrary, he saw and lamented that artifice which the great father of fraud has so long and so successfully been practising; who, like the enemies of Israel, when he cannot entirely prevent the building of God's temple, does as it were offer his assistance to carry on the work, that he may thereby get the most effectual opportunities of obstructing it. The Colonel often expressed his astonishment at the wide extremes into which some whom, on the whole, he thought very worthy men, were permitted to run in many doctrinal and speculative points; and discerned how evidently it appeared from hence, that we cannot argue the truth of any doctrine from the success of the preacher; since this would be a kind of demonstration (if I may be allowed the expression) which might equally prove both parts of a contradiction. Yet when he observed, that a high regard to the atonement and righteousness of Christ, and to the free grace of God in him, exerted by the operation of the divine Spirit, was generally common to all who had been peculiarly successful in the conversion and reformation of men, (how widely soever their judgments might differ in other points, and how warmly soever they might oppose each other in consequence of that diversity,) it tended greatly to confirm his faith in these principles, as well as to open his heart in love to all of every denomination, who maintained an affectionate regard to them. And though what he remarked as to the conduct and success of ministers of the most opposite strains of preaching, confirmed him in these sentiments; yet he always esteemed and loved virtuous and benevolent men, even where he thought them most mistaken in the notions they formed of religion, or in the methods by which they attempted to serve it.

§ 137. While I thus represent what all who knew him must soon have observed of Colonel Gardiner's affectionate regard to these peculiar doctrines of our holy religion, it is necessary that I should also inform my reader, that it was not his judgment that the attention of ministers, or their hearers, should be wholly engrossed by these, excellent as they are: but that all the parts of the scheme of truth and duty should be regarded in their due connexion and proportion. Far from that distempered taste which can bear nothing but cordials, it was his deliberate judgment, that the law should be preached, as well as the gospel; and hardly any thing gave him greater offence than the irreverent manner in which some, who have been ignorantly extolled as the most zealous evangelical preachers, have sometimes been tempted to speak of the former; much indeed to the scandal of all consistent and judicious Christians. He delighted to be instructed in his duty, and to hear much of the inward exercises of the spiritual and divine life. And he always wished, so far as I could observe, to have these topics treated in a rational as well as a spiritual manner, with solidity and order of thought, with perspicuity and weight of expression; as well knowing, that religion is a most reasonable service: that God has not chosen idiots or lunatics as the instruments, or nonsense as the means, of building up his church; and that though the charge of enthusiasm is often fixed on Christianity and its ministers, in a wild, undeserved, and indeed (on the whole) enthusiastical manner, by some of the loudest or most solemn pretenders to reason; yet there is really such a thing as enthusiasm, against which it becomes the true friends of the revelation to be diligently on their guard; lest Christianity, instead of being exalted, should be greatly corrupted and debased, and all manner of absurdity, both in doctrine and practice, introduced by methods which, like persecution, throw truth and falsehood on a level, and render the grossest errors at once more plausible and more incurable. He had too much candour and equity to fix general charges of this nature; but he was really, and, I think, not vainly, apprehensive, that the emissaries and agents of the most corrupt church that ever dishonoured the Christian name, (by which, it will easily be understood, I mean that of Rome,) might very possibly insinuate themselves into societies, to which they could not otherwise have access, and make their advantage of that total resignation of the understanding, and contempt of reason and learning, which nothing but ignorance, delirium, or knavery, can dictate, to lead them blindfold whither it pleased, till it set them down at the foot of an altar where transubstantiation itself is consecrated.

§ 138. I know not where I can more properly introduce another part of the Colonel's character, which, obvious as it was, I have not yet touched upon: I mean, his tenderness to those who were under any spiritual distress, wherein he was indeed an example to ministers in a duty more peculiarly theirs. I have seen many amiable instances of this myself, and I have been informed of many others; one of which happened about the time of that awakening in the western parts of Scotland, which I touched upon above; when the Reverend Mr. Maclaurin of Glasgow found occasion to witness to the great propriety, judgment, and felicity of manner, with which he addressed spiritual consolation to an afflicted soul, who applied to the professor at a time when he had not an opportunity immediately to give audience to the case. And indeed, as long ago as the year 1726, I find him writing to a friend in a strain of tenderness in this regard, which might well have become the most affectionate and experienced pastor. He there congratulates him on some religious enjoyments lately received, (in part, it seems, by his means,) when, among others, he has this modest expression: "If I have been made any way the means of doing you good, give the whole glory to God; for he has been willing to show that the power was entirely of himself, since he has been pleased to make use of so very weak an instrument." In the same letter he admonishes his friend, that he should not be too much surprised, if, after having been (as he expresses it) upon the mount, he should be brought into the valley again; and reminds him that "we live by faith, and not by sensible assurance," representing, that there are some such full communications from God, as seem almost to swallow up the actings of faith, from whence they take their rise: "whereas, when a Christian who walks in darkness, and sees no light, will yet hang, as it were, on the report of an absent Jesus;" and, as one expresses it in allusion to the story of Jacob and Joseph, "can put himself, as on the chariot of the promises, to be borne on to Him whom now he sees not: there may be sublimer and more acceptable actions of a pure and strong faith, than in moments which afford the soul a much more rapturous delight." This is the substance of what he says in the excellent letter. Some of the phrases made use of might not, perhaps, be intelligible to several of my readers, for which reason I do not exactly transcribe them all; but this is plainly and fully his meaning, and most of the words are his own. The sentiment is surely very just and important; and happy would it be for many excellent persons, who, through wrong notions of the nature of faith, (which was never more misrepresented than now among some,) are perplexing themselves with most groundless doubts and scruples, if it were more generally understood, admitted, and considered.

§ 139. An endeared friend, who was most intimately conversant with the Colonel during the two last years of his life, has favoured me with an account of some little circumstances relating to him; which I esteem as precious fragments, by which the consistent tenor of his character may be further illustrated. I shall, therefore, insert them here, without being very solicitous as to the order in which they are introduced.

§ 140. He perceived himself evidently in a very declining state from his first arrival in Britain, and seemed to entertain a fixed apprehension, that he should continue but a little while longer in life. "He expected death," says my good correspondent, "and was delighted with the prospect," which did not grow less amiable by a nearer approach. The word of God, with which he had as intimate an acquaintance as most men I ever knew, and on which, especially on the New Testament, I have heard him make many very judicious and accurate remarks, was still his daily study; and it furnished him with matter of frequent conversation, much to the edification and comfort of those that were about him. It was recollected, that among other passages he had lately spoke of the following, as having made a deep impression on his mind: My soul, wait thou only upon God! He would repeat it again and again, Only, Only, Only! So plainly did he see, and so deeply did he feel, the vanity of creature confidences and expectations. With the strongest attestation would he often mention those words in Isaiah, as verified by long experience: Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee. And with peculiar satisfaction would he utter those heroic words in Habakkuk, which he found armour of proof against every fear and every contingency: Though the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flocks shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls: yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation. The 145th Psalm was also spoken of by him with great delight, and Dr. Watts's version of it; as well as several other of that excellent person's poetical composures. My friend who transmits me this account, adds the following words; which I desire to insert with the deepest sentiments of unfeigned humility and self-abasement before God, as most unworthy the honour of contributing in the least degree to the joys and graces of one so much my superior in every part of the Christian character: "As the joy with which good men see the happy fruits of their labours, makes a part of the present reward of the servants of God and the friends of Jesus, it must not be omitted, even in a letter to you, that your spiritual hymns were among his most delightful and soul-improving repast; particularly those on beholding transgressors with grief, and Christ's message." What is added concerning my book of the Rise and Progress of Religion, and the terms in which he expressed his esteem of it, I cannot suffer to pass my pen, only desire most sincerely to bless God that, especially by the last chapters of that treatise, I had an opportunity, at so great a distance, of exhibiting some offices of Christian friendship to this excellent person, in the closing scenes of life, which it would have been my greatest joy to have performed in person, had Providence permitted me then to have been near him.

§ 141. The former of those hymns my correspondent mentions, as having been so agreeable to Colonel Gardiner, I have given the reader above, at the end of section 101. The latter, which is called Christ's Message, took its rise from Luke iv. 18, et seq. and is as follows:

I.

Hark! the glad sound! the Saviour comes,
The Saviour, promised long!
Let ev'ry heart prepare a throne,
And ev'ry voice a song.

II.

On him the Spirit largely poured,
Exerts its sacred fire;
Wisdom, and might, and zeal, and love,
His holy breast inspire.

III.

He comes, the prisoners to release
In Satan's bondage held;
The gates of brass before him burst,
The iron fetters yield.

IV.

He comes, from thickest films of vice
To clear the mental ray,
And on the eyeballs of the blind
To pour celestial day.*

V.

He comes, the broken heart to bind,
The bleeding soul to cure;
And with the treasures of his grace
To enrich the humble poor.

VI.

His silver trumpets publish loud
The jubilee of the LORD;
Our debts are all remitted now,
Our heritage restored.

VII.

Our glad hosannahs, Prince of peace,
Thy welcome shall proclaim;
And heaven's eternal arches ring
With thy beloved name.

§ 142. There is one hymn more I shall beg leave to add, plain as it is, which Colonel Gardiner has been heard to mention with particular regard, as expressing the utmost sentiments of his soul, and they were undoubtedly so in the last rational moments of his expiring life. It is called, Christ precious to the Believer; and was composed to be sung after a sermon on 1 Peter ii. 7.

I.

Jesus! I love thy charming name,
'Tis music to my ear;
Fain would I sound it out so loud
That earth and heaven should hear.

II.

Yes, thou art precious to my soul,
My transport and my trust:
Jewels to thee are gaudy toys,
And gold is sordid dust.

III.

All my capacious powers can wish,
In thee most richly meet:
Nor to my eyes is life so dear,
Nor friendship half so sweet.

IV.

Thy grace still dwells upon my heart,
And sheds its fragrance there;
The noblest balm of all its wounds,
The cordial of its care.

V.

I 'll speak the honours of thy name
With my last lab'ring breath;
Then, speechless, clasp thee in my arms,
The antidote of death.

§ 143. Those who were intimate with Colonel Gardiner, must have observed how ready he was to give a devotional turn to any subject that occurred. And in particular, the spiritual and heavenly disposition of his soul discovered itself in the reflections and improvements which he made when reading history; in which he took a great deal of pleasure, as persons remarkable for their knowledge of mankind, and observation of Providence, generally do. I have an instance of this before me, which, though too natural to be at all surprising, will, I dare say, be pleasing to the devout mind. He had just been reading, in Rollin's extract from Xenophon, the answer which the lady of Tigranes made, when all the company were extolling Cyrus, and expressing the admiration with which his appearance and behaviour struck them: The question being asked her, What she thought of him? she answered, I do not know, I did not observe him. On what then, said one of the company, did you fix your attention? On him, replied she, (referring to the generous speech which her husband had just made,) who said he would give a thousand lives to ransom my liberty. "O," cried the Colonel, when reading it, "how ought we to fix our eyes and hearts on him who not in offer, but in reality, gave his own precious life to ransom us from the most dreadful slavery, and from eternal destruction!" But this is only one instance among a thousand. His heart was so habitually set upon divine things, and he had such a permanent and overflowing sense of the love of Christ, that he could not forbear connecting such reflections with a multitude of more distant occasions occurring in daily life, where less advanced Christians would not have thought of them: and thus, like our great Master, he made every little incident a source of devotion, and an instrument of holy zeal.

* Two stanzas mostly borrowed from Mr. Pope.

§ 144. Enfeebled as his constitution was, he was still intent on improving his time to some valuable purposes: and when his friends expostulated with him, that he gave his body so little rest, he used to answer, "It will rest long enough in the grave."

§ 145. The July before his death he was persuaded to take a journey to Scarborough, for the recovery of his health; from which he was at least encouraged to expect some little revival. After this he had thoughts of going to London, and designed to have spent part of September at Northampton. The expectation of this was mutually agreeable; but Providence saw fit to disconcert the scheme. His love for his friends in these parts occasioned him to express some regret on his being commanded back: and I am pretty confident, from the manner in which he expressed himself in one of his last letters to me, that he had some more important reasons for wishing an opportunity of making a London journey just at that crisis; which, the reader will remember, was before the rebellion broke out. But as Providence determined otherwise, he acquiesced; and I am well satisfied, that could he have distinctly foreseen the approaching event, so far as it concerned his own person, he would have esteemed it the happiest summons he ever received. While he was at Scarborough, I find by a letter dated from thence, July 26, 1745, that he had been informed of the gaiety which so unseasonably prevailed at Edinburgh, where great multitudes were then spending their time in balls, assemblies, and other gay amusements, little mindful of the rod of God which was then hanging over them; on which occasion he hath this expression: "I am greatly surprised that the people of Edinburgh should be employed in such foolish diversions, when our situation is at present more melancholy than ever I saw it in my life. But there is one thing which I am very sure of, that comforts me, viz. that it shall go well with the righteous, come what will."

§ 146. Quickly after his return home the flame burst out, and his regiment was ordered to Stirling. It was in the castle there that his lady and eldest daughter enjoyed the last happy hours of his company: and I think it was about eight or ten days before his death that he parted from them there. A remarkable circumstance attended that parting, which hath been touched upon by surviving friends in more than one of their letters to me. His lady was so affected when she took her last leave of him, that she could not forbear bursting out into a flood of tears, with other marks of unusual emotion. And when he asked her the reason, she urged the apprehension she had of losing such an invaluable friend, amidst the dangers to which he was then called out, as a very sufficient apology. Upon which she took particular notice, that whereas he had generally comforted her on such occasions, by pleading with her that remarkable hand of Providence which had so frequently in former instances been exerted for his preservation, and that in the greatest extremity, he said nothing of it now; but only replied, in his sententious manner, "We have an eternity to spend together."

§ 147. That heroic contempt of death which had often discovered itself in the midst of former dangers, was manifested now in his discourse with several of his most intimate friends. I have reserved for this place one genuine expression of it many years before, which I thought might be mentioned with some advantage here. In July 1725, he had been sent to some place, not far from Hamilton, to quell a mutiny among some of our troops. I know not the particular occasion; but I remember to have heard him mention it as so fierce a one, that he scarce ever apprehended himself in a more hazardous circumstance. Yet he quelled it by his presence alone, and the expostulations he used; evidently putting his life into his hand to do it. The particulars of the story struck me much; but I do not so exactly remember them as to venture to relate them here. I only observe, that in a letter dated July 16, that year, which I have now before me, and which evidently refers to this event, he writes thus: "I have been very busy, hurried about from place to place; but blessed be God, all is over without bloodshed. And pray let me ask, What made you show so much concern for me in your last? Were you afraid I should get to heaven before you? Or can any evil befall those who are followers of that which is good?"*

§ 148. And as these were his sentiments in the vigour of his days, so neither did declining years and the infirmities of a broken constitution on the one hand, nor any desires of enjoying the honours and profits of so high a station, or (what was much more to him) the converse of the most affectionate of wives, and so many amiable children and friends, on the other, enervate his spirits in the least: but as he had in former years often expressed it, to me and several others, as his desire, "that if it were the will of God, he might have some honourable call to sacrifice his life in defence of religion and the liberties of his country:" so, when it appeared to him most probable that he might be called to it immediately, he met the summons with the greatest readiness. This appears in part from a letter which he wrote to the Reverend Mr. Adams of Falkirk, just as he was on marching from Stirling, which was only eight days before his death: "The rebels," says he, "are advancing to cross the Firth; but I trust in the Almighty God, who doth whatsoever he pleaseth in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." And the same gentleman tells me, that a few days after the date of this, he marched through Falkirk with his regiment; and though he was then in so languishing a state, that he needed his assistance as a secretary to write for some reinforcements which might put it in his power to make a stand, (as he was very desirous to have done,) he expressed a most genuine and noble contempt of life when to be exposed in the defence of a worthy cause.

* I should not but this will remind some of my readers of [illegible] speech of Zinzendorf, when, approaching [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

§ 149. These sentiments wrought in him to the last in the most effectual manner; and he seemed for a while to have infused them into the regiment which he commanded: for they expressed such a spirit in their march from Stirling, that I am assured the Colonel was obliged to exert all his authority to prevent their making incursions on the rebel army, which then lay very near them: and had it been thought proper to send him the reinforcement he requested, none can say what the consequence might have been. But he was ordered to march as fast as possible to meet Sir John Cope's forces at Dunbar; which he did: and that hasty retreat, in concurrence with the news which they soon after received of the surrender of Edinburgh to the rebels, (either by the treachery or weakness of a few, in opposition to the judgment of by far the greater and better part of the inhabitants,) struck a panic into both the regiments of dragoons, which became visible in some very apparent and remarkable circumstances in their behaviour, which I forbear to relate. This affected Colonel Gardiner so much, that, on the Thursday before the fatal action at Prestonpans, he intimated to an officer of considerable rank and note, (from whom I had it by a very sure channel of conveyance,) that he expected the event would be as in fact it was. In this view, there is all imaginable reason to believe he had formed his resolution as to his own personal conduct, which was, "that he would not, in case of the flight of those under his command, retreat with them;" by which, as it seemed, he was reasonably apprehensive he might have stained the honour of his former services, and have given some occasion for the enemy to have spoken reproachfully. He much rather chose, if Providence gave him the call, to leave in his death an example of fidelity and bravery, which might very probably be (as in fact it seems indeed to have been) of much greater importance to his country, than any other service which in the few days of remaining life he could expect to render it. I conclude these to have been his views, not only from what I knew of his general character and temper, but likewise from some intimations which he gave to a very worthy person from Edinburgh, who visited him the day before the action; to whom he said, "I cannot influence the conduct of others as I could wish, but I have one life to sacrifice to my country's safety, and I shall not spare it;" or words to that effect.

§ 150. I have heard such a multitude of inconsistent reports of the circumstances of Colonel Gardiner's death, that I had almost despaired of being able to give my reader any particular satisfaction concerning so interesting a scene. But by a happy accident I have very lately had an opportunity of being exactly informed of the whole, by that brave man, Mr. John Foster, his faithful servant, (and worthy of the honour of serving such a master,) whom I had seen with him at my house some years before. He attended him in his last hours, and gave me the narration at large; which he would be ready, if it were requisite, to attest upon oath. From his mouth I wrote it down with the utmost exactness, and could easily believe, from the genuine and affectionate manner in which he related the particulars, that, according to his own striking expression, "his eye and his heart were always upon his honoured master during the whole time."*

§ 151. On Friday, September 20, (the day before the battle which transmitted him to his immortal crown,) when the whole army was drawn up, I think about noon, the Colonel rode through all the ranks of his own regiment, addressing them at once in the most respectful and animating manner, both as soldiers, and as Christians, to engage them to exert themselves courageously in the service of their country, and to neglect nothing that might have a tendency to prepare them for whatever event might happen. They seemed much affected with the address, and expressed a very ardent desire of attacking the enemy immediately; a desire, in which he and another very gallant officer of distinguished rank, dignity, and character, both for bravery and conduct, would gladly have gratified them, if it had been in the power of either. He earnestly pressed it on the commanding officer, both as the soldiers were then in better spirits than it could be supposed they would be after having passed the night under arms, and also as the circumstance of making an attack would be some encouragement to them, and probably some terror to the enemy, who would have had the disadvantage of standing on the defence: a disadvantage with which those wild barbarians (for such most of them were) perhaps would have been more struck than better disciplined troops; especially, when they fought against the laws of their country too. He also apprehended, that by marching to meet them, some advantage might have been secured with regard to the ground; with which it is natural to imagine he must have been perfectly acquainted, as it lay just at his own door, and he had rode over it so many hundred times. When I mention these things, I do not pretend to be capable of judging how far this advice was on the whole right. A variety of circumstances, to me unknown, might make it otherwise. It is certain, however, that it was brave. But it was overruled in this respect, as it also was in the disposition of the cannon, which he would have had planted in the centre of our small army, rather than just before his regiment, which was in the right wing; where he was apprehensive that the horses, which had not been in any engagement before, might be thrown into some disorder by the discharge so very near them. He urged this the more, as he thought the attack of the rebels might probably be made on the centre of the foot; where he knew there were some brave men, on whose standing he thought, under God, the success of the day depended. When he found that he could not carry either of these points, nor some others, which out of regard to the common safety he insisted upon with some unusual earnestness, he dropped some intimations of the consequences which he apprehended, and which did in fact follow; and submitting to Providence, spent the remainder of the day in making as good a disposition as circumstances would allow.*

* Just as I am putting the last hand to these Memoirs, March 4, 1746-7, I have met with a Gentleman in Colonel Lascelles's regiment, who was then in the field, who informs me, that he supposed at Prestonpans, on the day of the battle, and the day before, and the account he has given me of some circumstances and persons is so exactly agreeable to what myself had received from Mr. Foster, that it would much contribute to the satisfaction of those who are not so much offended at considerations to render it uncontroverted.

§ 152. He continued all night under arms, wrapped up in his cloak, and generally sheltered under a rick of barley which happened to be in the field. About three in the morning he called his domestic servants to him, of which there were four in waiting. He dismissed three of them with most affectionate Christian advice, and such solemn charges relating to the performance of their duty and the care of their souls, as seemed plainly to intimate, that he apprehended it at least very probable he was taking his last farewell of them. There is great reason to believe that he spent the little remainder of the time, which could not be much above an hour, in those devout exercises of soul which had so long been habitual to him, and to which so many circumstances did then concur to call him. The army was alarmed by break of day by the noise of the rebel's approach, and the attack was made before sunrise; yet when it was light enough to discern what passed. As soon as the enemy came within gun-shot they made a furious fire; and it is said that the dragoons which constituted the left wing, immediately fled. The Colonel at the beginning of the onset, which in the whole lasted but a few minutes, received a wound by a bullet in his left breast, which made him give a sudden spring in his saddle; upon which his servant, who had led the horse, would have persuaded him to retreat; but he said it was only a wound in the flesh, and fought on, though he presently after received a shot in his right thigh. In the mean time it was discerned that some of the enemies fell by him; and particularly one man, who had made him a treacherous visit but a few days before, with great professions of zeal for the present establishment.

§ 153. Events of this kind pass in less time than the description of them can be written, or than it can be read. The Colonel was for a few moments supported by his men, and particularly by that worthy person Lieutenant-Colonel Whitney, who was shot through the arm here, and a few months after fell nobly in the battle of Falkirk; and by Lieutenant West, a man of distinguished bravery; as also by about fifteen dragoons, who stood by him to the last. But after a faint fire, the regiment in general was seized with a panic; and though their Colonel and some other gallant officers did what they could to rally them once or twice, they at last took a precipitate flight. And just in the moment when Colonel Gardiner seemed to be making a pause, to deliberate what duty required him to do in such a circumstance, an accident happened, which must, I think, in the judgment of every worthy and generous man, be allowed a sufficient apology for exposing his life to so great hazard when his regiment had left him.* He saw a party of the foot, who were then bravely fighting near him, and whom he was ordered to support, had no officer to head them; upon which he said eagerly, in the hearing of the person from whom I had this account, "Those brave

* Several of these circumstances have since been confirmed by the concurrent testimony of another very credible person, Mr. Robert Douglas, now a surgeon in the navy, who was a volunteer at Edinburgh just before the rebels entered the place; who saw Colonel Gardiner come from Haddington to the field of battle the day before the action in a chaise, being so ill from that circumstance he supposed in so weak a state that he could not well endure the fatigue of riding on horseback. He observed Colonel Gardiner in discourse with several officers the evening before the engagement, at which time it was afterwards reported, he gave his advice to attack the rebels, and when it was overruled, he afterwards saw the Colonel walk by himself in a very pensive manner.

* The Colonel, who was well acquainted with military affairs, could possibly remember, that in the battle at Dunbarton the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, when the horse at the wings were overthrown and ran away there, charged at the head of the foot, and thereby greatly contributed to the glorious success of the day. [illegible] exemplar may conduce to vindicate that noble person, whose memory [illegible] the unplatonised his country, some have been censured, and so continued to be blame. For my own part, I think it a great [illegible] to [illegible] for his reasoning his troops to [illegible] which I [illegible] have been common Border-law, and what [illegible] as he was [illegible] would have grieved me much more than [illegible] stances attending it.

fellows would be cut to pieces for want of a commander," or words to that effect: which while he was speaking, he rode up to them, and cried out aloud, "Fire on my lads, and fear nothing." But just as the words were out of his mouth, a Highlander observed to aspire him with a sword fastened to a long pole, with which he gave him such a deep wound on his right arm, that his sword dropped out of his hand; and at the same time several others coming about him while he was thus disabled, he was dragged off from his horse. The manner he still, another Highlander, who, if the king's evidence at Carlisle may be credited, (as I know not why they should not, though the unhappy creature died denying it) was one Macnaught, who was executed about a year after, gave him a stroke either with a broad sword or a Lochaber axe, for my informant could not exactly distinguish) on the hinder part of his head, which was the mortal blow. All that his faithful attendant saw further at this time was, that as his last was falling off, he took it in his left hand and waved it as a signal to him to retreat; and added, what were the last words he ever heard him speak, "Take care of yourself," upon which the servant retired.

§ 154. It was reported at Edinburgh on the day of the battle, by what seemed a considerable authority, that as the Colonel lay in his wounds, he said to a chief of the opposite side, "You are fighting for an earthly crown, I am going to receive an heavenly one;" or something to that purpose. When I preached the sermon, long since printed, on occasion of his death, I had great reason to believe this report was true; though before the publication of it I began to be in doubt, and on the whole, after the most accurate inquiry I could possibly make at this distance, I cannot get any convincing evidence of it. Yet I must here observe, that it does not appear impossible that something of this kind might indeed be uttered by him, as his servant testifies that he spoke to him after receiving that fatal blow, which would seem most likely to have taken away the power of speech, and as it is certain he lived several hours after he fell. If therefore any thing of this kind did happen, it must have been just about this instant. But as to the story of his being taken prisoner, and carried to the pretended prince, (who, by the way, afterwards came by horse, and entered upon it into Derby,) with several other circumstances, which were grafted upon that interview, there is the most undoubted evidence of its falsehood: for his attendant mentioned above assures me, that he himself immediately fled two miles at the distance of about two miles from the spot of ground on which the Colonel fell; where he changed his dress, and, disguised like a miller's servant, returned with a cart as soon as possible; which yet was not till nearly two hours after the engagement. The horse of the prince was then pretty well exercised by those who made themselves master not only possessed of his wig and other things of value, but also stripped of his upper garments and boots, yet still remaining; and also that, though he was not capable of speech, yet on taking him up he opened his eyes, which makes it something questionable, whether he were altogether insensible. In this condition, and in this manner, he conveyed him to the church of Tranent, from whence he was immediately taken into the minister's house, and laid in bed, where he continued breathing and frequently groaning, till about eleven in the forenoon; when he took his final leave of pain and sorrow, and undoubtedly rose to those distinguished glories which are reserved for those who have been so eminently and remarkably faithful unto death.

§ 155. From the moment in which he fell it was no longer a battle, but a rout and carnage. The cruelties which the rebels (as it is generally said, under the command of Lord Elcho) inflicted on some of the king's troops after they had asked quarter, are dreadfully legible on the countenances of many who survived it. They entered Colonel Gardiner's house before he was carried off from the field, and notwithstanding the strict orders which the unhappy Duke of Perth (whose conduct is said to have been very humane in many instances) gave to the contrary, every thing of value was plundered, to the very curtains of the beds and hangings of the rooms. His papers were all thrown into the street, and his house made as inexpert for the reception of those who were wounded in the action.

§ 156. Such was the close of a life which had been so zealously devoted to God, and filled up with so many honourable services. Thus was the death of him who had been so highly favoured by God in the method by which he was brought back to him after so long and so great an estrangement, and in the progress of so many years, during which (in the expressive phrase of the most ancient of writers) he had walked with him;—to fall as God threatened the people of his wrath that they should do, with tumult, with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet. Amos ii. 2. Several other very worthy and some of them very eminent persons shared the same fate, either prior to the battle of Prestonpans, or quickly after in that of Falkirk. Providence no doubt permitting it to establish our faith in the rewards of an invisible world, as well as to teach us to cease from man, and fix our dependence on an Almighty arm.

§ 157. The remains of this Christian hero, (as I believe every reader is now convinced he may justly be called,) were interred the Tuesday following, Sept. 24, at the parish church at Tranent; where he had usually attended divine service with great solemnity. His obsequies were honoured with the presence of some persons of distinction, who were not afraid of paying that last piece of respect to his memory, though the country was then in the hands of the enemy. But indeed there was no great hazard in this; for his character was so well known, that even they themselves spoke honourably of him, and seemed to join with his friends in lamenting the fall of so brave and so worthy a man.

§ 158. The remotest posterity will remember for whom the honour of subduing this unnatural and pernicious rebellion was reserved; and it will endear the person of the illustrious duke of Cumberland to all but the open or secret abettors of it in the present age, and consecrate his name to immortal honours among all the friends of religion and liberty who shall arise after us. And I dare say, it will not be imagined that I at all derogate from his glory in suggesting, that the memory of that valiant and excellent person whose memoirs I am now concluding, may in some measure have contributed to that signal and complete victory with which God was pleased to crown the arms of his Royal Highness: for the force of such an example is very animating, and a painful consciousness of having deserted such a commander in such extremity, must at least awaken, where there was any spark of generosity, an earnest desire to avenge his death on those who had sacrificed his blood, and that of so many other excellent persons, to the views of their ambition, rapine, or bigotry.

§ 159. The reflections I have made in my funeral sermon on my honoured friend, and in the dedication of it to his worthy and most afflicted lady, supersede many things which might otherwise have properly been added here. I conclude, therefore, with humbly acknowledging the wisdom and goodness of that awful Providence, who 5 drew so black a gloom around him in the last hours of his life, that the lustre of his virtues might dart through it with a more vivid and observable ray. It is abundant matter of thankfulness, that so signal a monument of grace, and ornament of the Christian profession, was raised in our age and country, and spared for so many honourable and useful years. Nor can all the tenderness of the most affectionate friendship, while its sorrows bleed afresh in the view of so tragical a scene, prevent my adoring the gracious appointment of the great Lord of all events, that when the day in which he must have expired without an enemy appeared so very near, the last drop of his generous blood should be poured out, as a kind of sacred libation, to the liberties of his country and the honour of his God; that all the other virtues of his character, embalmed as it were by that precious stream, might diffuse around a more extensive fragrancy, and be transmitted to the most remote posterity, with that peculiar charm which they cannot but derive from their connexion with so gallant a fall: an event, (as that blessed apostle, of whose spirit he so deeply drank, has expressed it,) according to his earnest expectation, and his hope, that in him Christ might be glorified in all things, whether by his life or by his death.

APPENDIX.

NUMBER I.

Relating to the Colonel's person.

In the midst of so many important articles, I had really forgot to say any thing of the person of Colonel Gardiner, of which nevertheless it may be proper here to add a word or two. It was, as I am informed, in younger life remarkably graceful and amiable: and I can easily believe it, from what I knew him to be when our acquaintance began, though he was then turned of fifty, and had gone through so many fatigues as well as dangers, which could not but leave some traces on his countenance. He was tall, (I suppose something more than six feet,) well proportioned, and strongly built; his eyes of a dark grey, and not very large; his forehead pretty high; his nose of a length and height no way remarkable, but very well suited to his other features; his cheeks not very prominent, his mouth moderately large, and his chin rather a little inclining (when I knew him) to be peaked. He had a strong voice, and lively accent, with an air very intrepid, yet attempered with much gentleness; and there was something in his manner of address more perfectly easy and obliging, which was in a great measure the result of the great candour and benevolence of his natural temper; and which, no doubt, was much improved by the deep humility which divine grace had wrought into his heart, as well as his having been accustomed from his early youth to the company of persons of distinguished rank and polite behaviour.

The picture of him* was taken from an original done by Van Dorest in Dutchman brought me Scotland by General Wade, in the year 1727, which was the 40th of his age: and it is said to have been very like him then, though far from being an exact resemblance of what he was when I had the happiness of being acquainted with him. Perhaps he would have appeared to the greatest advantage of all could he have been exactly drawn on horseback; as many very good judges, and amongst the rest the celebrated Mons. Faubert himself, have spoken of him as one of the completest horsemen that has ever been known: and there was indeed something so singularly graceful in his appearance in that attitude, that it was sufficient (as what is very eminent in its kind generally is) to strike an eye not formed on any critical rules.

* Presented by my good friend

NUMBER II.

Poetical Pieces on the death of Colonel Gardiner.

So animating a subject as the death of such a man, in such circumstances, has occasioned a great deal of poetry. Some of this has already been published; especially one large composition, said to be done by a worthy clergyman in Lincolnshire, in which there are many excellent lines and noble sentiments: but I rather choose to refer to the piece itself, than to insert any extracts from it here. It may be more expedient to oblige my reader with the following copy of verses, and an elegiac poem, composed by two of my valuable friends whose names are annexed. I could not presume to attempt any thing of this kind myself; because I knew, that nothing I was capable of writing could properly express my sense of his worth, or even the tenderness of my friendship; the sentiments of which will (as I assuredly believe) mingle themselves with the last ideas which pass through my mind in this world, and perhaps with some of the first which may open upon it in that which is to come.

VERSES

ON THE DEATH OF COLONEL GARDINER.

BY THE REV. MR. BENJAMIN SOWDEN

Quas dederis solas semper habebis opes.

Could piety perpetuate human breath,
Or shield one mortal from the shafts of death,
Thou ne'er, illustrious man! thou ne'er hadst been
A pallid corpse on Preston's fatal plain.
Or could her hand, though impotent to save
Consummate worth, redeem it from the grave,
Soon would thy urn resign its sacred trust,
And recent life re-animate thy dust.
But vain the wish.—The savage hand of war—
Oh how shall words the mournful tale declare!
Too soon the news afflicted friendship hears,
Too soon, alas! confirmed her boding fears.
Struck with the sound, unconscious of redress,
She felt thy wounds, and wept severe distress.
A while dissolved in truceless grief she lay,
Which left thee to relentless rage a prey.
At length kind Fame suspends our heaving sighs,
And wipes the sorrows from our flowing eyes;
Gives us to know thine exit well supplied
Those blooming laurels victory denied.
When thy great soul suppressed each timid moan,
And soared triumphant in a dying groan.
Thy fall, which raised, now calms each wild complaint,
Thy fall, which joined the hero to the saint.
As o'er the expiring lamp the quivering flame
Collects its lustre in a brighter gleam,
Thy virtues, glimmering on the verge of night,
Through the dim shade diffused celestial light;
A radiance death or time can ne'er destroy,
The auspicious omen of eternal joy.
Hence every unavailing grief! No more
As hapless thy removal we deplore.
Thy gushing veins, in every drop they bleed,
Of patriot warriors shed the fruitful seed:
Soon shall the ripened harvest rise in arms
To crush rebellion's insolent alarms.
While prosperous moments soothed through life his way,
Concealed from public view the hero lay:
But when affliction clouded his decline,
It not eclipsed, but made his honours shine.
Gave them to beam conspicuous from the gloom,
And plant unfading trophies round his tomb.
So stars are lost amidst the blaze of day:
But when the sun withdraws his golden ray,
Refulgent through the ethereal arch they roll,
And gild the wide expanse from pole to pole.

AN ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF THE TRULY PIOUS AND BRAVE

COLONEL JAMES GARDINER

[illegible] by the Rev. [illegible] at [illegible] 1745, to the [illegible] PRESTONIANS

BY THE REV. MR. THOMAS GILLIES

[illegible]

I.

Come, Melancholy, from the stony cave
The scope of time for thee has made
Under the broad cliff's shade,
Upon the naked shore,
Where warring tempests roar
In concert with the hoarse-resounding wave:
Come, but with solemn gait,
With trickling eyes,
And heavy sighs,
And all the scutcheoned pomp of fate:
And bring with thee the cypress and the yew,
All bathed and dropping with the mortal dew,
To this sequestered bower;
And let the midnight hour
Be hung in deeper glooms by thee,
And bid each gay idea flee
While all the baleful bargees of woe
That haunt the marble bust,
Or hover round sepulchred dust,
With conscious horrors all my soul o'erflow.
For 'tis no vulgar death
Urania means to mourn;
But in doleful strain
She bids the harp complain,
And hangs the funeral wreath
On Gardiner's awful urn.

II.

Gardiner, what various Fame
For ever crowns thy name!
For is it possible to say,
Or if the saint's or hero's ray
Shone brightest in that blended blaze,
That formed Fame's ample round of praise
Like Moses on the sacred hill
How hast thou stood with pleading eyes
Outstretching hands, and fervent cries
Unwearied wrestler with the skies!

Till Heaven, responsive to thy will,
Would all thy latent wishes fill;
Till the high heaven-bolt aside was thrown,
And the full blessing streamed in silver murmurs down.
Not less a Joshua than a Moses thou
For oft in Liberty's high strife
Hast thou exposed thy generous life,
And with impatient ardours of thy brow,
Rushed foremost in the horrid van on fight,
Driving the troops of Tyranny to flight
Unshaken in the noble cause
To pluck her bloody fangs, and break her iron jaws.

III.

When Anna sent her chosen chief,
Victorious Marlborough,
To Europe's groans to give relief
In Bourbon's overthrow;
Renowned Ramilia's tented field,
Where Gallia dropped her idle shield
And to the British standard kneeled,
Behold young Gardiner there.
Young Gardiner, where the combat mowed
The falling ranks, and widely strowed
Destruction and despair,
Wielded serene his youthful arms,
And, kindling at the dire alarms,
Enjoyed the raging war:
But here (for steel and flying shot
Fall chiefly to the hero's lot,)
Swift through his lips the glancing bullet rung,
His lips, on which the unfinished oath was hung;
Nor stopt its winged impetuous force,
Till through the neck it ploughed its angry course.
Amazing thought! that they who life expose,
Where all the thunder of the battle glows,
Who see pale death triumphant ride
Upon the crimson's surging tide,
In blasphemy and proud contempt should rise,
And hurl their mad defiance to the skies;
Whither a moment may convey
Their souls, dislodging from their quivering clay,
To take their last inexorable doom,
Big with immortal wrath, and dire despair to come.

IV

Such Gardiner was in early youth.
And while the warrior's rays
Beamed round his head, celestial Truth
He spurned, and scorned her ways:
And though the Almighty arm was near,
Made his endangered life its care,
And healed the burning sores
Yet vice, collecting with his strength,
Soon, soon bursts out in wilder length,
And like a torrent roars.
Now in the wide enchanting bowl
The hero melts his manly soul.
And now he blots the shades of night
With blacker scenes of lewd delight.
Anon in sport he lifts his brow to heaven,
And swears by the Eternal Name
Asks that the bolt may on his head be driven,
And courts the lagging flame.
So Pharaoh, when the feverish blains
No more embossed his flesh,
Nor shot infection through his veins,
Assumed his rage afresh:
And hard, grew harder still,
And propped on his wild will,
Set up the standard of his pride, [defied.
Cursed Israel's God and King, and all his plagues

V.

But, Muse, in softer notes relate,
For softer notes upon thee wait,
How Gardiner, when his youth had ranged,
These guilty scenes, to heaven estranged,
Paused in his mid career, and was divinely changed.
That God, whose piercing radiance darts
O'er all our ways and all our hearts,
The bold transgressor from his throne surveyed,
And thus in accents breathing mildness said:
"Go, Mercy, charged with my supreme command,
Thou fairest daughter throned at my right hand,
Go, wing thy downward race,
And stop that rebel in his furious way;
His heart shall thy victorious call obey,
And take the willing stamp of Grace:
For never shall thy call successless prove,
And thou lament thy baffled aim,
If thou but dart thy chosen flame,
Armed with the Saviour's energy of love."
He spoke: and gave the Almighty nod,
The sanction of the eternal God:
At once the joyful news is propagated round,
Loud anthems from the golden roofs rebound,
And heaven's high crystal domes remurmur with the sound.

VI.

Mercy obeys: and from the empyreal height
Precipitates her glittering flight;
A starry circle sparkling round her head,
And a wide rainbow o'er her progress spread.
Muse, sing the wondrous plan,
And sing the wondrous hour,
In which the Sovereign Power
The almighty work began,
And signalized her arm, and triumphed o'er the man.
Bent on adulterous shame
The sinner she beheld,
His bosom burnt with guilty flame,
And at the future joy in secret raptures swelled:

Enraged he cursed the lazy moon
In her nocturnal tour,
That thought his bliss would come too soon,
And clogged the midnight hour.
'Twas then, when lust's malignant sway
Had stifled conscience' pang, and smothered rea-
That Mercy stept between [son's ray,
The adulterer and his sinful scene,
And painted on his mental sight,
Dressed round in beams divinely bright,
The Saviour stretched upon the tree,
In purple sweats, and dying agony.
(Such was the vision, and the blaze the same,
That Saul, intent on murders, saw,
When Jesus, speaking from the radiant flame,
O'erwhelmed his conscious soul with awe.)
Then thus a voice arrests his ear:
"See, Gardiner, see thy Saviour here!
And was this wood
Tinged in my blood,
And did I languish in these woes for thee,
And canst thou plunge these recent wounds in me?"
O'erpowered with vast surprise,
A prisoner of the skies
The swooning champion falls,
And fear, that never yet his soul had shook,
Bedews his limbs, glares wild upon his look,
And all his soul appals:
But half the agony was unfulfilled,
Till Mercy from her crystal urn instilled
Fierce on his heart three burning drops:*
Drops that from Sinai came,
From Sinai, where the Almighty Thunderer forms
His shafted lightnings, and his bolted storms,
And from whose boiling tops [flame.
The wild sulphureous surge runs down in liquid
Stung with the unsufferable smart,
That festered at his heart,
Gardiner awakes, and round he throws
His ghastly eyes, and scarce he knows
Or if he lives in nature's midnight gloom,
Or, closed in hell's unfathomable womb,
Black o'er his head eternal horrors roll,
And the keen gnawing worm devours his inmost soul.

VII.

But when his wandering thought had found Himself a tenant of the ground,
Still, still his conscience felt the flaming wound.
Sudden before his prospect glows
The everlasting gulph of woes.
From the o'erhanging brink he seems to bend,
(The brink, that crumbled as he stood,
And nodded o'er the dreadful flood,)
And down in headlong ruin to descend [end.
To the broad burning waves, and pains that never
He turns, but ah! no friendly hand,
Not spark of glimmering hope, appears
Amidst the raging torrent of his fears:
But, outlawed from the realms of shining bliss,
He thinks he feels the unextinguished fires,
A waving waste of blue ascending spires,
And plunges in the bottomless abyss:
For, oh! his sins in crowding numbers stand,
And each tempts vengeance from the Almighty hand;
But fiercer o'er the rest Ingratitude appears,
That scorned the Saviour's love, and flaming horror
But while in sad confusion tossed, [wears.
And tortured with despair,
He doomed his soul for ever lost,
The bright ethereal Fair,
(For 'twas her kind design
Not to destroy, but to refine,) Amidst the darkness and the storms
Her sacred embassy performs;
For guilt displayed in all its frightful dyes,
And crimsoned over with redeeming blood,
Draws out the rolling anguish from his eyes,
And all his stubborn soul with [illegible]
'Tis done: O miracle of love!
Not minds below, nor minds above,
Great God, can trace thy mystic ways,
And pay the equal note of praise.
'Tis done. And now with outstretched wings
Back to the skies the radiant Power withdrew;
And, as her mounting path she springs,
The silver trump of victory she blows,
In stronger dyes her arch refulgent glows,
And a far-streaming glory [illegible]

VIII

At once abjuring all his sins,
Gardiner the heavenly life begins,
And pleads the honours of his God
With irresistible defence
Against the coloured arts of Eloquence, Though clouded with his Maker's frown, and crushed beneath his rod.
But quickly a celestial ray
Shot o'er his soul unclouded day,
And balmy dews, and blooming life were given,
The early antepast of heaven.
And now what equal words shall paint
How Gardiner, freed from tyrant lusts,
Nor longer tossed in passion's gusts,
Felt, spoke, and acted all the saint!
That holy name, which he profaned before,
Behold him now with suppliant knee adore:
At morn and ev'n his warm devotions rise,
Like clouds of incense, fragrant to the skies
No more the grape's nectareous juice
Could tempt beyond a prudent use:
No wanton speech defiled his tongue;
No deed designed his neighbour's wrong;

* See Milton's Paradise Lost, b. xi. l. 27.

But the fair streams of innocence
And unconfined benevolence,
O'er all his life uninterrupted ran,
And through their crystal mirrors showed the man.
The numerous characters he bore
With a distinguished praise he wore,
And subject, subject, husband, parent, friend,
He blended, and ennobled to the end.
Now with seraphic transports fired
The pinions of his zeal aspired,
Scarce patient till he broke the mortal shell,
And bid this empty scene, and dusky globe, farewell.
Heaven was his home, and to his home he bent,
And, ere the rounds of fatal life were spent,
Thither his passions would divinely roll,
The swift-winged heralds of his coming soul.
Peace at his tent would often light, and sing,
And shed the dewy blessings from her wing;
And rills, devolving from the fount above,
Poured o'er his heart ecstatic life and love.

IX.

Thus Gardiner lived; till from the gloomy North
Rebellion, grasping targe and steelly arms,
Rushed, like a mountain bear, murderous forth,
And shook our realms with horrible alarms;
Rebellion aiming at one wasteful sway
To strike the diadem from Brunswick's head,
Tear Liberty, and all her mounds away,
And Popery's o'erwhelming horrors spread.
The news to Gardiner came,
And fanned the noble flame,
Which pure Religion, heaven born Liberty,
And dauntless Fortitude had raised,
And as the gathering terrors thundered nigh,
With a redoubled strength the mourning fervors blazed.
What, though distemper had subdued his limbs,
And age defrauded half the purple streams
That bloomed his features o'er,
When in rebellion's storm before
He, rising in the glorious cause
Of George's rights, and Britain's laws,
Swept down the traitorous files, and Preston swam with gore;
Yet his unbroken soul disdains
Age's dull load of cramps and pains;
His youthful rage returns,
And for the battle burns:
Then springing from Francissa's tender arms,
Dissolved in flowing tears,
O'erwhelmed with boding fears,
And only solaced with the view
That heaven their friendship would renew,
He, in the unshaken confidence of power,
Sways the keen flame of his revenging sword
For his eternal, and his earthly, lord,
Serenely meets the danger's wild alarm,
Plants his embattled force, and waits the rushing war
So Michael,* bent on glorious fight, Against Satanic rage and might,
Came towering to the field;
Unconscious of a quivering fear,
He saw the foe his dusky horrors rear,
Wave his broad flaming sword, and heave his mossy shield.

X.

Not far from where Edina lifts
Her towers into the skies,
Or where the ocean-bounding cliffs
In clouded summits rise,
Preston extends her humble cots,
Long, long unknown to fame;
But flying routs, and purple spots,
Have stamped the eternal shame.
Here, here (oh could Time's brazen pen
Dash the reproach away,
Or, as the day returns again,
Might midnight choke its ray!)
Britannia's troops in vain
Opposed the rebel-host,
And fled inglorious o'er the plain,
Their courage withered and their standards lost.
Muse paint the doleful scene
With sighs and tears between;
For sighs and tears should rise
From every British heart, and gush from all our eyes.
Swift on the royal van
The yellow furies ran,
Like the wild ocean that has rent
Its shores, and roars along the continent;
Or the winged lightning's vivid glare
Darting along the immeasured fields of air.
Confounded at the shock,
The yielding squadrons broke:
And now (for hell inspired the throng)
The gloomy murderers rushed along;
And fierce the steelly blade
Its horrid circles played,
Till hideous cries,
Quivering sighs,
Hopeless screams,
Battered limbs,
Bloody streams,
And universal rout deformed the ground,
And waste the British strength, and the wide champaign drowned.
"Come on, come on!" mad Elcho cries,
And for his murders thanks the skies;
(While the Italian from afar,
Too soft a soul to mix in war,
Enjoying all the guilt, beheld
His bloody harpies tear the field;)

* See Milton's Paradise Lost, book vi. [illegible]

Ply, ply the thirsty steel,
Round the full vengeance wheel,
Each heretic must yield his breath,
That for the Hanoverian brood
Or lifts a sword,
Or speaks a word;
Come, gorge your souls with death,
And drown your steps in blood:
Think, think what blissful periods roll behind,
Let London's mighty plunder fill your mind,
When boundless wealth shall be with boundless empire joined."

XI.

Gardiner, with mind elate
Above the rage of fate,
His country's bulwark stood
Midst broken lines of death, and rising waves of blood.
His soul disdains retreat,
Though urged by foul defeat:
Now to his scattering friends he calls,
To wheel again and charge the foe;
Now hurls the wide-destroying balls,
Now deals the vengeful blow.
Forsaken and alone,
And torn with gashing wounds,
He hears the treasonous shout, he hears the loyal groan;
But nought the purpose of his soul confounds:
And still with new delight
He tempts the midmost fight,
Propped on his sacred cause, and courage of his own.
The embattled ranks of foot he spies
Without a leading chief,
And, like a shooting ray, he flies
To lend his brave relief.
Here the broad weapon's forceful sway,
Swung with tempestuous hand,
Ploughed through his flesh its furious way,
And stretched him on the strand.
Weltering in gore, with fiery fiends beset,
The dying Gardiner lies:
No gentle hand to wipe the mortal sweat,
And close his swimming eyes.
The unrelenting crew
The hero disarrayed:
But, struck at his majestic view,
Their souls were half dismayed:
And, had not hell instamped its hate,
Their stony eyeballs o'er his fate
Had streamed with human woe; for heavenly mild
He o'er their gloomy forms the Christian pardon smiled.
But not a tear must bathe, or garment shield
His mangled limbs from sight,
Down trodden in the fight:
While his fair mansion, that o'ertops the field,
The naked murder sees, and trembles from its height.
Still the departing flame of life
Waved languishing in double strife;
Till, such his servant's faithful care,
(May Heaven's distinguished goodness crown
The goodness to his master shown!)
The wheels slow-moving from the scenes of war,
To Tranent bore the expiring chief,
In sullen sounds remurmuring to his grief.
Urania, mark the melancholy road,
And with thy tears efface the scattering blood;
Nor stop, till on the late reposing bed
(Oh! rather 'tis the funeral bier!)
You see the hero's pallid body spread,
And his last anguish hear.
Half choked with clotted gore,
He draws the hollow moan;
Flitting his pulse, and fixed his eyes,
All pale and motionless he lies,
And seems to breathe no more.——
Oh! that's the life-dissolving groan:
Farewell, dear man! for in that pang thy mind
Soars to its God, and leaves the clog behind.

XII.

Gardiner is dead!—The bloody trump of fame
Proclaimed the mighty death;
In every look the posting rumour came,
And flew on every breath.
The widowed partner of his life
The doleful tidings hears,
And, silent in stupendous grief,
Her eyes refuse their tears:
Oppressed beneath the immensurable weight,
Her spirit faints away,
As, sympathetic with the hero's fate,
It meant to quit its clay.
The pledges of his love
Their filial duty prove,
And each with tender hand uprears,
With hands all covered o'er in tears,
Their mother's sinking head;
And groan resounds to groan:
For oh, the best of husbands gone,
The best of fathers dead!
But Gardiner's death is more than public woe.
Wide and more wide the increasing sorrows run,
O'er British lands unlimited they go,
And fly across the seas, and travel with the sun.
Religion, that from heaven had bowed
To watch the souls of light,
When holy Gardiner fell,
Who loved and who adorned her cause so well,
Retired behind a crimson cloud,
Nor could sustain the sight.
Britannia, where she sate
Upon the sea-beat shore,
To eye the battle's fate,
Her silver mantle tore:

Then thus, her blushing honours wanned,
Her sceptre quivering in her hand,
Her laurels withered, and her head declined,
Ten thousand terrors boding in her mind,
She to the deep in bitter wailings grieved,
While her fallen helm the trickling drops received:
"What havoc of my martial force
Has this sad morn beheld,
Torn, gashed, and heaped without remorse
Upon the naked field!
But Gardiner's death afflicts me most,
Than whom a chief I could not boast
More faithful, vigilant, and brave;
And should across his grave
An hecatomb of Highland brutes be slain,
They could not recompense his injured ghost,
Nor fully quench my rage, and wipe away my stain."

XIII.

But see, in splendid state
Cherubic convoys come,
And waft the hero from his fate
To his celestial home.
Now, now he sails along,
Encircled with the throng,
(The throng that clap their mantling wings,
And to loud triumphs strike their strings,)
Through liquid seas of day
Ploughing the azure way,
Till to the starry towers the squadrons rise.
The starry towers, thick sown with pearl and gold,
Their adamantine leaves unfold,
And show the entrance to the empyreal skies:
Through them our hero marked his road,
And through the wheeling ranks of heaven
An unobstructed path was given,
Till he attained the eternal throne of God;
A throne that blazed in uncreated beams,
And from its footstool gushed unnumbered streams,
Streams that in everlasting currents roll,
And pour the boundless joy o'er all the expanded soul.
"Well hast thou done," the Almighty Father spoke;
"Well hast thou done," the exalted Jesus cried;
"Well hast thou done," (all heaven the euge took,)
The saints and angels in their songs replied.
And now a robe of spotless white,
But where the Saviour's flowing vein
Had blushed it with a sanguine stain,
Invests him round: in various light,
(For such was the divine command,)
Refulgent on his brows a crown was placed,
And a triumphal palm his better hand
With golden blossoms graced.
Nigh to the seat of bliss
His mansion was assigned.
Sorrow and sin forsook his breast,
His weary soul was now at rest.
And life, and love, and ecstasies
Unbound his secret powers, and overflowed his mind.

XIV.

Nor has thy life, heroic man, been spilt
Without a wrath proportioned to the guilt;
Enkindled by the cries that rose
From thy dear sacred blood, with those
That shrieked for vengeance from the brave Munros,
Who fell a martyred sacrifice
To cool remorseless butcheries,
Heaven sends its angel righteously severe,
And from the foe exacts the last arrear.
For when the barbarous bands,
Thick as the swarms that blackened Egypt's strands,
And furious as the winter's rushing rains
Impelled by whirlwinds through the plains,
Had o'er our country rolled,
Young William rose, (auspicious name, Sacred to liberty and fame!)
And their mad rage controlled.
Back to their hills and bogs they fled
(For terror winged their nimble speed,)
And howled for help in vain:
William pursued, and launched his vengeful ire
(As o'er the stubble runs the crackling fire)
Upon the grovelling train:
Shuddering with horror and despair,
With bellowing pain they rend the air,
Till Culloden's illustrious moor [rebel-gore.
Groaned with the heaps of slain, and smoked with Then, Muse, suppress thy rising sighs,
And wipe the anguish from thine eyes;
Sing, how rebellion has received its doom,
How Gardiner dwells in his eternal home,
And in each British heart has raised a lasting tomb.

NUMBER III.

AN ACCOUNT OF SOME REMARKABLE PARTICULARS

CONCERNING THE ANCIENT FAMILY

OF THE MUNROS OF FOWLIS.

While I was endeavouring to do justice to the memory of that excellent man, and most beloved friend, whose memoirs I have now concluded, and was mentioning, in the course of my narration, the tragical consequences which the unnatural rebellion, by which he fell, had drawn along with it, and the many other valuable persons of which it had also deprived us; I could not but particularly reflect on the awful catastrophe of Sir Robert Munro, and his two brothers, the captain, and the doctor, who all within the compass of eight months, and in less than twelve after the death of Colonel Gardiner, with whom they were well acquainted, and to whom they were allied in the bonds of a virtuous and honourable friendship, fell a sacrifice to the rage and cruelty of the same savage destroyers.—I was desirous of interweaving so remarkable a piece of history with a subject to which it was, alas! so nearly connected; and therefore I applied myself to a person of high rank most nearly related to them, on whose information I was sure I might entirely depend; entreating the favour of such an account of these three excellent brothers, and of the circumstances of their death, as I might safely and properly offer to the view of the public.

This honourable person referred me to a gentleman well acquainted with the history of the family of the Munros of Fowlis, and possessed of a distinct historical account of it, taken from the annals which have been kept of that family for many ages past, and from the old writs, charters, and other authentic deeds, belonging to it, which are the vouchers of these annals.

This gentleman was pleased to favour me with a pretty large historical account of this family, beginning it much higher, and carrying it through a much wider extent, than I could have expected from the particular view with which I first requested information.—I next obtained instructions on the same subject from a gentleman at London.—I was then furnished with a particular relation from another gentleman, a pious minister of the church of Scotland, with whom I have the happiness of being well acquainted. And as all these are persons of such a character, that none who know them can question the veracity and testimony of each, so they were each of them happy in a most intimate acquaintance with all the three deceased brothers after whom I inquired. At last of all, I received from a fourth gentleman a historical account of this family from the most early times; which, by the date it bears, was compiled a great many years ago, and which, it seems, was intended to have been published in a historical account of some of the ancient families of Scotland; which work became abortive through the death of the author.

When I compared these several accounts, as I received them from time to time, it gave me great satisfaction to find them all agree, and tally so exactly, in their accounts of this family, and of the three excellent brothers last deceased.—On an attentive perusal of these informations, I found they contained what was too curious and important to be lost, and yet too long to be inserted in the memoirs of Colonel Gardiner, without breaking the unity of design in a manner that would have proved inconvenient.—I concluded therefore, that (especially as those memoirs were finished before some of these papers came to my hands) it would be best to present it to the world in a distinct piece, connected by way of appendix to the former. And I feel a most sensible pleasure in the addition I am hereby making to the work, as it is paying some little debt of gratitude to the illustrious dead, and at the same time doing a just honour to the surviving branches of a family, from whence so many heroes have sprung, and of which there are still (though after much sad desolation made in it) most worthy remains. And I hope, that it may not only entertain my readers with some remarkable facts worthy of commemoration, but excite in their breasts something of the same generous spirit, to which nothing can more powerfully instigate the mind than the view of such glorious examples.

The family of the Munros of Fowlis is among the most ancient and honourable families in the north of Scotland, and has generally been remarkable for a brave, martial, and heroic spirit. It is mentioned by Buchanan with a memorable testimony,* when, after speaking of the difficulties in which Mary Queen of Scots was involved at Inverness, he adds, "That as soon as they heard of their sovereign's danger, a great number of the ancient Scots poured in around her, especially the Frasers and Munros; which (says he) were esteemed among the most valiant of the clans inhabiting those countries." And how well the latter have ever since continued to deserve that character, the following memoirs, brief as they are, may in some degree show.

The Munros of Fowlis have, in every one of their generations, been intermarried with many of the best families of nobility and gentry in the north of Scotland. And it is yet more for their honour, that they were among the first in those parts that embraced the Reformation, and have ever since been zealous assertors of it. And many of them have not only given great countenance and encouragement to the ministers of the gospel in the parishes under their influence, in consequence of which a great harvest of most eminent Christians hath been produced there; but also have themselves been signal examples of true piety, and a behaviour in all its branches most ornamental to a Christian profession.—I fear there have been few families to which such a character can be universally applied: but it is certain, that so far as it is the case, it is the most illustrious of all hereditary honours; and therefore seems to have been mentioned with the utmost propriety by my several correspondents in this connexion.

According to Buchanan, it was in the beginning of the eleventh century, and about the time of the conquest in England, when Malcolm, the IInd of that name, King of Scots, first distributed, or, as it is expressed, fenced out, or fenced, the lands of Scotland to the great families thereof, on account of their eminent services in his many battles with the Danes, until he forced them quite out of his kingdom. And, according to tradition, it was on that occasion that the country betwixt the burnings of Dingwall and the water of Alness, in the shire of Ross, was given to Donald Munro: and which is therefore to this day called Feringdonald, that is, Donald's Land. And part of these lands were afterwards by the King erected into a barony, called the Barony of Fowlis.

* Arolit. Buchan. Rer. Scot. Hist. lib. VI. p. 107. Mirabant, imprimis Fraserorum et Munrorum [illegible] quorum [illegible] Familiæ [illegible] Hist. lib. XV. p. 358.

I shall not follow the annals of this family so far as to entertain the public with a detail of the barons of Fowlis in their several generations through these early ages, but shall begin my particular narration of them only from the time they became protestants, when their brave behaviour and example will afford us more instruction, and the facts concerning them may be depended on with more certainty. And therefore I shall only before that time observe,

That George, IXth baron * of Fowlis (in a direct lineal descent from the above Donald, the first baron) was slain at the memorable battle of Bannockburn, fought by King Robert Bruce of Scotland against King Edward II. of England, in the year 1314.—George, Xth baron of Fowlis, and son of the former, was also slain with a great many of his name at the battle of Halidonehill, near Berwick; in which battle the Scots were defeated by the English, and a great number of them killed, on the 22nd of July, A. D. 1333.—Robert Munro, XVIIth baron of Fowlis, was slain at the battle of Pinkie, near Edinburgh, with many of his name; where the Scots were again defeated by the English, and a great number of them killed, A. D. 1547.—I mention the fall of these three gentlemen, with their friends and followers, fighting valiantly in the cause of their country, as illustrating the valour and bravery of this family in their different generations, and showing how justly they merited the character which Buchanan gives them in the place before cited. How long this brave spirit has continued, as it were, hereditary to them, will appear from what follows.

The first protestant of this family was Robert Munro, the XVIIIth baron of Fowlis, son to Robert last mentioned, and the same who came to the assistance of Mary Queen of Scots, upon the occasion before cited, A. D. 1562. He embraced the protestant religion quickly after, and being a wise and a good man, he left an opulent estate to the family and died A. D. 1588. He was succeeded by his son Robert Munro, XIXth baron of Fowlis, who died the same year with his father.—The next to him was his brother, Hector Munro, XXth baron of Fowlis, who died A. D. 1603.—Robert Munro, his son, succeeded him, the XXIst baron of Fowlis, who (to resume) when Gustavus Adolphus, that justly celebrated king of Sweden, (whose religion and valour were so distinguished among his many religious and valiant contemporaries,) was engaged in a protestant war against the emperor Ferdinand II. in defence of the civil as well as sacred liberties of Germany. The generous heart of this worthy gentleman was so struck with a regard to the common cause, in which he himself had no concern but what piety and virtue gave him, that he joined Gustavus with a very great number of his friends, who bore his own name. Many of them gained great reputation in this war; and that of Robert their leader was so eminent, that he was made colonel of two regiments at the same time, the one of horse, and the other of foot, in that service; in which he acquitted himself with so much fidelity and zeal, that he died of the wounds which he received in crossing the Danube, and was buried at Ulm, in the month of March, 1633.

He was succeeded by Sir Henry Munro, XXIId baron of Fowlis, the next male heir of the family,† who was also colonel of a regiment in the same service; and, upon his coming over to Britain, was created a baronet in June, 1633. Returning afterwards to Germany, he died at Hamburg, in April, 1635. His son, Sir Hector Munro, was XXIIId baron of Fowlis, who died, without issue, in the year 1651, at seventeen years of age. Sir Robert Munro, XXIVth baron of Fowlis, succeeded as the nearest male heir, being grandson to George Munro of Obsdale, who was third son to Robert Munro, the XVIIIth baron of Fowlis.

My information imports, that in the before-mentioned annals of this family there is a well-attested list of officers, (of which I have a copy in the memorial last sent me,) wherein there are three generals, eight colonels, five lieutenant-colonels, eleven majors, and above thirty captains, all of the name of Munro, besides a great number of subaltern. Most of these were in that religious war under the great Gustavus Adolphus; and some of the descendants of this family are at this day in possession of considerable military commands in Sweden, and various parts of Germany.

General Robert Munro (who was uncle to Sir

Robert, the XXIVth baron of Fowlis) published, in the year 1644, an account of this religious war under Gustavus Adolphus, in a folio volume, entitled "Military Discipline learned from the valiant Swede:" a book of which (though I never happened to see it) I have heard a high character. I am informed that it contains an exact journal of that expedition into Germany for the relief of the distressed protestants; and it is said to be filled with most excellent observations on military affairs, delivered in a strain of piety which seems to breathe the spirit of its brave and worthy author. And, indeed, by what I have heard of that instructive history, it is hard to say when there has been, even in the Christian world, so religious and so well disciplined an army as this; at the head of which a mysterious Providence permitted that royal hero and martyr, the great Gustavus, to fall. Would to God the time might at length come when our commanders shall take their lessons from it; at least so far as to learn, from the example of some of the bravest and greatest of men, to maintain in the military bodies under their command the authority of the Lord of hosts; and particularly that reverence for his name and for his day, which was there so beautifully and gloriously conspicuous!

This worthy general, in the year 1641, was appointed by King Charles I. major-general of the Scotch forces that were sent to Ireland to suppress the infamous and destructive rebellion there. It is not my business here to insist on those unhappy circumstances which so long retarded their march, and so greatly obstructed their success. I find, however, that he had at length the honour to be in the number of those by whom God gave blood to drink to those miscreants, who had rendered themselves so eminently worthy of it by a series of outrages, which the most sanguinary and detestable faction on earth (I mean that of popery) has seldom been able to exceed. For, in the year 1644, this illustrious commander, at the head of 14,000 of the Scotch and English protestants, fought and defeated 22,000 of the Irish in Ulster, killed and took many thousands of them, and seized on a great quantity of cattle and other provisions, of which the protestants were then in great want.

The general was a great favourer of the presbyterian interest, and among the first who established it in Ireland. He sat in their presbyteries and synods; and adhered to the interest of the parliament till he apprehended they were carrying matters to an excessive height against the king: on which he accepted of a commission from him, and acted under the Duke of Ormond; to which he was persuaded by his nephew Sir George Munro, (of whom afterwards,) who had always adhered to the interest of Charles I. as he afterwards did to that of Charles II.

In the year 1645, the general was surprised by Colonel Monk before he could draw out his men from their quarters; and he and they were by that means taken prisoners: but he continued not long in their hands; for death came and set him at liberty soon after.

It is worthy of our notice by the way, that in the year 1644, we find Monk imprisoned by the parliament for having accepted a commission from the king, and acted in consequence of it, though before that he had acted by commission from the parliament: and again, in the year 1648, we find him fighting for the parliament against the king: and his surprising and taking General Munro, was the first thing that brought him into favour with the parliament. For in that reeling time we find men of a much better character than Monk changing sides again and again, as they apprehended the one party or the other to be in the right, from the many different demands, refusals, and concessions, which then happened between them.

The General was succeeded in his command by Sir George Munro, brother to the last-mentioned Sir Robert, and both of them nephews to General Robert by his brother Colonel John Munro of Obsdale, in the Swedish service: Sir George was also bred in that service with his uncle, and afterwards served with him in Ireland; where he arrived to the rank of a colonel. He was made major-general by king Charles II. and had a body of forces under his command at Kendal, when James Duke of Hamilton was defeated by Cromwell at Lancaster, A. D. 1648. Upon this defeat Sir George returned to Scotland, and defeated the Earl of Argyle: and afterwards, his forces being disbanded by order of the states of Scotland, he went to Holland, and joined King Charles II. After whose restoration he was made lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief in Scotland.

Sir John Munro, XXVth baron of Fowlis, succeeded his father Sir Robert, A. D. 1668. He was a member of the convention of the estates of Scotland, at the Revolution, and a very zealous promoter of that happy event. He was no less strenuous in asserting presbytery; and on that account, being also remarkable for a large and corpulent stature, he was nick-named the Presbyterian Mortar-piece. His eminent piety and zeal had exposed him to great sufferings in the cause of religion, in those unhappy and infamous days, when the best friends to their country were treated as the worst enemies to the government: and when to be conscientiously solicitous to depart from evil made so many thousands a prey. Sir John suffered greatly, among many others, of whom the world was not worthy: his person was doomed to long imprisonment for no pretended crime nor what was found against him in the matters of his God, and his estate, which was before considerable, was harassed by severe fines and confiscations, which reduced it to a diminution much more honourable indeed than any augmentation could have been, but from which it has not recovered even to this day. He died A. D. 1696, and was succeeded by his son.

Sir Robert Munro, XXVIth baron of Fowlis, who succeeded his father, was also a pious and benevolent man, and for some time a captain: but it pleased God early to deprive him of his sight, and to continue him in that condition during the remainder of his life. Under this calamity he calmly submitted himself to that God who can shed abroad a far more cheering light on the soul than these bodily eyes can admit. Providence was pleased to bless him with children, in whom he could not but find the highest satisfaction; and whose amiable characters in general leave no room to doubt of the tenderness and respect with which they would treat so worthy a parent, under a distressing calamity, which would naturally move compassion even in strangers. There were four of them who all reached maturity of age, and were the heirs of many blessings, though Providence suffered three of them to fall almost at once, by most unjust and barbarous hands; Sir Robert, Captain George Munro, and the Doctor, whose Christian name was Duncan; their only sister, married to Mr. Gordon, of Ardoch, still survives; an example of profound submission and fortitude, mingled with the most tender sensibility of temper.

Sir Robert Munro, XXVIIth baron of Fowlis, succeeded his father, A. D. 1729. He went early from the university to the camp, where he served seven years in Flanders; being some time captain in the Royal Scots, before that fatal cessation of arms, A. D. 1712; as his late Majesty with so much propriety publicly called it, to which therefore I shall not presume to give either a milder or a severer name. It was here that Sir Robert contracted that acquaintance and strict friendship with good Colonel Gardiner, which ran through the remainder of their lives, and of which each was so worthy. On Sir Robert's return from Flanders, he was reduced, on account of his inflexible opposition in parliament, (of which he was then a member,) to the measures which the ministry were then taking to subvert the succession in the present royal family, and with it, no doubt, the protestant religion, of which that family was, and is, under God, the firmest barrier.

My correspondent observes, concerning Sir Robert, "That he was noted for the countenance he gave to divine worship, both in public and his family, and for the regard which he always expressed to the word of God, and its ministers:" and then adds, "That he was sincere in his friendship, and full of compassion even to the meanest of those around him: and that he was remarkable, above most, for his activity in the discharge of any office of friendship, where he had professed it, and for his great exactness in the performance of his promises."

His military services are particularly worthy of being mentioned here. In the year 1715, he, with his clan, in conjunction with the Earl of Sutherland, kept the Earl of Seaforth, with 3000 men under his command, from joining the rebel camp at Perth, for near two months; and thereby prevented the Earl of Marr from crossing the Forth till the Duke of Argyle had gathered strength sufficient to oppose him. In consequence of this, Sir Robert exposed his own country to the fiercest resentments of the rebels, by whom it was plundered and destroyed; while others, who yet pretended to be friends to the government, saved themselves and their lands by capitulations with the enemy. Being then made governor of Inverness, Sir Robert kept 400 of his name there, during the rest of that rebellion, regularly paid and regimented: and these, together with some other clans, well affected to the interest of the present royal family, kept possession of that important pass, whereby the rebels were hindered from making a stand there, when they were dislodged from Perth by the Duke of Argyle.

He was, in the year 1716, made a commissioner of inquiry into the forfeited estates of the rebels; in which he strenuously exerted himself in procuring a number of parishes to be erected through the rebel countries, and provided with suitable stipends out of the confiscated land; whereby the gospel was preached in places where it had not been preached since the Reformation: so that some new presbyteries were formed in countries where the discipline and worship of protestant churches had before no footing. And such was the compassion and humanity which attempered his high courage, that by his interest with the government he did eminent service to the unfortunate widows and children of such as had, to the ruin of their families, been engaged in the rebellion.

Sir Robert was thirty years a member of parliament by his family interest; during which time he always maintained the firmest attachment to the service of his Majesty and his royal father, and to the religion and liberties of his country. His fidelity and zeal for these did not need to be purchased, solicited, or quickened, by personal favours: it continued through all this period unshaken and active, though from the ending of his commission of inquiry in 1724, till the year 1740, he had no post under the government. He then found the nation was to be involved in a foreign war, the necessity of which was generally apprehended and acknowledged: and therefore, though his friends thought his merit and experience might have pretended to something more, as he had been in the rank of a lieutenant-colonel twenty-five years, his heart was too generous and too warm not to accept of the same commission, which was then given him in the Highland regiment. This regiment, when first formed out of independent Highland companies, was under the command of the Earl of Crawford as its colonel, who, all the while he stood in that relation to it, was abroad, confined by the wounds he had received as a volunteer against the Turks. During this time Sir Robert Munro was his lordship's lieutenant-colonel. Before it went to Flanders Lord Semple was its colonel; but he also being generally absent, and Sir Robert an old experienced officer, the regiment during the war was left under his care; and the manner in which he modelled and conducted it will remain in many respects an immortal honour to his name.

It is indeed surprising that a regiment composed of Highlanders, who are generally used to so rapacious a life at home, should yet by discipline have been brought to so good a behaviour, as that they should be judged the most trusty guards of property; and that, when the people in Flanders were allowed a protection for their goods, they should choose to have some of this regiment, among others of the British soldiers, appointed to protect them. This may, indeed, seem hardly credible:* yet my informer assures me, that he had it from an officer of their own of unquestionable credit; who added further, that it was but seldom he had observed a man among them drunk, and as seldom heard any of them swear. This is very agreeable to the high character which I heard of this regiment from an English gentleman then in Flanders, whose veracity is undoubted, and who cannot, I am sure, be suspected of any prejudice here. And among Sir Robert's papers there is still existing a copy of a letter from the Elector Palatine to his envoy at London, desiring him to thank the king of Great Britain, in his name, for the excellent behaviour of the Highland regiment while they were in his territories, "which," as he says expressly, "was owing to the care of Sir Robert Munro, their lieutenant-colonel; for whose sake (he adds) he should always pay a regard to a Scotchman for the future."

I the rather mention these particulars, not only as they do an honour to Sir Robert, and his worthy brother, through whose interest, and that of the other officers, with the private men, this great reformation was effected; but likewise, as they seem to show, in a very convincing manner, of how great importance it is that some methods be seriously thought of for breaking the other uncultivated inhabitants of these countries into useful men, by bringing them at once under the protection and discipline of the laws, and enforcing their obedience to them, by teaching them the principles of religion, and the arts of peace and commerce. This is a happy effect, which, methinks, we may naturally hope for from the late rebellion, pernicious as it has in many respects been: considering how much it has reduced them to the power of the government, and how justly obnoxious it has made the chiefs of many fierce and barbarous clans.

According to my best information, from persons who are most thoroughly acquainted with affairs in the North, the two great springs of rebellion amongst the inhabitants of these Highland countries are, their idleness and their ignorance. The former subjects them to a slavish dependence on their masters, and is also the cause of their being so addicted to stealing; and the latter makes them a prey to popish priests and missionaries from Rome, who are constantly, and in great numbers, trafficking among them. It has been very justly remarked, that the success they have in seducing these poor ignorant people is occasioned, in a great measure, by the vast extent of parishes in those Highland countries; some of them being betwixt thirty and forty miles in length, and twenty and thirty in breadth, full of great mountains, rapid rivers, and arms of the sea; and those parishes which are more moderate in their extent, are about twenty miles in length, and ten or twelve in breadth: and it is every where to be observed through these parishes, that around the place of the minister's residence, the inhabitants are almost all protestants; but in the corners which are remote from his residence, they are generally all papists.

Now it is evident, that these poor people can only be cured of idleness by teaching them manufactures, to which they are wholly strangers: and it is hard to imagine how they can be rescued from popish ignorance, until there are several new parishes erected in those extensive countries. It would ill become me to pretend to direct the government of Britain on such an occasion; but I know it to be the opinion of many persons in those parts, of distinguished wisdom and experience, that if it should be thought fit to employ the produce of the estates confiscated by the late rebellion for these valuable purposes, this, with the thousand pounds of his Majesty's royal bounty annually bestowed, would go a good way towards remedying these two great evils, with their train of miserable consequences, which we have of late so deeply felt. And who would not rejoice to see all these poor people sharing with us fully in all the privileges and advantages of Christians and of Britons? I pray God to guide and prosper every scheme for this purpose, and in this connexion, I cannot but mention, and recommend, the society for propagating the knowledge of religion, and with it the principles of loyalty, in those Highland countries; a design, in which so many worthy persons, both in the northern and southern parts of our island, are incorporated: but their stock is by no means equal to the purposes here mentioned; and by their constitution they are confined to the support of schools which are indeed going on with great success, as far as the revenue will allow them.

* A very worthy person, to whose inspection this appendix has been committed since it was finished, observes here: That though the Highlanders are much addicted to depredations, their neighbours, yet the very actors even in them are generally as faithful to their trust as any set of people whatever; and that this action shows but my degree of cruelty and kindness to one of those people, the love of obedience has a greater influence than that of stripes generally has on others of the common people. This remark I thought proper to insert here, that the representation of this affair might be as impartial as possible.

But to return from this natural, and therefore, I hope, very pardonable, digression: The behaviour of Sir Robert Munro and his regiment at the battle of Fontenoy was heard through all Britain. He had obtained leave of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland to allow them their old way of fighting. They were early in the field, and were ordered to attack the main battery of the French at the village from which the battle derives its name, which they did, and drove the enemy from it: but finding the body of the French forces deeply intrenched behind the battery, they did not give over the charge, but bravely drew up to attack them. Sir Robert, according to the usage of his countrymen, ordered the whole regiment "to clap to the ground" on receiving the French fire; and instantly, as soon as it was discharged, they sprung up, and coming close to the enemy, poured in their shot upon them, to the certain destruction of multitudes, and drove them precipitately through their own lines; then retreating, they drew up again, and attacked them a second time after the same manner. These attacks they repeated several times that day, to the surprise of the whole army.

Sir Robert was every where with his regiment, notwithstanding his great corpulency, and wherein the trenches, he was hauled out again by the legs and arms by his own men. And it is observable, that when he commanded the whole regiment to "clap to the ground," he himself alone, with the colours behind him, stood upright, receiving the whole fire of the enemy; and this, because, as he said, though he could easily lie down, his great bulk would not suffer him to rise so quickly.

His preservation that day was the surprise and astonishment, not only of the whole army, but of all that heard the particulars of the action: and my information relates, that a most eminent person in the army was heard to say upon the occasion, "That it was enough to convince one of the truth of the doctrine of predestination, and to verify what King William, of glorious memory, had been used to say, that 'every bullet has its billet,' or its particular direction and commission where it should lodge." It is added, that on the retreat of our army, the Highland regiment was in the rear; and a great body of the French horse being ordered to pursue, Sir Robert made his regiment face about, and gave them a general fire so full and effectual, that a great number of them being brought to the ground, the rest wheeled about and rode off.

But to close what relates to Sir Robert Munro: As an acknowledgment for his brave services at Fontenoy, as well as on former occasions, his Majesty was pleased to appoint him to succeed General Ponsonby, who was slain there in the command of his regiment, which was among the troops that arrived at Newcastle during the rebellion, and made a part of General Wade's army. They were afterwards ordered to Scotland; and being upon the left wing at the battle of Falkirk, on that fatal day, the 17th of January, 1745-6, they shamefully left their brave colonel and lieutenant-colonel, with five or six more of their officers, to be cut in pieces.

By the account which the rebels themselves give of Sir Robert, he defended himself against six of them with his half-pike, and killed two of their number; upon which, a seventh came up, and (as they expressed it) poured a shot into his belly, which brought him immediately to the ground. In this dreadful moment, in the midst of all this extremity, his brother, Doctor Munro, whom the warmest instances of his friends could not divert from exposing his person in defence of his country, and who was near at hand, ran to him to support him, attended by his servant and the surgeon of the regiment; but they were all murdered on the spot, in the most barbarous manner, by those cruel men.

Sir Robert's body was the next day sought out; and his face was so cut and mangled by these savages after he fell, that it could scarce be known. He was found, and buried honourably in the church-yard at Falkirk, by the Macdonalds, who, though engaged in rebellion against their lawful sovereign, could not but pay some public regard to the memory of so valiant a man, the principal persons among the rebels attending him all the way to the grave.

And thus fell these two brave brothers, for the Doctor undoubtedly deserves that title with Sir Robert, who, though professing the peaceful art of medicine, adventured himself amidst the most visible danger, fired with love to his illustrious brother, and attempting in vain to bring him some aid in his last extremities, amidst armed enemies, expired with him, no less lamented than he by all that intimately knew him. How just that lamentation was, will appear from the accounts which I have had of the Doctor's character from his most intimate friends, which I here subjoin.

He was a gentleman of an excellent understanding, and had a brightness and solidity in his genius which are not often united; but which, when they occur, do greatly illustrate each other. He had been bred up to the study of medicine and surgery, which in Scotland are frequently joined, as they have so great an affinity. "He had a large stock of knowledge, not only in his own profession, but in most parts of polite literature. But these (adds my correspondent) I hold cheap, when compared to the goodness of his heart. His greatest study was to know himself; and I verily believe, that since the early ages of Christianity, there has not appeared a more upright person."

He spent a great many years in the East Indies, and had most accurately and diligently inquired into the manners, customs, arts, and manufactures of the natives, and into the produce and commodities of the country; so that he was much more capable of giving entertainment to persons of curiosity in such things, than travellers commonly are; and his veracity was such, that all who knew him could entirely depend upon whatever he reported as on his own knowledge. To all these advantages, was added a memory remarkably tenacious of every circumstance with which he charged it; but perhaps it was a loss to the world that it was so, as it hindered him from committing many extraordinary things to writing, which might have afforded improvement, as well as delight, to the public.

The want of such memoirs from so able a hand is the more to be regretted, as his remarkable modesty did not permit him to talk much in company. One might spend a good deal of time with him without perceiving, by any hints from him, that he had ever been out of Britain: but when his friends seemed desirous of information on any of these topics, as they fell in his way, he communicated his observations upon them with the utmost freedom, and gave them the greatest satisfaction imaginable; of which some remarkable instances happened at the houses of persons of very considerable rank, who paid him that respect which he so well deserved.

It was the more to be desired, that he should have left behind him some written memoirs of his own remarks and adventures, as he was a most attentive observer of divine Providence, and had experienced many singular instances of it. One is so remarkable, that it claims a place here, brief as these hints must necessarily be.—After he had continued eight or ten years in the East Indies, he was shipwrecked on the Malabarian coast, as he was on his passage home: he saved his life on a plank, but lost all his effects, except a small parcel of diamonds. This ruinous calamity, as it seemed to be, obliged him to return to Fort St. George, where he experienced, far beyond what he could have expected, the extraordinary friendship of several English gentlemen of that settlement; and felt the solid effects of it, as by their assistance he acquired much more in six or seven years following (for his whole stay in that country was about sixteen years) than he had lost by shipwreck; and when he left the settlement, he had all sort of encouragement offered him to induce him to stay; but his health and other circumstances obliged him to return home.

This return (which happened, if I mistake not, about the year 1726,) was a happy providence to many; for, as he was remarkably successful in both the branches of the peculiar profession, he took great pains in both; and, as he did this without fee or reward, when he was satisfied the circumstances of the afflicted needed such assistance, he was an instrument of saving many limbs, and many lives, which must otherwise in all probability have been lost.

To this account I must beg leave to add what another of my correspondents writes to me concerning the Doctor in the following words: "As we were often by ourselves, I still found him inclined to turn our discourse to spiritual subjects, concerning God and religion, the offices of the great Redeemer, and the power of God's Spirit in converting and sanctifying the souls of men, and the hope of eternal life through Christ." I transcribe the passage thus particularly concerning this pious physician, as I esteem it, in one view, a peculiar honour to him, and permit me to say, in another, to the profession itself: blessed be God, that though it is so rare a case, yet there are those of that learned body who are not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; but who, knowing it to be true on incontestable evidence, and having felt (what one would imagine every rational creature who believes it to be true must immediately see) its infinite importance, have steadily determined to submit to its influence, and to maintain its honours in the midst of all the scorn and derision of their infidel brethren; a determination which perhaps requires no less courage, especially in some tempers, than that generous instance of fraternal love which will entail such lasting glory on the memory of Doctor Munro.

There yet remained one valiant brother of this family, whom Providence reserved for a few months, before he shared the fate of the other two. The person I mean was Captain George Munro of Culcairn, Esq. of whom I have conceived such an idea, from the account of him which has been put into my hands, that I cannot forbear wishing the world were blessed with a much larger narrative of his life and character than my instructions will [illegible] than I should have room to insert in such an appendix as this. Much do I regret that Providence never favoured me with an opportunity of being personally acquainted with him, especially as I have reason to believe, from what my friends in the North write, that he had the like disposition towards forming a friendship with me, as produced so quick a growth of it in the breast of Colonel Gardiner, whom, on the whole, Captain Munro seems to have resembled almost in every part of his character, taking it as it was since that happy change which I have so largely described in the foregoing memoirs: but what was wanting in my personal knowledge, is supplied by a large and animated account from my correspondents, who had the best opportunity of knowing them, and upon whose information I can safely depend.

Captain George Munro was the second brother of the family; the Doctor being the youngest son. He, like the other gentlemen, had the advantage of a very liberal education, and soon discovered marks of a good genius, which might have qualified him for making a figure under any character in the learned world. Besides the other branches of literature, common to all the professions, he acquired a stock of theological knowledge; and before he was seventeen years old he was well acquainted with ecclesiastical history, so as to be able to give a good account of the advance and decline of the Christian interest in various ages and countries, and the degrees and manner by which the corruption and reformation of the church had been introduced, established, or obstructed. I the rather mention this, as it seems to be an accomplishment of great importance; on which account I much wonder that the generality of young gentlemen should think it so little worth attending to; and I wish I could say, that all who are intended for the ministry were so careful in pursuing it, as its usefulness and its absolute necessity to them might demand.

But his taste and talents particularly lay for a military life; and in the year 1715 he behaved himself with great courage and activity during the whole course of that rebellion; and after the dispersion of the rebels he was employed in reducing the inhabitants of those Highland countries and the adjacent isles to a submission to the government.

In the year 1719, when, on occasion of the invasion from Spain, General Wightman, with the troops under his command, had waited long at Inverness for a body of Highlandmen to conduct the troops through the mountains to Glenshiel, where the Spaniards and rebels were encamped; and when many promises of such assistance made to the general had failed, Sir Robert Munro being then out of the country, his brother the Captain (of whom we now speak) assembled in a most expeditious manner a body of the Munro clan, and marched with the regular troops to Glenshiel; where they distinguished themselves by the gallantry of their behaviour, driving the enemy before them in a sharp action, in which many of them were killed, and more wounded; and among the rest the Captain himself, in a very dangerous manner. He had, however, the satisfaction to see these foreign invaders and their rebel abettors, totally routed and dispersed, on the Pretender's birth day, June 10: and though his constitution suffered much by the loss of his blood on this occasion, yet it pleased God to recover him for further service to his country.

As he still continued vigorous and active in the service of the government, he obtained the command of one of the independent companies then in the national pay; and when they were afterwards regimented and sent to Flanders, he attended them thither, and continued in the public service till the year 1744; when he became so exceedingly asthmatic, that he could not breathe in the Flanders air: on which General Wade not only allowed him to sell his commission, but, out of compassion to his distress, joined his brother Sir Robert in obliging him to do it, and to return home; to which at length he submitted, though not without regret, and thereupon returned to his domestic seat at Newtown in Ross-shire, in the view of spending his days with his family and friends in a peaceful retreat. But Providence determined otherwise, and had reserved for him further labours of a military life, in which it had appointed him gloriously to toil and fall, after services which might have done an honour to his most vigorous and active days.

The late wicked and unnatural rebellion broke out soon after his arrival; and the danger of his country, and its civil and religious constitution, gave him at once a new stock of life and spirits.

When General Cope came to Inverness, and had been assured of being joined by a number of Highlanders, to conduct him and his small army through the rebel countries between that town and Aberdeen, Captain Munro, with 200 of his brother's clan, were indeed the only persons that were found willing to perform the promises that were made by several others. He marched with the General directly to Aberdeen, from whence he was ordered to return home; in which return he was under the necessity of marching through a great number of the rebels under the command of Gordon of Glenbucket, who lay on the road to attack the Captain and his party; but Glenbucket, finding that the Captain was determined to dispute every inch of ground with him, retired, and allowed him to proceed without disturbance to Inverness.

Not long after that the Earl of Loudoun sent Captain Munro, in conjunction with the Laird of Macleod, with a body of men, to relieve the city of Aberdeen, and the neighbouring country, then greatly oppressed by the outrages committed upon them by Lord Lewis Gordon, and the rebels under his command. Accordingly the Captain and Macleod proceeded as far as Inverury, a small town a few miles west of Aberdeen, where they halted to receive intelligence, and, from the narrowness of the place, they were obliged to quarter a great number of their men in distant places through the adjacent country. In the mean time, a considerable reinforcement from the main body of the rebel army, which then lay at Perth, was sent under the command of a French officer, supported by their piquets and Irish brigades; by the assistance of which Lord Lewis attempted to surprise and cut off the Captain and his whole party. In this view they were moving towards Inverury, in the dusk of the evening, after Captain Munro and Macleod had sent their men through the country to their quarters; but though there was not such good intelligence provided as might have been wished, they were providentially discovered at such a distance, that Captain Munro and the Laird of Macleod had time to draw up the men they had in the town of Inverury, in so regular a manner, that, in consequence of it, they gave the enemy such a warm reception, attacking them at once in front and flank, that many of them were left dead in the field. The brave Captain and his associate continued very sedate, intrepid, and active during the heat of the skirmish, till at last, being overpowered by far superior numbers, they thought it advisable to retire; and brought off their party safe and in good order, excepting some few who had been killed or taken prisoners. Among the latter was Mr. Adam Gordon, of Ardoch, nephew to Captain Munro, who was seized by the rebels, and treated with a deal of rigour and severity for a considerable time, while detained in their power: but they did not presume to pursue the rest; and the young gentleman at length made his escape, to the great joy of the family; being, I hope, reserved by Providence to tread in the steps of his heroic uncles, and to bless his country with some considerable future services.

Upon the retreat of the rebels northward before his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland, the Earl of Loudoun had not sufficient strength to maintain his possession of Inverness against them: whereupon he, with the Lord President and Captain Munro, retreated to the shire of Sutherland, proposing to defend themselves there until the season allowed his Royal Highness to march the troops to Inverness. But in this interval, the rebels having spread themselves through the shires of Inverness, Murray, and Ross, they got possession of a great many boats; by the help of which they transported a great part of their body to the Sutherland coast, under the covert of a very thick fog. Upon which the Earl of Loudoun, with the Lord President and the Captain, were obliged to retreat, through the western parts of Ross, into the Isle of Sky; where they continued until the rebel army was broke and dispersed at the battle of Culloden.

I have been the more particular in this narrative of the Captain's conduct during the rebellion, as it gives some light into the situation and transactions of the friends of our constitution in those parts at that time: and my information assures me, that the facts are taken from persons of undoubted veracity, who were present with the Captain in his march to Aberdeen with General Cope, and in his return from it; and who were with him in the skirmish at Inverury, and were afterwards witnesses of his death.

Upon his return from the Isle of Sky he was constantly employed in expeditions through the rebel countries of great extent, to reduce them to a submission to the government; which he performed with diligence and zeal, but still with the greatest humanity. This the rebels themselves must acknowledge; as he never did the least injury to any man, and in all that vast circuit which he made through these distant countries, he neither himself seized, nor allowed those under his command to seize, any thing but arms: and yet, notwithstanding all this humanity, his diligence and zeal had been such in the whole of this rebellion, as rendered him obnoxious to the rage and revenge of the rebels, who had vowed his destruction upon the first opportunity; and because they had not courage to face him, they had recourse to the base method of assassination, which was effected on the Lord's day, the 31st of August, 1746. He was then on a long and necessary march at the head of 500 men, on the side of Locharkey, amongst the wild rocks of Lochaber; where, as he was passing by the side of a wood, between the advanced guard and the main body of his men, he was shot dead by a villain who concealed himself behind the trees and rocks in the wood, and who, by the advantages of that situation, got off without being discovered, and has never since been found out: an event to the Captain, no doubt, most happy; and a blessed kind of instantaneous translation to the regions of endless peace and triumphant joy; but to all who loved the public, not to be mentioned without the tenderest sensibility and deepest regret.

One of my correspondents on this occasion concludes his accounts of the deaths of Sir Robert, the Doctor, and the Captain, in these words: "Thus died these three worthy men, to the irreparable loss of the country in which they lived: all of them remarkable for a brave spirit, full of love to their native land, and of disinterested zeal for religion and liberty; faithful in their promises, stedfast in their friendship, abundant in their charity to the poor and distressed; moderate in their resentments, and easy to be reconciled: and especially remarkable for their great and entire love to each other, so that one soul seemed, as it were, to actuate all the three." To which it might have been added blessed with a sister, not unworthy to make the fourth person in such a friendship.

* [illegible] Secretary of the [illegible] August 24, 1881 [illegible]

My other correspondent, in his character of the Captain, speaks in this manner: "The great foundation of all his other virtues was laid in a most sincere and stedfast regard to the Supreme Being. He carefully studied the great doctrines of our holy religion, which he courageously professed, and, as it was requisite, defended, in whatever company he might be cast: he did this with the greater freedom, as his practice was always agreeable to it, and in particular his regard, both to the book and to the day of God. He had from his infancy been trained up in an acquaintance with the Scripture; and he daily perused it with pleasure, and doubtless with advantage. And, though the natural cheerfulness of his temper inclined him on other days to facetious turns in conversation, yet on the sabbath he was not only grave and devout, but carefully attentive that all his speech might tend to edification, and as far as possible minister grace to the hearers. He was exemplary in the social virtues, temperate in the use of food and sleep, and rose early for devotion (wherein, as in many other respects, he remarkably resembled his beloved friend Colonel Gardiner). He was also thoroughly sensible how much a faithful discharge of relative duties is essential to the character of a Christian. He approved himself, therefore, as a brave and vigilant officer, a most active and faithful servant of the crown, and a true patriot to his country in the worst of times, and in domestic life was exemplary as a husband, a father, and a master. He was a most affectionate brother, a faithful friend, a constant benefactor, and a sure patron of the oppressed; and, to crown all, was at last in effect a martyr in the cause of that religion he had so eminently adorned, and of those liberties he had so long and bravely defended."

It must give a sensible pleasure to every reader, who enters into these things with a becoming spirit, to reflect, that, notwithstanding these unparalleled and irreparable losses, this family, which has been long celebrated for so many worthy branches, is not yet extinct; but that both Sir Robert Munro and the Captain have left those behind them who may not only bear up the name, but, if they answer the hopes which in the opening of life they give to their country, may add new honours to it.

I hope the reader will not lay down this narrative, which is now brought to a close, without deriving some useful lessons from the remarkable train of Providence which this Appendix, as well as the preceding Memoirs, offer to his observation. And the more he enters into these lessons, the more will he be disposed to lift up his wishes and prayers to God for those valuable remains, both of Sir Robert Munro's and of Colonel Gardiner's family, which may yet be within the reach of such addresses; that God may graciously support them in their sorrows, and that all the virtues and graces of the illustrious dead may live in them, and in their remotest posterity. Amen!

Captain, September 18, 1685, and the Doctor September 19, 1687. Sir Robert therefore was slain in heavenly second year, the Captain in his sixty first, and the Doctor in his fifty-ninth.

SOME ACCOUNT

OF

THE LIFE AND CHARACTER

OF THE

REV. THOMAS STEFFE.

PREFIXED TO

A VOLUME OF SERMONS PUBLISHED AFTER HIS DECEASE.

TO THE REV. MR JOHN BARKER.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,

If the dedication of a book be any token of gratitude and respect, or the patronage of it any instance of generosity and favour, you have the justest title to this volume in one view, and I the greatest encouragement to address it to you in the other. I know, Sir, that to enlarge on these topics, would, to a gentleman of your character, be making a very disagreeable kind of return. But you will allow me to let the world know, that I am inscribing these posthumous sermons of Mr. Steffe to one of the best of his friends, as well as of mine; and to him, to whom, had he been engaged to publish them himself, he would surely have chosen to present the first-fruits of his labours. And permit me, Sir, thus publicly to thank you for all the pleasure you gave me in an opportunity of cultivating the mind of so worthy a youth, and for the foundation which you laid for that excellent example he gave, as well as for the wise and pious instructions he delivered in circumstances and relations of life, which, unsupported by your bounty and care, it is probable he had never known. You, Sir, discovered this promising plant in its tenderest state, and presented it to the garden of God; and though we must not arraign the wise hand that removed it, every one will own it reasonable that these early, yet pleasant and wholesome, fruits which dropped from it should be presented to you. And I persuade myself, Sir, that, though they are not ripened to all that height of beauty and of flavour which a maturer growth might have given them, you will receive them with candour; and, indeed, I am not without some cheerful hope, that they may afford you both delight and nourishment.

When I intimate that Mr. Barker may not only be entertained, but edified, by the productions of our young friend, I might seem to speak with too little caution, and to raise an expectation which a prudent friendship will always avoid, when it would introduce persons or books into the world with advantage. But it is the happiness of great wisdom and goodness (I had almost said it is a part of its reward) to be entertained and edified by the writings of those who are much its inferiors, and most readily to exercise an indulgence which itself least needs. In this view you, Sir, would have read these Sermons with pleasure had they been the work of a stranger; but you cannot, and I think you ought not, to forget, that you were, through the divine goodness, the instrument of giving them to the world. And you will be quickened to renew your bounties of this kind, and a more important kind is not easily to be named, when you so sensibly perceive that, short as the date of our friend's life was, your labour, with regard to its present effects, hath not been in vain in the Lord.

They who know the relation in which I stood to Mr. Steffe, will readily believe that I have some peculiar share in your joys on such an occasion; but if there were not such a distinguishing tie, as in the present case, I must be insensible to a long train of personal obligations, if I did not affectionately take my part in all your satisfactions and joys. I bless God that they arise from such a variety of springs, that they swell into so full a stream; and, above all, that they are so faithfully and so constantly returned back to him from whom they originally proceed.

I do, Sir, in my conscience, apprehend that, when addressing the ministers of the gospel, there is seldom reason to congratulate them on their distinguished circumstances in temporal life. When the more abundant gifts of the divine bounty seem to be received, as if, like those given to the Hebrew servants, they were a part of the ceremonial of their dismission from their Lord, they are indeed the calamity rather than the happiness of the proprietors, be they ever so copious, or ever so splendid. That is really a poisonous draught, be it ever so luscious, which intoxicates the mind, and lulls it into a forgetfulness of the interest of Christ, and of immortal souls. But where affluent circumstances are considered as an engagement to serve God with greater cheerfulness and zeal in the abundance of all things; where the possessor considers himself as the steward of God in temporals as well as spirituals, and as the almoner who is to distribute the divine bounties to his indigent brethren, whether ministers or private Christians; and where all this is done in the easy, cheerful, endearing manner of a heart that feels how much more blessed it is to give than to receive; this, Sir, is a most grateful spectacle, not only to the eye of an intimate and obliged friend, but of a stranger who understands any thing of the beauty of character; and is, I doubt not, venerable, as well as amiable, in the eyes of those celestial spirits from whom it seems to be copied. Human acknowledgments on such an occasion are little things to the voice of an approving conscience and an approving God. I hope, therefore, Sir, that the many, whose burdens (to my certain knowledge) you have eased, and whose hearts you have gladdened, will express their gratitude in a nobler way, by endeavouring to serve the public with greater alacrity, while they are freed from the encumbrances which must otherwise have depressed and broken their spirits.

I heartily bless God, that while good Mr. Barker is possessed of these pleasures, which so few of his brethren in the dissenting ministry can have, he also shares with the most acceptable, and I hope I may add, the most successful, of them, in those which immediately arise from the exercise of his sacred office. It is with unutterable delight that I see so valuable a friend recovered from the remainders of that disorder which seemed some years ago to threaten the speedy period of his public services. To be able to vent the fulness of your heart under a sense of the grace of the gospel, and to represent the important engagements to vital and universal holiness which so naturally arise from it, would give a nobler pleasure than money could purchase, though it were only in your own house, to a little circle which might fill one of its rooms. There, indeed, you might equally approve the sincerity of your heart in the presence of him that searches it: but you must give your friends, that is, as I should imagine, all the friends of virtue and religion who know you, leave to rejoice, that Providence, having invigorated you for it, has called you out to constant service in one of the most numerous and important congregations which is to be found among us, even in London, that great support of our interest through the whole kingdom. There, my dear and honoured friend, may you long continue to delight and to bless crowded, attentive, and serious auditories, growing daily more attentive, and more serious, while your doctrine drops upon them like the dew, and distils like the rain! May you have the pleasure to see, not merely that they are capable of relishing the dignity of sentiment, the propriety of language, and the gracefulness of delivery; but, which is infinitely more desirable, that they continually advance in faith, in holiness, and in love, to the glory of that God whom you serve with your spirit in the gospel of his Son, and to whom all that you are and have is so faithfully and so zealously devoted!

For these great purposes may your important life be prolonged, and your health, with that of your valuable lady, be supported to many future years! May the secret blessing of the God of heaven sweetly mingle itself with all the concerns of both! May it fill your house with prosperity, and your hearts with that joy which a stranger intermeddleth not with; and which, though it were in a royal palace, can grow upon no stock but benevolence, friendship, and devotion! And may the various blessings of a long and a happy life be at length crowned with those of an infinitely happier immortality!

Whenever that solemn moment comes which is to remove you from time to eternity, I know that it must leave multitudes lamenting; so deeply lamenting, that it is painful to speak of or to think of it. But I rejoice, Sir, to reflect, how many friends above will then be waiting to receive you to everlasting habitations. I doubt not but the spirit of our dear author will be numbered and distinguished among them; and that your generous concern to promote the spread and the acceptance of these his remains, will, so far as it may be known to him, increase his acknowledgment. In the mean time, Sir, I persuade myself, that among all your other good offices, you will join your earnest prayers for their success, with those of,

Reverend and dear Sir,

Your most obliged and affectionate brother,

And obedient humble servant,

P. DODDRIDGE.

Northampton, June 8, 1742.

SOME ACCOUNT

OF

THE LIFE AND CHARACTER

OF THE

REV. THOMAS STEFFE.

The pious author of these discourses was so early removed from our world, and made so short an appearance on any public stage of action, that there is no room for any to expect a variety of remarkable occurrences in his life. By far the greater part of those few years which Providence allotted him, was spent in assiduous preparation for services, which, alas! he was never permitted to accomplish. Nevertheless, as a person curious in the anatomy of vegetables would look with some satisfaction on a blossom yet folded up in the bud, while he traced the first rudiments of its future form, as well as that peculiar apparatus which was subservient to its preservation and growth in that infant state, though it never grew up to display its vivid colours and diffuse its fragrancy; so I flatter myself, that something may occur in this narration, not unworthy the notice of survivors.

They who, like our author, in the years I shall principally describe, are growing up to the work of the ministry, may, I hope, learn in many instances, what it is to be desired they may be, while I am telling them what Mr. Steffe was, and if they go and do likewise, it may be for the benefit of multitudes who are yet unborn that this little sketch has been drawn. And the generality of readers may, perhaps, be more disposed to edify by his writings, as they grow better acquainted with his character: for it is certain, that nothing adds greater authority to a minister's instructions from the pulpit or the press, than an apprehension that they are transcribed and uttered from his heart.

Our author was the son of a worthy clergyman of the established church, the Reverend Mr. John Steffe, once of Emanuel College in Cambridge, and afterwards Rector of Wrentham in the county of Suffolk. This gentleman, remarkable for his piety, learning, and moderation, married Mrs. Martha Popland, of Raydon, in Suffolk, by whom he had several children, who survive their honoured father, I hope, to be long-lived blessings to their other pious parent, and to supply, as far as possible, the great loss she sustained, so soon after she became a widow, by the death of two most hopeful and delightful sons.*

Mr. Thomas Steffe was born April 6, 1716; and though he had a very weak constitution, so that his life was hardly expected from his infancy; (for he soon appeared subject to an asthmatic disorder, besides other infirmities;) yet he discovered such an early solidity of genius, seriousness of temper, and fondness for books, that his father soon determined to indulge his desire of being bred a scholar. And as he candidly referred it to himself, as his judgment advanced towards maturity, to judge for himself in religious matters, he generously acquiesced in the young gentleman's choice of pursuing his studies among the protestant dissenters.

I am informed that he had most of his education in the languages under his father, who was well acquainted with them, and especially a very accurate judge in the elegances of the Latin, of which I have some remarkable proofs in my correspondence with him. It is not very material to mention the particular places in which our author improved and perfected his studies. It may suffice to say, that when he was judged nearly qualified for the academy, as he resolutely declined, from principles of conscience, those offers which a person of the first rank in the established church had kindly made of providing for him at the university, his case was accidentally mentioned to that excellent person to whom I have ascribed those traits of his labours, who, ready to embrace all opportunities to serve the public interest, made a particular inquiry into his character and disposition, and in concurrence with another, and to me unknown, benefactor, determined to assist this hopeful youth with a supply of twenty pounds a year, that his education might not be burthensome to his good father, then far advanced in years, charged with the care of a numerous family.

* The Rev. Mr. Steffe, of Wrentham, died April 7, 1736, in the 58th year of his age, and was buried in the chancel of that church. His widow died June 4, 1746.

In the year 1733, Mr. Steffe was sent, at the request of his friends, to one of those little seminaries among the protestant dissenters, where attempts are used to supply, in the best manner we can, the want of more public advantages for education, and to guide the minds of young persons intended for the ministry into such preparatory studies as may in some measure qualify them for appearing properly in it. He was then in his 18th year; but as he well knew the importance of making himself master of the learned languages in younger life, he desired to be excused from entering upon the philosophical part of his course, till he had spent almost another year in applying himself to them; and particularly to Greek: which, I am sorry to say it, is not generally cultivated in private schools with that care and exactness which it deserves and requires. He prosecuted these studies with such resolution, and such success, that, on the whole, the most celebrated classics both of Greece and Rome were a delight rather than a drudgery to him; and thus a foundation was laid for that solidity, strength, and correctness both of sentiments and style, which must seldom be expected, where those great originals are unknown or disregarded.

I cannot forbear mentioning two other particulars, which Mr. Steffe took in his entrance on this stage of life, which appeared to me remarkably prudent. The one was, that he endeavoured to gain an early acquaintance with the character of books, especially those of the little library to which he had access: and was ready to take the advice of more experienced friends in the choice of those he should read, that he might not throw away his time in those which were of little importance; and also that he might not anticipate the perusal of others, which might more properly be reviewed in some future time. And I must needs say, that the neglect of this caution, obvious as it is, may make a well furnished library a snare rather than a benefit. The other particular I referred to, was his care immediately to learn short-hand, and that not merely in its first rudiments, with which too many content themselves, but to some degree of exactness, elegance, and readiness. In consequence of this, he became capable, with great ease, and in a very little time, to make many valuable extracts from the books he read and consulted; not to mention the many hours which it afterwards saved him, in the composition of discourses for the pulpit.

I think it was also during the first year that he laid a foundation for reading the Old Testament in its original language; a care so very necessary, that I wonder it should ever be omitted; or that any young gentleman, in an age like ours, should be judged competently qualified for the pulpit, who lies as much at the mercy of translators in studying the larger half of his Bible, as any of the people he is to teach. It is, however, with pleasure that I observe, how seldom this is done among the protestant dissenters, so far as I have an opportunity to learn; and I am sorry to hear from many learned clergymen, with whom I have the honour to be acquainted, how often it is totally neglected by those, whose advantages for literature are so very much distinguished.

I shall not here give a particular account of the method in which Mr. Steffe's education, and that of his companions, was carried on, while at the academy, though I have often been requested and importuned to write largely on this head. I content myself with observing in general, that he did not despise any part of polite literature, which seemed subservient to his honourable appearance in the ministry, in so learned an age and country as our own; but, nevertheless, applied himself with the greatest assiduity to those things which appeared of the most eminent and immediate service; in which view he is worthy of being imitated by all that regard either their acceptance or usefulness in the churches.

In the former view, besides the general preparations of logic, rhetoric, and metaphysics, he made himself acquainted with the principles of geometry and algebra, and, I think, also of conic sections, and celestial mechanics. That steady command of thought, and attention of mind, for which our author was remarkable, and the traces of which were discoverable in his countenance, made these studies pleasant rather than fatiguing to him; and he soon saw the tendency they have to teach us to distinguish our ideas with accuracy, and to dispose our arguments in a clear, concise, and convincing manner. These introduced him into the easy knowledge of mechanics, statics, hydrostatics, optics, pneumatics, and astronomy, so far as it was judged material to open to him the chief phenomena of each with their respective solutions. He added to these some other articles, which have their place in what is usually called the Encyclopædia of Learning, especially something of natural history, and a pretty large view of the anatomy of the human body; the knowledge of which he cultivated with peculiar care and pleasure, as well observing the tendency it has to promote our veneration and love to the great architect of this amazing frame, whose wonders of providential influence also are so apparent in its support, nourishment, and motion.

For all these studies Mr. Steffe had a relish, and a genius; but the far greater part of his time, especially in the last three years of his course, was employed in others more directly preparatory for the great work he had in view. In this number I must reckon a large and particular investigation of Jewish Antiquities, in which he met with the illustration of numberless texts in the Old Testament, which cannot be well understood without them: as likewise his survey of Ecclesiastical History, of which Lampe's admirable Epitome was the ground-work; which I mention, because I wonder it is no more generally known, though so very far superior to any thing else of the like kind, for the vast variety of judicious hints which it contains, in a little room, and most beautiful order. His view of the doctrines of the ancient philosophers in their various sects, had been taken with greater advantage, had Buddæus's Compendium Historiæ Philosophicæ been then known: but something of this kind he surveyed, and it could not but serve to endear Christianity to him, that glorious light which dispels these shades of learned and artificial darkness.

These articles took up some hours every week, in the latter years of his course; but by far the greater part of his time throughout this whole period, so far as it fell under the direction of his tutor, was employed in a series of about 250 lectures of divinity, in the largest extent of the word, that is, considered as including what is most material in pneumatology and ethics.* In this compendium were contained, in as few words as perspicuity would admit, the most material things which had occurred to the author's observations, relating to the nature and properties of the human mind, the proof of the existence and attributes of God, the nature of moral virtue, the various branches of it, the means subservient to it, and the sanctions by which its precepts, considered as God's natural law, are enforced; under which head the natural evidence of the immortality of the soul was largely examined. To this was added some survey of what is, and generally has been, the state of virtue in the world; from whence the transition was easy to the need of a revelation, the encouragement to hope it, and the nature of the evidence which might probably attend it. From hence the work naturally proceeded to the evidence produced in proof of that revelation which the Scripture contains. The genuineness, credibility, and inspiration of these sacred books were then cleared up at large, and vindicated from all the most considerable objections, which modern infidels (those sinners against their own souls) have urged. When this foundation was laid, the chief doctrines of Scripture were drawn out into a large detail; those relating to the Father, Son, and Spirit, to the original and fallen state of man, to the scheme of our redemption by Christ, and the offices of the Spirit as the great agent in the Redeemer's kingdom. The nature of the covenant of grace was particularly stated, and the several precepts and institutions of the gospel, with the views which it gives us of the concluding scenes of our world, and of the eternal state beyond it. What seemed most evident on these heads was thrown into the propositions, some of which were problematical; and the chief controversies relating to each were thrown into the scholia; and all illustrated by a very large collection of references,† containing perhaps, one lecture with another, the substance of forty or fifty octavo pages, in which the sentiments and reasonings of the most considerable authors on all these heads might be seen in their own words; which it was the business of the students to read and contract, in the intervals between these lectures, of which only three were given in a week, and sometimes but two. The mind of this excellent youth knew how to judge of the importance of this part of his course; it struck him strongly; and as he made it his early care to transcribe the manuscript with great exactness, so he studied both the lectures and references diligently, and made himself master of them to such a degree, as to be able to handle such points of theology as occurred to him in his course of preaching, not in a crude indigested manner, but with an accuracy and solidity, rather worthy of a divine who had numbered more years of study than he of life.

As he was always encouraged and exhorted to inquire freely, and to judge for himself, so it was particularly recommended to him to take his system of divinity, not from the sentiments of any human teacher, but from the word of God. This therefore he early studied, and set a great value on those critical lectures on the New Testament, which he weekly attended, and carefully transcribed; besides those daily expositions in the family, in which, within the five years he spent in the course, he had an opportunity of hearing almost the whole Old Testament explained from the original, as well as the New twice or thrice illustrated, partly, though not entirely, in a practical view. If I remember right, he soon took the wise precaution (which I would recommend to every young student) to get an interleaved

* The manuscript, which was [illegible] [illegible] definitions, propositions, demonstrations, corollaries, and scholia, and in the method which mathematicians [illegible] that the introduction of these scholastic terms [illegible] like occasions.

† See [illegible]

Bible, and a Wetstein's Greek Testament interleaved with good paper in quarto, in which he wrote memorandums of the most considerable remarks for the illustration of Scripture, which occurred to him in reading, conversation, or reflection. And had Providence continued him a few years longer in that prudent and diligent course, I question not but these manuscripts would have been a rich repository of valuable materials; for he had a true genius for criticism, in those which I take to be its noblest and masterly parts; which are those which depend, not merely on dint of industry, but on sagacity, elevation, and vivacity of thought; to which I must add, a truly devotional temper of mind, without which it will be impossible for any man to relish, and therefore, to be sure, impossible to point out the beauties, of the sacred writers.

His great desire to appear in a becoming manner under the character of a preacher, as well as a concern to cultivate religion in his own soul, engaged him intimately to converse with the best practical writers our fertile country has produced; in which number, I know, he peculiarly esteemed Mr. Howe and Mr. Baxter, not to mention any of those lights of the sanctuary, which through the great goodness of God to us, are not yet extinguished, and who will, I doubt not, preach with abundant success to generations long to come. I believe that day seldom passed, in which some of these writers were not in his hands, in whom he sought at once the improvement of the Christian and the minister; and I think it must argue a great defect of understanding, as well as of real piety, if any theological students are negligent of this.

The same good principle, which led Mr. Steffe to be very conversant with such books, engaged him also to attend with great diligence to those instructions which were largely given him, on the important head of preaching and pastoral care. And while I speak of this, I must not forget how gladly he embraced the opportunity, which the custom of the place gave him, to submit, first, the schemes of his sermons, and then several of the sermons themselves, to the examination and correction of that friend who had the charge of his education: a privilege which those that least need it generally value most; and which, if I do not much mistake, may be more instructive to young preachers, than any general rules for composition, which can be offered them by those, who are themselves most eminent in their profession. An early care to get a due management of his voice, and to form himself to a just, animated, yet unaffected delivery, set an agreeable varnish on what was in itself much more important, and greatly contributed to that extensive and well-merited popularity, which attended him, so far as I can learn, from the first sermon he preached to the last. Sad calamity to the church, and the world, that the interval between the one and the other was so short!

Hitherto I have considered Mr. Steffe's character and conduct as a scholar, during the series of his academical studies: I must now describe him in another yet more important view, which will carry us a little further into his life, as well as deeper into his heart; I mean, as a Christian. And here I shall not mention a variety of particulars, which I comprehend in saying, "He was, as I am verily persuaded, a Christian indeed;" but shall only mention some of those exemplary effects, which the sincere and lively piety of his heart produced, in a beautiful correspondence to those circumstances of life in which he was placed. And this I attempt, not in a view of raising a monument to the memory of a dear deceased friend, I doubt not but the applause of his great Master has raised him high above all such; but rather of hinting instruction to others, by exhibiting him more fully in a point of light which has seldom been enlarged upon by those who have written lives, whether from a very mistaken apprehension that it was of little moment, or, as I would rather hope, for want of materials. Providence has ordered it so, that it was almost all the history that can be given of Mr. Steffe, and has assigned this office to one who had an opportunity of collecting materials from what he himself saw; though I must add, that in what I have further to write, my personal observations have been much illustrated by a collection of his letters to his parents and other near relations, the originals of which are now before me.

No advantages of genius, and, could they have come into question, no views of preferment, could have engaged so worthy a clergyman as Mr. Steffe's father was, to enter into measures for his being brought up to the ministerial office, if he had not known him to be a blameless and a virtuous youth: but from some things which he has written of himself in papers now before me, the particulars of which it is not necessary to transcribe, I have reason to believe that real religion was of a later date in his heart, than his first views of undertaking the sacred work in which he afterwards engaged. An awful text of Scripture, solemnly and seasonably dropped from the venerable lips of his pious father, a little before he quitted the family, seems to have given a most happy turn to his mind, and, under divine influence, to have been the immediate occasion of producing that sincere piety there, which afterwards grew so fast, and shone so bright.

I find, that when he first came to the academy, his religious resolutions were seriously renewed and confirmed, and he was very early animated with a solicitous concern to do good to the souls of others, as well as to secure the salvation of his own. This particularly appears in a letter which he then wrote to an elder brother, who was just then coming out of an apprenticeship, and entering on life; and it is pleasant to observe, what a mixture of prudence, fidelity, and tenderness, runs through the whole of it. He was very apprehensive, from what he had observed in his brother's temper and conduct, as well as from the remarks he had even then made upon the world in general, that he would be in great danger of being insnared; and though he was afterwards remarkably recovered by divine grace, some circumstances which followed too plainly showed how just those apprehensions were. Our author therefore plainly admonishes him of his danger, and seriously urges him to make religion his choice and his business, as the great point of wisdom both for time and eternity: yet he mingles this with so many acknowledgments of his own imperfections, of his having neglected many early advantages of improvement, and having perhaps, in some instances of sin and folly, insnared so intimate a companion, that it plainly shows he did not forget the respect due to an elder brother, and that it was not pride, but cordial love, that dictated what he wrote. "I am," says he, "unworthy to be called a child of God; yet through his goodness I see and taste so much sweetness in religion, that I cannot but recommend it to others." And accordingly he does recommend it, by a variety of most weighty arguments; and concludes them all with such a serious representation of the uncertainty of youth and health, and the possibility of an early surprise by death, as is peculiarly moving, when one recollects that the person by whom this letter was written, and he to whom it was addressed, were both called into eternity in their blooming years.

It is with some difficulty that I forbear inserting the whole; but I fear swelling these memoirs to a disproportionate size. Nevertheless I find myself, as it were, constrained to transcribe great part of another letter, which he wrote much about the same time to a younger brother, Mr. John Steffe, to engage him to resume those views of the ministry which he seemed at that time inclinable to lay aside. It discovers much of the heart of the writer; and I hope they who are training up for that office, whose benefit I have here particularly in view, will read it with some peculiar attention, as coming from one of their companions, if they will allow the name of companion to one who was as yet only in the pursuit of his grammatical studies. That was Mr. Steffe's circumstance when he wrote the following epistle; and yet I freely own, that while I read it, (such is the gravity, propriety, and spirituality with which he writes,) I seem to be rather perusing the charge of a brother long experienced in the ministry, than the letter of a child who was but looking towards it.

Speaking of the ministry, he says, "I must acknowledge that it was with great reluctance I was brought to comply with the proposals which were made to me in this view, from a sense of the greatness and importance of the work, and of my own insufficiency for it; which argument was strongly backed with frequent fears, lest I should not have had a work of grace wrought in my own heart, without which I saw an impossibility of becoming a faithful and successful minister; and I doubt not but you have had some apprehensions like these. But I would not have you nor myself overwhelmed with these discouraging thoughts; since it is so delightful, so honourable a work, and has so great a tendency to the promotion of religion in the world.

"It is true, this is an office which is attended with great difficulties, even such as would be too considerable for any mortal creature to encounter with, if he had not inward supports from Christ, the chief shepherd and bishop of souls. The greatness and difficulty of the ministerial work will evidently appear, if we consider, that whilst they are engaged in their office, they are personating even the great God himself, whose mouth they are to the people: the purposes they serve are high and godlike; and besides, what greatly adds to the difficulty of it, is the opposition and discouragements which attend the faithful discharge of this duty. The prince of this world is active by temptations to divert and discourage every one from engaging in this work, often suggesting what may pervert and mislead their minds in it. If allurements, terrors, or reproaches will avail, they are sure to be tried; for ministers are the butt against which Satan by these instruments levels his sharpest darts, well knowing that the strongest batteries against his kingdom are placed there; and therefore the most faithful are sure to be most assaulted. There are also our own indispositions, which render the work the harder. And besides all, there is a strict account to be given at the day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, when we shall hear Christ saying with a heart-impressing power, Give an account of your stewardship. He will demand an account of the souls he committed to our care, and the trust he reposed in us. There, if we be pronounced faithful servants, we shall accordingly receive the reward of such; but if unfaithful, the blood of others will be required at our hands, and their misery will be an aggravation of ours.

"Now upon mature consideration of the great importance and difficulty of the work, as it is of so great consequence, we may justly cry out, Who is sufficient for these things? His labor, his agony: this is a work indeed. What piety, what prudence, what zeal, what courage, what faithfulness, and what holy watchfulness is necessary, to the right discharge of this so great an office! The work is great; our strength is small: yea, of ourselves we have no strength at all; but all our sufficiency is of God, to him therefore must we go for it. Here is our comfort, and our hope. It hath pleased the Father that in Christ all fulness should dwell; fulness of merit and righteousness, of strength and grace, even a grace that shall be sufficient for us. God himself hath said, that if any lack wisdom, they should ask it of him who giveth to all liberally; and he hath expressly added, it shall be given. Therefore let us make our application to him; let us come with a holy boldness to the throne of grace, deeply impressed with a sense of our weakness and folly; and thus let us ask wisdom, and then we need not fear being disappointed, but shall of his fulness receive, and grace for grace.

"In vain may we have recourse to the most refined and polite parts of human learning, to qualify ourselves for this work: all human arts, and the whole circle of the sciences, will be unable to furnish us for it, unless God, who first commanded the light to shine out of darkness, lay the foundation, in shining by his Spirit into our hearts, and displaying the invincible efficacy of his grace, to work in us a true repentance and conversion never to be repented of. Not that I would have you neglect your studies, but use a double diligence in your earnest pursuit of them: yet I write thus, that you may not rest in these, but be aspiring after more noble acquirements. Be very solicitous about the one thing needful, without which you can never expect to become a faithful or successful minister of Christ's gospel.

"My dear brother, I hope you will take in good part what I have here said; and though you do not want advice and direction in this affair from those that are with you, and are more capable of giving you better admonition than I, yet I hope you will have so much regard to me and yourself, as to bestow some time in reading over and considering these obvious thoughts, which I have spent a few minutes in drawing up, hoping that as they are continually of use to me, they may be so to you.

"You intimate that your inclinations are rather to be of a trade. It is true, in such a station of life, you would not find so much difficulty as attends the ministry: but then you will not have such prospects of being useful in your day. What more noble or honourable employment than this! Surely it may well be called a good work, a work of the greatest importance, and designed for the most extensive good; since it is conversant about no lower concerns than the life and happiness of immortal souls, and is designed to display and illustrate God's free grace and mercy in bringing many sons to glory. Are the ways of wisdom pleasant? then ministers of all men enjoy most real, solid pleasure; for they are always exercised in her ways, spending themselves, and being spent, in the service of their Lord, who will not fail to reward them abundantly. Oh what pleasure will arise in our minds, if God shall call us to this work, and succeed our labours in it, when we shall, in the midst of those toils, see many coming to own us as their spiritual fathers! These will be our joy and crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus, they will be as so many jewels in our diadem of glory. But then, what still more unspeakable pleasure and satisfaction will arise in our souls, when we come in the near views of an eternal world, that we can look back upon our past lives, and see that they were spent in the service of our Creator and Redeemer; that his glory was our chief aim in all we did; so that we can say, we have fought a good fight, we have finished our course, and kept the faith; and that what remains is, that there is a crown of righteousness laid up for us, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall bestow upon us in that day.—But I must break off for this time; yet not without recommending you to God; once more desiring you would be earnest and constant in your addresses at the throne of grace, that we may both obtain mercy and grace to help in every time of need."

It may easily be imagined, that so lively a sense of piety in the heart of this good youth would be productive of such discourses and actions, as must naturally attract the observation and esteem of those around him: and how modestly soever conducted, would be (as Solomon expresses it) like a perfume held in the hand, which the more closely it is grasped, discovers itself so much the sooner, by the agreeable odours which it diffuses.

He was soon informed of a society of private Christians, who met at stated times for religious discourse and prayer: (the first of those formed, and since so happily increased, in the place where he then dwelt;) and he was invited to enter himself a member of it. In consisted, as such societies generally, though blessed be God not always, do, of persons in lower ranks of life: but it is edifying, as well as delightful to me, to observe, in what humble strains this young gentleman expresses his admiration of the goodness of God, and of the condescension of his friends, that he should have the honour of being admitted among them, of which he seems to have apprehended himself very unworthy.

From this society he quickly passed to another, consisting only of senior students for the ministry, who used on the evening of the Lord's day to visit neighbouring villages, and hold private meetings for religious worship in some licensed houses there. Two of them generally went together; a serious sermon on some uncontroverted and important subject of religion was repeated, and one of them prayed before and the other after it, with proper intervals of singing. This custom, still continued, and extended to many other places, hath, I hope, been very useful, both in exercising the gifts of the students, and in abating the prejudices which some have been ready to entertain against our ways of worship, as well as in spreading the knowledge of divine things; not to mention the relief it has given to some, whose circumstances have confined them from opportunities of attending, where they could have chosen to spend the sabbath. When the assembly was dismissed, a few serious people would often remain, to spend an hour or two more in conference and prayer with the persons who had been officiating; and they who appeared under the first religious impressions, or under dejection of spirit, were encouraged to open their cases, and their hearts, at such times as these.

It is not at all to be wondered at, by those who consider what Christian experience is, and how it is to be learned, that those students, who entered into these exercises with the greatest spirit and zeal, have appeared to distinguished advantage under a public character. And accordingly I am well assured, that many large and flourishing congregations, in which (having been unanimously and affectionately chosen) they are now labouring with great acceptance and success, are blessing God, that they were thus formed for more extensive service, and that they learnt in such schools as these, what no academical lectures alone could have taught them with equal advantage.

I will venture to say, that it would be well for the church of Christ, if all his ministers entered on the solemnities of their ordination-day, with that deliberation, self-examination, and prayer, which Mr. Steffe's papers show him to have used, when he first gave up his name to this repeating society: but he knew the worth of souls, and the importance of men's devotional moments! May none, who do not in some measure know both, venture to meddle with them, lest it be to their own hurt!

Well did this prudent youth apprehend, how absurd it is for any to undertake to officiate in Christian assemblies, before they are entered into full communion; and well did he consider, how great a duty and privilege it is to commemorate the death of our great Lord at his table. Accordingly, in September, 1734, some considerable time before he engaged in the society I last mentioned, he made his first approach to that ordinance, with the entire consent and approbation of the church, to whom he wrote an excellent letter on the occasion, which I would gladly insert, if I had convenient room to do it. But I cannot forbear transcribing a few of his reflections upon this head, in a letter which he wrote presently after; because I hope it may animate young Christians to attend an important duty, which I fear they are too ready to neglect.

"I did then," says he, (speaking of the preceding sabbath,) "give myself up to God, and seal my covenant with him; and it is with unspeakable pleasure that I look back on that solemn and awful transaction. I bless God, I can say, the day in which I made my first approach to the table of the Lord, was one of the best days, if not the very best, I ever lived. I then felt more sensible sorrow for sin, than I had ever done before. I was filled with admiration to think that I, who did not deserve to be set among the dogs of his flock, should have the honour of sitting among his children at his table. I hope, I had then some appropriating views of the blessed Jesus, and could call him my Saviour and my God; could esteem him the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. And while I was by faith feeding on him in this ordinance, unspeakable transports of grief and joy at once seized on my soul: grief, when I looked up, and saw my bleeding dying Redeemer bearing my sins in his own body on the tree; when I viewed him, as wounded for my transgressions, as bruised for my iniquities, and enduring that chastisement which was the purchase of my peace: and proportionable joy, when I considered that my sins, though so great, and so many, and attended with such aggravated circumstances as gave them a scarlet and crimson dye, were all washed away in the overflowing fountain of his precious blood. On the whole, I was enabled with delight to draw water out of this well of salvation, and could with great pleasure enlarge on this head: but must conclude, with entreating your prayers for me, that having vowed unto the Lord, I may never go back; but considering myself as bound by so many engagements, invited by so many encouragements, and obliged to God and godliness by so many ties of duty, interest, and gratitude, I may be running the Christian race with patience and alacrity, and continually adorning that profession, which I have in this ordinance so solemnly made."

In consequence of a resolution, so solemnly recorded in this ordinance, and often renewed and sealed in returning approaches to it, our author continued in a calm, resolute, and diligent prosecution of his studies, according to the plan laid down above: still conducting himself in a prudent and cautious manner, so as to cut off occasion, even from those who sought it, if such there had been, to bring any reproach on the society he belonged to, and the denomination of Christians in whose interest he had chosen to embark. Nor do I from this time meet with any incident relating to him, so remarkable as to require a particular notice, till August, 1737, when it pleased God to remove his reverend and worthy father, by a stroke which his family and the church will have long cause to lament. This providence occasioned two letters, which have been so very pleasing to me, and to some pious and judicious friends to whom I have communicated them, that I cannot forbear inserting the greatest part of them here; as I think they are both a very lively and beautiful image of filial piety in its most genuine workings; and as the latter contains some such consolations on the death of friends, as the best of mankind in this dying world have, alas, frequent occasion to recollect.

The former of these was directed to his mother; but begins in this abrupt manner, without any appellation to mark the person for whom it was particularly intended.

"Last night the most melancholy letter came to my hands that ever I received, and I am now sitting down to write an answer to it. But to whom shall I address myself? and what shall I make the subject of my letter?

"Had I sufficient encouragement to hope, that my dear father could read it, or hear it read, I should not be long in determining whether I should direct a part of it to him. But the account I have had of his extreme illness discourages me from it: if he was a week ago so low and weak, as to be incapable of holding a pen to write a few lines to me, there is too, too much room to suspect, lest that disease, which made his hands so feeble, should by this time have cast a mortal veil over his eyes, and stopped his ears, so that he can neither read, nor hear, what I write. Oh could I meet with some one that is able to resolve the question! With what eagerness should I address myself to such a person, in the language, though not in the sentiments, of Joseph, Doth my father yet live? But oh, with what fear and anxiety should I attend the answer? How should I fear, lest my present uncertainty should be changed into a melancholy certainty; and that uneasy situation of mind, which between hope and fear concerning my father's life I am now in, should be succeeded by the deepest sorrow from hearing, He does not live!

"In the midst of such uncertainties, what shall I do? What course shall I take? Shall I venture to write to him? Shall I tell him, that notwithstanding the prevalence of his disease, and his extreme weakness, I have yet great hope of his recovery? Alas, there is little room for that. What hope can I have, when a physician, whose skill enables him to form a more certain judgment, than his tenderness and unwillingness to grieve will permit him to impart, does yet say, If he does recover, it will be a considerable time first? Where is the strength to hold out a considerable time under such a disease? Do the young and vigorous often fall a prey to a fever, after a few days' or a few hours' struggle? And can the aged and infirm grapple with, and conquer, so powerful an invader.

"Shall I then endeavour to administer some divine consolations to a dear parent, in the near views of death and eternity? Blessed be God, that I have so much reason to believe, this would be an unnecessary task, as I have good ground to hope, that that God whom he has served with so much faithfulness and constancy in his life, will not withhold from him the comforts of his Spirit in his death; and that God, concerning whom he has so often said in the time of health and prosperity, Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee; will be the strength of his heart now when his flesh and his heart fail him, and will be his portion for ever. I doubt not, that vital active principle of love to God, and delight in him, which spread such a calm and serenity over his mind during life, will dart a cheerful ray to enlighten the dark valley of the shadow of death.

"Once more, shall I yet suppose him alive, and capable of reading or hearing my letter, though just on the brink of the grave, and almost panting out his last breath? And shall I write to take my last solemn farewell of him, till we meet in eternity? Oh how can I do that? It is a task too melancholy for me; my heart even melts at such a thought. No, though I have too much reason to believe, that if my dear father does live, to see or hear this, it will be the last that he will see or hear from me, yet I will not, cannot write it as the last. However, my uncertainty about him is so great, that I cannot prevail upon myself to address it immediately to him, too much afraid lest I should be writing to a pale corpse, instead of a living tender father.—In this dubious frame of mind, to thee, Oh my God, would I turn. I know, that thou livest, and wilt ever live: thou art the great arbiter of life and death; thou bringest down to the borders of the grave, and thou only canst say with a prevailing voice, Return. Let us join in saying, if there is yet room for prayer, do thou hear it on the behalf of thy servant: do not so lay our sins to our charge, as to take away our father and husband: oh spare him a little, that he may recover strength, &c. But if he is out of the reach of prayer, dispose us cheerfully to acquiesce in this afflictive dispensation of thy wise providence. Adored be thy name, that supposing this, we have so much reason to mingle our praises with our tears; and though we should lament the loss of a most tender, valuable, and important relative; yet we may rejoice to think, that we mourn not as those without hope for him, to whom to live was Christ, and consequently to die must be gain. Amen."

He then addresses his mother in a very tender strain, on a supposition that she might possibly be a mournful widow before this letter reached her: but as many of the considerations he there touches upon are more largely inserted in the consolatory address which next follows, I omit them, only here transcribing the following expressive lines:—

"Now is the time especially, to reflect upon God as your constant friend, and never-failing portion. Now is the time to recollect his many exceeding great and precious promises. Look back on former experiences, and draw encouragement from them: look forward, and view that divine principle of grace implanted in your souls, by which you are united to God, and to Christ, in the bonds of an everlasting covenant.

"This, my dear mother, may be a source of calm serenity, and even of joy and transport, in circumstances, which in other respects wear the most gloomy aspect. And if you are tempted to entertain any anxious thoughts about those difficulties, which may attend us in our passage through life, now the channel through which the greatest part of its supports and enjoyments flowed down to us is dried up, let us remember, that the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: and now the streams are cut off, let us rise to the fountain of all good."

This letter was dated the first of August, 1737, and his father died on the seventh; so that, according to the usual course of the post, it must, I suppose, come to hand while he was yet alive; and a pious and tender parent will judge perhaps better than any one can, what a noble consolation it must add to the last days and hours of his life, to hear such a letter from such a son. I question not but his generous mind would rejoice for others, as well as himself; not only thinking, what an ornament and support such a son might prove to the surviving branches of the family; but also, how useful his maturer age might be to the world, who was capable of administering such consolations to the afflicted, before he had yet gone through the studies of his youth.

A few days more brought our young friend the melancholy tidings, that his father was dead: which occasioned the following letter, dated the 15th of August, 1737; which I doubt not, has also proved a very great support to the worthy person to whom it was addressed, when mourning over the remains of this dear son by whom it was written; who seems therein to have been providentially led to lay in, if I may so speak, a cordial against his own approaching funeral. If the reader be affected with it, as I myself have been, there will be no need to make an apology for inserting it at large; and I am persuaded it must afford every believer of Christianity a secret triumph, to compare this epistle of a youth instructed in the gospel, with those of the most learned and celebrated philosophers of antiquity, and particularly of Seneca, Tully, and his correspondent friends, on melancholy occasions, which bore some resemblance to that on which this was written.

Aug. 15, 1737.

"My dear dear Mother.

"You may easily imagine with what sad surprise I received the last account from Wrentham. I have indeed been in an uneasy state of uncertainty ever since I left you: yet the letter which I had a few days ago, written with your hand, and which gave me an account of my father's small revival, gave me withal some comfortable hope of his recovery; so that the interval between that and the last letter, was spent in some greater degree of cheerfulness, than I was willing to allow myself before. But O how soon it was turned into sorrow! And I was lifted high in my hopes and expectations, only to be sunk the lower by that sad message which I received by the hand of my sister last Friday night. How did I tremble, when I saw the letter! How many melancholy fears did my foreboding heart suggest, even before I opened it! But when it was opened, oh, what did I see! Words that could not but cut me to the very heart. Our dear dear father is dead. Tears prevented me from reading any further; and the repetition of the cutting sentence calls up my tears afresh: you must give me leave then to weep awhile, and I will endeavour to proceed.—

"It will be painting too melancholy a scene, to tell you what a variety of gloomy thoughts passed through my mind on this occasion. No, I will not renew or increase your sorrow, by aggravating the loss we have sustained, in the death of such a husband and father. But I would fain turn my thoughts to the brighter side, and by divine assistance endeavour to suggest such things as may be of use to reconcile us to this very heavy stroke of Providence, and to form us to such a suitable disposition of mind, as that if any one should ask us, Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with thy father? Is it well with thee? We may even with a smile reply, It is well.

"I omitted writing the last post, that I might have time to settle and compose my own mind, and consequently be the more capable of administering consolation to you, and others, who are intimately concerned in my dear father's death. Had I wrote immediately after the reception of my sister's letter, while my mind was almost overwhelmed with sorrow, you might indeed have seen a sheet of paper filled with the most passionate expressions of tenderness and grief; but perhaps they would only have served to open your wounds afresh; whereas my design in what I now write, is, if possible, to pour in balm to heal them.

"Blessed be God, the storm that was first raised in my mind, has been by him commanded into a calm; and the consolations of God have not been few nor small to me on this occasion. And I am not without good hope, that if you are not yet brought to a settled composed state of mind, those considerations which religion suggests, and which have been the happy means of reviving my spirits, and introducing some considerable measure of tranquillity into my mind, may answer the same end, and have the same effect, upon you.

"The dear dear man has taken his final leave of us, with regard to this world; and we cannot but mourn his departure. The desire of our eyes is taken from us; and it would argue a stupid, insensible, savage temper, not to drop a tear, or feel any tender concern under so sad a stroke. The wise Author of our nature did not place these melting emotions of soul for no other purpose but to be rooted out as weeds; and the noblest examples of faith and holiness, courage and magnanimity, which are recorded in the Old and New Testament, are represented as dropping a tear upon such an occasion. Even the spotless Jesus wept over Lazarus. But the greatest danger is, lest we abandon ourselves to immoderate sorrow, so to mourn as to refuse to be comforted. We are not, with Jacob, to resolve to go down to the grave mourning, because we are deprived of this or that comfort of life. That you, my dear, and now only, parent, may not sink under the weight of sorrow, let me lead your thoughts to the following reviving considerations.

"Let us consider, for our comfort, how long our dear relative was continued to us. It is not the withering of a gourd, which sprung up in a night, and perished in a night, whose friendly shade failed us when we had most need of it, that we now mourn. No, we lament the fall of a full-grown tree, under whose wide-spreading shadow we have long rejoiced. Now, in order to make this affliction sit the lighter, let us compare it with what it would have been had he been taken from us at a time when we his children had all been young, and unable ourselves to make our way through the world; which we now all have a pretty fair prospect of doing with comfort, by the blessing of God, and the kindness of surviving friends. Is it not some alleviation to our sorrow, to think he lived to bring up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord? and may I not add, to see the good effects of a religious education upon most of them?

"However, it must be confessed that the loss is great to us all. But then, let us not confine our thoughts so much to this mournful part of the subject, as to forget how great a gainer the dear departed spirit is by this separation from us. Let us lift up the eye of our faith to the invisible world, and take such a view of the happiness and glory of those who die in the Lord, as our imperfect state will allow; and then let us say whether there is any room to grieve and mourn on his behalf. Surely, when we consider his present advantageous situation, from what he is delivered, and what he now enjoys, we could not wish him back again without the greatest breach of friendship. Indeed, as others have well observed on the like occasion, we form a very wrong judgment of the condition of our departed friends, when, because we see their breathless corpses laid in the ground, to become food for worms, we are overwhelmed with grief, and bitterly mourn over them. This is owing to our ignorance of their state: as Jacob mourned over the rent garment of his son Joseph, and concluded he was devoured by some evil beast, when indeed he was going to reign in Egypt. Our dear relative is gone to reign in heaven; and would we cling so fondly about him, as to pull him from his throne? He is gone to possess a part of the land of Canaan above; and can we wish him back, to struggle again with the difficulties of the wilderness? Can we call ourselves his friends, and not rather rejoice in his happiness?

"This consideration, taken in conjunction with that which is drawn from his being removed from us by the hand of an all-wise and sovereign God, should be allowed to have a due influence upon us, to bring us cordially to acquiesce in this dispensation of Providence. So that I may say to you and myself, as the great Mr. Howe did to one in the like circumstances, If God be pleased, and his glorified creature pleased, who are we, that we should be displeased? O my dear mother, I have had such lively views of the happiness of the dear deceased, that if I have felt any sentiment of grief at that particular instant, it was because I was not in the like circumstances.

"Another consideration which has been a means of quieting and composing my mind upon this occasion, and which I would recommend to you, is this, that though our dear relative is taken from us, yet our best Friend is still continued to us. Let us remember, that though our house be not so with God, as we could wish it to be, yet he has made with us an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure. Therefore let us encourage ourselves in the Lord our God; and when creature comforts are like broken reeds, and broken cisterns, let us fix our dependence more and more on the Rock of ages, and have more affectionate recourse to the overflowing Fountain of living waters. Let us reflect a little on what it was that rendered our departed relative so amiable and desirable to us; and then let us further consider, Was not God the author of all? And cannot he make up our loss abundantly? I am persuaded I need not tell one who has enjoyed so much communion with God as you, Madam, have done that we may hope and expect infinitely more from him as our covenant God, than from the most wise, tender, and powerful friend upon earth. Let this stroke of Providence then engage us to walk closer with our God, to centre in him as our portion and happiness, and to derive all our expectations from him.

"My dear mother, if the communicating to you my experience on this melancholy occasion may be of any service to you, I will take the freedom here to assure you, that if ever I could call God my Father, with any considerable degree of filial joy and confidence, it has been since I have had no other, to whom I could apply that endearing title. —On this God and Father then let us cast all our cares and burdens; cheerfully confiding in him, who has furnished us with the most powerful antidote against immoderate grief and anxiety in such circumstances as ours, by declaring himself *a Father of the fatherless, and Judge of the widow, in his holy habitation.

"But I must by no means omit another thought, so full of consolation, upon this occasion; that in a little time we shall be restored to this dear husband and father again, and meet and converse with him, on terms of much greater advantage. Though the separation be grievous, yet it is but short. Our days and years are rolling away apace; and every year and day brings us nearer to our home; and so brings us nearer to the house of our heavenly Father, and to the mansions of glory, one of which is inhabited by that happy spirit, to which we so lately claimed a near relation.

"Surely, my dear mother, when we consider where he is, and where we are, we may abundantly satisfy ourselves with this consideration, so much more forcible in such a case, than in that to which it was applied, We shall go to him, though he shall not return to us."

I believe the reader will easily apprehend, that a person capable of writing in this manner upon such an occasion, was well qualified to compose for the pulpit; and though his tutor did not see this letter, he had a very agreeable proof of it much about this time, (I think, the October, or November, following,) when Mr. Steffe bore a part in the course of homilies, (as they were called, to distinguish them from sermons,) delivered in the lecture room, upon the being and attributes of God, and the chief points of natural religion. The subject allotted to him was, the imitation of God's moral perfections: and I cannot recollect that I ever heard a better academical discourse from any of the young students with whom I have been acquainted. It was finished with an accuracy, both of thought, and language, which would have engaged me to have added it to this collection of his remains, if I had found it amongst his papers. But as I did not, I only mention it to show the reason upon which they acted, who out of regard to the necessity of several neighbouring congregations then destitute, advised him to offer himself to the examination of a committee of ministers deputed for that purpose, in order to his preaching in public. He passed that examination highly to their satisfaction, as they declared by a proper testimonial. And my illness engaged him to preach his first sermon at Northampton, on the first of January, 1737-8.

The subject of it was those words, Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?† As I have inserted it the first in this collection, which is now in the reader's hand, I need say nothing more to prove, that the general acceptance it met with was very well grounded; and all I shall add concerning it, is, that I find in a blank page of the notes the following memorandum, dated April 16, 1738: "I have heard that this sermon was made peculiarly useful to several persons at Northampton, the first time of its being preached, and the first time of my preaching at all. Bless the Lord, O my soul, for the honour he has done to thy poor worthless attempts of service in this instance! O may it be a happy specimen of far more abundant success to attend my future labours in the ministry!"

It was before the end of January this year, that the Reverend Mr. Stodden, of Taunton, and the heads of the congregation under his care, wanting an assistant, thought proper to apply to Mr. Steffe's tutor, who, knowing the importance of that place, judged it convenient to send him thither as a candidate. His labours were universally acceptable to that numerous society; insomuch, that after having spent two or three sabbaths among them, he received an unanimous and pressing invitation to settle there; which invitation, by the advice of all his friends, he accepted, only reserving to himself the liberty of continuing where he was till his academical studies were completed, which they were by Midsummer, 1738.

The last day in which he appeared in the congregation to which he had so long stood related, was the 4th of June, 1738, when he preached that excellent sermon with which this little collection concludes; a day which I cannot forbear mentioning on two accounts: the one is, that it was the last in which I ever enjoyed the pleasure of his labours and conversation, though he lived till that day two years: the other, that I find it was made, by the divine goodness, remarkably comfortable and refreshing to him. "This morning," says he, in a letter from which I must borrow a few lines, "I took my leave of the pulpit here; and have this afternoon been at the table of the Lord, reviewing with a grateful surprise the various instances of the divine goodness to me; especially in fixing me in this place, and making my abode here so comfortable and advantageous. I have now been renewing my covenant-engagements to my Father and my

* Psal. lxviii. 5.

† 2 Sam. vii. 18.

God; and in this respect I would not alter the thing that is gone out of my lips, or which has been expressed in the secret language of my heart. I would not be excused from loving the great Author of all my mercies; I would not be discharged from his service, if I might. I would not wish for any thing to lessen my obligations to my dear Redeemer, but for every thing to increase my sense of them." And then he goes on to express his tender sympathy to his mother, then under confinement by illness, and his longing desire, if it were the will of God, to share the entertainment of God's house and table with her, and to dwell with her again, though in the lowest circumstances: in which I believe he alluded to a scheme which he had, of bringing her to Taunton, which, had God spared his life, might have perhaps succeeded.

What pleasure she had in an interview with him, and in attending his ministry in that visit which he quickly after made her at Wrentham, may be more easily imagined than described. From thence he went to Taunton, and was very joyfully received by his worthy friend, the Rev. Mr. Stodden, and the whole congregation under his care. How he acted in this more public scene of life, I have not an opportunity particularly to say: but am in the general fully satisfied, that he behaved in such a manner, as there was reason, from what we have already seen of him, to hope and expect, and as entitled him to the affection and esteem of his valuable pastor, of the society to whom he preached, and also of many neighbouring congregations, among whom he soon came to have an influence, far beyond what could have been imagined, considering his years.

I think I have before me all the sermons he composed during the two years he continued in this situation, which was all the remainder of his valuable life; and they are so fairly written, and, so far as I can judge, so carefully finished, that I cannot but suppose they had all, except the last, which was made when his illness began, been written out twice. They are every one of them, so far as I can recollect, upon practical and important subjects; and, if I may judge from what I have seen, they are such, both for method, thought, and language, that I should have found no difficulty in furnishing out several volumes of discourses equal to most of these which are here published. I cannot find any one of them, in the review of which a wise and good man might not have had reason to rejoice on the borders of eternity; for all are calculated to promote a reverence for God, and love to him; to convince men of their sin and misery by their apostasy; to point out the only method of their recovery, by faith in the righteousness and grace of the blessed Redeemer, and a sincere devotedness of soul to God through him; to awaken careless sinners, to reanimate slumbering Christians, to encourage the weak and timorous: and, in a word, so far as was possible, in every discourse, to give to every one his portion of meat in due season. Nothing of that solemn pomp of profound reasoning, with which the dullest and emptiest discourses often abound; none of those affected and puerile ornaments which make preaching the play of the imagination, and turn the church into a theatre; nothing arrogant, nothing petulant, nothing censorious; nothing intended to kindle the unhallowed flames of party zeal, and lead men either to judge or despise their brethren: but all serious, spiritual, and candid; and, on the whole, such as became a preacher who considered that his sermons were written in the book of God's remembrance, and that he must shortly render an account to him in whose name and presence he had the honour to speak.

As he was well convinced that religious visits made a considerable part of the care of souls, he did not imagine that his being only an assistant preacher could excuse him from it. He was willing to assist his honoured pastor in this, as well as public work; and as the congregation was so numerous, that he perceived he should be a long time going through it, he had his appointed times for visiting some of the poorer families, in which they used to call in their neighbours to share the happy opportunity; and as pious instruction was the great end of these visits, they seldom or never concluded without prayer; a labour of love, in which he was greatly animated by the writings and example of the great and excellent Mr. Joseph Allen, his predecessor; to whose Alarm to the Unconverted, our author by the way acknowledges, he was under God indebted for some of the first serious impressions that were made on his mind.

In the mean time, his care of those with whom he was, did not lead him to forget his absent friends, especially the dear family at Wrentham, and that of his tutor. To the latter he wrote several letters, expressing the most lively and affectionate acknowledgment of the care which had been taken of him, though, to be sure, no more than the duty of such an important trust had required. To his friends at home he always expressed the kindest regard, in a variety of instances which I must not here enumerate; nor must I even insert that important letter which he wrote to one of his brethren, who was removed by death the winter after he came to Taunton. I must content myself with saying, that he showed not only a pious care, but an admirable skill and dexterity, in the manner of that address; omitting nothing that might tend, on the one hand, to awaken his mind, and to secure him from all presumptuous and mistaken hopes; and, on the other, to encourage him to lay hold on the grace of the gospel in a manner that might be effectual to his eternal salvation. It is merely from the fear of extending these memoirs too far beyond their proper bounds, which I fear they have already transgressed, that I refrain from inserting this letter at large. But I must with great pleasure add, that his pious care was so successful, that his brother died in such a truly Christian manner, as to leave in the mind of his surviving relatives a most cheerful hope that God had shown him the path of life.

He carried on a very affectionate correspondence with several of his fellow-students; in which he expressed the sincerest desire to maintain upon their minds a lively sense of religion, and an active zeal in the service of God. And in such offices of piety and friendship of various kinds he continued till the close of his life.

I remember, about the beginning of May, 1740, he wrote me the last letter I ever received from him, indeed not quite a month before he died; in which he expressed himself to the following purpose: "The small-pox prevails much in Taunton, and carries off considerable numbers. My friends express a very tender obliging solicitude on my account; and I endeavour to take all prudent precautions to avoid danger. But I bless God I find my spirits entirely calm and composed as to the event: I cheerfully commit myself to the all-wise and gracious disposal of my heavenly Father; and hope I have no uncertainty before me, but whether I shall be serving Christ in this world or in a better."

Thus prepared that illness found him, which ended in his death. On the first symptoms of it, he composed a very serious discourse on those words: He feedeth on ashes; a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand? * concerning the deceits which sinners practise on themselves, and those lies which they carry in their right hands, to support a foolish and dangerous hope. This was the last sermon he ever preached; and had he finished the whole of his plan, the reader would not have failed of the pleasure of perusing it. In the mean time I heartily pray, an impression of its important design may remain on the hearts of all that heard it, and of all for whose benefit it was designed.

When he fell ill, it evidently appeared how much he was valued by persons of all denominations, in that continued solicitude which all that knew him expressed for his recovery; as well as afterwards, in the universal lamentation occasioned by his death. He himself, though the symptoms soon appeared dangerous, maintained the same composure of mind, that he had expressed in the more distant prospect, through all the stages of his distemper; in which the exercise of his reason was continued, though he did not die till the 22nd day after he was seized. He gave very particular directions for the disposal of his affairs a fortnight before his death; and was frequently, throughout the whole time of his illness, employed in earnest prayer as he lay in his bed, even beyond the strength of his nature. And as he was accustomed to use his voice, he was heard (by one of the family from whom I had this account) to express himself thus: "O Lord, preserve me in the use of my rational powers and faculties, that I may not only perform those things which are necessary to the health of my body, but may also be capable of conversing with thee, and of stretching my thoughts towards the heavenly world;" and then, after a solemn pause, added—"where perhaps I may quickly be! I had rather, if it might be for thy glory, continue longer in this world for the good of thy church; but if thou hast determined this sickness shall end in death, thy will be done!" or words to that effect.

Some physician, it seems, had unhappily told him, while he was very young, that if ever he had the small-pox he would die. On the other hand, his friends did all they could to keep up his spirits, by expressing their hope of his recovery. He acknowledged their affection in it, and interpreted it as an instance of their respect; but intimated his own apprehensions as to the issue, that it would be as it proved. He, on his part, expressed his tender regard for them, by pouring out earnest prayers to God, on their account, as well as on his own; intermingling his prayers with his praises. And when he was desired not to spend himself so much, he answered, "As long as I have tongue, I will use it for my Redeemer's praise and service."

These are the most remarkable circumstances of his illness, which have been transmitted to me from a pious friend, in whose house he lived. He calmly resigned up his soul to God, on Wednesday, June 4, 1740, having lately entered on the 25th year of his age. Not only the mourning habits, but the tears, of vast numbers in that numerous congregation, in which his lot was cast, testified their sorrow for his death; and we in these parts, as well as his friends in Suffolk, had a share, a large share, in it. I am sure, no wise and pious reader will need to be told at large, that not only Taunton, but the wide neighbourhood around, had a loss in the removal of a person of such a character and abilities, and that it was a stroke long and deeply to be lamented.

I cannot conclude without acknowledging the divine goodness to my friends amongst whom he laboured, not only in still sparing their valuable pastor, but likewise in sending them from the same place another worthy and excellent assistant, the Rev. Mr. Benjamin Fawcett, if I am capable of judging, not on the whole inferior to Mr. Steffe. I should have esteemed his great neighbourhood as important blessing to these parts, and to me: but a sense of the importance of the interest at Taunton, and a compassion to my afflicted friends under that grievous loss they had sustained, inclined me to concur with all their measures for fixing him among them. May God multiply the years of his usefulness there, and make him an instrument of everlasting good to multitudes that are yet unborn.

* Isa. xliv. 20.

Having said thus much of the author, it may be expected I should say something concerning these sermons; but I shall give no additional recommendation of them at all. My love to the person that wrote them may lead me to judge more favourably than they deserve; but the reader may be assured I had a good opinion of them, when I proposed the publication: a project, not contrived merely with a view of serving his sorrowful mother, though if any advantage be made by them, it will be shared, as it ought, between her and the printer, who runs the hazard of the edition; but designed to prolong the usefulness of this dear and lamented youth beyond the narrow limits of his life. I did indeed think, that, considering his age, and considering also that they were composed in no view of publication, they would do some honour to his memory, and would meet with encouragement in various places where he was not personally known. But I especially depended on it, that those at Taunton, and in the neighbouring parts, who knew and loved him so well, as I am sure many hundreds there did, would read them with peculiar pleasure and improvement: and the happy disposition prevailing in the young persons of that congregation to which he belonged, to associate themselves together for religious purposes, in hours when these sermons will give them a delightful employment, has further encouraged this hope.

As to the particular reasons which determined me to choose these discourses, and to omit others which some of his friends desired to see, it is not material to enter into them. I had not time to read all, and therefore took generally those, of which there was not a large number upon a single text, and those which had been most blessed to the good of souls; some of which I had heard myself, and had peculiarly struck my mind.

What I have done in reviewing them, was but little. I have here and there added a clause, and, very seldom, a sentence or two by way of illustration. I have also corrected the style a little in some places: sometimes I have contracted a period, which seemed rather too diffuse, and in one place abridged two sermons into one. But I have made no essential or very material alterations at all, either by way of omission or addition: and the greatest liberty I have taken with any, is used with respect to the last. That sermon I myself heard, and it impressed me exceedingly. I afterwards found, that it was the first plan of some discourses, branched out into a considerable number at Taunton. I could not publish them all; and I was so well pleased with what I had heard, that I could not persuade myself to omit it. I was therefore obliged to have recourse to those notes, which I had taken while he was preaching, which were generally short hints of sentences, only setting down a few particular expressions, the beauty and energy of which struck me with some peculiar pleasure. The consequence is, that here, though the whole scheme and almost all the thoughts are Mr. Steffe's, the language is often my own. I could much rather have given it to the world in the very words of the author; but as that was impossible, and as on account of throwing two of those transcribed from his notes into one, we wanted another sermon to make up the number proposed, I verily thought, I could not do better than to present it to the world as it is; at least without employing too much time in reviewing and comparing those few single sermons, which might have been considered as proper upon this occasion: and the great pleasure with which my friends had attended upon this sermon, and recollect in general the remembrance of it, engaged me to oblige them with this opportunity of reviewing it, for which I am sure of their thanks.

Nothing further remains, but to commit these discourses to the attentive perusal of all into whose hands Providence may bring them, especially of those to whom the author was dear by any peculiar bonds, and to the blessing of that God, with regard to whose honour, I am well satisfied, they were first composed, and are now published.

P. DODDRIDGE.

A

COURSE OF LECTURES

ON THE PRINCIPAL SUBJECTS IN

PNEUMATOLOGY, ETHICS, AND DIVINITY;

WITH

REFERENCES TO THE MOST CONSIDERABLE AUTHORS ON EACH SUBJECT

TO WHICH ARE NOW ADDED,

A GREAT NUMBER OF REFERENCES,

AND

NOTES OF REFERENCE TO THE WRITERS ON THE SAME TOPICS, WHO HAVE APPEARED SINCE THE DOCTOR'S DEATH

BY ANDREW KIPPIS, D.D. F.R.S. S.A.

ADVERTISEMENT

BY THE FIRST EDITOR.

THIS work was originally drawn up for the use of the students under the Author's care; but it appears by a clause in his will, that it was his intention it should be published after his decease; and though it would, no doubt, have appeared to much greater advantage, if the Author had prepared it himself for the press, yet it is hoped that it will not be thought, even in its present form, unworthy of the public view.

The transcript from which it was printed, I have carefully compared with the original short-hand copy; and the public may be assured that the Author's sentiments have been every where scrupulously preserved,—no other alterations having been made than such as are necessary in all posthumous works that have not had the Author's last hand. A few references have been added, particularly to some books published since the Author's death, and others omitted, that seemed less important.

If the reader should think the references under the same head are sometimes too much alike, he will please to consider, that though the sentiments in each may be nearly the same, yet the different manner of expression will often serve more fully to explain and illustrate the subject: besides, that one author may be at hand when the other is not.

In order to assist the reader in consulting particular passages referred to, the reference is always made to the chapter and section, where that could be done; and as in many cases it could only be made to the page, an account is added at the end of the editions to which such references are made (where the books could be procured) with the number of pages in the volume, which, by the rule of proportion, may be some direction to find the passage in any other edition.

As to the work itself, it may be proper to acquaint the public that the mathematical form into which it is thrown, was taken from a work of the same kind, in manuscript, drawn up in Latin, by the Author's Tutor, the Rev. Mr. JOHN JENNINGS, of Hinckley; from whom he has borrowed some of the propositions and demonstrations, especially in the former part; but he has so much enlarged and improved upon the original plan, that the whole may properly be considered as a new work.

As my regard to the Author's memory, and my apprehension of the usefulness of the work itself, led me to comply with the request of the Author's Widow, to inspect the publication of these Lectures, I thought it necessary to give this general account of what has been done in relation to them, for the satisfaction of the public; and heartily wish they may subserve the cause of learning, religion, and moderation.

S. CLARK.

Birmingham,
31*st January*, 1763.

PREFACE

TO THE THIRD EDITION

In the Life of Dr. Doddridge, prefixed to the seventh edition of his Family Expositor, it is observed, That in a future impression of the Author's Course of Lectures, it would be extremely useful to enlarge the list of references, by introducing the names and productions of those writers who have treated upon the several matters in question, since the Doctor's decease. It is added, That to a person conversant in the History of Controversies, this would be no very difficult task; and that it might, in particular, easily be executed by any gentleman who, as a tutor, has made use of the Lectures as a text-book, and who, consequently, has been in the habit of referring to succeeding authors.

Though I do not completely answer to the whole of this description, (having only been occasionally a reader on a few detached parts of Dr. Doddridge's Lectures,) I was, nevertheless, readily induced to undertake the business suggested, from a consciousness of the utility of the design, and from the hope that I had so far attended to the progress of literature as to be in some degree qualified for the employment. At the same time, I entertained no doubt of my being able to obtain assistance from the manuscript references of such tutors as had regularly gone through the Doctor's Course. In this respect I have happily succeeded. The Reverend Benjamin Edwards, of Northampton, has favoured me with the use of his copy of Dr. Savage's Notes, whence I have been supplied with a considerable number of references, several of which might have escaped my own recollection. It is still a superior aid which I have derived from the communication of the references of my late excellent friend, the Reverend Samuel Merivale, for some time theological tutor in a protestant dissenting academy at Exeter. For this communication I am indebted to the Rev. James Manning, of the same city, Mr. Merivale's relation. Mr. Manning, with that zeal for promoting every valuable undertaking which marks his character, and with that friendship which I have experienced in many pleasing instances, voluntarily undertook to transcribe the references in question, together with some other papers that might be conducive to my purpose. By such assistance, united with a due measure of diligence on my own part, the Lectures, in point of references, will be found to be very greatly augmented. This will be particularly apparent to any one who shall take the trouble of comparing the catalogue of authors inserted at the end of the present work, with that which is given in the former editions.

Besides the new references which pervade the whole body of the text, I have added, at the bottom of the page, many notes of reference, the intention of which is not only to assist theological and other pupils during their academical course, but to point out such sources of information as may be serviceable to them in their future inquiries. It is not to be expected that, in their state of pupilage, they should be able to pay a due attention to one half of the books here specified; while, at the same time, it may be of great importance to know where hereafter to apply for fresh stores of knowledge and improvement.

There is one thing which I wish particularly to be remembered, and that is, that it is no part of my design to give general illustrations of the subjects treated upon,—or either to confirm or gainsay the opinions of Dr. Doddridge. This would have been the creation of a new work. It is the business of individual tutors to enlarge upon the Lectures in that way which accords with their own sentiments. My sole aim is to mention, with freedom and impartiality, the writers on all sides of the different questions which are the objects of discussion, that hereby the mind of the student may be duly enlarged, and that he may be able with the greater advantage to prosecute his searches after truth.

It is necessary to mention, that not having received Mr. Merivale's references till the work had been printed so far as to the sixty-seventh proposition, I have inserted in an Appendix those which preceded that proposition. A second Appendix contains a list of some productions which either did not occur to my remembrance at the proper time, or have been published since the Lectures were committed to the press.

I must acknowledge a great error into which I have fallen in the note subjoined to the 295th page of the first volume. In that note I have ascribed to Dr. Wm. Wagstaffe a Treatise on the Future Existence and Immortality of the Animal Creation. The book in question was written by a Dr. Hildrop. The reader will forgive the temporary failure of recollection with regard to a performance which was perused between forty and fifty years ago, and has not since been seen. Dr. Hildrop's work was, I believe, entitled Free Thoughts on the Brute Creation.

ANDR. KIPPIS.

Westminster,
5th August, 1794.

INTRODUCTION.*

It may not be improper, in the entrance of this Work, to give some general account of the plan of it, and some directions for studying it in the most useful manner.

The Work itself contains an abstract of the most important and useful thoughts I have anywhere met with, on the chief subjects which can be supposed to come under consideration, in the review of Pneumatology, Ethics, and Divinity: and as these sciences do insensibly run into each other, I judged it not proper to treat of each separately, and so to divide the whole into three distinct parts, the first Pneumatological, the second Ethical, and the third Theological; but have chosen to consider them in such a connected view, as might convey to the mind, with the greatest ease and advantage, the principal truths relating to each. The whole Work is divided, therefore, into ten Parts, and contains in all 230 Lectures. The first Part (Lect. 1—22) considers the powers and faculties of the human mind. The second (Lect. 23—51) the being of a GOD, and his natural perfections. The third (Lect. 52—90) treats of the nature of moral virtue in general, and of the moral attributes of the Deity; of the several branches of virtue, and the nature of civil government. The fourth (Lect. 91—100) of the immortality and immateriality of the human soul, with its original; as also our general obligation to virtue, and the state of it in the world. The fifth (Lect. 101—110) considers the reason to desire and expect a revelation, and the external and internal evidence with which we may suppose it should be attended. The sixth (Lect. 111—153) asserts and vindicates the genuineness, credibility, and inspiration of the Old and New Testament. The seventh (Lect. 154—163) contains an account of the Scripture doctrine relating to the existence and nature of GOD, and the divinity of the SON and SPIRIT. The eighth (Lect. 164—187) treats of the fall of human nature, and our recovery by the mediatorial undertaking of our Lord Jesus Christ, with the nature of faith in him, and of the covenant of grace established through him. So that the doctrine of Christ's atonement, and the Spirit's influences, are also comprehended in this Part. The ninth (Lect. 188—209) is a survey of the chief duties which the gospel requires, and more particularly of the positive institutions; in which the doctrine of the Christian sabbath, the sacraments, and the constitution of the church are considered. The tenth and last Part (Lect. 210—230) contains the Scripture doctrine of angels, and of the future state, including the resurrection, and the most remarkable events to precede or attend it.

These are the great subjects of the Work,—and I believe the very mention of them is sufficient to show how important a part of an academical course it must make, and how much it must be the concern of every prudent and judicious student to give it a large share of his application.

For the more profitable studying this Course of Lectures, it will be advisable that, as soon as possible, after the Lecture has been given, it be carefully reviewed, and the chief references read and contracted; but in contracting them, it will be unnecessary to transcribe those passages, the substance of which is already inserted in the Lecture: it will be sufficient to take some general hints of their contents, and to transcribe only those parts which are very peculiar and observable; and here some distinction is to be made between those books, which may very probably be always at hand in reviewing the Lectures, and those which may not so probably be within your reach.

A diligent attendance on the course will, I hope, be both a pleasure and improvement; yet, I would advise every pupil (if he can) to go over it twice; for, though the subjects themselves, at the second review, will want the advantage of novelty, yet more thoughts will often arise in lecturing, and the whole will be made more familiar to the mind; besides, that the student will, by this means, have an opportunity of reading and studying some things, which accidental causes might have obliged him before to pass over without due attention, and, for this purpose, it may be very convenient to keep a catalogue of those Lectures, which by absence, illness, or any other accidental circumstance, were not studied so carefully as might be wished, as likewise of those things which did not, in the course of lecturing, appear solved and explained in a satisfactory manner; and if any difficulties arise which seem peculiar, let them be drawn out in writing, to be lodged in the tutor's hands, or made the subject of a thesis, to be canvassed at large. In the mean time, full liberty will be given to make any objection or inquiry, from time to time, which will be examined in the hours of lecture, so far as the limits of time and other employments will allow.

* This Introduction is to be considered as the Author's Address to his own Pupils, when they entered upon this Course of Lectures; which will show the propriety of some of the directions which might otherwise appear too particular and minute.

Yet let it be remembered, that the student is supposed to be already acquainted with many things here brought into question. It would be a most fatal mistake, to act as if nothing were known of God and Christ, till the chief doctrines relating to both come to be examined in this course. Many small treatises, which may be read in a few hours, contain evidence enough, both of the being of a God and the truth of the Christian religion, to satisfy an upright mind. though it may be convenient that those who are to be the teachers and guardians of these truths, or those who may be exposed to peculiar temptations to doubt or disbelieve them, should be acquainted with their evidence in a larger extent. Let the great vital truths of Christianity taught in Scripture be constantly regarded. As to matters of controversy, let them be referred to their proper place, without any eagerness to anticipate them, which often produces great bigotry and error, as well as a neglect of what is proposed to immediate inquiry; and may it never be forgotten that matters of abstruse speculation and laborious inquiry, are not, even to theological students, the one thing needful, though they may be important in subordination to it.

I would remind you, dear Sir, (whoever you are that are going over these Lectures,) that you may enter into eternity long before you can have attended, or even transcribed them; and therefore, I would beseech and charge you, by all your hopes and prospects there, that it be your daily and governing care, after having solemnly devoted your soul to God through Christ in the bonds of the Christian covenant, to live like his servant, to keep yourself in the love of God, and to endeavour in all things to adorn his gospel. So will you be most likely to succeed in your inquiries, through the communication of light from the great Father of lights; and so will you be prepared for the infinitely nobler discoveries, enjoyments, and services, of the future state, even though you should be deprived of the residue of your days here, and cut short (as many of your brethren have been) in the intended studies and labours of this course.

LECTURES.

PART I.

OF THE POWERS AND FACULTIES OF THE HUMAN MIND.

LECTURE I.

AXIOM I.

EXISTENCE is a simple idea, which we get both by consciousness and observation.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. vii. § 7; lib. iv. c. ix. § 3. Burnet at Boyle's Lect. vol. i. p. 2, 3. Grove's Posth. Works, vol. iv. p. 2, 4.

DEFINITION I.

Whatever our thoughts are immediately employed about, whether as simply perceiving it, or as asserting or denying any thing concerning it, is called AN IDEA.

SCHOLIUM.

The definition more frequently given is, that an idea is the representation of a thing in the mind, which the mind immediately perceives; and the thing itself supposed to exist without our thoughts, is called The Archetype of the idea: but we do not yet choose to assert or deny any thing concerning the external existence of such supposed archetypes, and for this reason have not thought it so proper to use this definition.

DEFINITION II.

Whatever exists is called A BEING.

SCHOLIUM.

We do not here enter largely into the distinction which the metaphysicians make between ens reale, which exists without any dependence upon our thoughts, and ens rationis, which owes its existence to its being the object of them, nor into the question between the Realists and Nominalists; but by Being, in the process of this discourse, we mean ens reale.*

Watts's Ontol. c. xvi. Watts's Logic. c. p. 27, 28.

* The knowledge of these distinctions, and of the disputes occasioned on account of them, by the schoolmen, may be either sought for in Enfield's History of Philosophy, and in other works. Those who have found this kind of reading unprofitable, or at Boyle's Lectures.

DEFINITION III.

Whatever is contained in the adequate idea of any being, is called its PROPERTIES.

COROLLARY 1.

A being is the same, with all its properties taken together; and, therefore,

COROLLARY 2.

We can have no conception of any substance distinct from all the properties of the being in which they inhere; for this would imply that the being itself inheres; and so on to infinity.

Jennings's Log. Def. 15. Locke's Ess. lib. c. iv. § 18; ib. lib. ii. c. xiii. § 19, 20; ib. c. xxiii. § 2, 3, 6. Watts's Philos. Ess. p. 1.

DEFINITION IV.

BODY is an extended solid being.

Gravesand's Phys. l. ii. c. iii. § 9, 12, 18. Le Clerc's Phys. lib. v. c. iii. § 1—3. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. iv.

AXIOM II.

THOUGHT is a simple idea, which we get by reflecting on what passes in our own minds.

Cudworth's Intell. System, p. 277, 278. Crousaz's Logic, vol. i. p. 10.

DEFINITION V.

SPIRIT is a thinking being, or a being which has the power of thought.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxiii. § 15.

COROLLARY 1.

We have as clear an idea of spirit as we have of body,—the essential properties of each being equally known, and the inward constitution equally unknown.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxiii. § 15. Pearce's Unders tand. p. 74—78.

COROLLARY 2.

We are at least as certain of the existence of spirit as of body. The former we know by consciousness, which is always infallible; the other by the senses, which may be mistaken.

Descartes Princ. part i. § 7 et 11. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxiii. § 31.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The Cartesians thought that these primary and essential properties of body and spirit, mentioned in Def. 4 and 5, were the respective substances whence all their other properties flow; and Dr. Watts maintains the same opinion; urging, that they agree with the received definition of substance, as they support the accidents of figure, size, colour, &c. in bodies; and doubting, fearing, willing, &c. in spirit: and both subsist independently on human power. He further pleads, that we have no idea of the support of these properties; and that if these be destroyed, nothing will remain.

Descartes Princ. part. i. § 53. Watts's Ess. ii. present. § 2, 3.

SCHOLIUM 2.

A power of communicating motion by impulse is improperly mentioned by Mr. Locke among the essential properties of body; and that of moving a body by volition among those of spirit.

DEFINITION VI.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY is that branch of learning which relates to body; giving an account of its various phenomena, and the principles on which the solution of them depends.

DEFINITION VII.

PNEUMATOLOGY is the doctrine of spirits, or that branch of science which relates to them.

DEFINITION VIII.

ETHICS is that branch of learning by which our faculties are directed to that manner of acting by which we may obtain the highest happiness, i. e. the supreme enjoyment of which our natures are capable.

LECTURE II.

DEFINITION IX.

The HUMAN MIND is that in or of a man which thinks. Watts's Ess. ii. p. 59.

COROLLARY.

The human mind is a spirit. Comp. Def. 5.

SCHOLIUM.

Descartes, in his definition, calls it "A thinking, incorporeal, inextended substance, which shall survive the body to which it is united, and with which it was immediately created by God, in order to form a perfect man." It is evident that on this definition it will be matter of much controversy whether man has a mind or not; yet he defines it somewhat otherwise in his Principles.

Descartes Princ. part. i. § 8.

AXIOM III.

It is evident that men have not one COMMON CONSCIOUSNESS.

COROLLARY.

Every one has a mind peculiar to himself.

More's Immort. of the Soul, lib. iii. c. xxi. p. 212—216. Ditton on the Resurrect. p. 467—471.

AXIOM IV.

VOLITION is a simple idea, which we get by reflection.

DEFINITION X.

ACTION signifies volition, with the effect which we will.

COROLLARY 1.

Nothing can act but spontaneously.

COROLLARY 2.

Nothing but a thinking being can act; for spontaneity implies an idea of the action to be performed.

SCHOLIUM.

Action is commonly, though in a less proper sense, applied to irrational, and even inanimate, beings, when the body immediately employed in producing a new effect, is said to act upon that in which it is produced; as the sun-beams upon the earth, the fire upon fuel. Watts's Ontology, p. 342.

DEFINITION XI.

As that being which acts is called THE AGENT, so that which is acted upon is called THE PATIENT, whether sensible or insensible, or whether the action produced be a pleasing or displeasing effect.

DEFINITION XII.

Pleasure and Pain are simple ideas. That which tends to produce the former, is called NATURAL GOOD; and that which tends to produce the latter, NATURAL EVIL.

COROLLARY.

The loss of good is evil, and the removal of evil is good.

SCHOLIUM.

See an unnecessary description of Pain in Collier's Ess. part iii. p. 1.*

AXIOM V.

POWER, whether active or passive, is a sensible idea, which we get by observing the changes produced in the beings about us by agents and patients. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 1, 2.

DEFINITION XIII.

Those properties or powers of any spirit, whereby

* [illegible] which has been severely censured, and [illegible] by a remarkable instance of the absurdity of [illegible]

it is rendered capable of action, enjoyment, or suffering, are called FACULTIES.

PROPOSITION I.

To take a survey of the principal faculties of the human mind.

SOLUTION.

1. We find within ourselves a power of perceiving, abstracting, compounding, comparing, discerning, judging, reasoning, which all lead us on in the pursuit of truth, i. e. in the right apprehension of the nature of things, and are called by the common name of Understanding.

Duncan's Logic, ap Precept. vol. ii. l. i. c. i. § 4; ib. l. ii. c. i. § 1; ib. l. iii. c. i. § 1, 2.

2. The power of retaining and recollecting our ideas in the absence of their archetypes, is what we call Memory; but when ideas or trains of ideas occur, or are called up by memory in a lively manner, and without regard to the order of former actual impressions and perceptions, it is said to be done by the power of the imagination or fancy.

Hartley on Man, vol. i. Introd. p. 3. Balguy's Six Serm. p. 44—46. Balguy's Ser. vol. i. p. 357—359.

3. We perceive, on many occasions, various commotions in our minds; (which also produce changes and impressions, not only on the nerves of the brain, but in the exterior parts of the body;) which commotions we call Passions. Pleasure and pain are the great hinges on which they turn; and the more particular modifications of them will be considered in Prop. 13.

Dr. Watts describes them thus:—"They are sensible commotions of our whole nature, both soul and body, which are occasioned by the perception of an object according to some special property that belongs to it." (Watts on the Passions, p. 5.) To excite them, it must appear rare and uncommon, good, i. e. agreeable, or evil, i. e. disagreeable.*

4. A power of forming volitions; which Locke defines to be the act of the mind knowingly exerting that dominion it takes itself to have over any part of the man, by employing it in or withholding it from any particular action: but what that exerting its dominion is, can only be known by consciousness. Ax. 4. Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xxi. § 15.

5. A power of moving some parts of the body. Others it has no immediate power over, the motion of some being always involuntary, as that of the heart. In other parts, it is sometimes voluntary and sometimes otherwise, as in the lungs and intestines.

Descartes de Pass. l. i. § 13, 16.

DEMONSTRATION

We find by experience that these faculties are in our own minds; and we perceive, by their effects, they are in the minds of others.

COROLLARY 1.

Man is a being of great abilities and excellences; so that if it shall hereafter appear that he was produced by any other intelligent being, it may reasonably be concluded, that he was designed for great and important purposes.

COROLLARY 2.

While these faculties continue in a degree of vigour, he must be capable of great and noble improvements: so that much of the difference between persons, in other respects equal, will depend upon the degree in which this natural furniture is cultivated or neglected.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is not proper to speak of the understanding and other faculties of the soul as if they were distinct principles of action:—the understanding is the soul understanding; the will is the soul willing; and to represent them as distinct agents, produces confusion in our ideas.

Witsii Econ. Fœd. l. iii. c. vii. § 4, 5. Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xxi. § 17—20. Crouzaz's Logic, vol. 1. part i. c. viii. § 6. p. 144.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The power which the mind evidently has of moving the various parts of the body, by nerves inserted in the muscles, is truly wonderful, seeing the mind neither knows the muscles to be moved, nor the machinery, by which the motion in it is to be produced; so that it is as if a musician should always strike the right note on a very complex instrument, which he had never seen before. That no laws of mechanism can produce this, is proved by its being voluntary, as well as by other considerations.

Cheyne's Princ. c. ii. § 12. p. 29—35. Mathe, vol. i. p. 359, &c.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is questioned whether there be any motion in the human body which depends upon the mind, and yet is involuntary.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Berkley entirely denies the power of abstraction, as an evident absurdity and inconsistency; and says we have only a power of making one particular idea a representation of all the rest: but this is all grounded upon an unwary expression of Mr. Locke. The truth is, that we do not positively exclude, but only overlook, a part of the idea from which we abstract; e. g. when I conceive of a line by abstraction, I do not deny that it is either straight or crooked, but only think of the flowing of a point, without determining its direction.

* With Dr. Watts's Doctrine of the Passions compare A Short Theory of the Passions, by Dr. T. Balguy, in the Appendix to his Divine Benevolence asserted. An 8vo pamphlet, published in 1781.

* For a further character of [illegible] see Reid's Inquiry, Prop. [illegible] M. [illegible] M. Degerando's [illegible] of the Philosophy [illegible] Hume, M.

Locke ib. l. ii. c. xxi. § 9. Berkley's Princ. Introd. § 6—20. Pneum. of Underst. p. 186—188.

LECTURE III.

PROPOSITION II.

To survey those phenomena observable in BRUTE ANIMALS, which seem to bear some resemblance to the faculties of the human mind.

SOLUTION.

1. They seem to have a power of perception: i. q. to see, to hear, to smell, to taste, and to feel: and it seems that it is by this power that those bodies, which we call Animal, are distinguished from those that are inanimate. Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. ix. § 11.

2. They seem also to have memory; which appears by the marks of their recollecting a train of ideas, when one that has a relation to the rest is, by sensation, presented anew; and especially by birds perfecting themselves, by practice, in tunes they have imperfectly learnt.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. x. § 10. Pneum. of the Underst. p. 158—162.

3. They appear capable of exerting volitions, and of putting them into execution by correspondent motions of their bodies.

4. They appear to be impressed with passions: as joy, sorrow, fear, hope, desire, gratitude, anger, &c. and sometimes in a very violent degree.

5. They appear not to have the power of abstraction: because they do not use articulate sounds as the signs of their ideas, though the organs of some are capable of pronouncing them.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xi. § 10, 11. Pneum. of the Underst. p. 188, 189.

Gr. 5 6. They are incapable of any high degree of reasoning, since that evidently depends upon abstract ideas. Object. Many of their actions seem rational. Ans. They are, and in so high a degree, that if they were governed by any reason of their own, they would exceed the sagacity of the generality of men: yet in other instances they appear mere idiots, and in the actions of the same species there is so little variety, that we cannot imagine this to be the case. This must therefore be granted to be a very strange phenomenon.

Spectat. No. 120. vol. ii. p. 130. Spect. de la Nat. vol. i. part ii. p. 70, 71. Collib. Inq. into the Power p. 86, 87. ed. 1. p. 160, 161. ed. 3. Beattie's Dissertations, p. 63—71. Reimarus's Dissertations, p. 216—218.

COROLLARY 1.

The Cartesian hypothesis, that brutes are mere machines, is very incredible: since their phenomena can by no means be accounted for on any mechanical laws, nor upon any principles, which will not prove it possible that those which appear to us human creatures may be mere machines, and not only irrational but insensible too.*

Descartes de Methode § 5. p. 34—39. La Chaire's Phys. l. 4. c. xii. § 9—13. Ray's Wisdom of God, p. 54—57. Pneum. of the Understand. p. 176—174. Ess. upon Human p. 92—98. R. p. Pardies Conn. vol. ii. p. 82—85. Dutton on the Resurrection, p. 202—190. Watts's Ruin and Recovery, Appendix, Essay 1.

COROLLARY 2.

It is evident that man is a creature superior to the brutes, though some authors have endeavoured to sink him to a level with them.—Vid. Prop. 1.

Blount's Anima Mundi, p. 10 to 36. Orig. adv. Celsum, lib. iv. p. 217 to 222. Conn. Christ by Laying, pass. Dutton on the Resurrection, p. 205.

SCHOLIUM.

That Plants are a species of animals, and have some sort of sensation, is strongly maintained, though with no appearance of reason, by

Reb. de Generat. Insect. p. 245—249. 257—260. Edwards's Exercit. No. viii. ad finem. †

LECTURE IV.

PROPOSITION XII.

That may be called a man's own BODY which is the general system over which his will exercises an immediate power, and by the organs of which ideas are transmitted to his mind: and that is to be accounted a VITAL part of it which partakes of its vegetation.

PROPOSITION XIII.

To enumerate the principal phenomena of the dependence of the human mind on the body.

SOLUTION.

1. When the nerves of the body are moved, ideas are presented to our minds whether we will or not, according to the different senses to which those nerves serve which are put into agitation; that is, certain ideas in the mind succeed to certain motions in the brain.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. i. § 24. Glanvill. Pneum. Scep. c. iii. § 20. p. 228, 229. Descartes de Pass. § 31. Descartes Pass. part iv. § 197. p. 216.

2. Passions are often excited by bodily motions

* [illegible]

† [illegible]

and on the other hand, when raised, produce changes in the body, sometimes even contrary to our volitions; v. g. in anger and blushing.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xx. § 17. Descartes de Pass. § 97—106, 113—135.

3. When the body is indisposed, the mind is often disabled from using its faculties: v. g. the understanding is disabled by drunkenness and sleep, —motion, by the palsy, —memory, by diseases, &c.

4. When the senses are gently and naturally shut up, and the command over the body intermitted, as in sleep, if we think at all, we are said to dream; and generally wander through airy tracks of thought, which have no agreement with each other, nor are at all corrected by the judgment. Ideas fetched out of the memory seem to us to be produced anew; and out of mere simple ideas laid up in the memory, new imaginary ideas of substances are formed, and seem to be produced by external objects. When the senses are obstructed in a violent and unnatural manner, as in a swoon, if we think at all, we may observe the same phenomena, but in a still more languid degree.

Lanc. street Lect. vol. ii. p. 442, 443. Descartes Dioptrics, c. vi. § 17. Rohault's Phys. lib. iv. c. 19. Lucret. lib. iv. ver. 905—1024. Herv. Med. vol. ii. p. 43, in Note.

5. In a frenzy, though the senses be not shut up, nor the command of the mind over the body suspended, yet the same phenomena are found as in sleep, only in a more vivid and pathetic degree.

Aretæus de Morb. Acut. lib. ii. c. iv. v. p. 17. Boer. Ed. Vid. Boer. Not. in loc.

6. Sometimes, by very intense thinking, we do not attend to impressions made on the organs of sensation, nor receive ideas from them. This, in a very high degree, may be called a trance or ecstasy.

Plutarch's Lives, vol. ii. p. 435, 436. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. ix. § 3, 4. Ibid, c. ii. § 19. p. 1—3. Flavel's Pneumat. ap. Opera, p. 276, 277. Edin. ed. vol. i. p. 475, 476. Lond. ed. Gualperius in Acts x. 10. Col. Gardiner's Memoirs, § 30—32.

COROLLARY.

Man is a very feeble creature, and we have little reason to boast of those intellectual powers, the exercise of which, by the very constitution of our nature, does not only depend upon an animal system, but is necessarily subject to frequent long interruptions, as in the state of sleep.

Burnet's Theory, vol. ii. p. 164. Camb. our Exist. p. 176, 177. Hervey's Contempl. vol. ii. p. 39, 40, 48—50.*

* From all these circumstances recent philosophers have deduced arguments to prove that the soul is not distinct from the body. On this side of the question, the subject has been copiously discussed by Dr

LECTURE V.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is queried, To what are we to ascribe the difference to be found in the intellectual capacities of men?

ANSWER.—The principles of physiognomy, the decay of the faculties in old age, the destruction or restoration of them by corporeal accidents, and many of the phenomena mentioned in the proposition, may convince us that the temperature and constitution of the body has a great influence on the mind. It must also be allowed, that the circumstances of education and conversation, may make a considerable difference between persons in other respects equal. Yet if we attend to the variety there is in all the works of nature, we may be inclined to think there is a like variety in the internal constitution of human souls; which conjecture is confirmed, by observing that no visible difference has yet been discovered between the brain of the weakest and the most sagacious of mankind; as well as that persons in the same circumstances, and with the same opportunities, often make very different improvements.†

Descartes de Method. sub init. p. 1. Watts's Death and Heaven, p. 97—102.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some have distinguished between the rational and the animal soul, as if they were two distinct beings, calling the former the Spirit, the latter the Soul. They suppose the intellect and will are seated in the former, the passions and appetites in the latter; and that the Soul is a principle common to brutes, which therefore they sometimes call by very contemptible names, as the horse, the brute, &c. whereas they think the Spirit is peculiar to man. Vid. Prop. 1. Schol. 1.

Perrenl. of the Universe, lib. ii. c. x. p. 367, 370—377. Marc. Anton. lib. ii. § 2; lib. iii. § 16; lib. xii. § 3, with Dac. Notes. Descartes de Pass. part i. § 47. Pope's Iliad, lib. xxiii. ver. 122, vol. vi. p. 61, 62. Mr. [illegible] Soul Knowledge, lib. i. c. ii. p. 14. Vitringa Obs. lib. iii. c. iv. pref. § 2—8.

DEFINITION XV.

The SOUL is said to be SEATED in that part of the body where sensation terminates, and voluntary motion begins.

PROPOSITION IX.

The Soul is seated in the Brain.

Principles of the Philosophical and Christian Morals and Notes on Mr. Locke's Essay concerning Human Understanding, with a Memoir of the Author. Edinburgh, 1809. 8vo. Dr. Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense. Edinburgh, 1764. 8vo. Dr. Beattie's Dissertations, Moral and Critical. Dublin, 1783. 8vo. vol. i. p. 1—[illegible].

† [illegible] by [illegible] [illegible]

DEMONSTRATION

1. The nerves, on which sensation and motion evidently depend, terminate in the brain, or in the medulla spinalis, which is derived from thence, and whose fibres are probably all continued to it.

2. If a straight ligature be made on any nerve, or it be cut asunder, sensation continues in that part nearest the brain, and ceases in that which is more remote.

3. In men, and in most other animals, death immediately ensues, if the head be cut off, or the brains taken out, or the cerebellum wounded.

4. All known distempers that immediately take away sensation, are seated in the head.

Grad. 1—4. Def. 14. 5. The soul is seated in the brain.—Q. E. D.

Keil's Anat. c. vii. § 1. More's Immort. of the Soul, lib. ii. c. vii. § 10. Watts's Ess. iii. p. 78—80.

COROLLARY.

The ancients were mistaken in placing it in the heart; and Van Helmont in the mouth of the stomach. It may be observed, by the way, that Philo, who, with many ancients, supposed the sensitive soul to be subdivided into the irascible and concupiscible, placed the former in the heart, the latter in the belly, while he thought the rational was seated in the head.

Vitringa ubi supra, § 4. sub fin. More, ibid. lib. ii. c. vii. § 5—10. Descartes de Pass. § 28.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It must still be matter of controversy, in what part of the brain the soul is seated. There is no reason to think, as some have imagined, that it is in the meninges; but whether it be in the pineal gland, as Descartes supposes, or, as Dr. More thinks, among the animal spirits in the fourth ventricle, or in the corpora striata, as has been lately maintained in France, or in some part different from any of these, we cannot certainly say.*

Descartes de Pass. § 32. More, ibid. lib. ii. c. vii. § 12—18. c. viii. per tot.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The constitution of some animals may perhaps be different from that of men in this respect. It is certain the phenomena mentioned gr. 3, are not always to be found in them; for wasps will live a long time after their heads are cut off; eels are soonest killed by striking them on the tail; and vipers will live some hours after their heads are cut off, and their bowels taken out.

More, ibid. lib. iii. c. xv. § 1, 2. Bacon's Nat. Hist. Cent. 4, No. 400.

* The question concerning the seat of the soul, for a long time excited the attention of philosophers, and has been the subject of various discussion. At present, we believe that it is deemed of little importance.

LECTURE VI.

DEFINITION XVI.

Any idea or proposition is said to be INNATE when it is not acquired by the use of the faculties, but so implanted in the mind from its original, as to be common to the whole species, independently upon any circumstances in which individuals may be placed.

PROPOSITION V.

There are no innate ideas in the human mind.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. There can no simple idea be assigned, but may be traced up to sensation or reflection, or both: e. g. to one sense alone; as seeing green, hearing the sound of an organ, smelling a rose, tasting a peach, feeling solidity, &c. or more; as extension, motion, rest: to reflection only, as perception, volition, duration: or sensation and reflection both, as existence, and various kinds of pleasure and pain.—Ax. 1.

Locke, lib. ii. c. iii. v—vii; Ibid. c. i. § 2, 7—9.

2. We see that simple ideas are acquired gradually, and the furniture of various persons differs according to their various circumstances in life.

Locke, lib. ii. c. i. § 2, 5, 7, 20—23.

3. When the organs of sensation are destroyed, simple ideas proper to them are no more acquired; and those who, from their birth, want proper organs, want correspondent ideas, even though they be ever so important to the comfort and usefulness of life.

Locke, lib. i. c. iv. § 20; ibid. lib. ii. c. iii. § 1.

Grad. 1—3. 4. It is needless and unreasonable to suppose that any simple ideas are innate.

5. Compound ideas are made up of simple ones; nor can we, by any operation of the mind, produce any idea, how chimerical soever, the materials of which we are not already possessed of.

Locke, lib. ii. c. ii. § 2; ibid. c. xii. § 8.

Grad. 4, 5. 6. It is needless and unreasonable to suppose any of our ideas innate. Q. E. D.

Proced. of the Underst. p. 382—384; More's Philos. Works, lib. 1. c. 5, 6.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Dr. Watts supposes there are three sources of our ideas, viz. Sensation, Reflection, and Abstraction; but since he grants that the materials of the last are derived from the two former, this cannot be reckoned a third primary source, any more than compounding.

Watts's Phil. Ess. iii. § 16. p. 93—97

SCHOLIUM 2.

Brown, in his Procedure of the Understanding maintains that we have all our ideas originally from sensation; but his proof depends entirely upon hi-definition of the word Idea, which he takes for a picture or representation of some sensible object laid up in the imagination; which is different from our definition of it.—Vid. Def. 1.

Proceed. of the Underst. p. 55, 63—66. Dr. Price's Review of the Morals, c. i. § 2. Lord Monboddo on the Origin and Progress of Language, vol. i. p. 1—184.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Most of those ideas which arise from reflection, come into the mind later than those which arise from sensation. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. i. § 8.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Many errors in our ideas of sensation are rectified by reflection.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. ix. § 8, 9. Smith's Optics, vol. ii. Append. p. 27, 28. Locke's Fam. Lett. p. 134—138; Watts's Logic, part ii. c. iii. § 3. p. 200.

LECTURE VII.

PROPOSITION VI.

There are no innate propositions in the human mind.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. All propositions consist of ideas; therefore, innate propositions would imply innate ideas, contrary to Prop. 5. Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. iv. § 19.

2. If any propositions could be supposed innate, it must be those that are intuitively discerned; but these, though assented to as soon as proposed, are not known before such proposal, even by those whose minds are least corrupted by education and custom; which shows (by the way) that they cannot be the principles of all our knowledge,—not being themselves first known.

Ibid. lib. i. c. ii. § 4, 16, 21—27.

3. All propositions relating to identity and diversity of ideas may be intuitively discerned, and consequently must be innate, if intuitive discerning were the mark of an innate proposition; but this would imply, that all our ideas were innate, which is evidently absurd.

Ibid. lib. i. c. iv. § 4, 5; ibid. lib. iv. c. vii. § 4.

4. Propositions, supposed innate, cannot be distinguished from others, so that a complete catalogue of them should be made; yet this might reasonably be expected if any were so, and would be necessary to render them useful.

Ibid. lib. i. c. iii. § 15; ibid. c. 4. § 21.

5. Several of those propositions, which are of greatest importance in morality, and seem most evident, and are therefore most likely to be innate, are unknown to some, and expressly contradicted by others, and all need proof.

Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. iv. § 4—13. Sale's Pref. to the Koran, p. 131, 132. Watts's Ess. iv. § 1. Baxt. Works, vol. ii. p. 381.

Gr. 1—5 6. Valet propositio.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It may be granted that there are certain circumstances, in which it is impossible for the mind to avoid receiving certain ideas, and assenting to certain propositions, and even taking them for granted in all its reasonings; and this is the necessary consequence of its constitution. It may also be granted, that there is something in natural temper disposing to gratitude, compassion, &c. as effectually as if propositions recommending them were inscribed upon the soul; but this is by no means inconsistent with what has been said above; and in this sense Mr. Locke owns innate practical principles as the desire of happiness.

Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. iii. § 2. Watts's Ess. iv. § 2—4. p. 100—102, 104—107.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The dream of innate ideas seems to have arisen, on the one hand, from the desire of teachers to impose their own sentiments upon their disciples, as sacred truths stamped on their minds by the Author of Nature; and, on the other, from the ease with which such principles have been early received, and the assurance with which they have been assented to, so that people cannot remember that they have ever doubted of them.*

Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. iii. § 21—26. Ibid. c. iv. § 24. Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. i. p. 12—18.

LECTURE VIII.

PROPOSITION VII

The same external qualities in objects, may excite different ideas in different persons.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. If the organs of sensation be at all different, the ideas of the same object must be proportionably so, while the same laws of nature prevail.

2. It is probable, there may be some degree of difference in the organs of different persons; v. g. in the distance of the retina and crystalline humour of the eye, in the degree of extension in the tympanum of the ear, in the acrimony of the saliva, &c.; and the variety which is observable in the faces, the voices, and the bones of men, and almost through the whole face of nature, would lead us to suspect that the same variety might take place here.

* The doctrine of innate ideas and mental propositions was long maintained, and Mr. Locke was obliged to take much pains upon the subject. Though the system is now generally exploded, there has appeared in a few late writers a tendency to revive somewhat like innate propositions, under the terms of the "Principles of Common Sense." Dr Reid is guarded upon the subject, but has however been and been equally prudent. See Beattie's Immutability of Truth, and more especially Dr Oswald's Appeal to Common Sense in Behalf of Religion. Sentiments very similar to those maintained by these gentlemen had long before been advanced by Pere Buffier, in his First Truths, and the Origin of our Opinions explained: a translation of which work, from the French, was published in 1780.

3. Those things which are very pleasing to one, are extremely disagreeable to another.

4. Those things which are at one time very agreeable, are at another very disagreeable to the same person, when the organs of his body are indisposed, or when other disagreeable ideas are associated with those that had once been grateful.

Gr. 1, 2, and 4, 5. Valet propositio.

Locke's Essay, b. ii. c. xxxii. § 15. Ars Cogitandi, p. i. c. i. Le Clerc's Logic, p. i. c. i. § 15.

SCHOLIUM.

Though the causes mentioned above may probably produce ideas which differ in degree in the minds of different persons, there is no apparent reason to suppose they differ in their kind; v. g. that what appears green to one should constantly appear red to another,—and vice versa.

Malebranche's Research, l. i. c. xiii. § 5, 6. Rohault's Phys. part. i. c. xxvii. § 6. vol. i. p. 197. Philosophical Transactions, vol. lxviii. part ii. for 1778.

PROPOSITION VIII.

To survey the phenomena of the human memory with the solutions that have been given of some of them. See Prop. 1, gr. 2.

SOLUTION.

1. A vast stock of ideas are treasured up in the memory, which it easily produces on various occasions.

The Cartesians say, that objects, coming in by sensation, and ideas got by reflection, make traces in the brain: but how exquisitely fine must these be, when in so small a compass the names and images of so many objects, as well as so many propositions and arguments, are inscribed! Who can sufficiently admire it, not only in such extraordinary cases as are mentioned by Derham, &c. but in those cases which are most common!

Derham's Phys. Theol. l. v. c. i. p. 262. Descartes de Pass. § 42. Cicero's Tusc. Disp. l. i. § 24, 25. Watts's Ess. iii. § 13, 14. Rollin Manuere, &c. vol. i. p. 275—277. August. Confes. lib. x. c. 7. Senec. Controv. lib. i. sub init.

2. We can distinguish ideas brought out of the memory from those that come in by sensation or reflection; perhaps, by the liveliness of the impression, or by the train of relations.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. 10. c. vi. § 5, 6. Descartes de Pass. § 26.

3. Ideas, of which we have but a general and imperfect remembrance, may often be recovered by recollection.

Watts's Ess. iii. § 15. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. x. § 7.

4. Memory, in a great measure, depends upon the body, and is often much injured by a disease, and afterwards recovered with recovering strength, which, on the Cartesian hypothesis, is accounted for, by supposing that those parts of the brain on which these characters are written, are, by such disorders, relaxed, in the same manner as the nerves in the other parts of the body are liable to be weakened or disabled.

5. The memory differs at different ages. Children soon forget, as they soon learn; old people learn with difficulty, and remember best what they learnt when young; that is, say the Cartesians, because the brain, growing by degrees more dry, retains old characters; but does not easily admit new.

6. Dreams generally make little impression on the memory; because, say some, the animal spirits are then but gently moved.

Watts's Ess. No. v. § 2.

7. An idea, attended with great pleasure or pain, makes a deep impression on the memory, i. e. a deep trace on the brain, the spirits being then violently impelled. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. x. § 3.

8. The power of recollecting differs extremely at different times: and it is generally strongest when we are most brisk and lively.

9. We remember that best in the morning which we learnt just before we went to sleep; because, say the Cartesians, the traces made then are not apt to be effaced by the motions of the spirits, as they would, if new objects of sensation had presented themselves; and during this interval, they have, as it were, time to stiffen.

10. Sensible ideas gradually decay in the memory if they be not refreshed by new sensations, the traces perhaps wearing out; yet they may last many years. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. x. § 4, 5.

11. When a train of ideas is very familiar to the mind, they often follow one another in the memory without any laborious recollection, and so as to arise almost instantaneously and mechanically; as in writing, singing, &c. the traces between them being worn like beaten roads.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxxiii. § 6.

12. The memory is a faculty which is almost incessantly exercised while thought continues (though the instances of laborious recollection are comparatively few): nor do we ever find the human mind entirely stript of it, though it be often impaired.

LECTURE IX.

DEMONSTRATION.

The probability of the Cartesian hypothesis will appear from considering,

1. How well it agrees with the various phenomena mentioned above.

2. The analogy upon this hypothesis between sensation and memory, the one arising from impressions made on the brain, the other depending on traces continued there.

3. The instances in which memory has been almost wholly lost at once by a sudden violent blow upon the head; insomuch, that a great scholar has entirely lost the knowledge of letters by it, and has been forced, with infinite labour, to begin again from the elements of them; and, in other instances, the recollection has been gradual, and the events of childhood and youth have been recovered first.

COROLLARY.

The memory is a useful faculty, which deserves to be carefully cultivated by attention and exercise, frequent reviews and conversation.

Free-thinker, No. 72. Rollin's Man, &c. vol. i. p. 277—279. Watts's Improv. of the Mind, part. i. c. xvii.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The artificial methods which some have proposed must be allowed to be very ingenious; but perhaps are rather calculated to improve a memory already good, than to help a bad one.

Rollin's Maniere, &c. vol. i. p. 279, 280. Grey's Memoria Technica. Bruen's Life, p. 56—58.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The excellency of the memory consists partly in its strength of retention, and partly in its quickness of recollection. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. x. § 8.

SCHOLIUM 3.

If the Cartesian hypothesis should be admitted, memory will still continue a great mystery; for it must be acknowledged impossible thoroughly to explain how either that or sensation should be affected by any impression on the brain, or what connexion there can be between such impressions and thought in any of its modes.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Mr. Locke accounts for the association of ideas, which is the cause of antipathies and many errors, with other strange phenomena, by memory; supposing such traces are worn on the brain as unite ideas, so that when the mind turns to one it should almost necessarily fall on the other too. See Solution, gr. 11.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxxiii. § 7—18. Hartley on Man, Prop. X. XI. vol. i. p. 65—72.

SCHOLIUM 5.

If the Cartesian hypothesis be admitted, it must be owned that nothing gives a greater idea of the minuteness of the parts into which matter may actually be divided, than the smallness of those traces, by which so many dictionaries, histories, poems, &c. are transcribed, and so many pictures exactly drawn in miniature.*

SCHOLIUM 6.

It is probable the weakness of memory in infants may be one chief cause of their being so long before they come to the use of speech, as well as the want of dexterity in using the organs of it.

LECTURE X.

AXIOM VI.

We get our ideas of SUCCESSION, by observing the train of ideas passing through our minds one after another. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xiv. § 4.

PROPOSITION IX.

The swiftness and slowness of the succession of ideas in the human mind have certain limits.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Some motions are so swift, and others so slow, that they cannot be seen.

2. Motion is always successive.

3. Could our ideas succeed each other as fast as the bodies move in one case, and as slow as they move in the other, the motion would become visible.

1, 3. 4. The swiftness and slowness of ideas coming in by sight, have their limits.

5. There is equal reason to believe it with regard to other ideas; as some of the like phenomena may be observed concerning some ideas that come in by hearing.

6. We are not able to retain one idea long in the mind without any variation; nor can we call up any given number of ideas in any given time; v. g. we cannot think over ten verses between one vibration of the pendulum and another.

Gr. 4, 5, and 6. 7. Valet propositio.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xiv. § 6—14.

SCHOLIUM.

It is evident that there are various degrees of velocity in the ideas of different persons, and of the same person at different times; partly according to the temper in which he is, and partly according to the degree in which he exercises his volitions; and where the velocity is the same, it will seem

* That memory is an original faculty, given us by the Author of our being, of which we can give no account, but that we are so made, is maintained by Dr. Reid, in his Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, p. 303—310. For an account of the different theories concerning Memory, see the same author, p. 338—356.

greater in proportion as the kinds of ideas are more various. Watts's Ess. No. xii. § 2

AXIOM VII

The idea of DURATION is a simple idea, which we get by reflecting on the succession of our ideas.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 1—3

COROLLARY.

When we are insensible of the succession of our ideas, we are also insensible of duration.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 4, 5.

DEFINITION XVII

TIME is a part of duration, measured by some supposed equal succession,—a certain number of which makes a period or epoche.

Locke, ib. § 17. August. Confess. lib. ii. c. xiv. apud Jackson's Works, vol. i. p. 883.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The revolutions of the heavenly bodies serve for a convenient measure of time, seeing they are long, various, publicly visible, and nearly equable; yet any phenomena, returning periodically and regularly, (e. g. the freezing of water, the blowing of flowers, a fit of the ague, &c.) might, with regard to any particular person, answer the same end.

Locke, ib. § 19, 20.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Nevertheless, in the absence of such assistance, the train of ideas passing through a man's mind may be to himself the measure of time; though neither this nor any other measure can be demonstrated entirely equable. Locke's Ess. ib. § 21.

SCHOLIUM 3.

When the duration of any being is said to be either long or short, it is only as compared with that of other beings.

Free-thinker, vol. iii. No. 114. Le Clerc's Logic, part i. c. iv. § 6.

COROLLARY 1.

The same part of duration may appear of different lengths to different persons, and to the same persons at different times. See Prop. 7. Schol.

Spectator, vol. ii. No. 94.

COROLLARY 2.

Hence we may learn the reason why years (cæteris paribus) appear longer to us while very young, than as we grow up to riper age; because the objects being newer, strike the mind more forcibly, and so the succession is more observed than when they grow more familiar to the mind. The like may be observed of the day we spend in a strange place, or a road we are not used to travel; vet if, by frequent repetition, a thing is grown tedious to us, it appears of a longer duration, because we mingle many other ideas with it; and therefore, on the whole, there is a greater succession.

COROLLARY 3.

If an Almighty Power be supposed, it may make that part of duration which appears but a moment to one, appear a thousand years to another, or a much greater period, and vice versa; which is indeed an amazing thought.

COROLLARY 4.

Time is not (as it has often been said to be) the measure of motion; but motion is one, though not the only, measure of time; for if there were no material world, and so no motion, there might still be time, if there were any intellectual beings whose ideas succeed each other. See Schol. 1.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 22, 24. Jackson's Works, vol. i. lib. v. c. xiii. § 2. p. 881, 882. Reid's Intellectual Powers of Man, p. 310—314, 322—331.

LECTURE XI.

DEFINITION XVIII

Those Properties or Qualities of bodies are called PRIMARY, which are in them whether we perceive them or not, (e. g. bulk, number, figure, situation of their solid parts, motion, rest, &c.) but those ideas which, by means of these primary qualities, are excited in our minds, as colours, sounds, smells, tastes, &c. (being vulgarly but falsely supposed to be in bodies,) are called Secondary Qualities.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. viii. § 8—22. Watts's Ess. No. iii. p. 81—85.

SCHOLIUM.

Mr. Locke further divides secondary qualities into those that are immediately perceivable, i. e. by the ideas which the bodies themselves produce in us; and those that are mediately perceivable, i. e. by the changes which we see them produce in other bodies. Locke's Ess. ib. § 25—26.*

PROPOSITION X.

To enumerate several instances and causes of the imperfection of human knowledge.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION

1. We are ignorant of many things for want of ideas; perhaps, wanting proper organs for such kind of ideas, and certainly wanting such an acuteness of those organs which we have, as would be necessary to discover many things which are now concealed from us by their distance or minuteness. This occasions great imperfections in our knowledge both of body and spirit.

Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. iii. § 23—27.

2. We are not able to discern the connexion between many of those ideas which we have, parti-

* See this whole matter amply discussed by Dr. Reid, in his Intellectual Powers of Man, § [illegible]—22 cularly that between the primary and secondary qualities of bodies, which is a great impediment to physical inquiries.

Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. iii. § 9—17. Ib. c. vi. § 11—15. Watts's Ess. No. iii. § 9.

3. Few important propositions are intuitively known; and all demonstrative knowledge depends upon the memory,—which, being fallible, brings some degree of uncertainty on what we learn by it.

Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. ii. § 4—7; ib. c. iii. § 3; c. xi. § 9—11.

4. We are often obliged to judge by analogy, the particulars of which are generally very imperfect, and come vastly short of a complete induction.

Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. xii. § 9; c. xvi. § 12.

5. The various avocations of life, an indolent temper, and wrong methods of pursuing knowledge, hinder our attaining what might otherwise come within our reach. Ibid. lib. iv. c. iii. § 30.

COROLLARY.

Since our knowledge is so limited, it must be of great use and importance to know the limits of it.

Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. i. § 4—6. Mason on Self-Knowledge, p. 62. Butler's Serm. No. xv.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Nevertheless, we are not destitute of capacities and opportunities for coming to the knowledge of those things on which our happiness most evidently depends.

Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. i. § 5; ib. lib. iv. c. xi. § 8. Jonval's Lett. in Nat. displayed, vol. i. p. 277—290.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The question, Whether there be any material world or not? will come in with greater advantage hereafter; yet were the negative to be granted, (which Bishop Berkley maintains,) the same difficulties with those above mentioned would occur, with a little alteration of phrase.

LECTURE XII.

PROPOSITION XI.

To inquire wherein PERSONAL IDENTITY consists.

SOLUTION.

1. Mr. Locke supposes it consists in a continued consciousness of the same actions; and thence infers, that, if the consciousness of one spirit were to be transferred to another, they would both make but one person; and that, if any spirit should lose all consciousness of its former actions, it would from that time become a different person. To confirm this, he pleads that, when it is evidently apparent that consciousness is lost, i. e. in case of phrenzy, when a man is beside himself, the sober man is not punished for the actions of the madman, nor the madman for the actions of the sober man: but I think this may be accounted for another way, without supposing that the law looks upon them as different persons.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxvii. § 9—27.

2. To this Dr. Watts very justly objects, that fancied memory might make two men, born in the most distant places and times, the same person; or real forgetfulness might make the same man different persons; v. g. Lee, the tragedian, when distracted, might be successively Alexander, Socrates, Tully, Virgil, Luther, Queen Elizabeth; and therefore Lee, when distracted, might justly be rewarded or punished for all the different actions which he ascribes to himself; and finally, several men might become the same person. This he thinks is contrary to the common forms of speech, and to true philosophy.

Watts's Ess. No. xii. § 7. p. 294—308.

3. He therefore concludes, That the same person, in an incomplete sense, is the same intelligent substance or conscious mind; but in a more complete sense, is the same soul united to the same body; or, in other words, that, while a spirit is united to a body, the same continued animal life, in union with the same spirit, generally attended with the same consciousness, goes to constitute the same person. If the question be started relating to a supposed resurrection, it is answered, That if the resurrection precedes the dissolution of the body, it does not alter the common forms of speaking; but if the body be dissolved, we may refer it to an after-inquiry how far and in what cases it may be said to be the same. Mr. Locke also acknowledges this to be most probable; so that the chief question between them is only about the application of the word person in a case that is never likely to happen, i. e. of transferred consciousness: yet, for this very reason, I think Dr. Watts's notion is to be preferred; and, to conclude, if God should utterly destroy the soul and body of any man whom we know, and afterwards create a new spirit, united to a new body, and in form resembling the other, and give to it the exact consciousness of the man whose body and soul was destroyed, and should reveal to us what he had done, we could not converse with this new produced man as the same man we formerly knew, or approve that as an equitable conduct, by which he should be rewarded or punished for the actions of the annihilated man. This abundantly shows the impropriety of Mr. Locke's manner of stating the question, and how much Dr. Watts's is to be preferred to it.

Watts's Ess. ib. p. 301—306, 308—313. Locke's Ess. ib. § 25. Le Clerc's Ontology, c. ii. § 7. Butler's Analogy, diss. i. p. 130—150. 8vo edit.: p. 305—309, 4to edit. of 1736.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Mr. Locke seems to have been led into this mistake, by considering what we commonly call ourselves, rather than what we call the same person, when speaking of another; (Vide Locke ubi supra, § 16;) yet it is plain we do not make consciousness the only rule even here, since no one is conscious of his having been born, nor of many other events and actions of his life, which nevertheless, upon the evidence of reason and testimony, without consciousness, he would not at all scruple to apply to himself.

SCHOLIUM 2.

If we have two ideas of body, in all respects the same, for instance, of a book or watch, we judge that they have the same archetype, if each of the ideas have the same relation to certain times and places; for we know that two bodies cannot be at the same time in the same place. As for the question, Whether two spirits may or not?—it depends upon the doctrine of the immateriality; and it is proper to defer the examination of it till we have proved that there is some immaterial spirit.

Essay on Personal Identity, published for Robson, 1769. Defence of Mr. Locke's Opinion concerning Personal Identity, printed at Cambridge, and sold by Johnson, 1769. Reid's Intellectual Powers of Man, p. 315—321. 332—337.

LECTURE XIII.

PROPOSITION XII

To inquire, Whether men think always without intermission?

COMPARISON OF ARGUMENTS.

SECT. I. FOR THE AFFIRMATIVE.

If there be a time when the soul does not think, the existence of it as a spirit is destroyed; and we can imagine nothing to remain unless it be something merely material. Now there is no apparent reason to think the soul thus exists by intervals; and, therefore, we must conclude it always thinks.

To this it is replied, That such a definition of the soul as implies continual actual thought, is begging the question in dispute. When actual thought is suspended, there may remain some secret power of thinking, resulting from the constitution of the soul, which will exert itself when the obstruction is removed. As a bow when bent has a disposition to straighten itself again, or a clock to strike, though the hammer be held back.

To this it is answered, We can have no idea of this power. If the power of thinking be not the very substance of the soul, there must be some unknown substance in which the power inheres; nor can we imagine how it awakes itself again to actual thought.

It is further objected, That the various degrees of intenseness of thought, which we all perceive, seem to prove that thought is not the essence of the soul; for then it must be uniform and constant.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xix.

But it may be replied, That the least degree of thought is thought, as the finest particle of matter is matter. On the whole, it must be granted, that, if it be hereafter proved, without this proposition, that the human soul is immaterial, there will be some considerable weight in the argument; if the contrary be proved, there will be very little.

Watts's Ess. No. v. § 1. p. 116—118. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. i. § 10—19. Inquiry concerning Political Justice, p. 335—340.

SECT. II. FOR THE NEGATIVE.

Arg. 1. If we think in our sleep, we think in vain; and it is not to be thought we are so constituted as that this should be necessary.

Answer. If all our forgotten thoughts are in vain, many of our waking thoughts are so; for how few can we perfectly recollect! We may as well argue against our existing at all without thought, as a useless thing. Besides, there is perhaps in sleep some continued sense of pleasure, which the wise Author of Nature might connect with so necessary a support of life as sleep is. To which we may further add, That the uninterrupted thought of every rational spirit, whether remembered or forgotten, may make a part of a scheme, in the general right and useful, though the advantage of it in some particular instances may not appear. As we may suppose with respect to those minerals or metals in the bowels of the earth, which are never in fact discovered.

Locke, ib. § 15. Watts's Ess. ib. § 3. p. 127, 128.

Arg. 2. Infants, who have but few ideas, sleep much; probably before, and to be sure after, their birth; but is it to be imagined they are all that while necessarily employed in thinking?

Ans. It is allowed they have few or no ideas by reflection; (for the thought of a learned Scottish anatomist, who pretends they are then forming the heart and lungs for their respective offices, seems too extravagant to be particularly examined;) but ideas of sensation they have early,—perhaps some strong sensations of the mother communicated to them before the birth; but when the soul is first united we know not.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 17, 21, 22. Watts's Ess. ib. p. 129—131.

Arg. 3. As we fall asleep we seem gradually to approach to a state of insensibility; it is therefore probable that at length we arrive at it.

Ans. If by insensibility be meant incogitation, the phenomenon is denied. The same kind of argument may prove, that matter might be annihilated by continual division.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xix. § 3, 4.

Arg. 4. We do not remember that we think in many of our sleeping hours, therefore how can we know that we do?

Ans. Dreams may be entirely, or but imperfectly, or not at all, remembered, according to the various degrees in which the nerves are impressed by the motion given to the animal spirits in sleep. Besides, daily experience shows us, that occurrences of the day bring to mind dreams, which, in the morning, we had forgotten; and we have often a general remembrance that we have dreamed, though we know not of what; to which it may be added, That people sometimes, in their sleep, discover marks of great emotion, when, if asked in the morning what it was that disquieted them, they do not perhaps know; so that though it would be very ridiculous to argue, from universal experience, that we always think in our sleeping hours, this will be an unanswerable objection against any other argument; nor can it possibly prove that we ever cease from thinking, any more than breathing, which we also forget; or than forgetting the circumstances of our birth will prove we were never born.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. i. § 13, 14, 18. Watts's Ess. ib. § 2. p. 120—125.

Arg. 5. It might be expected that those operations of the soul should be most rational, in which it is most abstracted from the body; whereas, by what we remember of our dreams, we perceive the contrary.

Ans. It may be a law of the creation, that, during our union with the body, a certain disposition of the nerves, generally wanting in sleep, should be necessary to rational and connected thought; and that such a wild play of the animal spirits as arises from the obstruction of the nerves should cause roving imaginations, which therefore, by the way, it is no dishonour or detriment to forget.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 16. Watts's Ess. ib. § 3. p. 126, 127.

Arg. 6. If a man thinks without knowing it, the sleeping and waking man are two different persons.

Ans. If by knowing it be meant remembering it, (which it must mean if it be at all to the purpose,) they cannot be different persons, according to Mr. Locke's principles of identity, unless every instance of forgetfulness makes a man a new and different person; and then how many thousands and millions is every man! This objection would suppose two distinct incommunicable consciousnesses acting in the same body by intervals, as in sleeping and waking; which none ever maintained.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 12. c. xxvii. § 23. Watts's Ess. ib. p. 125, 126.

Arg. 7. If the soul always thinks, there must be some innate ideas, contrary to Prop. 5.

Ans. There must be some one idea at least or perception; but that it is this rather than that, does not arise from the original constitution of the soul, but from the circumstances in which the body to which it is united is placed; (thus it might have been the idea of colour as well as heat;) so that supposing the soul at the first moment of its union with the body to have the idea of heat, this would not prove heat to be an innate idea.—Def. 16.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 17, 20, 21. See on this subject, Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 330—346, and note (a) octavo edit.

SCHOLIUM.

It may not be amiss here to mention the argument which Mr. Baxter has drawn from the phenomena of dreams, to prove the existence of some immaterial spirits by which they are suggested; though the particular manner, in which that strange and seemingly inconclusive argument is managed, cannot here be largely represented, and need not be particularly confuted.

Baxter on the Soul, c. x. passim. oct. ed. vol. ii. § 1.

LECTURE XIV.

PROPOSITION XIII.

To take a more particular survey of the PASSIONS of the human mind, according to Dr. Watts's distribution of them. See Prop. 1. Sol. gr. 3.

SOLUTION.

An object may be considered as rare and uncommon, as good or evil in the general, or with respect to the various kinds of good or evil, and the particular circumstances that attend it.

1. If an object be in the general considered as rare, it excites admiration; sudden wonder is surprise; great wonder is astonishment. This passion has no opposite. If an object appear good in the general, it excites love; if evil, hatred.

These are primary passions; and those under the next head are derived from the two last of these.

2. As to the various kinds of good and evil; considering an object merely and absolutely as valuable, it excites esteem, which, in a very high degree, is veneration, and, in a supreme degree, is adoration. If it be considered as worthless, it excites contempt, especially if it be proposed as excellent. If it be considered as fit to receive good from us, it is the object of benevolence or good-will; if fit to receive evil, of malevolence or ill-will: but it is to be observed, that this passion centres only on sensible objects, i. e. on objects capable of perception. If the object be considered as fit to do me good, or afford me any present pleasure, it produces complacency; if the contrary, displacency. Complacency in any very high degree towards an inferior, or on considerations not adequate to that degree of regard, is fondness; the opposite to which is disgust or loathing.

There may be benevolence where there is no complacency; but a high degree of complacency without benevolence is hardly conceivable.

3. As to the various circumstances in which the good or evil object is considered, it may be either present or absent.

(1.) Future good considered as possible excites desire, which is the great spring of action; if evil be considered as possible, it excites aversion.

(2.) If there be a probable prospect of obtaining absent good, it excites hope; if evil be likely to come upon us, it produces fear. The highest degree of hope is confidence or security; when little remains, there is despondency; and when hope is entirely banished, despair succeeds. Fear, joined with foresight, is anxiety; with careful contrivance to avoid it, is solicitude; mingled with surprise, and rising to a violent degree on a sudden, is terror; and a high degree of aversion attending the idea of any object we apprehend or reflect on, is horror.

(3.) Good obtained awakens joy; evil actually endured brings sorrow. Moderate joy is gladness; sudden and high joy is exultation; habitual joy is cheerfulness. Moderate sorrow is trouble; great sorrow is distress and anguish; habitual sorrow is melancholy. Congratulation is the sentiment and expression of joy arising from the happiness of another. Pity and compassion is sorrow arising from the distress of another. Sympathy comprehends both; envy is the contrary of both. Jealousy is a species of envy, arising from an apprehension of preference given to another person in the affections of one for whom we have a peculiar regard. Shame may be reckoned as a species of sorrow, attended frequently with blushing, arising from a consciousness, imputation, or apprehension of any thing that appears to be matter of disgrace in ourselves, or others we are concerned for, i. e. when likely to expose us or them to the contempt of others.

(4.) When any intelligent being designedly brings good upon us it excites gratitude; when evil, anger. With respect to our fellow creatures, gratitude is a mixture of complacency and benevolence; anger is displacency, with some degree of malevolence. When anger rises to an excessive degree, it is rage and fury; when it is deeply rooted, it is rancour and spite; when arising on trifling occasions, and expressed in little tokens of resentment, it is peevishness.

When an affront is apprehended, beneath us or any other person to whom it is offered, it excites indignation; and when anger is attended with a desire of hurting another, it is called malice; and when this is in consequence of an apprehended injury, revenge.

Watts on the Passions, § 2. p. 4—9. ed. 2. Fordyce's Mor. Philos. b. i. § 2—4. Pope's Essay Epist. ii. ver. 93—204. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xx. Hutcheson's Treatise on the Passions. Le Brun Of the Characters of the Passions.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Descartes divides the primary passions into six, viz. Admiration, Love, Hatred, Desire, Joy, and Sorrow; and though this is by no means an accurate distribution, yet his description of the passions contains many excellent passages.

Descartes de Pass. part ii. § 69. p. 81.

SCHOLIUM 2.

As pain is useful for preserving the animal body from those injuries which might prove fatal to it, so many of the passions, which are disagreeable in their present operations, are useful and even necessary, both to individuals and societies.

Watts on the Pass. p. 85—88. Butler's Serm. No. viii. p. 150—154. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. vii. § 4. Foster's Serm. vol. ii. p. 122—125, and 128.

LECTURE XV.

PROPOSITION XV.

To inquire into the original of our passions.

SOLUTION.

1. They may either arise from the motion of the body, impressions on the sense, or operations of the mind by which ideas are produced; as the sight of beauty, hearing of music, or understanding a proposition.

2. From ideas recollected by the memory which may be accompanied with some degree of pleasure or pain, which they at first gave. Prop. 8. gr. 7.

3. From the exercise of reason, which apprehends a probability of approaching good or evil.

Descartes de Pass. part ii. § 51. Watts on the Pass. § 3. p. 10—17.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The second and third source arise from the first; since there could have been no memory nor reasoning, without ideas presented to the mind as the ground work of its operations.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some think the passions may be raised by means of the body, when no particular idea is presented to any one of the senses; that is, only from the temperature of the body; v. g. when we find ourselves cheerful or sad, and cannot assign any reason for it; which, if it be admitted, may, in the judgment of some, make it dubious whether the first idea in the human mind be (as Mr. Locke maintains) an idea of sensation: but it may perhaps be answered, We have a sense of the temperature of the body; and that we are seldom, in our waking hours, destitute of some sensible impressions, which are at different times painful or pleasant, in different degrees, according as our organs are disposed.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. i. § 23, 24.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The passions cannot be immediately excited or suppressed by our volitions, but consequentially they may; especially those arising from the third spring, by which some arising from the two former may be balanced. Descartes de Pass. § 45—47.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is queried, Why objects are often found to affect the passions less when they are grown familiar than they did before? To this may be answered, That admiration, in a great measure, proceeds from the novelty of objects. Perhaps, in other instances, it may be owing to some unknown connexion between making the first impression on the brain and the excitation of the passions; yet it is observable, that the degree in which we are impressed, is by no means proportionable to the novelty of objects alone; it depends much more upon the temperature of the body, and a variety of other particulars.

AXIOM VIII.

We find by experience, that our minds are so constituted, that some degree of passion or desire is necessary to action; so that an entire suspension of them would be attended with a stagnation of all our faculties.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. vii. § 3. Descartes de Pass. § 40. Spectator, vol. iv. No. 255.

COROLLARY.

It must be of the greatest importance, in order to influence men to a due course of action, to know how to awaken or moderate their passions by proper application to them; and those who act as if they desired entirely to eradicate the passions, are ignorant of the constitution of human nature, and can expect but little success in their attempts to work upon the mind.

Doddridge's Dedication of Ten Serm. p. 10.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Mr. Locke maintains that desire is always a state of uneasiness; but it is certain that, in many cases, the uneasiness is abundantly overbalanced by a probable prospect of the immediate enjoyment of good; and if some degree of uneasiness be universally necessary to action, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to conceive how any active being can be perfectly happy.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 32—34. Watts on Liberty, p. 23—25. Grove's Posth. Works, vol. iv. p. 136, 137. Watts's Essay on the Freedom of Will in God and his Creatures, octavo; or his works, vol. vi. p. 382, 383.

SCHOLIUM 2.

We cannot mistake in judging of present pleasure or pain, as the incentives of desire or aversion; but in judging of future we often do.

Locke's Ess. ib. § 61—65.

LECTURE XVI.

DEFINITION XIX.

When a being is determined to the performance of any action, not by a view of the beneficial consequences that may attend it, but merely from a strong impulse leading to the action itself, that being is said to act by INSTINCT.

COROLLARY 1.

There are many remarkable instincts in mankind, which greatly tend both to the good of individuals and the species. Those which are called Natural Appetites, plainly come under this class; to which may be added parental affection, and some workings of compassion and gratitude; though it must be granted the force of all these is very different in different persons.

Baxter's Pract. Works, vol. i. p. 379. col. 2. Andrey apud Mem. of Literat. vol. i. p. 15. Hutcheson's Inq. p. 143—147, 195—199.

COROLLARY 2.

Brutes are governed by instinct in many of their actions, as was observed above, in Prop. 2. gr. 6. The reason upon which many of their actions depend, could not be discovered without a penetration far beyond what is to be found in the generality of men. See particular instances of this in the bee (a), in the ant (b), in the wasp (c), in the raven (d), in the formica leo (e), in the gallinæ sylvestres (f), in the bohaques (g), in the fox (h), in the beaver (i), in the Turkey-hen (k), in the common hen (l), besides many others (m).

(a) Ray's Wisdom of God, p. 132, 133. 2d edit. p. 122—124. Nat. Disp vol. i. p. 168—178, 182—184, 194—202. the Guardian, vol. ii. No. 156, 157. Plin. Nat. Hist. xi. 30.

(b) Nat. Displ. part i. p. 126—148.

(d) Albert. Magnus, apud Grad. Harm. part ii. p. 67, note in the margin.

(e) Nat. Displ. part i. p. 234—240.

(f) Derham's Phys. Theol. p. 229.

(g) Derham, ib. p. 242. (h) Derham, ib. p. 204.

(i) Nat. Displ. part II. p. 105—114.

(k) Nat. Displ. ib. p. 20, 21.

(l) Spect. vol. II. No. 120.

(m) Cicero de Nat. Deor. lib. ii. § 48—50. Cambray sur l'Exist. § 23. p. 46, 47. Scott's Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 211—220. Essay on Hunting, p. 53, 54. Pope's Ethic Epist. iii. ver. 172—198.*

SCHOLIUM 1.

That instinct is not mere imitation, see proved by a remarkable story in Galen, apud Ray's Wisd. of God, p. 349–353, 2d edit. p. 133—135.

It is probable that, in most instances, if not in all, the actions to which any being is determined by instinct, are accompanied with immediate pleasure.

LECTURE XVII.

DEFINITION XX.

A MENTAL HABIT is a facility of thinking or willing any action acquired by frequent acts.

PROPOSITION XV.

Mental habits do very much depend upon the memory.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Memory, furnishing us with ideas and relations, makes it easy for us to think upon any subject.

2. Furnishing us with motives, it makes it easy to will it.

3. When memory ceases, we see that mental habits are destroyed.

1, 2, and 3. 4. Valet propositio. Def. 20. Clericî Pneum. sect. i. c. iv. § 18—22.

COROLLARY 1.

Mental habits must very much depend on the body, since memory plainly does so. Prop. 8. Sol. gr. 4.

COROLLARY 2.

The facility with which the body obeys the command of the mind, is a thing different from mental habit, yet it may have some affinity to it, as bodily motion depends upon volition.

COROLLARY 3.

No habits can in strict propriety of speech be said to be infused; since it is impossible the first act of any kind should be the effect of habit, according to the definition; yet a disposition may be given to perform acts at first with as much readiness as if they had been learnt by long practice. Neither can any habit be properly said to be hereditary, yet there may be, and it is plain in fact that there are, certain hereditary dispositions towards contracting habits of one kind rather than another.

SCHOLIUM 1.

On these principles some account for the phenomenon which has frequently been observed, that a great degree of wit and judgment seldom meet in the same person; because wit is a habit of finding out the resemblance of ideas, and making an agreeable assemblage of them; whereas judgment is the habit of distinguishing accurately between those that have some resemblance, though they really differ. It is not to be wondered at, if two such different habits do not ordinarily occur in the same mind. Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged highly probable, that habit is not the only thing that makes the difference between various persons in this respect, though it may serve very much to increase it.† See Prop. 3. Schol. 1.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xi. sect. 2.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Idiots reason very little, and make few propositions; whereas the madman reasons very much, and often justly, but upon very precarious and false principles. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xi. sect. 12, 13.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The force of habit, both mental and corporeal, is so great, that it is an evident part of wisdom to take care how habits are formed; and it is worth our while to use great labour to turn and fix them on the right side.

Tillotson's Serm. vol. i. No. 29 p. 301—304. Dodsl. Precept. vol. ii. p. 519—530.

DEFINITION XXI.

Those properties of any being are called PERFECTIONS, which directly tend to promote its happiness.

COROLLARY.

Only spirits are capable of perfection, since a capacity for happiness implies perfection, i. e. thought.

SCHOLIUM.

Nevertheless, in an inferior sense, or by analogy, insensible beings may be called perfect, i. e. as they are fitted to answer the purposes intended by them. Watts's Ontol. c. viii. p. 333—335.

* Great light has been thrown upon the properties and instincts of animals by many recent writers. See particularly Bulfon's Natural History, Pennant's Arctic Zoology and George Edwards's Works, to which several other productions might be added. Many of the Voyages and Travels that have lately been published are worthy of being particularly studied in this view. The information given by Captain Cook, and the other circumnavigators of the globe, must not be forgotten.

† For the different accounts which have been given of Wit, reference may be had to the Spectator, vol. i. No. 62. vol. ii. No. 253. Mr. Harris's Dialogues on Happiness, vol. ii. p. 170. Kames's Elements of Criticism, vol. ii. chap. xvi. p. 98—81.

LECTURE XVIII.

DEFINITION XXII.

That mind is said to be possessed of NATURAL LIBERTY, or liberty of choice, which is so constituted as that its volitions shall not be invincibly determined by any foreign cause or consideration whatever offered to it, but by its own sovereign pleasure.

COROLLARY 1.

If any instance occurs in which the mind can choose no otherwise than it does, it is not in that instance naturally free; though it chooses with the greatest delight, and executes its volitions without any restraint.

Watts on Liberty, p. 8, 9. Collins on Liberty, part ii. ed. 2. Limborch's Theology, lib. ii. c. xxiii. sect. 20.

COROLLARY 2.

Natural liberty, as before defined, includes what some have called a liberty of contrariety, as well as of contradiction; i. e. supposes the mind able to choose the contrary, as well as to defer its choice, if indeed these two expressions do not signify in fact the same thing, which in some connexions at least they may. Hutcheson's Metaph. p. 22.

DEFINITION XXIII.

EXTERNAL LIBERTY, or liberty of action, is opposed to a constraint laid on the executive powers; and consists in a power of rendering our volitions effectual.

COROLLARY.

There may be external where there is not natural liberty,—and vice versa. Watts on Lib. p. 4, 5.

SCHOLIUM.

The liberty of which Mr. Locke generally treats, is a liberty of action, not of choice; and that Collins expressly allows.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 7—13, 21—30, 71. Collins on Lib. p. 115—118.

DEFINITION XXIV.

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBERTY consists in a prevailing disposition to act according to the dictates of reason; i. e. in such a manner as shall, all things considered, most effectually promote our happiness. A disposition to act contrary to this is MENTAL SERVITUDE: and when the mind is equally disposed to follow reason, or act contrary to it, it is then said to be in a state of INDIFFERENCE.

Tillots. Serm. vol. ii. p. 617, 618. Pers. Sat. v. ver. 124—191. Clarke's Serm. vol. iii. No. 1. p. 5—13. ed. 12mo.

COROLLARY.

Philosophical liberty is a perfection of the mind, (see Def. 21.) since much of our happiness depends on our conduct; and by acting according to reason, much good may be obtained, and much evil avoided.

DEFINITION XXV.

A man is said to be MORALLY FREE, when there is no interposition of the will of a Superior Being, to prohibit or determine his actions in any particular under consideration. Watts on Liberty, p. 4.

COROLLARY.

As the same man may be subject to the control of various superiors, one of whom may allow what another prohibits, he may, as to the same action, be said to be or not to be morally free, according to the persons whose will is in question. Nevertheless, where there is one who has a much greater power and authority over him than any of the rest, it is proper to judge of his moral freedom by considering the will of such a superior person.

DEFINITION XXVI.

Complete liberty consists in the union of natural, external, moral, and philosophical liberty, without any struggle or difficulty.

Watts on Lib. p. 9—12. Collliber's Inq. p. 47—59. edit. 3.

COROLLARY 1.

Complete liberty, on the whole, is a perfection. See Def. 24. Cor.

COROLLARY 2.

Complete liberty seems to consist in a certain symmetry or subordination of the faculties; and, when applied to such beings as ourselves, supposes a serene understanding, moderate passions rising in proportion to the nature of objects, the will choosing to follow such regular impressions, and the executive powers readily and vigorously performing its dictates.

COROLLARY 3.

When we speak of complete liberty, it is not so proper to inquire whether the will be free, but rather whether the man be so. (See Prop. 1. Schol. 1.) Yet natural liberty evidently belongs to the will. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 14—19. Watts's Ess. No. xii. § 5.

SCHOLIUM.

What some call a liberty of spontaneity, consists merely in choosing to perform any particular action: nor does it at all enter into the question, whether we can choose or perform the contrary, but since this is nothing more than willing, it does not deserve the name of liberty.

For the Cartesian notion of it, see

Descartes Princ. i. § 37—39. Watts on Lib. p. 6.

LECTURE XIX.

PROPOSITION XVI.

The mind of man is possessed of natural liberty, i. e. liberty of choice.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. We are conscious to ourselves, that we have a power of choosing otherwise than we do, in a multitude of instances.

2. We universally agree that some actions deserve praise and others blame; and we sometimes condemn ourselves as conscious of the latter; for which there could be no foundation at all, if we were invincibly determined in every volition, and had it to say, we had done the best we possibly could.

3. The laws of all nations agree to punish some actions in a man who is master of his reason; for which they would not punish one whom they knew to be distracted.

4. When equal objects are proposed to our choice, we sometimes determine to choose one of them rather than another, without being able to assign any reason for such a preference.

1, 2, 3, 4. 5. Valet propositio.

Grove of Hum. Lib. § 13—16. Watts on Liberty, § 3. p. 28—39. Religion of Nature, p. 63, 64. edit. 4to. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 85—89.

COROLLARY.

The will is not determined (as some have asserted) by the last dictate, or rather assent, of the understanding, nor the greatest apparent good, nor a prevailing uneasiness; which last seems to coincide with the former.

Watts on Lib. p. 17—23, 25—27. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 35, 36. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 97—100. Clarke and Leibnitz, p. 403—415.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it is objected, that we are formed with a necessary desire of happiness, and consequently cannot choose any thing but what in present circumstances appears most conducive to it; and experience is appealed to as confirming the assertion, since we are always in fact most inclined to what we choose.

Answer. This must be acknowledged a considerable difficulty.

It is granted that what we choose must have some appearance of good; but the mind appears in fact, as well as from the reasoning in the proposition, to have a power of preferring a smaller present to a greater absent and future good, though at the same time it condemns itself of folly in such a choice; which it could never do if what it chose always appeared to be the greatest good, since then in every choice it would act according to the necessary impulse and constitution of its nature; and though we allow that there is always a greater inclination to what we choose than what we refuse, yet till this inclination be proved invincible, the proposition may hold good.

Turretine, vol. i. Loc. x. Qu. ii. § 7, 15, 16. Collins on Lib. p. 40—44. Burnet on the Art. p. 117, 118. Watts on Lib. p. 70—74. Grove on Lib. § 18, 19. Grove's Mor. Philos. vol. i. p. 205—214. Maclaurin's Newtonian Philos. p. 81—84. Clarke and Leibnitz, Append. No. 3. Cato's Letters, vol. iv. No. 3.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To the argument from self-accusation Collins replies, That it is only the sense of having acted against some rules, which on reflection we apprehend it would have been better for us to have followed, though it did not appear so when we did the action; but how then could conscience condemn us, not only in our after-reflections, but in the act itself? or how could we condemn ourselves for having done foolishly in choosing what did appear to us the greatest good, and could not but so appear?

Collins ib. p. 105, 106. Grove's Posth. Works, vol. iv. p. 93—148. præs. § 3—7, and § 21.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is objected to the argument, gr. 3. that punishments are often inflicted where it is granted there is no liberty at all,—as on lunatics, drunkards, and brutes.

Ans. It may be debated how far it is proper to call the severities used with them in some cases punishments, or how far they may be destitute of all natural liberty; but as for Collins's argument, That were man a free creature, rewards and punishments would signify nothing, because it would lie in his own breast to slight them,—it is most evidently weak; for nevertheless they would be a probable means of answering their end; and that they are not always effectual is evident in fact.

Collins ib. p. 86—88, 91—98.

LECTURE XX.

SCHOLIUM 4.

To the fourth argument (which is generally called choice, ἐν ἀδιαφορᾳ) it is answered by the opposers of natural liberty, That no such case can occur that two objects should appear entirely equal: and if there did, then a choice would be impossible; for that would imply an effect without a cause, or a balance turning when the weights are equal; but this is evidently taking the question for granted; for it will not be allowed that willing is a necessary effect, which must imply a compelling efficient cause; or the mind like a balance to be moved with weights; and as to the fact in question, a cause which we cannot assign is to us no cause, and yet in many such cases we determine.

Collins ib. p. 44—52, 57—59. Watts on Lib. p. 68—70. Clarke and Leibnitz, p. 38. § 1. p. 93—95, 121—123, 169, 173—177, 291. Append. No. iv. ix. p. 165. § 14, 15. p. 281—287. Cicero de Fato, § 24, 25. Jackson on Liberty, p. 193—196.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is further pleaded that such a liberty would be an imperfection to the human soul; because it would suppose in some instances to act without reason.

Ans. Our scheme of liberty supposes a power of choosing rationally in all instances; of seeing and preferring a greater good; and choosing of two objects equally good, one, where there is reason for taking one, though not for taking this rather than that; whereas to deny this is plainly to limit the mind in its power of choice and capacity for happiness in some instances;—yet, I think (though we allow that some particular pleasure may arise from the consciousness of having used this natural liberty aright, when it might have been abused) it must be granted, that a power of choosing worse rather than better is not necessary to the happiness of any being:—but is mankind in such a perfect state, that we are under a necessity of maintaining that it could not have been greater or happier than it is?

Collins ib. p. 62—83. Watts ib. p. 70—74. Colliber's Inquiry, p. 50, 51. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 48—52. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 119—121.

SCHOLIUM 6.

The sentiments of many considerable moderns may be seen in Collins on Lib. p. 14—31; and those of several ancients in Collins ib. p. 59—62. Jackson on Lib. p. 82—91. 98—113. Lucas's Inquiry, vol. i. p. 163—185, 130—135. Hutch. Metaph. Syn. c. iv. p. 22, 23, compared with p. 57.

SCHOLIUM 7.

What Mr. Locke's notion of liberty on the whole was, is much debated. The truth of the matter seems to be, that he changes his idea of it; sometimes meaning external liberty, of which he generally speaks, (see Def. 23. Schol.) sometimes philosophical, (as in the place quoted above, lib. ii. c. xxi. § 49.) and sometimes he seems to recur to the notion of natural liberty again, especially when he says in so many words, that freedom consists in not being under a necessary determination of our will in any particular action (§ 51) and in a power of suspension (§ 52); by which last manner of stating it, he seems not to throw any light upon the question; since all the difficulty attending a possibility of determining to act one way or another, will attend a possibility of determining to act or not to act.

Locke's Fam. Epist. p. 474, &c. præsert. p. 480.

SCHOLIUM 8.

Those who believe the being and perfections of God, and a state of retribution, in which he will reward and punish mankind according to the diversity of their actions, will find it difficult to reconcile the justice of punishment with the necessity of crimes punished; and they that believe all that the Scripture says on the one hand of the eternity of future punishments, and on the other of God's compassion to sinners, and his solemn assurance that he desires not their death, will find the difficulty greatly increased; but as many of the words here used are not yet strictly defined, nor the evidence of the propositions stated, it may suffice briefly to have suggested the thought.

Cato's Letters, vol. iv. No. 110. Jackson's Reply, passim. Hartley on Man, vol. i. p. 500—511.*

LECTURE XXI.

PROPOSITION XVII.

The philosophical liberty of the mind is much impaired, and we are obnoxious to a lamentable degree of servitude. Def. 24.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The understanding is often so far influenced by the passions, as to be unwilling to enter on reasonings which may seem to lead to a conclusion contrary to our interest.

2. The passions and prejudices of our minds insensibly mingle themselves with the whole process of reasoning when it is undertaken, leading into many embarrassments and inconsistencies, obscuring truth and gilding error; so that frequently the judgment is formed upon a very unfair hearing, agreeably to the bias the mind is under, and con-

* Since the preceding Lectures were written, the question concerning Liberty and Necessity has again received a most copious and acute discussion. See Jonathan Edwards's Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will;—The Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity illustrated, by Dr. Priestley;—A free Discussion of the Doctrines of Materialism and Philosophical Necessity, in a Correspondence between Dr. Price and Dr. Priestley;—Observations in Defence of the Liberty of Man, as a Moral Agent, by the Rev. John Palmer.—Dr. Priestley's Letter to Mr. Palmer, in Defence of his Illustrations;—Mr. Palmer's Appendix to his Observations;—Dr. Priestley's Second Letter to Mr. Palmer;—Mr. Jacob Bryant's Address to Dr. Priestley, upon his Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity illustrated;—Dr. Priestley's Letter to Mr. Bryant;—Dawes's Free Inquiry into the Merits of a Controversy between Dr. Price and Dr. Priestley;—The Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity briefly invalidated;—Reid's Essays on the Active Powers of Man, p. 267—368;—The Notes to the new edition of Hartley on Man;—Belsham's Essays, Philosophical, Historical, and Literary, vol. i. p. 1—15;—Essays, Philosophical and Literary, by Dr. Gregory of Edinburgh;—and Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. i. p. 283—317.

trary to the evidence that might have been obtained.

3. We often find it difficult to excite our passions at the command of reason, and to fix them on objects which appear to our understanding most worthy of regard: on the contrary, they are often excited by such objects as the understanding has been by irresistible evidence compelled to disapprove; and thereby we are led to commit actions which, while we do them, we condemn ourselves for.

4. Bodily constitution and appetite have sometimes almost a constraining power to hinder the execution of the wisest volitions. Yet it must be acknowledged, this impulse is not invincible; we may stop ourselves in the career, and enter upon a contrary course: so that, upon the whole, the way to happiness is rather difficult than impossible. See Prop. 15. Schol. 3. and Prop. 16.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 47, 56—59.

COROLLARY.

It is plain from these phenomena, of which experience may convince us too surely, that the symmetry of the soul, and subordination of its faculties, mentioned Def. 26. Cor. 2, in which complete liberty consists, is in a great measure violated in the human soul; but whether it were originally in the same state, cannot be determined till we have examined other previous propositions.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxi. § 53—55. Seed's Serm. vol. ii. p. 339—344.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is greatly debated, how far the will has in our present state any influence on the judgment, in assenting to any proposition in question. Some maintain that it cannot have any influence at all; but I think experience proves the contrary: and though there must be some show of argument to determine the judgment, yet it seems to be the consequence of that natural liberty, asserted Prop. 16. that the mind can divert itself from examining proofs which are likely to establish a disagreeable proposition; and by labouring to confirm and embellish arguments on the favourite side of the question, can bring itself to assent to what it wishes to find true, though vastly superior evidence on the contrary side were fairly within its reach. Yet it must be acknowledged, that this remark only takes place in propositions which have some certain limited degree of evidence, since there are some cases in which the truth will invincibly force itself upon the understanding, and no artifice can be sufficient to evade it.

Collins on Lib. p. 33—36. Clarke's Pneumat. lib. i. c. iii. § 14. Watts on Lib. p. 13—16. Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. xx. § 6, 12—16. Clarke and Leibn. p. 103—115.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Many actions of brutes seem to discover some degree of liberty, but how far they are possessed of it seems impossible for us to determine, since all the principal proofs of the natural liberty of the human mind arise from what passes within ourselves, and what we learn by discoursing with other men, and not merely from what we observe in their most rational or capricious actions.

Reynault's Philos. Concern. vol. iii. p. 82—87.

LECTURE XXII.

PROPOSITION XVIII.

There are many particulars in which the knowledge we have of our own minds is very imperfect, and we are, as it were, a mystery to ourselves.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. We know not what our soul is, otherwise than by its operations; but are not able to determine what that constitution is whence those operations proceed, or what particular and distinct idea is to be affixed to the word principle; if we may call it, as many do, an intelligent or conscious principle.—See Def. 3. Cor. 2. Def. 5. Schol. 1. Def. 9.

2. We know not how the soul is united to the body, or what connexion there is between impressions made upon the organs of sensation and the ideas arising in our minds, or between the volitions of our minds and the consequent motions of our bodies.—Prop. 1. Schol. 2.

3. We know not certainly how ideas are laid up in the memory; it is not demonstrably evident that there are traces in the brain correspondent to those ideas (Prop. 8.), but if it were, how recollection is performed, and in many cases why one idea is recollected rather than another, is not possible for us to say.—Prop. 8. Schol. 3.

4. It still remains in some degree an uncertain question, Whether we think always, or only by intervals.—Prop. 12. Dem.

5. It is extremely difficult to remove all the objections against liberty of choice, especially against that which is stated Prop. 16. Schol. 1.

6. The question wherein personal identity consists, how plain soever it may have appeared to some, has been differently determined by different persons of great learning and abilities, and is, after all, attended with some perplexities, perhaps chiefly arising from what is mentioned above, gr. 1.

Vid. Prop. 11.

7. The phenomenon of dreams does also contain some very unaccountable things. How ideas are then suggested to the mind, in the reception of which we are entirely passive, how dialogues are formed, and how the moral principles of action seem to be suspended, even while we continue to reason (though often after a wild and inconclusive manner) upon circumstances and events in which we imagine ourselves to be engaged. Vid. Prop. 3. gr. 5. Baxter on the Soul, vol. ii. § 1. 8vo edit.

8. The phenomenon of phrenzy is likewise very unaccountable, and how the state of the nerves and juices of the body at that time should so strangely affect our rational powers, and make us creatures so very different from ourselves.—Prop. 3. gr. 6.

1—8. 9. Valet propositio.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The like may in some degree be said of the imperfection of the knowledge we have concerning our own bodies: in which, though great improvements and discoveries have been made, some very important questions still remain undecided, v. g. By what mechanism animal secretion, respiration, and muscular motion are performed'—whence the systole and diastole of the heart arises'—what is the use of the spleen and the cæcum'—not to mention the rationale of many distempers, about which many celebrated physicians are much divided, and almost the whole doctrine of the nerves.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The phenomena mentioned in the proposition and the preceding scholium, serve to illustrate Prop. 10. and add a very important article to it.

COROLLARY 1.

It becomes us to maintain a deep and constant sense of the ignorance and weakness of our own minds, when we always carry about, in the very constitution of them and our bodies, such affecting demonstrations of it.

COROLLARY 2.

Since such a modest sense of our weakness and ignorance will have a great tendency to promote the honour and happiness of our lives, by teaching us to avoid many instances of arrogance and self-conceit, which expose men both to enmity and contempt; therefore Pneumatology, which leads us into this humbling view, is a noble and useful study.—(Compare Prop. 3. Cor. Prop. 10 and 17.)*

COROLLARY 3.

If we should hereafter prove the existence of any being vastly superior to us, and especially of a being possessed of infinite perfections, it must be expected that there will be many things relating to him, which it is not possible for us fully to explain or comprehend; and our inquiries concerning such a being ought to be pursued with great modesty and humility.

Butler's Serm. p. 303—305. Spectator, vol. viii. No. 590. Jonval's Letter, apud Nat. Displ. vol. i. part 2. p. 293, &c.

PART II.

OF THE BEING OF A GOD, AND HIS NATURAL PERFECTIONS.

LECTURE XXIII.

AXIOM IX.

It is impossible that any thing should of itself arise into being, or that it should be produced without some producing cause, existing in order of time, as well as of nature, prior to the thing so produced; or, in other words, which must not be considered before the effect, in order to understand it thoroughly, but must also be supposed to have existed before it.

DEFINITION XXVII.

That is said to be a SELF-EXISTENT, or NECESSARILY EXISTENT, BEING, which does not owe its existence to any other being whatsoever, either as its cause or its support, but would exist, or be what it is, were there no other being in the whole compass of Nature but itself.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 17. 18. Burnet. ib. vol. i. p. 7, 8.

SCHOLIUM.

It seems safer, in this momentous argument on which we are now entering, to acquiesce in this general and simple idea of self-existence, gradually deducing from thence other ideas connected with

* Though it is the only design of the author to point out new references and authors, he cannot forbear recommending the study of those two excellences to the attention of academical youths. When it is considered how extensive a subject many questions in Natural Art, and what different conclusions have been drawn even by men of the profoundest knowledge, and the deepest reflection, there is a modest confidence which is well becoming young students to observe, till time shall have given them the opportunity of wider inquiry and deeper observation. They ought to avoid and have their minds disengaged from all prejudices, which have originally crept into arguments, whether themselves or our ears or eyes admit, without sufficiently examining that judgment of reasoning and that close exactness of examination, which are always to be the most favourable to the acquisition of truth.

it, than to state it, as Dr. Clarke has done, "That which cannot so much as be imagined not to exist, or that which has necessity for the cause of its existence;" since, if there be any self-existent being at all, it seems not proper to ascribe its existence to any cause whatsoever.

Law's Inq. p. 147—150. Abernethy's Serm. vol. i. p. 191—193, Dubl. edit. p. 203—205, Lond.

COROLLARY 1.

If any self-existent being does now exist, it has existed from all eternity; for if it ever began to exist, it must (by the 9th Axiom) have owed its existence to some prior being as its cause,—which is plainly contradictory to the notion of self-existence stated above.

COROLLARY 2.

If there be, or ever has been, any self-existent being, it is also everlasting, i. e. it will never cease to be; for dissolution must arise from something external or internal; but nothing external can dissolve that which depends upon no other being for its support; and no imaginable reason can be assigned why there should be any internal cause of dissolution in that being which has (by Cor. 1.) existed from eternity, or which was indeed in any single past moment self-existent and independent; which is so plain, that, whoever may have denied the existence of a self-existent being, none have ever asserted that there was such a being, and that his existence is now extinguished and lost; or that there is some self-existent being, which, though now subsisting, will at length be destroyed, or dissolved of itself; yet it must be owned that a late writer, who seems determined to carry scepticism to the greatest excess, has presumed to call this matter into question. Hume's Philos. Essays, p. 253.

COROLLARY 3.

If there be any self-existent being, it is also immutable; for since a being is the same with all its properties taken together, (Def. 3. Cor. 1.) if any property were taken away from it, a part of the being would perish, which is inconsistent with its being necessary (Cor. 2.); or if any properties were added, the being itself would not be eternal, and therefore not necessarily existent. Cor. 1.

Cranz. Log. vol. i. p. 126. Abern. vol. i. p. 196—200, Dub. edit. p. 209—213, Lond.

COROLLARY 4.

There is no medium between a self-existent and derived being; or, in other words, whatever exists at all is either self-existent or derived.

COROLLARY 5.

The existence of every derived being may at length be traced up, either mediately or immediately, to what is self-existent; which, in order to its producing it, must, according to the Axiom, have existed before it. Cor. 1. Axiom 9.

COROLLARY 6.

From the Corollary above it will follow, that whatever is eternal is self-existent.

COROLLARY 7.

To maintain a series or succession of derived beings from eternity, is most absurd: for every series supposes some first; and to suppose that first to be derived, is self-contradictory, (as above, Cor. 5.) with this further absurdity, that the greater the series, the greater support it will need, as a chain consisting of many links will need a greater support than one consisting but of a few such links; and should a circle of causes be supposed, instead of solving, it will, if possible, increase the absurdity, since this would suppose every cause in the circle to have produced itself, and all the other causes too.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 11—14. Woolast. Rel. of Nat. p. 65—68.

DEFINITION XXVIII.

That is said to be simply infinite in its kind which has no bounds, or than which nothing in its kind can be conceived greater; but if it be conceived as bounded in some respects, and unbounded in others, then it is said to be only infinite secundum quid, as a line infinitely produced one way from a given point: but this is a very improper sense of the word.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xvii. § 1—3. Watts's Ontology, c. xvii.

COROLLARY.

Whatever is self-existent has all its properties infinite (see Def. 27.); for if it be necessary in any time or place, (if it be its nature to exist in time and place,) it must be necessary at all times and in all places; and since, whatever its other properties are, to set bounds to them is to assert its non-existence beyond those bounds, whether of power, wisdom, &c. it seems extremely probable, not to say certain, that what hinders its existence beyond those bounds might hinder its existence entirely; but it could not be a self-existent being, if its existence might have been hindered, or could be destroyed.

Clarke, p. 158, 159, 162, 163, 165, 166, 169—176.

SCHOLIUM 1.

On much the same principles, Mr. Grove directly infers, That a being necessarily existent must be infinitely perfect. Some perfections it must have, or it could not be any thing at all; and for the same reason that it has any one perfection, and in any one degree, it must be possessed of all possible perfections, and in all possible degrees; but this is a point of so great importance, that we choose rather to infer it from other mediums of argument, than to rest the whole stress of it upon such a deduction, especially as upon the principles of Def. 21. Cor. this argument can have no place till it be proved that whatever is self-existent is percipient, or endued with thought.

Grove's Posth. Works, vol. iv. p. 7. Howe's Living Temple, part i. c. iv. § 2, 3.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is disputed whether our idea of infinite be a negative or positive idea. Some have pleaded, That bounds imply a negation of continued existence beyond them; and consequently by removing this negation we form a positive idea.

Cambray sur l'Exist. p. 379—383. Boyse's Translation, p. 145—151. Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xvii. § 13, 16—19.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It may also be queried, Whether our idea of infinite be a simple or compound idea?—Yet I think it may more properly be said to be a simple idea, as no addition of finites can make up an infinite. It will be difficult to find out any idea more simple.

PROPOSITION XIX

Something has existed from eternity.

DEMONSTRATION

Ax. 1. 1. It is evident that something does actually exist; v. g. we know that we ourselves do.

2. If something has not existed from eternity, the things which now are must have risen absolutely from nothing, and without any producing cause, contrary to Ax. 9.

1, 2. 3. We are certain something has existed from eternity.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 8, 9. Abern. Serm. vol. i. p. 184—187, Dubl. edit.; p. 195—198, Lond.

SCHOLIUM.

It must be acknowledged extremely difficult to conceive of any thing having existed from eternity; yet since there are such evident proofs of it, we learn that a thing may be true, the manner of which is entirely inconceivable to our limited minds, or against which some objections may lie which to us are unanswerable.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 9—11.

PROPOSITION XX

There has from eternity existed some self-existent or necessary Being.

DEMONSTRATION

Prop. 19. 1. There has from eternity existed something, either self-existent or derived. See Def. 27. Cor. 4.

Def. 27. 2. If there were not so evident an absurdity as there seems to be, in supposing a derived being eternal, yet its existence (even granting its eternity, and much more evidently supposing it not to be so) may be traced up to a self-existent Being, which as self-existent is eternal.

1, 2. 3. Valet propositio.

SCHOLIUM.

The proposition follows directly from Def. 27. Cor. 6. but we choose to keep it in its present form; that if any should think there may be an eternal necessary emanation from a self-existent principle, as many have maintained, the foregoing proposition might rest on a foundation not to be affected by such an apprehension.

Introd. to the Ancient Univ. Hist. p. 5. 8vo edit.

LECTURE XXIV.

PROPOSITION XXI.

The system of things, which we call the material world, did not exist from eternity in its present form; but had a beginning.

DEMONSTRATION

Arg. 1. We may not only conceive of many possible alterations which might be made in the form of it, but we see it incessantly changing; whereas an eternal Being, for as much as it is self-existent, is always the same. Def. 27. Cor. 8.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 22, 23.

Arg. 2. We have no credible history of transactions more remote than six thousand years from the present time; for, as to the pretence that some nations have made to histories of greater antiquity, as the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Phœnicians, Chinese, &c. they are evidently convicted of falsehood at large in Stillingfleet's Orig. Sacr. p. 15—106. Millar's Propag. of Christ. vol. i. p. 100—112. Pearson on the Creed, p. 58—60. Jenkins of Christianity, vol. ii. pref. p. 4—11. Allix's Reflections, vol. i. p. 95—120. Winder's Hist. of Knowledge, vol. ii. passim. Lucret. lib. v. ver. 325—330.*

Arg. 3. We can trace the invention of the most useful arts and sciences; which had probably been carried further, and invented sooner, had the world been eternal.

Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. vii. viii. Lucret. lib. v. ver. 331—339. Nichols's Conf. vol. i. p. 76—87. 12mo; p. 45—51. 8vo. Cheyne's Princ. c. ii. § 24. p. 63—68. Burnet's Theory, vol. i. p. 54—59.

Arg. 4. The origin of the most considerable nations of the earth may be traced; i. e. the time when they first inhabited the countries where they now dwell: and it appears that most of the western nations came from the east.

* The Hindoos make great pretensions to a very high antiquity and credit has been given to their assertions. But the extravagance of their chronology has been shown by the best of all judges, Sir William Jones, as may be seen in his Dissertation on the subject, published in the second volume of the Asiatic Researches.

Newton's Chron. passim. Patrick on Genesis c. x. Wells's Geog. of the Old Test. vol. i. c. iii. Pearson on the Creed, p. 60, 61. Perizon. Cumberl. de aerug. Gent. et Bochart's Phaleg. passim. Bryant's Mythology, passim. Michaelis's Spicilegium Geog. Heb. pass.

SCHOLIUM.

If it be said that deluges, pestilences, conflagrations, &c. destroy men with their inventions, it may be answered, (1.) If the world were eternal, there must have been an immense number of these devastations; and it is amazing (if there be, as this hypothesis supposes, no superior Being that presides over them) that they should not have destroyed the whole human race. (2.) If any had survived, the most useful arts would have been preserved.

Lucret. lib. v. ver. 339—352. Pearson on the Creed, p. 61, margin. Religion of Nature, p. 91, 92.

LECTURE XXV.

Arg. 5. The projectile force of the planets is continually diminishing, by the resistance of the fluid through which they pass, i. e. the rays of light; which are every where diffused through all parts of their orbits in so vast a quantity, that multitudes of them fall on bodies too small to be discerned by the naked eye, as appears by microscopical observation. Now, if we allow this diminution in the projectile force in one year or age to be ever so small, there must be a finite time in which it will be utterly destroyed; and consequently, had the present system of things been eternal (since on this supposition the same laws of Nature must have prevailed) the planets would long ago have fallen into the sun.

Watts's Ess. No. x. § 1. p. 242—245. Cheyne's Princ. c. ii. § 20. p. 53—56.

Arg. 6. The sun is continually losing some of its light; and consequently must, long ere this time, have been reduced to utter darkness, if the world had been eternal. If it be said, That every ray of light, after a certain elongation, falls back into the sun,—we answer, Some of them must, in their return, strike on the planets, falling on their dark hemisphere, by which means they would be absorbed, and the decay would be real, though more gradual, according to the reasoning above. If it be answered, That there may be some kind of fuel provided, as suppose comets, by which the sun is fed,—we reply, That fuel is or is not exactly adjusted to the expense of his flame; if it is not exactly adjusted, if too little, the consequence urged above will at length, though still more slowly, follow; if too much, the sun growing continually hotter, the Earth and other planets must have been burnt up, and so an argument against its eternity will arise to another form, from the ever-growing heat of the sun; but if the adjustment be exact, it will be such a proof of design and government in the works of Nature, as would be so greatly serviceable in another view, that any friend of religion might willingly spare this argument against the world's eternity, when there are so many others unanswerably strong, and it may be observed, that a similar train of reasoning may take place as to some following particulars.

Cheyne's Princ. c. i. § 42. p. 95—98; c. ii. § 19. p. 51, 52.

Arg. 7. Since it is probable that the fixed stars and the sun attract each other,—had they been eternal, they must long ere this have met in the centre of gravity common to the whole universe; and nearly akin to this is the argument which may be drawn from the effect of the nearest access of the Earth to Mars, or any other superior planet; in consequence of which it might be supposed to be drawn by such attraction a little from its orbit; the eccentricity of which would by this means be continually increased, till the Earth were utterly destroyed. The like argument may be applied to the other planets, and especially to Saturn: but the thought is in general so much the same that it has not been judged necessary to insist upon it.

Cheyne's Princ. c. i. § 22. p. 58—60.

Arg. 8. Sir William Petty has attempted to prove that the number of mankind doubles in 300 years, but though the exactness of his computation should be doubted, if there be any periodical and constant increase at all, it will prove the world not to be eternal; as from a limited distance of time it must ere now have been overrun with human inhabitants. Some have indeed maintained a decrease since the Augustan Age;—but if it could be proved that mankind do actually decrease periodically, or that the increase is exactly balanced, this argument will stand on the same footing with Arg. 6. As for plagues, by which some suppose the balance to be made, if we may judge by what we know of their history, the diminution of mankind by them bears but a very small proportion to its increase, as computed by Petty.*

Nich. Conf. vol. i. p. 62—76, 8vo edit. p. 36—44. Cheyne's Princ. c. ii. § 25. p. 68—72. Pers. Lett. vol. ii. p. 148—158. Reflec. on Polyg. Diss. vii.

Arg. 9. Many substances are continually petrifying and ossifying, so that, had the world been eternal, the whole earth would have been but one stone, or the petrifaction must have ceased of itself; but if it be said, That these stones dissolve, and so there may be a kind of circulation,—it is answered, That stones grow in one year, which do not dissolve in many centuries.

* As to the controversy concerning the Decrease of Mankind since the Augustan Age, see the learned and ingenious discussion in Hume's Essay on the Populousness of Ancient Nations, and Wallace's Dissertation on the Numbers of Mankind.

The argument from the waste of fluids by the growth of animal and vegetable bodies, is much the same as this, so far as there is any solidity in it; but it may be queried, Whether the dissolution of those bodies, and separation of their consistent fluids in a series of years, may not answer this?

Nich. Conf. vol. i. p. 51—55; 8vo, p. 30—32. Clare on Fluids, p. 271, 272.

Arg. 10. Hills are continually subsiding, which will in some finite time reduce the world to a level. If it be objected, That this is balanced by earthquakes, &c. which raise mountains,—it is answered, The number of these so raised is comparatively small, and they being hollow, would soon be washed away.

Nich. Conf. vol. i. p. 55—62; 8vo, p. 32—36. Ray's Three Disc. No. iii. p. 344—364. Mountf. Trav. p. 377, 378. Burn. Theory, vol. i. p. 51—53.

Arg. 11. According to the best calculations which have been made, comets appear on an average at least in 30 years; but whether this account be exact or not, if their return be periodical, there would, within an imaginable time, have been more than a thousand millions cutting the earth's orbit in various directions; in consequence of which the earth must have been exposed to such danger, either of being drawn into the sun or separated from it, that, without a particular Providence, which this hypothesis opposes, its destruction must have happened long since.

Arg. 12. If the world be eternal, it is hard to account for the tradition of its beginning, which has almost every where prevailed, though under different forms, among both polite and barbarous nations.

Hale's Orig. of Man, § 2. c. xii. § 3. c. i. Grot. de Ver. lib. i. § 16. p. 26—40. Burnet's Arch. lib. ii. c. i. p. 273—285.

LECTURE XXVI.

COROLLARY 1.

There must have been some great and excellent Being, superior to this whole material system, by which it was reduced into that beautiful order, in which it now appears.

COROLLARY 2.

Hence we may infer the vanity and falsehood of Spinoza's doctrine, who asserts that the whole and every part of the material world is a self-existent being; for he expressly says, that one being or substance could not be produced by another; and that all things could be in no other order and manner than they are, i. e. that all things in their present form are necessary, and therefore eternal. Def. 27. and Cor. 1, 3.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 26—29. Camb. on Exist. p. 202—207. part ii. c. 2. Toland's Pantheisticon. p. 5—8. 54. 55. apud. Sykes's Connect. c. iv. p. 64—83. Orph. Carm. ap. Apul. Op. (de Mundo) p. 109. Ramsay's App. to Phil. Princ. vol. i. p. 197, &c. Campbell's Necess. of Rev. p. 368.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Those arguments which Redi, Malphigius, and several modern philosophers, have advanced against the doctrine of equivocal generation, either of animals or plants, have often been urged as conclusive against the eternity of the world: and if they will prove that every animal or plant of the present generation was not only contained in its immediate parent, but together with that parent in the remoter generation, and so on perpetually, it might indeed prove that, how small soever the bodies now grown up might be at any given time, there is a certain distance of generation, at which the organized body containing them and all intermediate generations, each bigger than the embryo in question was at that time, must have been bigger than even the whole mass of the earth. But it may be answered, That allowing no animal or plant to rise into visible form but from pre-existing parents of the same kind, it may nevertheless in its first stamina be formed anew, from some fluid before making an unorganized part of the adult parent; and in that case there will be no peculiar force in this argument, as lying against the eternity of the world; for that which arises from the exquisite workmanship of an animal body, and the absurdity of supposing it produced from any fluid or solid merely by mechanical laws, properly belongs to another question.

Redi de Gen. Insect. pass. Nieuwent. Rel. Phil. vol. i. c. xxi. § 9. Bentley at Boyle's Lect. Serm. iv. p. 127. ad fin. Cheyne's Princ. c. ii. § 23. p. 60—63. Ray's Wisd. of God, p. 298—326. Varen Geog. vol. i. p. 226. Engl.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Neither do we argue from the probability that the Torrid Zone would have taken fire; which is examined in Ray's Three Disc. p. 381—388.

SCHOLIUM 3.

We likewise wave those arguments which are taken from the supposed absurdity and impossibility of the world's having been actually eternal, or having existed through an infinite succession, because the same objection seems to lie against every thing which is said to be eternal, and the argument turns on the supposition, that an infinite is made up of a number of finites.

Burnet on the Art. p. 19, 20. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 35—37.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Some of the ancients, who speak of the eternity of the world, do not seem to intend it in the sense in which Spinoza asserts it. The arguments are designed to prove, either that something must be eternal, which is all that those of Ocellus Lucanus amount to; or that the world is a necessary eternal effect, flowing from the energy of the divine nature, which Aristotle seems to have thought; or that it was an eternal voluntary emanation from a supreme and infinitely perfect Cause, which was the opinion of Plato's followers. Nevertheless, there is reason to believe that some of them were properly Pantheists, in the same sense in which the term may be applied to the present followers of Spinoza. Compare Cor. 2.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 29—35. Nichols's Conf. vol. i. p. 22—36; 8vo. vol. i. p. 12—20.*

SCHOLIUM 5.

If any objection should be brought against the seventh argument, from the supposed infinite number of celestial bodies, which would occasion an equal attraction every way, we must defer the examination of that till we have proved that matter is not infinite; to which we shall quickly proceed.

LECTURE XXVII.

DEFINITION XXIX.

That is said to be an ESSENTIAL QUALITY which cannot cease, unless the being itself should be supposed to be destroyed. Watts's Log. p. 17, 18.

PROPOSITION XXII.

Motion is not essential to matter.

DEMONSTRATION I.

1. It is evident that when we have abstracted the idea of motion from any particle of matter, there will still remain the idea of extended solid substance, i. e. it will still be matter. See Def. 4 and 29.

2. If motion be essential to matter, then a motion must either be an equal tendency every way, or a prevailing tendency one way.

3. An equal tendency every way would certainly produce rest.

4. A prevailing tendency one way rather than another, must arise from some external cause; and if these motions were various, from causes that act in various manners, and not from the necessary nature of body or matter itself.

1 and 2. 3. 4. 5. Motion is not essential to matter. Q. E. D.

Toland's Lett. to Serena. No. 5. p. 186—202. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 24, 25.

DEMONSTRATION II.

Another proof may be drawn from the vis inertiæ, which Baxter has proved to be essential to matter, and which is directly contrary to necessary motion. This argument is stated at large in Baxter on the Soul, and as it cannot conveniently be contracted here, we choose to refer to the author himself.

Baxter on the Soul, vol. i. p. 1—78.

COROLLARY.

Since it appears that matter does move, (still supposing the reality of the material world,) it is evident there must be some first mover, i. e. some superior immaterial being, from whom its motion is derived.

SCHOLIUM.

The argument which Toland brings, in the passage cited above, to prove motion essential to matter, amounts to little more than the universal gravitation observed to prevail in it; but this may be sufficiently accounted for, by supposing it always impressed upon it by the Creator, and that it might, at his pleasure, be suspended, though no single particle of the whole material world should be now exempted from the influence.

PROPOSITION XXIII.

Matter is not self-existent or necessary.

DEMONSTRATION.

Def. 4. 1. Tangibility, solidity, or resistance, is essential to matter.

1. 2. If all space were full of matter, how fine soever the particles were, there must be on every side an invincible resistance to the motion of any one of those particles.

3. But we plainly see that there is motion in the corporeal world.

2. 3. 4. There is, therefore, a vacuum; as will be further illustrated in the scholium.

Def. 28. Cor. 5. But if matter were self-existent or necessary, there must be a universal plenum.

6. Matter is liable to continual changes in its place, contexture, situation, &c. which is inconsistent with its being self-existent. Def. 27. Cor. 3.

1, 5, and 6. 7. Matter is not self-existent. Q. E. D.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 503, 504, 2d. 26. Cudworth's Intell. Syst. p. 258—261. edit. 3. Bent. at Boyle's Lect. § 6. p. 211—213. Howe's Liv. Temp. part. ii. c. 2. § 5. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. ii. § 3. pass. p. 345—351. 356—359. 373—384.

* A concise and elegant view of the dubious [illegible] phenomena on this subject may be seen [illegible] Philosophy.

COROLLARY.

There must be some immaterial self-existent Being, by whom matter was at first created, supposing it now really to exist.—See Prop. 22. Cor. Def. 27. Cor. 5.

SCHOLIUM.

A vacuum may further be proved from the different specific gravity of bodies, compared with the vibrations of pendulums of unequal bulk and equal length in equal times: v. g. one of ten pounds vibrates just as fast as another of one pound whose rod is of the same length; it has, therefore, just ten times the momentum or force of motion, i. e. ten times the gravity; for here it is gravity that gives it the force; or, in other words, the gravity is as the quantity of matter: when, therefore, the gravity under the same bulk is unequal, it proves there is more matter in one mass than in the other, and consequently pores (at least) in the lighter, though the heavier were to be supposed entirely solid; and the experiment of the feather and guinea descending together in the exhausted receiver, establishes the argument on the same principles.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 503, 504.

LECTURE XXVIII.

AXIOM X.

If any being be the producing cause of another being, not merely occasionally, but by its own power, it is very reasonable to suppose that it was more excellent or perfect than its production, or at least equally so.

COROLLARY.

Seeing a thinking substance as such is more excellent than a substance destitute of thought, it is not to be imagined that spirit should be produced by a being which is not possessed of thought.

PROPOSITION XXIV.

It is in the nature of things utterly inconceivable and incredible, that thought should necessarily arise from matter.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. If thought could proceed from matter, it must either arise from the general nature of it, or must be peculiar to matter in some certain configuration and agitation.

2. Thought cannot arise from the nature of matter in general; for then every particle of matter would have thought, which is evidently false and ridiculous to affirm.

3. Any supposed alteration in the figure of the particles of matter, v. g. from squares to cubes, or cones, &c. has no apparent influence on the production of thought.

4. Motion in general, added to matter, cannot produce thought; for then almost all matter known to us, being actually, though not necessarily, in motion, and some of it in a wonderful swift agitation, must be cogitative, contrary to fact.

5. The change of its motion, v. g. from a straight line to any kind of curve, or vice versa, or its collision against other particles of matter, seems to have no tendency to produce thought.

1—5. 6. Valet propositio.

Abern. Serm. vol. i. p. 107—117. Bentley at Boyle's Lect. Serm. ii. p. 15—26; 8vo edit. p. 52—60. Clarke, ib. p. 52—57. Locke's Ess. l. iv. c. x. § 10.

COROLLARY.

Since we are sure there is such a thing as thought, (Ax. 2.) this is another argument independent on Prop. 23. Cor. to prove that there is some immaterial being. See Ax. 9.

Bentley ib. p. 29—36; 8vo edit. p. 68—74.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is to no purpose to object, That there may be some unknown connexion between certain modifications of matter and thought, from which thought may necessarily result, or that it may be produced from some unknown properties of matter, though not from those which are known; seeing many things are utterly incredible, which cannot be proved to be absolutely impossible.

SCHOLIUM 2.

If it be further objected, That it is as inconceivable that matter should arise from thought, as thought from matter,—it may be answered, That we are sure in fact, that, if there be any material world, matter is moved by thought, though we know not how it is done, and that it was actually produced by some immaterial being (Prop. 23. Cor.); but it cannot be proved in fact that thought is necessarily produced by matter, or that any thinking being has been mechanically produced from matter itself; though we allow that, according to the constitution of some superior being, thought is occasioned by it, i. e. that there is a certain wonderful harmony between impressions made on the material parts of our frame and thought; and that thinking beings are produced by a superior cause on certain concurrences in the material world.*

Sherlock, Chur. vol. ii. p. 236. Bart. on the Soul, vol. ii. p. 350, note.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It may not be improper here to collect the proof we have had of the existence of an immaterial being, which arises partly from the motion of mat-

* It is scarcely necessary to say how much the [illegible] of this learned author [illegible] by several [illegible] arguments, or proof-sentences [illegible] See particularly Preacher's Discourses on Matter and Spirit, and Cooper's Essays. Outline of our [illegible] Mr W. Bertram, in the second volume of his Essays, p. 1—30

ter. Prop. 22. Cor. and its existence, Prop. 23. Cor. and also from the existence of thought, which mere matter could not produce, Prop. 24. Cor. compared with Ax. 10. Cor.

PROPOSITION XXV

We are not ourselves necessary or self-existent beings.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. It is evident we are lately born into this world; and there is no proof of our existence before.

2. We evidently appear to be dependent on every thing about us.

3. The capacity and sentiments of our minds, as well as the powers of our bodies and our external circumstances, are almost continually changing.

Def. 27. Cor. 1, 3. 4. But every self-existent being is eternal, independent, and immutable.

1, 2, 3, 4. 5. We are not self-existent. Q. E. D.

Camb. sur l'Exist. p. 185—188.

COROLLARY 1.

There is some self-existent Being, from whom we mediately or immediately derive our existence, and to whom ultimately we owe all the faculties of our nature, and all the enjoyments of our lives.—Def. 27. Cor. 5.

COROLLARY 2.

There is great reason to believe that this Being is naturally much more excellent than we.

COROLLARY 3.

It is evident that, as we are already under great obligations to this Being, so we have a constant dependence upon him for every future period and circumstance of our existence.

COROLLARY 4.

It must be of the greatest importance for us most attentively to inquire after him, and to study his nature and properties, that we may, if possible, secure an interest in his favour.

Camb. sur l'Exist. p. 188, 189.

PROPOSITION XXVI.

That self-existent Being, from whom our existence was ultimately derived, (Prop. 25. Cor. 1.) is a Spirit.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Originally and primarily to produce a being is an action.

Grad. 1. Def. 10. Cor. 2. 2. That must be a Spirit, whereby any being whatsoever is originally and primarily produced.

Prop. 25. Cor. 1. 3. Our spirits were produced by some self-existent Being.

Ax. 10. Cor. 4. To suppose a thinking being produced by an unthinking cause, would be more evidently absurd than to suppose an unthinking being so produced.

2, 3, 4. 5. That self-existent Being, from whom our existence was ultimately derived, is a Spirit.—Q. E. D.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 49—52. Abernethy. vol. i. Serm. iv.

SCHOLIUM.

Though it seems more proper to state the evidence of this important proposition thus largely, it is in effect contained in Prop. 25. Cor. 2. since nothing that is not a spirit can be more excellent than our minds.

LECTURE XXIX.

DEFINITION XXX.

That self-existent spiritual Being, by whom we and the material world about us were originally formed, we call GOD.

Vanini Amphitheatrum Providentiæ, p. 8—10. apud Collib. Inq. p. 243, 244. Shaft. Char. vol. ii. p. 10, 11.

COROLLARY.

It appears from this definition that our idea of God is very complex, and is made up of many ideas arising both from sensation and reflection.

Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxiii. § 33—36.

PROPOSITION XXVII.

There is a God.

DEMONSTRATION I.

Prop. 23. Cor. 1. The matter of which this world or system consists, was originally created by a self-existent immaterial Being.

Prop. 22. Cor. 2. This matter was first put into motion by some superior, i. e. self-existent, Being. See Def. 27. Cor. 5.

Prop. 21. Cor. 1. 3. This material world was reduced into the beautiful form wherein it now appears, by some Being superior to it.

4. There is no reason to assert, nor has it ever, that we know of, been maintained by any, that the Being by whom the matter of our world was at first produced, was a different one from that by whom it was first moved and brought into the order in which it now appears.*

Prop. 25. Cor. 1 and 2. 5. Our spirits were also derived from some self-existent Spirit of superior excellence and perfection.

6. There is no apparent reason to believe that the Spirit by whom our spirits were originally produced, is a being different from that by whom this material world about us was created and formed.

1—6. 7. There is some self-existent Spiritual

* It may be observed here, that the Gnostics maintained the Demiurgus, or Maker of this world, to be different from the Supreme Being; but them they held matter itself to be eternal and coæqual. See Mosheim's Commentarii de Rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum, p. 64, and his Institutiones Majores Secul. prim. Pars Secunda, § 5 6 8

Being, by whom we and this material world were formed; i. e. there is a God.—Def. 30. Q. E. D.

Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. x. § 1—6.*

COROLLARY 1.

God is a Being more excellent than the material world, or than we, or than any other spirit, which may hereafter appear to be derived from him. See Ax. 10.

COROLLARY 2.

There is something so great and excellent in self-existence, joined with a degree of other perfections, superior to those which we can discover in any derived being whatsoever, that it seems most safe and reasonable, in all our further inquiries into the nature of God, to ascribe to him what appears to us most noble and excellent, and to separate from our ideas of him whatever is defective or contemptible; i. e. in other words, to conceive of him as a Being of infinite perfection; but of this more fully hereafter. See Def. 28. Cor. and Schol. 1.

Howe's Liv. Temp. part. i. c. iv.

DEMONSTRATION II

The being of a God proved from universal consent.

1. Almost all men, of every place and age, have acknowledged a God,—learned or unlearned, polite or barbarous, pious or wicked, fearful or courageous; and nations that have differed most in their genius and customs, have generally agreed in this important point.

2. This opinion must arise from prejudice or from right reason.

1. 3. It is exceedingly difficult, or rather impossible, to find any prejudice common to all who have embraced this opinion. Fear could not affect the courageous, nor the invention of politic princes, princes themselves, or barbarous nations; blind credulity would not affect the most philosophic inquirers, nor religious hopes men of impious characters; and as for the authority of one person affirming it, how could the notion have been so universally propagated, or merely on this authority so universally believed? If education infused it through succeeding generations, why has it been so much more uniform than any thing else which is supposed to be so transmitted?

4. It does not appear that particular prejudices can be assigned to suit the case of all particular persons.

3, 4. 5. This opinion does not appear to arise from prejudice.

2, 5. 6. It seems founded on right reason; i. e. there is a God. Q. E. D.

Wilkins on Nat. Rel. p. 41—49. p. 52—61. Tillots. Works, vol. i. p. 14—17. Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. iv. § 8, 9. Loubiere's Siam, part 3. c. xxii. xxiii. p. 130—132. Burn. on the Art. p. 17, 18. Gastrel of Nat. Relig. p. 26—38. Ridgley's Divin. vol. i. p. 12—14. Millar's Prop. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 161.†

SCHOLIUM.

The different notions that men have maintained of the Deity, and the opinion of many concerning a plurality of gods, is urged as an objection against the argument stated above; but it may be answered, That their difference in other things makes their agreement in this great principle so much the more remarkable; and it is certain there is not such an agreement in any false notion of the Deity, or plurality of gods, as there is in his existence in general; to which we may add, that the wrong notions particular persons have entertained concerning him, may often be accounted for by the variety of their genius, condition, education, &c.

Wilkins on Nat. Rel. p. 43—45. Burn. on the Art. p. 18, 19. Tillots. Works, v. i. p. 15, 16.

LECTURE XXX.

DEMONSTRATION III

In which the being of a God is proved from a brief survey of the Works of Nature.

LEMMA

This system of things, which we call the visible world, is full of beauty, harmony, and order.

DEMONSTRATION OF THE LEMMA

1. This appears by a survey of the heavenly bodies; in which we may distinctly consider their magnitude, number, due situation, that they may not interfere with one another, and may lay a foundation for certain astronomical discoveries, which would otherwise have been impossible, had there been a perfect similarity in situation and size. Especially in our system, we may remark the sun, that glorious fountain of light and vital influence, by which most of the other beauties of the creation around us are discovered, and the various planets with which he is surrounded; in which we may more particularly observe the correspondence between their distance from the central body about which they revolve, and the times in which their revolutions are performed, i. e. that the squares of their periodical times are as the cubes of their distances; the supply of moons to most of the distant planets, with the addition of a ring to Saturn; the agreement both of primary and secondary planets in a spherical figure; as well as the agreeable

* For other proofs of the being of a God, recourse may be had to Squire's Irreligion Indefensible.—Priestley's Institutes, his Letters to Philosophical Unbelievers, part the first,—and Bryant's Treatise on the Authenticity of the Scriptures, part the first

† How far the universal consent of the being of God is a fact may now particularly be traced from the number of late Voyages and Travels to all parts of the world, and to men in all the degrees of society variety that is observable in their size, and other phenomena relating to them.

Derham's Astr. Theology, pass. Nieuwent. Rel. Phil. vol. iii. Ray of Creat. p. 72—78. Nat. Disp. vol. iv. Baxt. Matho. Abern. vol. i. Serm. i.

2. The proposition appears from a view of the globe of the earth, in which, not to urge the gravitation of bodies on or near its surface towards its centre, which is common to our whole system at least, if not to the whole material world, and is the great cement of it, we may more distinctly consider its diurnal and annual motion; the atmosphere with which it is surrounded; its constituent parts, as it is a terraqueous globe, and composed of bodies of very different kinds, lodged upon or beneath its surface.

Bentley at Boyle's Lect. p. 310—314. Nieuw. Rel. Phil. vol. ii. cont. 17. p. 367—413. Derham's Phys. Theol. p. 4—18. Keil's Astron. Lect. xxi. sub init. 298, 299.

3. The vegetable productions with which the Earth is furnished, so various, beautiful, and useful.

Nat. Disp. vol. i. Dial. 14, 15. part 2. p. 158—248. Ray's Wisd. of God, p. 116—132. Derham's Phys. Theol. p. 404—424. Denne's Serm. on Veget.

4. The animal inhabitants of it; in which we can never sufficiently admire the organs of sensation, especially the eye and ear, the organs of respiration, of motion, those for receiving and digesting the aliment, and those intended for generation and the nourishment of the fœtus. In the inferior animals, it is wonderful to observe how their different organs are fitted for those different circumstances in life for which they are intended, and especially to the elements in which they are chiefly to live. To this head may be referred what was before said of their various instincts, Def. 18. Cor. 2. to which we may further add the limitation of their instincts, as well as animal sensations, within such degrees as the convenience of the animal requires.—Vid. Ess. on Man, part 1. But above all, in human creatures we may justly admire the faculties of the mind, as well as the structure of the body,—both which have been largely considered elsewhere.

Monro's Compar. Anat. pass. Derham's Phys. Theol. pass.

5. On the whole, it may be observed, that the more philosophy is improved and inquiries pursued, the more is the harmony and regularity of the works of nature illustrated, and the more evidently does it appear, that objections formerly made against them were owing to the ignorance of those that advanced them.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 55, 58, 103—106. Nat. Disp. vol. i. p. 13—15

6. As these things are wonderful when considered apart, so when the whole is considered as a system, and in reference to man, for whose use this Earth and what it contains seems principally to have been designed, many comparative beauties arise, which in a separate view, could not have been discovered.

Shaft. Char. vol. ii. p. 285—290.

SCHOLIUM 1.

These arguments are set in so strong and beautiful a light in the works of Ray, Derham, Nieuwentyt, Bonet, Baxter in his Matho, and in De la Pluche's Nature Displayed, especially in the first and fourth volumes, that they deserve a most attentive perusal at leisure.*

SCHOLIUM 2.

As to those objections which are brought from the noxious qualities of some vegetables, animals, or exhalations, from the limitation of our senses, from the helpless circumstances in which human infants are born, as well as from our being subject to diseases and death; besides those arising from the asperities of the surface of our globe, and the inclination of the axis of the earth to the plane of the ecliptic,—they are most of them so evidently weak, and capable of being retorted as beauties rather than defects; and they are all so well considered and confuted in the following references, that we shall not more distinctly examine them here.

Lucret. lib. v. ver. 196—235. Blackm. on the Creat. p. 78—92. Bentley at Boyle's Lect. Serm. iii. p. 10—17. 8vo edit. 5. p. 94—104. Ibid. Serm. viii. p. 22—40, 8vo edit. p. 83—90. Shaft. Char. vol. ii. p. 298—309. Ray on the Creat. p. 249—255. Keil's Exam. of Burn. Theory, pass. Pope's Ess. on Man, epistle i. ver. 165—198. Wilkins's World in the Moon. Collib. Inq. p. 92—94. Polign. Anti-Lucret. pass. Clarke on the Origin of Evil, p. 160. ad fin. prax. p. 160—202. 233—264. Reimarus on Nat. Relig. pass.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The noble powers and properties of the human mind are well worthy of being mentioned here, as a production incomparably more glorious than any thing in the vegetable or brutal creation. It may something assist our thoughts here, to consider how the face of nature is embellished and improved by the arts which mankind have introduced into life, and how much entertainment is given mankind by producing them as the effect of their own art and labour, beyond what they could find in them merely as the product of nature.

Derham's Phys. Theol. p. 226, and 61—65. Locke on Government. Abernethy's Sermons on the Being and Attributes of God.

* The many curious volumes which have recently been published in the different parts of Natural History may be read to great use, though they are not, in general, applied by the authors of them to the purposes of religion.

LECTURE XXXI.

PROPOSITION XXVII.—DEMONSTRATION III

Proof of the being of a God from the Works of Nature.

Prop. 21. 1. Seeing the world was made, it is universally allowed that it must have been produced by chance or design.

2. Chance is entirely an unmeaning expression, unless we ascribe that to it which is produced by mechanical laws, without the contrivance and purpose of the thinking being, whose agency may be the means of producing it.

Watts's Ontol. p. 332. Bentley at Boyle's Lect. Serm. v. p. 9—12; 8vo edit. p. 147—153; 5th edit. p. 170—174.

2. 3. It may generally be expected, that whatever is thus produced should be very confused and imperfect, especially when the effect is very complex.

Lem. 4. This world, though a very complex system, is full of beauty, harmony, and order, incomparably superior to any work which we see produced by the design of the most curious artist.

3, 4. 5. It is most incredible that it should be produced by chance.

1, 5. 6. It was produced by the design or counsel of some intelligent agent.

Prop. 20. Cor. 7. If any derived being were supposed the immediate former of the world, he must ultimately owe his wisdom and power to some original and self-existent being.

6, 7. 8. The frame of the world proves that there is a God. Q. E. D.

Lucret. lib. v. ver. 417—449. Camb. sur l'Exist. p. 4—6. § 5—8. Bent. ib. Serm. v. p. 12; and fine 8vo edit. p. 153—177. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 29—34. Collib. Inq. p. 74—84. Rel. of Nat. p. 79—85; 8vo edit. vol. i. p. 72—92.

DEMONSTRATION IV.

A Deity proved from the marks of divine interposition, which appear in the support and government of the world.

LEMMA.

The author of Matho has illustrated this topic of demonstration with incomparable strength and beauty; but some of his arguments are of such a nature as to be more properly mentioned in another place.

1. This appears in the continuance of the centripetal and projectile force of the planets, as a mutual balance to each other; neither of which appears necessary in itself, though a failure of either would be attended with a general ruin; and this thought appears with a force greatly increased, when we consider the various composition of that four-fold motion, by which a secondary planet revolves about its primary, while both revolve about the Sun.

Baxt. Matho, vol. ii. Conf. vii. p. 4—18. Coll. Inq. p. 119, 120; edit. 3. p. 143, 144. Baxt. on the Soul, § 2. No. 6. p. 46, 47, 4to; vol. i. 8vo edit. p. 101—106.

2. In preventing the alteration of the obliquity of the earth's axis, or its receiving any other detriment from the approach of comets, or any other cause; and likewise in preventing the inclination of the Moon's orbit from becoming greater, or the Moon itself from being brought nearer to, or carried further from, the Earth; any of which alterations would be attended with fatal consequences, especially the two last of them, which might be most easily affected by a comet's approach.

Matho, vol. ii. § 118, 119. p. 143, &c. § 110. p. 91, &c. Collib. ib. p. 144.

3. In regulating the winds, so as may be for the preservation and benefit of the Earth; though we are not able to assign any certain laws by which it is effected.

Clarke's Rohault, part i. c. xii. § 41. Note. Collib. Inq. p. 144.

4. In the due proportion which is observed between males and females in the several species of animals, and especially in mankind.

Nieuwent. ib. vol. i. p. 351—363. Derh. Phys. Theol. p. 175, 176. Note.

5. In preserving the balance of the several species of animals, so that none should overrun the earth, and none be lost.

Collib. ib. p. 123; edit. 3. p. 147. Derham's Phys. Theol. p. 168—179. Nat. Disp. vol. i. part i. p. 44—46.

6. In keeping the species of animals and vegetables the same through succeeding ages, and preventing their being corrupted by undue mixtures.

Collib. ib. p. 122, 123; edit. 3. p. 148, 149.

7. In keeping the faces, voices, and handwriting so wonderfully distinct as they appear to be.

Weems's Works, vol. iv. part ii. p. 12, 13. Derh. ib. p. 308—310. Ray's Wisd. p. 283—286.

8. The regularity and steadiness with which the world is governed by the same laws in the most distant ages, is a further noble argument of the divine interposition; and is perhaps in nothing more conspicuous than in this, that the instincts of animals are still the same. Shaft. vol. ii. p. 337.

9. If in any instance these laws have been interrupted, and effects have been produced beyond the common course of nature: as these instances do not appear to have been so frequent as to overthrow the argument, gr. 8. so they afford a further argument of a Being superior to this system of things, and prove that he attends to the affairs of his creatures.

Limb. Theol. lib. i. c. ii. § 17, 19, 25. Crellius de Deo, p. 23, in his Works, vol. iv.

1—9. 10. It appears that the world is under the government of some Being of great power, and exquisite contrivance, art, and conduct; who is himself either necessarily existent, or derived from some other who is so.

LECTURE XXXII.

PROPOSITION XXVIII.

To give a view of those other arguments in proof of a Deity, which seem not of equal force with the former, and yet are urged by persons of considerable note.

SOLUTION.

1. Cartesius argues that there must be a God, because necessary existence is contained in the idea of a God, as three angles are in the idea of a triangle; so that though essence and existence are in other things distinct, yet when considered with regard to the Deity, they are the same.

To this it is answered, That there is a difference between the notional truth of propositions, and the real truth of ideas. In plainer terms, the fallacy lies in the ambiguity of those words, God is a necessary existent Being: If the meaning of them be, q. d. "By the word GOD, I understand a Being that is supposed to be self-existent," they will be allowed; but then they prove not his real existence: but if they signify, "It is most certain there is such a Being," the sense is changed, and the proposition may still be disputed.

Cartes. Princ. lib. i. § 14—16. Camb. Exist. p. 197—199. Voyage to the World of Cart. p. 159—164. Collib. Inq. p. 130—132; edit. 2. p. 156—159.

2. Cartesius further argues, "The greater the objective perfection of any idea is, the more perfect must its cause be; but we have the idea of a Being infinitely perfect, therefore there must be some infinitely perfect Being to cause and produce it."

But this seems still to take for granted the thing to be proved, i. e. the objective reality of the idea, or the reality of the object supposed to be represented by it; and it may be pleaded, that without any such archetype at all, an idea of an infinitely perfect Being might be produced by the operation of our minds upon ideas arising from inferior objects, seeing we do not comprehend infinity, but only deny the bounds of an object which we suppose infinite.

Cartes. ib. § 17, 18, 22. Camb. ib. p. 189—191. Voyage to the World of Cart. p. 166—169. Collib. Inq. p. 132, 133. edit; 3. p. 159, 160. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 20—22. p. 19—21; 6th edit. Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. x. §. 7.

3. Epicurus, and many others, particularly Lord Shaftesbury, have argued, that the idea of God is universal as being innate, and therefore that his existence is certain. Epicurus therefore supposes it natural to admit it; and those who believe man to be God's work, argue from his having stamped this character of himself upon all his human creatures; but the foundation of this argument has been removed in Prop. 8. gr. 5. and the references.

Coll. Inq. p. 128—130. edit. 3. 154—156. Shaftesb. Letter to a Clergyman.

4. Tillotson argues to this effect: "The idea of a God is possible, seeing it involves no contradiction to suppose a Being of all possible perfections, therefore it is necessary; for if there be no God now, there never can be a God, seeing eternity is a part of our idea of him; so that on this supposition the existence of a God is impossible, contrary to the hypothesis." But this argument, which seems nearly equal to the first in a plainer dress, may be sufficiently answered by the known distinction between an hypothetical and an actual possibility; v. g. It may be said to be hypothetically possible that the first man should have been created with wings; but since he was in fact created without wings, it is not actually possible; and this seems to be an instance parallel to the other.

Tillots. Works, vol. i. p. 19. Collib. Inq. p. 133, 134; edit. 3. 161, 162.

DEFINITION XXXI.

Those arguments which are brought from the existence of some of the attributes of God to prove the existence of a God, are called proofs A PRIORI: those taken from the phenomena observable in the works of nature, are called proofs A POSTERIORI.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The question, Whether there be any proof of the being of a God a priori? depends upon the reality of space and duration, and their being the properties of some substance; which will be examined hereafter.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The proof of the attributes of a God a priori, is the arguing them from self-existence, showing them to have a necessary connexion with it: and in this sense some have denied there can be any proof a priori; because nothing can be prior to a self-existent Being, and because all our proofs of the attributes of such a Being are ultimately drawn from the consideration of some Being derived from him; but this objection is evidently founded on a mistake of the sense in which these words are used by the most accurate writers.

SCHOLIUM 3.

On the whole, it may be proper to distinguish the various ways of proving the being and attributes of God thus:—

1. Both are proved a priori, when from the real existence of space and duration we infer the existence of a self-existent Being, whose properties they are, and from necessity of existence prove his wisdom, power, goodness, &c.*

2. Both are proved a posteriori, when we argue from a survey of the system of nature, that there must be a wise, powerful, and benevolent Author.

3. The proof is mixed, when from the observed existence of any one derived being, whether material or immaterial, more or less perfect, we argue the existence of a self-existent Being, and thus infer his attributes from a necessary connexion with self-existence, as in the first case.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 494—498, and p. 501, 502. Waterland's Diss. on the Arg. a priori, apud Law's Inq. ad fin. præs. 51—54, 56—60.

LECTURE XXXIII.

PROPOSITION XXIX.

To take a survey of the chief sects of ATHEISTS amongst the ancient Grecian Philosophers.

SOLUTION.

SECT. 1. They all agreed in asserting that there was nothing but matter in the universe; but differ as to the question, whether it was animate or inanimate.

SECT. 2. Those who held matter to be animated, were in general called ὑλοζοικοι; who (as they darkly expressed it) maintained that matter had some natural perception, but no animal sensation, or reflection, in itself considered; but that this imperfect life occasioned that organization from whence sensation and reflection afterwards arose.

SECT. 3. Of these, some held only one life, which they called a plastic nature; and these were called the Stoical Atheists, because the Stoics held such a nature, though they supposed it the instrument of the Deity: others thought that every particle of matter was endued with life, and these were called the Stratonici, from Strato Lampsacenus: and Hobbes seems to have been of this opinion.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 57. marg.

SECT. 4. Those Atheists who held matter to be inanimate were called ατομικοι. Of these, some attempted to solve the phenomena of nature, by having recourse to the unmeaning language of qualities and forms, as the Anaximandrians, who thought they were produced by infinite active force, upon immense matter, acting without design: others, by the figure and motion which they supposed to be essential to those atoms: these were the Democritici; whose philosophy differed but very little from the Epicureans, who evidently borrowed many of their notions from Democritus.

SECT. 5. Diagoras and Theodorus among the ancients, as Vaninus among the moderns, are reckoned martyrs for Atheism.

Collier or Bayle in Nom. Buddæi Hist. Phil. c. iv. § 43—46, et 48. Cudworth's System, l. i. c. iii. præs. § 34—36, 105, 134—136. Cyrus's Trav. vol. ii. p. 27, 28, 31, 32. Fenel. Phil. Lives, p. 110, and 253, 254. Hale's Orig. of Man, § 4. c. iv. p. 340—342. Univ. Hist. vol. i. p. 17—25. fol.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Sir William Temple is said to have been an Atheist of a kind different from any of these, and to have thought the present system of things necessary and eternal; consequently his notion has been confuted, by all the arguments brought to prove the world in its present form not to have been eternal, and that matter is not self-existent, nor motion essential to it, or thought producible from it alone.

Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, vol. ii. p. 670, 8vo.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The Chinese have been represented by some as a nation of Atheists; and Burnet declares that Confucius and his followers, of whom Sir William Temple was a great admirer, are to be reckoned amongst those who were Atheists themselves, and left religion to the people. But Couplet (in his Declaratio Proemialis, p. 38.) has largely endeavoured to prove, that though their modern writers, i. e. those from about the tenth century of Christianity, have entertained and propagated Atheistical notions among the philosophers of that nation, Confucius and their earlier teachers were notwithstanding votaries to pure religion; but it is very observable, that Confucius (if the writings which Couplet and his brethren, the Jesuit missionaries, have published as his, do really contain a just representation of what he taught) says little of those branches of duty which immediately relate to God; which leaves too much room for suspicion: though he does indeed speak of spirits surrounding men when they sacrifice, in such a manner, as to agree very well with the heathen notion of good demons; which perhaps differs not much from the Christian doctrine of angels (Conf. Morals, l. ii. p. 20—32). Yet I have not been able to find any part of his work in which he speaks expressly of God, but that very remarkable passage (l. ii. p. 88—90) in which he says so many sublime things of Him who is supremely holy, must (when the whole of it is taken together) be understood of his Wise Man, and in that view is so impious and profane, as to leave a great deal of room to imagine that Barnet was not mistaken in the judgment he formed concerning him; nor will what he says of the Great Spirit of Heaven and Earth be sufficient wholly to remove the suspicion, as it is most probable that it coincides with the notion of a plastic power, which some of the Grecian Atheists held.

* Amidst the various attempts to prove the being of a God a priori, one of the most curious, and which seems to approach the nearest to a demonstration, is a short tract, written by the Rev. Moses Lowman of Clapham. The piece is now become very scarce, and indeed is almost forgotten. We mention it, that, in case it should be met with in any catalogue or sale of books, its value may be known. A Mr Knight, a Dissenting Minister at Chertsey, in Surrey, wrote a book on the same subject, a little more than forty years ago. See also the second edition of Dr. Price's Review of the principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Besides the objections against design in the universe, (Prop. 27. Lem. to Dem. 3. Schol. 2.) other objections against a Deity have been urged, the chief of which amounts to this, That there is something in his nature, operations, and conduct, which we cannot fully comprehend. But if this argument be allowed as conclusive, we might be brought even to doubt of our own existence. See Prop. 18. Cor. 3.

Many other arguments or excuses brought for Atheism do not deserve a particular place here, as will appear by consulting the passages here referred to.

Cudworth's Syst. Book 1. c. iv. § 5—22. Gastrel of Nat. Rel. p. 187—212.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It seems reasonable to conclude, that the fear of punishment from a Divine Being, and a desire of seeming wiser than others, have been the chief causes of Atheism, and perhaps the absurd notions which some have entertained of the Deity, and the unworthy manner in which those who profess to believe in Him have acted, may be reckoned among the most fatal occasions of it.

Gastr. ib. p. 240—248. Scott's Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 84, 85. Works, vol. i. p. 221, 222.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It may not be improper here to hint at the strange conduct of Tully in his celebrated book De Natura Deorum, who only slightly touches on the opinion of Anaxagoras, that all things were produced by one Infinite Mind, and gives no reason to that opinion, not so much as spends one page or section in discussing it, though he assigns proper advocates to defend at large the Stoical and Epicurean principles as well as the Academical; and after all, leaves his reader under the impression of the Epicurean objections against Providence; only coldly telling us, that they were not on the whole, in his opinion, so probable as the contrary doctrine. It is observable, that the most religious passage in all Tully's works is only a fragment preserved by Lactantius.

Middleton's Life of Cic. vol. iii. 8vo. p. 320, 321.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Having thus established the proof of the existence of God, we now proceed to the following propositions to consider the chief of his perfections.

LECTURE XXXIV.

PROPOSITION XXV.

God is eternal, i. e. he has existed, and will ever exist.

DEMONSTRATION.

Def. 27. Cor. 1. 1. Whatever is self existent is eternal.

Def. 30. 2. God is self existent.

1, 2. 3. God is eternal. Q. E. D.

Wilkins's Nat. Rel. p. 120—123. Abern. vol. i. p. 182—191.

COROLLARY.

God is immutable. Vid. Def. 27. Cor. 3.

Wilkins's ib. p. 115—117. Collin. Inq. p. 46, 57; edit. 3. p. 66, 67. Abern. p. 198—200.

SCHOLIUM.

It must be acknowledged there is something to us incomprehensible in the Divine Eternity, in whatever view we attempt to conceive of it. A successive eternity is what the mind can form no consistent idea of; for it seems that, if there had been a fifth, a tenth, or hundredth, there must have been some first; and there can be nothing absolutely infinite, to which a continual addition is making. On the other hand, it is impossible for us to conceive of an eternity so instantaneous as to exclude all past and future, and to be but one point of duration: this would make that space of time, to which millions of years are as nothing, but a small part of an hour or a minute, and is in effect declaring that God is now creating the world, and also now destroying it, supposing it ever to be destroyed. Indeed, if all that were meant by an instantaneous eternity when applied to God were this—That all things, whether past or future, are as open to his view as those things which exist in the present moment—this would be intelligible, but would not remove the difficulty of a successive eternity: and to reply (as some have done) that this eternity is not to be considered as duration at all, but as necessary existence, to which neither succession nor instantaneousness have any relation at all, more than colour to sound, leaves the question, I think, under the same darkness as before.

Nevertheless, it is to be remembered, that this difficulty does not arise from the doctrine of the Deity alone, but is common to every scheme that supposes any thing eternal, as something must certainly be (Prop. 19.); and it would follow from supposing one atom to be so, besides all the other absurdities arising from the denial of an intelligent self existent cause.

Clarke's Serm. vol. i. p. 81, 82. 8vo. Collib. Inq. p. 204—211; edit. 3. p. 245—253. Rel. of Nat. p. 69, 70. Watts's Hymns, l. ii. No. 17 and 67; see also his Ontology, c. iv. p. 12—17. Abern. vol. i. p. 201—207. Soame Jenyns's Disquisitions, No. 4.

PROPOSITION XXXI.

God is omnipotent; i. e. no effect can be assigned so great, but he is able to produce it.

DEMONSTRATION.

Def. 30. 1. The very act of creating any being out of nothing, implies a power so great, that we can imagine nothing impossible to a Being who can perform it by his own power.

Prop. 27. Dem. 3. 2. The amazing greatness and variety of the works of nature, serve still more sensibly to illustrate the power of the Creator.

3. We see nothing which betrays any marks of impotency or weakness in the Deity.

1, 2, 3. 4. We have no reason to believe that any internal defect limits the Divine Power.

5. If there were any other Being capable of controlling him in the execution of his volitions, this Being must be superior to him, and might (for any thing that appears) have prevented or destroyed his being as well as his operations; which would be inconsistent with the idea of God (Def. 30.) as a self existent Being.

5, 6. There is no external power to limit the operations of the Divine Being.

4, 6. 7. His power is unlimited, and consequently can produce any effect, be it ever so great. Q. E. D.

Wollast. of Nat. Rel. p. 145, 146, p. 127—129. 8vo edit. Clarke's Serm. vol. i. p. 119, 120, 206—216. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 106, 107, 67—69. Living Temple, vol. i. 8vo edit. p. 207—215. Abern. vol. i. No. 8.

COROLLARY.

If God be omnipotent, then nothing can be necessary to the production of any being in any supposed circumstance of time or place, but that God should will its existence in this circumstance.

Jen. Pneum. Prop. 30. Ralphson de Spatio reali, p. 67. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 23; Note. Living Temple, p. 50, 51.

LECTURE XXXV.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Another argument to prove that God is infinite in power is drawn from Def. 28. Cor.; for it is certain he has some degree of power. A third from Prop. 27. Dem. 1. Cor. 2. since it is evident that to conceive of God as omnipotent, is much more honourable than to conceive of him as a Being of limited power.

SCHOLIUM 2.

If it be objected to the fifth step of the preceding demonstration, That a power merely equal to that of God's might be sufficient to control him in the execution of his volitions, and that we have not yet proved there is no being equal to him,—it may be replied, that in some cases to control the acts of another must argue some superiority; v. g. if A. will that a creature should exist, and B. that it should not exist; if it does not exist, then B. in that instance triumphs over A. and appears superior to him; but if this answer should not be judged satisfactory, then it must be remembered, that we have shown that God's power is not limited by any internal defect, and that no external limiting power has yet been proved; and if it should hereafter be proved, by any argument not depending upon his omnipotence, that there is but one such self existent being as we call God, then this proposition will be demonstrated in all its extent.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It must be owned that we have no conceptions of a creating power otherwise than by its effects: nevertheless, that will not prove that there is no such thing: a blind man might as well argue against the existence of light.

Collib. Inq. p. 60—64; edit. 3. 70—75.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is no limitation of the Divine Power, to assert that God is not able to do what implies a contradiction; for that is in effect to do nothing at all: and consequently, a pretended power of doing it, is no power at all.

Col. Inq. p. 180, 181; edit. 3. p. 217, 218. Crouz. Log. vol. i. p. 403, 404. Clarke's Serm. vol. i. p. 216—219. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 101. Living Temple, 8vo edit. vol. i. p. 330—343.

LECTURE XXXVI.

PROPOSITION XXXII.

All the creatures of God, whether they be corporeal or incorporeal, sensible or spiritual, owe their efficacy for producing any effect to the agency of a Divine Power in and upon them, at the very time when such effect is produced.

DEMONSTRATION I.

Def. 27. 1. Whatever is derived from another, does not necessarily exist in the first moment of its being.

2. Whatever does not necessarily exist in the first moment of its existence, cannot necessarily exist in the second, or in any following moment; but must owe its continued existence to the will of the Being by whom it was at first produced: for by supposing its existence to continue when that will ceased, we should suppose it to be without the cause of its being. Q. E. D.

1, 2. 3. All the creatures of God do every moment depend upon God for the continuance of their existence.

Cudlib. Inq. p. 64, 65; edit. 3. p. 75. 76. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 65. Burnet on Art. p. 30. Watts's Ess. I. ix. § 2. p. 201—208, 213. Ib. No. xi. p. 267, 268. Cheyne's Princ. part. i. § 9. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 225—227. Sherlock on Providence, 9th edit. p. 19, 20.

4. The power of action implies something more than continued existence.

3, 4. 5. Whatever is created by God depends continually upon him for the continuance of its active powers.

6. If from any constitution of nature whatsoever, there could necessarily arise any act of power independent on the concurrent volition of God, it is difficult to say where that independent power would stop; and for aught appears, that Being might be omnipotent.

7. The wisest and greatest philosophers have not been able to trace any connexion between solidity and gravitation, or motion and thought; therefore a perpetual omnipotent agency seems to be the most probable way of accounting for those otherwise unaccountable phenomena.

Barter's Mathe. vol. i. Conf. iv. § 44—49. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. § 2. pras. p. 94—101; and note, p. 101—108, 128—139. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 309.

5, 6, and 7. 8. Valet propositio.

Virg. En. vi. ver. 724, &c. Queen on the Sp. p. 138—140. p. 77. p. 465, 466. Camb. Exist. p. 111. Clarke's xvii. Serm. No. 7. p. 171. Baxt. Works, vol. ii. p. 15. B. p. 27. A. p. 183. A. p. 100. B. South's Serm. vol. iii. p. 461. Reynolds's Works, p. 7. Jenk. Reasonab. of Christianity, vol. ii. p. 484. Marc. Anton. I. v. c. 40. Aberm. vol. i. Serm. vii. p. 240—244; Lond. edit. p. 225—229. Price's Four Dissertations. No. 1. Dr. Stebbing's Discourse on Providence.

DEMONSTRATION II.

To those who allow the universality of Divine Providence on principles independent on this proposition, which many do, another argument has been proposed which will stand thus:

1. God must will that any creature should, or should not, exist, with any given power, in any given moment; for not to will that it should so exist, would on the present supposition be in effect willing that it should not.

2. If he will that it should not so exist, it will not: otherwise God would not be omnipotent, contrary to Prop. 31.

1, 2, 3. 4. Therefore its existence in such circumstances, i. e. its efficacy for producing any effect in question, is owing to the divine volition, i. e. to the agency of God in and upon it.* Q. E. D.

LECTURE XXXVII.

COROLLARY 1.

What we generally call second causes, are not causes in the strict propriety of speech; and what we call the laws of nature, are only certain rules and methods by which God generally proceeds in those of his actions which fall under our cognizance. Nevertheless, creatures may in an inferior sense be called causes, as certain events commonly follow certain changes in their condition and will.

Boyle's Inquiry into Nat. apud Ray's Wisdom of God, p. 53, 54. Seed's Serm. No. 5. vol. ii. p. 127, &c. Cheyne's Princ. part i. § 4. p. 4—6. Nat. Disp. vol. iv. p. 50—52. Ramsay's Princ. vol. i. p. 251—255. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 179—181. Watts's Ontology, p. 329 and 365. Clarke at Boyle's Lectures, part ii. p. 222. 6th edit.

COROLLARY 2.

It evidently appears that the providence, i. e. the notice and care, of God extends itself to all events, even the smallest as well as the greatest. Vid. Prop. 27. Dem. 4.

Rel. of Nat. p. 95—98. Scott's Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 162—166. Baxt. on the Soul, p. 182, 183.

COROLLARY 3.

We hence learn, into what we are to resolve the

* N. B. I lay but little stress upon this second demonstration, though it once appeared plausible to me; perhaps the supposition of Divine Providence extending to the smallest as well as greatest events, is a proposition, as God is the Author of all things, and the Lover of those creatures, that he has formed to be the continual receptacles of their enjoyments, that it requires the whole weight of God to counterbalance that evidence which appears for the event. There may be a medium between absolutely willing either that it should or should not exist, which is inconsistent with the supposition power which our minds have of moving our bodies, viz. into a divine volition in such and such instances to produce motions in our bodies, correspondent to the volitions of our minds. To this agree the ease and swiftness with which those motions are performed on the act of our will, and the constancy of other involuntary, but always needful motions, which cannot be solved by any mechanical laws. Prop. 1. Sch. 2.

Clarke and Leibnitz, No. 5. App. Clerici Pneum. § 1. c. vi. § 12—16. Camb. Exist. § 46, 47. Matho, vol. i. Conf. 6. § 79. Seed's Serm. vol. ii. p. 150.

COROLLARY 4.

The wonderful instances of instinct in brutes may most probably be accounted for this way: God, by some unknown impression upon them, moving them to and assisting them in such actions, as on the whole are most convenient: though the rationale depends on principles, which they cannot know. Def. 19. Cor. 2.

Spect. vol. ii. No. 120. sub fin. No. 121. sub init. Camb. Exist. § 23. p. 46—48. Nat. Disp. vol. i. p. 285, 286; edit. 2. p. 197, 198. Matho, vol. i. Conf. vi. § 82, 83. Origen adv. Cels. l. iv. p. 217. Seed's Serm. vol. ii. p. 148, &c.

COROLLARY 5.

Hence we infer the absurdity of the doctrine of a plastic nature, which some have thus described:—"It is an incorporeal created substance, endued with a vegetative life, but not with sensation or thought; penetrating the whole created universe, being co-extended with it; and, under God, moving matter, so as to produce the phenomena, which cannot be solved by mechanical laws: active for ends unknown to itself, not being expressly conscious of its actions, and yet having an obscure idea of the action to be entered upon."

As the idea itself is most obscure, and indeed inconsistent, so the foundation of it is evidently weak. It is intended by this, to avoid the inconvenience of subjecting God to the trouble of some changes in the created world, and the meanness of others: but it appears from this proposition, that even upon this hypothesis he would still be the Author of them; besides, that to Omnipotence nothing is troublesome, nor those things mean, when considered as a part of a system, which alone might appear to be so.

Cudw. Int. Syst. book i. c. i. p. 149—172. prax. 178—181. More's Imm. of the Soul, l. iii. c. 12. His Philosophical Works, p. 212—215. Ray's Wisd. of God, p. 51, 52. Cheyne's Princ. part i. c. i. § 3. p. 3, 4.

LECTURE XXXVIII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is objected, That if God be thus the Author of all our ideas, and of all our motions, then also of all our volitions, which would be inconsistent with that liberty of choice asserted, Prop. 16.

Ans. On the principles laid down above, the will is not properly an effect of any necessary efficient cause; but rather a tendency towards the production of an effect, so far as we apprehend it to be in our power (Prop. 1. gr. 4.); and for any thing which appears in the objection, or is asserted in the proposition, when all the requisites to volition are supposed, it lies in our own breasts to determine one way or another; and though God, upon such a determination of ours, adds efficacy to the volition, even when it is most foolish and pernicious, that does not properly make him the Author of the action (vid. Def. 10.); and they who suppose a stock of power lodged in the hand of the creature by virtue of its original constitution, (God at the same time knowing in every particular how it will be used,) will labour under the same difficulty in this respect with us; nay, their hypothesis at last will be found equivalent to ours; and if we allow that universal presence and inspection of God, which all who are not Atheists admit, it will be nearly as difficult to account for his not interposing to prevent such actions, as for his adding efficacy to them in a natural way.

Camb. Exist. § 67. Howe on Prescience, § 6, 7. Op. vol. ii. p. 500—503. Watts's Diss. on Trin. No. 5. p. 142, 143. His Works, vol. vi. p. 604, 605. Mandev. Free Thoughts, p. 108, 109. Bart. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 207—210. Collib. Inq. p. 195—198; edit. 3. p. 235—238.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is further objected, That if God produces all our ideas by his own impression on the mind, then a material world was not necessary, and consequently it would be unbecoming the nature and character of God to produce it. Vid. Prop. 31. Cor.

Ans. 1. The denial of any material world at all, according to Berkley's and Collier's scheme, would remove the foundation of this objection: nevertheless, for reasons which will afterwards be mentioned, we do not choose to have recourse to that solution: but add,

2. Allowing the creation of a material world to be to us utterly unaccountable on this supposition, we cannot therefore certainly say that it was in vain; and as for its not being absolutely necessary, it will not easily be granted that any thing that God does is so.

3. If we grant that God has a power of producing any idea in our minds without an external archetype, of which dreams seem to be an evident proof, and which is so certainly included in Omnipotence that few deny it, then it will be as hard to account for the creation of the material world as if we admit the proposition to be true.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is further objected, That it is a dishonour to the Divine Being, to suppose him immediately concerned in the most mean and trifling events; and that it would be exceedingly ridiculous, were our discourse commonly to be formed upon the principles of this proposition.

Ans. We before (Cor. 5.) observed the usefulness and beauty of many things on the whole, which, when considered in themselves, may appear mean and vile; (of which the discharge of the fæces from animal bodies is a remarkable instance;) and we may further add, that there is no occasion at all for introducing a change in our common forms of speech, seeing there is a sense in which those things may be said to be the actions of the creatures, which are done by the intermedintion of their volition, though not by an active force of their own, at that time independent on the concurrent volition of God (Cor. 1.); so that, upon the whole, they may be sufficiently distinguished from those which are, with full propriety and in the highest sense, called the actions of God.

Cranz. Log. vol. i. p. 436—440, 442. Watts's Ess. No. 3. c. iii. § 10—15, p. 87—90.

LECTURE XXXIX.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is further objected, That it would be a dishonour to the Divine Being, that, whereas a common workman can make a machine which shall go on for some time without his interposition, God should not be able to produce what can operate without his perpetual agency.

To this it is answered, 1. All human arts are but the means of altering some circumstances in the form and disposition of matter, which before existed under certain laws, entirely independent on the will of the artist; but it is the peculiar glory of God to have a whole world of creatures in a perpetual dependence on himself.

2. That when we asserta perpetual divine agency, we readily acknowledge that matters are so contrived as not to need a divine interposition in a different manner from that in which it had been constantly exerted. And it is most evident, that an unremitting energy, displayed in such circumstances, greatly exalts our idea of God, instead of depressing it; and therefore, by the way, is so much the more likely to be true. Vid. Prop. 27. Cor. 2.

3. We may add, that this argument tends to prove, contrary to the opinion of most that have advanced it, that God might make a creature which should subsist without his supporting presence and agency.

Burn. on Art. p. 35. Watts's Ess. No. iv. § 2. p. 201—208. Calch. Inq. p. 197, 198. edit. 3. p. 235—238. Clarke and Leibnitz. p. 3—7. § 4. p. 13—17. § 4. p. 27—31. § 6—9. p. 43—47. § 6—9. p. 361—365.

PROPOSITION XXXII.

God is a Being of perfect KNOWLEDGE; i. e. he knows in the most certain and perfect manner whatever can be the object of knowledge, i. e. whatever does not imply a contradiction.

DEMONSTRATION I.

Def. 30. Prop. 27. 1. God is a Spirit, i. e. a thinking Being.

1. 2. God must have some degree of knowledge.

2. Def. 28. Cor. 3. There is no reason for setting bounds to his knowledge, i. e. he knows all things in the most perfect manner. Q. E. D.

DEMONSTRATION II.

Def. 30. Prop. 27. Cor. 32. 1. God has made all the creatures, and continually actuates and supports them.

1. 2. He must know all that relates to them.

3. He must by consciousness know himself.

2, 3. 4. He must know all things. Q. E. D.

SCHOLIUM.

To this it may be objected, that there may be some other self-existent creator; and that this being with his creatures may be unknown to God; and it is allowed, that the argument of this second demonstration cannot appear in its full evidence till we have proved the unity of the Godhead: nevertheless, the second step alone would be sufficient to prove that he knew all things that belong to us; which is that in which we are chiefly concerned.

DEMONSTRATION III.

1. Knowledge is an attribute of so great importance, that without it, whatever conceptions we could form of the Deity, would be very low and imperfect.

Prop. 27. Cor. 2. 2. It is reasonable to conceive of God in the most honourable manner.

1, 2. 3. It is reasonable to conceive of God as a Being of great knowledge; and to remove from our idea of him, as much as possible, all degrees of error, ignorance, and uncertainty.

4. There is no apparent reason for limiting his knowledge, so as to exclude from it any thing which can be the object of intelligence to us or any other being.

3, 4—5. It is reasonable to conclude that he is a Being of perfect knowledge. Q. E. D.

Clarke's Post. Serm. vol. i. p. 248—252. No. 11. Wilk. Nat. Rel. p. 124—128. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 599, 600, 602, 603, 609—611. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 102, 103. Abernethy, vol. i. No. 9. p. 290—306.

SCHOLIUM.

That God is a Being of boundless knowledge as well as power, was the opinion of the wisest heathens; as appears from the custom of swearing, as well as from many passages quoted from their writers in the references above.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it appears that God knows all the secrets of the heart, and therefore is most able to judge of the real characters of men.

COROLLARY 2.

It appears that any hypocrisy, when we are dealing with him, or addressing him, is very great folly, though it may be most artfully disguised.

LECTURE XL.

DEFINITION XXXII.

A SPIRIT is said to be PRESENT IN ANY PLACE, when it is capable of perceiving and immediately operating upon the body which fills that place, or on spirits united to such bodies, i. e. spirits perceiving and acting by them.

PROPOSITION XXXIV.

God is OMNIPRESENT, i. e. present in every place.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 33. 1. God perceives the changes of bodies in whatever place they are, and of all spirits united to them.

Prop. 31. 2. He is capable of operating upon them.

3. It is much more honourable to God, to conceive of him as present in all places, than as excluded from any.

1, 2, 3. Def. 32. and 28. Cor. 2. 4. God is omnipresent. Q. E. D.

Howe, ib. vol. i. p. 108—110. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 756, 757. Collib. Inq. p. 71, 72; edit. 3. p. 84, 85. Abernethy, vol. i. Serm. vii. Spect. vol. viii. No. 565, 571.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The first of these arguments only proves that God is where any of his creatures are; and it is only on supposition that there is but one God, that it will follow from hence that he is every where: but it is to be remembered, that the argument, Def. 28. Cor. if allowed, will prove, that what can by a necessity of its own nature act upon a body in any place, may by a necessity of its nature act upon bodies in every place; which will be so far a proof of God's omnipresence, independent on his unity; and if it be his property to fill space, he must for the same reason fill all space.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is a great question, Whether God be so present as to fill space? This depends upon another question, Whether it be the property of an immaterial Spirit to fill space? with reference to which I must confess, that when I conceive of spirit as diffused through any part of space, I immediately conceive of it as something corporeal; and consequently cannot conceive how it can be asserted of the Divine Being, by those who grant his immateriality, as most of the patrons of this doctrine do; but this will be more largely considered below.

Newt. Princip. p. 483. Saur. Serm. vol. ii. p. 60—64. Watts's Exc. No. vi. § 5. p. 165—169. Rams. Phil. Princ. Prop. viii. vol. i. p. 57—72.

DEFINITION XXXIII.

An event not come to pass is said to be CONTINGENT, which either may, or may not, be. What is already done, is said to have been contingent, if it might or might not have been.

COROLLARY 1.

Contingency is opposed to necessity, not to certainty; for that is said to be certain which will be, without considering whether it be necessary or not.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 100. p. 78. edit. 6.

COROLLARY 2.

There are in fact various things, which are in their nature contingent; for such are all the actions of free creatures, considered as free.—Vid. Def. 22. and Prop. 70.

Watt's Ont. c. iii. p. 331—333. Hutcheson's Metaph. part i. c. 4. § 2. p. 23—25.

PROPOSITION XXXV.

Future contingencies are known to God.

N. B. Though this be comprehended in Prop. 33. yet we shall here give a distinct demonstration of it, because it has been so much controverted, and so much of what follows depends upon it.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. So much depends upon future contingencies, that if they be unknown to God, almost every thing relating to those of his creatures which are free agents must be unknown to him too: so that our ideas of the divine knowledge and perfection will by this means be very much diminished.

2. Wise and sagacious men are capable of making very probable conjectures of future events, and therefore it seems dishonourable to deny that God has a power of forming an unerring judgment concerning them.

3. If God does not foreknow future contingencies, he is daily growing more and more knowing, in a prodigious and incomputable degree beyond any of his creatures, which would be inconsistent with his immutability, and therefore contrary to Prop. 3. Cor. 1, 2, and 3—4. Valet proposito.

Hoar's Works, vol. i. p. 103, 104. Rel. of Nat. p. 99—102. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 605, 606. Clarke's Posth. Serm. vol. i. No. 11. p. 258—268. Abern. vol. i. Serm. ix. p. 313—324.

COROLLARY.

God always wills the same thing—for whatever appears to him eligible in any circumstances which actually are, must always have appeared eligible on the foresight of those circumstances, i. e. he must always have willed it; supposing, what we shall hereafter endeavour to prove, that his will is always agreeable to reason, and never changed without it.

LECTURE XLI

SCHOLIUM 1.

If it should hereafter be proved, on the one hand, that God has foretold the evil actions of his creatures; and on the other, that he could not have made them necessary, then it will appear that this proposition is true in fact, whatever plausible objections may be raised against it.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The principal objection to the proposition is, That certainly to foreknow contingencies is a contradiction, since nothing can be the object of knowledge but what exists in itself or in its necessary cause; and, consequently, to deny their being known to God is no more limiting his knowledge, than it limits his power to own he is not able to do what is self-contradictory.

To this we answer, That the certainty of an event does not imply necessity, (Def. 33. Cor. 1.) and consequently, that there may be a foundation for certain foresight, where the event itself is contingent; or, in other words, the thing will not be because God foresees it, but God foresees it because it will certainly be. It may be added, that not to be able to do a contradiction, is in effect no limitation of the power of God, because a power to effect a contradiction is indeed no power at all. Prop. 31. Schol. but not to know what the will of a free creature will determine is indeed a limitation of knowledge, or, in other words, a difficulty with which the divine understanding, all the proposition be denied, is puzzled and confounded.

It must be acknowledged, that the method by which God foresees these contingencies is unknown; for I think it not safe to say, as some do, that the mind is so constituted, that it does always in fact, though not necessarily, determine itself according to the preponderancy of the motive offered to it; which, if it were granted, would not be a certain foundation of prescience, since if this scheme could be reconciled with the doctrine of liberty, as stated Prop. 16. yet it would subject the Divine Being to a possibility of error in every particular, and in all the schemes depending upon each. We are sure, by Prop. 33. that God knows all things that actually are, whereas our own knowledge is limited to a very narrow sphere; and therefore, since we are sure the divine understanding does in that instance entirely exceed our comprehension, why may we not as well allow that it may exceed it in the manner of foreknowing future contingencies; or where is it we may more reasonably suppose the human mind to be puzzled, than when it would attempt to explain the method of divine knowledge?

Collins's Def. p. 67, 68. ap. Op. vol. iv. Collyns, Exp. p. 91, edit. 3. p. 106—109. Coach at Hogh's Lect. p. 103—104. Rel. of Nat. p. 102, 103. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 606—608. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 104—106. vol. ii. p. 503, 504. More's Enchir. lib. iii. c. ii. § 2. Letters Pers. vol. i. No. 36. Jackson on Human Liberty, p. 30—76.

SCHOLIUM 3.

To the second step it is answered, God may indeed form very probable conjectures, vastly beyond the reach of any human sagacity, though he cannot certainly foreknow the event.

To this the principal reply is, That to suppose God always in doubt, and ever liable to be mistaken, seems inconsistent with the perfections of his nature, and is a less honourable way of conceiving of him; especially if we consider, that as an event lies more and more distant, the possibility of an error in each intermediate circumstance will so much affect the rest, that in a little time there may be upon complicated schemes almost a total darkness; but should it ever appear that he has actually and positively without any hesitation foretold future contingent events, and that he has even put the evidence of his true divinity upon such predictions, that would abundantly confirm the second argument: nor would the hypothesis of a constant though not necessary determination of the will according to motives (Schol. 1.) be sufficient to vindicate such a conduct; since still there was in every instance at least a possibility of mistake.

SCHOLIUM 4.

To step the third it is objected, That such a change as is there supposed is not inconsistent with the immutability of the Divine Being, seeing his nature and attributes are still the same, though his ideas are supposed to be different at different times; but it is answered. This is only a partial immutability; whereas the arguments that prove the immutability of God in general will not admit of such a change in the divine views and purposes, as must be involved in the ignorance of future contingent events.

Collib. Inq. p. 56, 57; ed. 3. 66, 67. Ridgley's Div. vol. i. p. 62.*

SCHOLIUM 5.

It seems strange, that many who grant the universal foreknowledge of what will actually be, should deny what they call scientia media, or hypothetical prescience, i. e. the knowledge of what would follow upon some certain suppositions, which are not fact; v. g. how King George would have acted, if he had been Emperor of Germany; or the Emperor, if he had been King of Great Britain; or how any child who died in infancy would have behaved, if he had grown up to manhood. To object, that this would suppose the Divine Mind filled with a variety of vain speculations, is very inconclusive; for it is difficult to say how God could in any instance select any scheme as best, if he had not a view of others with which it might be compared.

Le Blanc's Thes. p. 454—458. Juvenal's Sat. x. ver. 350—354.

LECTURE XLII.

DEFINITION XXXIV

That being is said to be SPECULATIVELY WISE, who is able rightly to determine and judge of the relation of means to their respective ends, and the value and importance of those ends with respect to the person by whom they are pursued; and that being is said to be PRACTICALLY WISE, who determines his own choice in a manner agreeable to such right views, so as that his own greatest happiness may be most effectually promoted, if it be not yet perfect,—and maintained, if it be.

COROLLARY 1.

A being of great sagacity, who in some instances chooses excellent ends and right means, yet neglects the greatest of all, may be said to have a partial practical, as well as speculative, wisdom, yet must on the whole be accounted foolish.

COROLLARY 2.

Speculative wisdom is a part of knowledge.

PROPOSITION XXXVI

God is possessed of the highest degree both of speculative and practical wisdom.

DEMONSTRATION

Prop. 27. Lem. to Dem. 3. and Dem. 4. 5. We can conceive no more exquisite degrees of wisdom than are displayed in the formation and preservation of the world, where we evidently see a most astonishing subordination of means to ends, rising through numberless degrees, in which the most penetrating human understanding is soon swallowed up.

2. We see nothing upon which we can with certainty pronounce that it is on the whole foolish, because we know not what its connexion may be, and what end it may subserve.

Pope's Essay on Man.

1, 2. 3. So far as we can judge from fact, God is speculatively wise.

Def. 31. Cor. 2. Prop. 33. 4. Speculative wisdom being included in knowledge, which was before proved to belong to God, another argument arises independent on the former.

3 and 4. 5. God is possessed of the highest degree of speculative wisdom.

6. To choose and act, with an utter disregard to his own felicity, when known, (as by the preceding step he must know the most certain methods of maintaining it,) would be a character in a rational agent so unaccountable, and in so peculiar a manner unworthy of Deity, that nothing could be more dishonourable than to ascribe it to him.

5, 6. 7. Valet propositio.

Wilk. Nat. Rel. p. 128, 129. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 106, 107. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 617, 618. Collib. Inq. p. 65, 66, edit. 3. p. 77, 78. Abern. vol. i. Serm. x.

COROLLARY.

Philosophical liberty belongs to God in the most perfect degree; for that is indeed no other than the practical wisdom here defined, Vid. Def. 24; and that liberty of action belongs to him, appears from comparing Def. 23. with Prop. 31.

SCHOLIUM.

It may be objected, that it is dishonourable to the Divine Being, to suppose that one thing can be more congruous to his happiness than another. To this we reply, That we most readily acknowledge, that it would be very absurd (for reasons afterwards to be mentioned) to suppose that the Divine Felicity depended on the existence of his creatures, or on any action of theirs. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to believe that the Divine Nature is such, that unspeakable delight must arise to himself from some methods of acting, which so perfect an understanding cannot but approve; and that, on the other hand, different methods of acting must appear to him the objects of aversion, as being in themselves absurd, contemptible, and mean; v. g. for him to do homage to any of his creatures, as more excellent than himself.

* The question, Whether future contingencies are known to God, unavoidably enters into the grand controversy concerning the Liberty or Necessity of the Human Will. Accordingly, it will be found to have been more or less discussed in the authors to whom we have referred, under the sixteenth proposition.

or to make a creature merely to torment it. It is so far from being dishonourable to God to suppose his happiness inseparably connected with certain methods of acting rather than others, that we could think of nothing more reproachful, than to represent him as so arbitrary a being, that of all possible methods of acting which might be proposed to him, it would be as congruous to his nature and happiness to choose one as the other.

Fost. Serm. vol. i. No. 5.

LECTURE XLIII

PROPOSITION XXXVII

To inquire how far natural liberty belongs to God. Vid. Def. 21.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Whenever any thing is more congruous to the divine felicity than another, God certainly chooses it; nor can we suppose him to do otherwise, in that were inconsistent with his wisdom, and therefore contrary to Prop. 36.

2. Nevertheless, when of many things which might be proposed any one is equally congruous to his felicity with the rest, in this he has a natural freedom of choice; and it seems that many things are indeed of such a nature. Now that this liberty is to be ascribed to him, appears from its being found in the human mind, and its being a perfection in its degree.—Prop. 16. Schol. 5.

Watts on Liberty, § 4. Prop. 11. 12. 14. 15. Tracts, vol. iv. p. 41, 42, 44—48. Works, vol. vi. p. 389—391. Grove on Wisd. p. 24—26. 30—37.

SCHOLIUM.

It is objected, That it is a reflection upon infinite wisdom, to suppose that God does not always choose that one scheme which is of all others the best, i. e. the most congruous to his felicity.

It is replied, The objection goes upon the supposition that there is one fitter than the rest; which is begging the question. If it be inquired, Whether God could not contrive such a scheme? it is answered, That we must readily allow, that he might form a scheme, fitter than the best which any created understanding could contrive; but to say he could not form another equal to that, is speaking without proof: nor does it appear that it would be any honour to divine wisdom to maintain it, more than to say, that having made one human face exceeding beautiful, it should be impossible for him to make another, whose beauty should on the whole be equal to it, even though some of the features were different: and when God chooses one of those many things, than which nothing could be fitter and nothing better, he may, agreeably to the common forms of speech, be said to choose the fittest and the best. Nevertheless, we must acknowledge, that when we weak creatures speak of the Divine wisdom, we speak of what is to us an unsearchable thing.*

Price's Four Dissertations, edit. 1. p. 121, note.

PROPOSITION XXXVIII

God is infinitely happy.

DEMONSTRATION

Prop. 36. 1. His wisdom always enables him to know, and engages him to choose, what is most conducive to his happiness.

Prop. 21. 2. Being omnipotent, he is always able to do whatever he chooses, and above the possibility of being disturbed or hurt by any being whatsoever.

To suppose the Divine happiness dependent on any creature, would be most absurd; for then, before that creature was produced, he must have been unhappy; and as he had eternally existed before the production of that creature, he must have been eternally unhappy, i. e. of all other beings the most unhappy; which it would be most dishonourable and groundless to imagine.

1, 2, and 3. 4. God is infinitely happy. Q. E. D. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 586—588. Serm. 78. p. 516. 517. edit. 4. Collib. Inq. p. 57—59. edit. 3. p. 67—69.

SCHOLIUM.

It may be asked, Why does God act at all, if he be, as the proposition supposes, perfectly happy previously to action?

To this we may answer, That the Divine Being may find some unknown delight in those volitions by which he communicates being and happiness to his creatures; nor does this suppose any change in him, since it is reasonable to believe he always wills the same thing, (Prop. 35. Cor.) viz. That at such times, and in such circumstances, beings should exist; and being secure of the execution of his volitions, (Prop. 31. Cor.) whatever delight he can be supposed to have in the actual production and happiness of those beings, he must have had in the purpose of producing them; so that in this respect, things that are not are to him as if they were; and if it be said, that there is a change in him, when in consequence of his volition those creatures are produced, he being now their Creator, supporter, benefactor, &c. which he was not before, it is answered, This is no change in him; a change of relations necessarily arising from the very idea of a Creator, and being perfectly consistent with the highest conceivable immutability; else God is changing in numberless instances every moment, as the relations of his creatures change.

* A doctrine very agreeable to Scripture, the text of which is explained by Mr. Grove in his Practical Essay.

And if it were to be allowed, that we find some degree of uneasiness attending the desire necessary to produce action in us, which however seems not to be wholly the case, yet we could not thence argue that it must be so with regard to all created beings; much less can we assert it of God, in whose volitions and motives of action we must, after all, acknowledge there is something which we cannot fully explain. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 505.

LECTURE XLIV.

PROPOSITION XXXIX.

There is no self-existent being besides that, whose existence and attributes we have demonstrated above.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. If there were any other self-existent being, besides that whose existence we have demonstrated, he must in all respects be equal to him; for otherwise it would be natural to suppose some derivation or dependency, inconsistent with self-existence, and consequently with the hypothesis.

2. To suppose such another being, is to limit the omnipotence of God; for (not to plead God's supposed incapacity to annihilate or change him; because it may be said, that admitting him to be self-existent, this would be a contradiction, and therefore an incapacity of effecting it no limitation of power; nor to insist upon his inability to control him on account of the supposed omnipotence of this other being, to which the same thought may be applied) it seems he would be unable to act without his consent, at least tacitly implied; and if their volitions should in any respect contradict each other, which in things indifferent they might at least very possibly do, the one would be a restraint upon the other, and so neither would be omnipotent.

1. 3. It would be impossible for God to conceal any of his counsels or purposes from the knowledge of such a being, which would in some degree derogate from his majesty; or if it were allowed, that he might conceal any thing from that other being,—that other being might, by a parity of reason, conceal some things from him, and consequently he would not be omniscient; nay, supposing this being to be infinite, the number and variety of things so concealed might surpass any expression or imagination of ours.

4. It is a much greater glory to be the highest of all beings, than to be only one of a number of equals; now this supremacy of God would be destroyed by the supposition of an equal, especially when it is considered, that no one can say how many they might be; for we might allow two millions as well as two.

2, 3, 4. 5. It would be much less honourable to God, to suppose any such other being as himself, than to suppose the contrary.

6. The unity of design, which seems to prevail in the works of nature, makes it reasonable to believe it had but one Author, and that he operated in an uncontrolled manner.*

7. There is no reason from the light of nature to conclude that there are any more deities than one, or indeed to imagine there are any more; since one almighty and all-wise Being can do as much as a thousand such beings can do; and if any revelation of it be pretended, it will be examined in its proper place.

Gr. 5. Prop. 27. Cor. 2. gr. 6 and 7. 8. It is reasonable to believe, there is no self-existent being, besides that One, whose existence and attributes we have already demonstrated. Q. E. D.

Wilkin's Nat. Rel. p. 113, 114. Burnet on Art. p. 23, 24. Clerici Pneum. § iii. c. v. § 2—4. Locke's Fam. Lett. p. 112—115. Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 72, 73. Living Temple, 8vo, vol. i. p. 226—228. Grot. de Verit. lib. i. c. iii. Lactant. Instit. lib. i. c. iii. Abern. vol. i. Serm. v. præs. p. 164—177. Priestley's Inst. vol. i. Letters to Philosophical Unbelievers, part i.

LECTURE XLV.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is readily acknowledged, that these arguments, as well as many by which the foregoing proposition has been proved, do not arise to full demonstration, yet they carry a very strong degree of probability, in which the mind must acquiesce till further proof can be offered from other principles.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Limborch objects, That this proof is built on the supposition that God is a Being of all possible perfections: we reply, It goes on the supposition, that we are to conceive of him in the most honourable manner that we can; and it seems enough, if we can prove that it is dishonourable to the Deity to suppose a plurality. Locke's Lett. p. 124—128.

SCHOLIUM 3.

To the argument gr. 6. it is objected,

1. That we cannot see how far the unity of design is preserved, unless we knew the whole system.

2. That so far as we can judge by the specimen

* Though Abernethy's Sermons are esteemed by many and deservedly, that he has in the second and third parts of his discourse denied the Unity of Design in the Works of Nature, and the force of many arguments drawn from thence, and has attempted to overthrow the [illegible] Mr. Locke [illegible] the first [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] the argument a priori.

we have, it seems that unity of design is not preserved, since there is a mixture of good and evil; which makes it probable that there must be at least two self-existent beings, the one evil, and the other good.

To the first of these we answer, That we must judge by analogy in this respect as in many others; and particularly, that the unity of the Divine Being stands thus far on the same footing with his wisdom, which can only be proved from a comprehensive view of the whole scheme, and must be left an uncertain thing by all created understandings, if the reasoning in the objection be admitted. As to the second, it will be more fully answered below; for the present it may be sufficient to observe, that the quantity of good being so much greater than of evil, there is no reason to believe two equal beings, one entirely benevolent, the other entirely malevolent; which yet must be the hypothesis, if the phenomena referred to could grow into an objection against the proposition.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Mr. Grove argues the truth of the proposition, from our having no revelation of more deities than one; whereas if there were more, every one of them would be the reasonable object of veneration from all other beings, even though no benefits were conferred, and consequently any one wise self-existent being would reveal to all his creatures the general knowledge of his associates, that they might pay them all due veneration; but we do not choose to insist upon this, because it depends upon those moral perfections of the Deity, which we have not yet demonstrated; and might be liable to some objection, even if those moral perfections were granted.

Grove's Post. Works, vol. IV. p. 27—29. see also p. 85.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It seems not improper here to mention some other arguments, which have been urged by writers of considerable note, which yet appear not to carry along with them equal conviction with the former.

Arg. 1. Clarke and Colliber argue from the nature of self-existence, which is simple, uniform, and universal; whereas all variety must arise from some external cause, be dependent on it, and proportionable to the efficacy of it; but to this it is objected, That if it were allowed that extension and duration were not as Dr. Clarke supposes properties of God, (which if they are, they are undoubtedly distinct properties) yet wisdom and goodness, which all allow in the Deity, may be considered as various things. How then shall we account for this variety in him? or if we say he is what the schoolmen called purus actus, what idea shall we fix to those hard words?

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 46. Collib. Inq. p. 26, 27; edit. 3. p. 30—32.

Arg. 2. Tillotson and Clarke both argue, that if there were another self-existent being, then the existence of God would not be necessary; by, that this would introduce Atheism; for no one of the supposed number would be necessary, i. e. there would be no God; for you might suppose any one of them not to exist, if the other would suffice to account for all the phenomena of nature. But I confess this argument seems to me to arise from the ambiguity of the word necessary: in one place, it signifies what is hypothetically necessary, i. e. necessary in order to solve some apparent phenomena; in the other, it signifies underived.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 16, 17, 150—161, 163, 164, 166, 167, 170. Tillot. vol. I. p. 491, 492.

Arg. 3. Wollaston argues, (as Mr. Locke has done in the preceding references,) That if two or more such beings as we have described be supposed, their natures must be supposed either the same or different; if different, they must be contrary, or various; if contrary, each must destroy the operations of the other; if various, one must have what the other wants; both, therefore, cannot be perfect: but if their nature be perfectly the same, then they would coincide, and indeed be but one, though called two. But this latter branch of the argument seems not to be self-evident: for aught appears, they might be specifically, though not identically, the same: and if it be self-evident, it supersedes all the former part of the argumentation, amounting indeed to nothing less than an assertion that the existence of two all-perfect Beings is a contradiction in terms. Rel. of Nat. p. 70, 71.

All these arguments, with those mentioned in the proposition, are stated and urged in Camb. of Exist p. 236—246. § 61, 62.

SCHOLIUM 6.

If, upon the whole, that God, whose existence and attributes have been the subject of our former inquiries, were only a co-ordinate Deity, and the God of our own system, he would, nevertheless, be the supreme object of our reverence, gratitude, and obedience.

Howe's Works, vol. I. p. 100, 101. Irving Temple, part I. c. VI. § 6. vol. I. p. 326—329.

SCHOLIUM 7.

That several of the wiser heathens, notwithstanding the tales of their priests and their poets, believed the existence of one Supreme Deity, appears from many passages in their writings: and if the word GOD, wherever we find it used, were always to be considered as signifying a Being of all possible perfections, it would be difficult to prove that there ever was such a thing as polytheism in the heathen world. It is the opinion of the learned and ingenious Dr. Warburton, that the mysteries of the greater initiation, among the heathens, was the discovery of the doctrine of the Divine Unity to the wiser part of the people: agreeably to which he supposes, that the song ascribed to Orpheus, preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius, was the very hymn used upon that occasion. That of Cleanthes (see Cudworth's Int. Syst. p. 432, 433, and West's Pindar) must be allowed in the strongest sense to speak this language; and is perhaps the finest piece of pure and unadulterated natural religion to be found in the whole heathen world.*

Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. l. ii. § 4. p. 131—160. edit. 1. Tillard's Reply to Warb. c. iv. p. 248—272. Ab. Taylor of Faith, note, p. 12—17. Sykes's Connect. c. xiv. p. 361—383. prax. 364, 365. Cud. Int. Syst. c. iv. § 10—31. prax. § 19—28. p. 184—186. Luct. Inst. l. i. § 5.

LECTURE XLVI.

AXIOM XI.

Our idea of SPACE is a simple idea, which we get by observing the distance of one body from another.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xiii. § 2—4. Collib. Inq. p. 213; edit. 3. p. 256, 257.

DEFINITION XXXV.

The PLACE of a body, is its situation with respect to some other body, with which it is compared.

Watts's Ontology, p. 380. edit. 3.

COROLLARY 1.

According to the different surrounding bodies brought into comparison, any body under consideration, may be said to continue in the same place, or be removed from it.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xiii. § 7—9.

COROLLARY 2.

The universe has no place. Locke, ib. § 10.

PROPOSITION XL.

Space is a mere abstract idea; and does not signify any thing which has a real and positive existence without us.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Space is either something real and existing without us, or a mere abstract idea.

2. If space be something really existing without us, it is either a mode or a substance.

3. If space be a mode, it must be a mode of some substance, and this substance must be co-extended with space; and the great question will be, how space differs from the substance whose mode it is said to be, or how that can be said to be a mode which, if it exists at all, exists necessarily, and is so far from depending upon any support, that it is itself the support of accidents; such as length, breadth, capacity, &c.

3. 4. Space is not a mode.

5. If space be a substance, it must be God; for those who assert its reality maintain (as they needs must do) that it is self-existent, infinite, and immutable; and we have already proved (Prop. 39.) God to be the only self-existent, infinite, and immutable Being.

6. Space cannot be God, since mere space has neither wisdom nor power; and we have already proved God to be both omniscient and omnipotent. Prop. 31. 33.

5, 6. 7. Space is not a substance.

1, 2, 4, 7. 8. Space is a mere abstract idea, and does not signify any thing real and positive existing without us. Q. E. D.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xiii. § 17, 18. Collib. Inq. p. 218; edit. 3. p. 261—263. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 39, 40. Watts's Ess. No. 1. 2—5. p. 3—18. ; 7. p. 23—25. Rel. of Nat. p. 74, 75.

SCHOLIUM 1.

By what operation of the mind Dr. Waterland apprehends the idea of space to be formed; and what he thinks the foundation of our mistaking it for something real, see in Waterland ap. Law's Inq. p. 14—16. Jacks. Exist. p. 75, 76. Law, ib. p. 26, 27, 30—33.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To the proposition it is objected, That space is a simple idea, and therefore must have an objective reality.

To this some have answered, by denying that the idea of space is simple; since we necessarily conceive of it as having partes extra partes; but it is more justly replied, that bare privation is sufficient to suggest positive ideas, as darkness and silence, though they have nothing of an objective reality.

Jacks. on Exist. and Unity, p. 63—69. Law's Inq. p. 32, 34.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is said that space forces its actual existence upon us.

Ans. If its idea forces itself upon us, it is only as mere emptiness: nor can we certainly argue the real existence of a thing, merely from our not being able to avoid the idea of it, or to suppose it not to be.

Jackson, ib. p. 69—73. Law, ib. p. 44—46, and p. 8—12.

* Dr. Warburton's opinion is disputed by Dr. Leon Levison in a great work on the Question Resolved, vol. i. chap. 8. on the sentiments of the several sects of the ancient philosophers concerning the Deity, recourse may be had to Brucker and Enfield. An account of different Treatises of Memoirs relative to the same subject may be seen in the Monthly Review, vol. [illegible] p. 176 [illegible] p. 48, [illegible] p. 402, and in May's Review, vol. vi. p. 378—380, 428—432

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is further objected, That nothing has no properties, whereas we talk of the properties of space, and settle its dimensions as well as those of body.

We reply, as above, Schol. 2. That we sometimes talk of mere abstract ideas, as if they were real beings; and though a shadow be only a privation of light, yet we often speak of it as a positive thing.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 16, 17. Watts's Ess. I. 1. § 8. p. 25—28. and § 10. p. 31—39. Jacks. ib. p. 77—81. Law's Inq. p. 48—50.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is further argued, That space is necessarily infinite, and therefore real.

Ans. This takes the question for granted; for this infinity supposes its reality, else, wherever body is, space is excluded: nor do we allow that our idea of space is infinite, though it may be ever growing: the same argument would prove number to be infinite; which seems a great absurdity at first view.

Jacks. ib. p. 81—85. Law's Inq. p. 51—65.

SCHOLIUM 6.

If space were not real, it is said there could be no motion, because no space to move in.

Ans. A body might move on to infinity; for there would be nothing to stop it: and since motion is only a change of place, i. e. in the situation of bodies with respect to each other, (Def. 35.) there needs no such medium through which the change should be made.

Jacks. ib. p. 88—92. Law, ib. p. 65—88.

To this Mr. Jackson answers, That according to this account of motion, God could not move the whole material creation in a straight line. To which Mr. Law replies, with Leibnitz, That this would not be real motion, since it is neither going to, nor from, any thing, but is still in the centre of infinite space. If it be said it relates to the various parts of real space, the body going from one point of it to another,—it is answered, That this is evidently taking the whole question for granted; and that a motion in a mere void is as conceivable as a motion in a void space, supposed ever so real. After all, the whole seems to amount to little more than a controversy about the definition of motion.

Jackson, ib. p. 93—95. Law, ib. p. 68—70. Clarke and Leibnitz, p. 7. § 5. p. 79. § 4. p. 99. § 13. p. 103. § 43. p. 107. § 52. 53.

SCHOLIUM 7.

It is further objected, That supposing two bodies a yard asunder, and all intervening bodies annihilated, if space be nothing, they would be contiguous, since in that case there would be nothing between them.

Ans. To be contiguous, and to have nothing between them, are not synonymous terms. To be contiguous signifies to touch one another; which is not a necessary consequence of their having nothing between them.

Watts's Ess. No. 1. § 11. p. 39—43. Jacks. ib. p. 92. Law, ib. p. 50—53.

COROLLARY.

It is matter of humiliation, to think that there should be such weakness and darkness in the mind of man, that some of the greatest geniuses should dispute whether space be God, or whether it be nothing.

Watts, ib. No. 1. § 6. p. 20—23. Rams. Phil. Princ. Prop. 24. Schol. 2.

SCHOLIUM 8.

It seems that time is an abstract idea, as well as space: having gotten the idea of it from some things in a constant succession, we conceive it to flow uniformly on, and to take in all existences; thus it becomes a kind of common receptacle, as well as space: but many of the same arguments brought for and against the reality of space, may also be applied to that of time. Vid. Ax. 6, 7. Def. 17.

Law's Inq. p. 79, 80. Jacks. ib. p. 76. Watts's Ontology, ch. xii. on Time, and ch. iv. on Duration. Soame Jenyns's Disquisitions, Dissertation 4.

LECTURE XLVII.

AXIOM XII.

It is impossible for two bodies to be in the same place at the same time. Vid. Def. 3.

PROPOSITION XLI.

God is incorporeal or immaterial.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 23. 1. Materiality has already been proved incompatible with self-existence, therefore God, being self-existent, must be incorporeal.

Prop. 32. Ax. 12. 2. If God were corporeal, he could not be present in any part of the world where body is; yet we have proved his presence to be continually necessary for the support and motion of body.

1, 2. 3. God is incorporeal. Q. E. D.

Clarke's Serm. vol. i. p. 98. 8vo. Taylor of Deism, p. 250, 260.

COROLLARY.

God is invisible. Abern. Serm. vol. i. No. 4.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The chief objection which has been urged against the proposition is, That unless God were corporeal, we could not imagine that he should produce body,—since nothing can give what it has not. It is answered, That we grant nothing can produce an effect more excellent than itself (Ax. 10.); but to be corporeal is not a greater excellency and perfection than to be incorporeal, but rather the contrary: nor would our conceptions of God's producing matter be at all helped by conceiving of him as material, unless that production were only making some alteration in the form and situation of some parts of himself, which is far from being the idea of creation; and indeed, on the whole, creation is a thing of which we can form no distinct idea, whether we suppose the Creator, on the one hand, or the creature on the other, corporeal or incorporeal.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some who allow the immateriality of the Divine Being contend, that though it is impossible one body should penetrate another, yet it is not impossible that an immaterial Being should penetrate body, for their natures will still be distinct; and the pre-eminence of the Divine Nature above all corporeal or derived natures is such, that there is not an equal reality in both, as there is in two particles of matter, which hinder them from coming into the same place.

Ans. Though we easily perceive what it is for a subtil fluid to penetrate a body rarer than itself, v. g. for water to fill the pores of a sponge, yet this does not help our ideas, when we apply penetration to an incorporeal substance; and it seems altogether as reasonable to suppose that an immaterial being moves bodies by contact, as that it does in a proper sense penetrate them. If that penetration mean no more, than that God can act in and upon every particle of matter where or however situated, this will be readily granted; but this seems not to be what is contended for by Mr. Colliber. On the whole, considering the immateriality of God, if any thing be asserted concerning his omnipresence, beyond what is expressed, Def. 32. it is to us mysterious and incomprehensible.

Collib. Inq. p. 218—221; edit. 3. p. 263—265.
Watts's Ont. c. xii. p. 377—379.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Notwithstanding what has been asserted in the former corollary, it may be allowed possible for God to manifest himself to his creatures, by presenting some material phenomenon to their senses, and thereby communicating ideas to them: yet in this case, it is only in a secondary and less proper sense that we may be said to see God, or hear his voice.

Burnet on Art. p. 25.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Some who have maintained that God is so present as actually to fill space, have differed in explaining the extent of that presence. Sir Isaac Newton and Dr. Clarke argue, that infinite space is possessed by him; but Colliber denies it: and though he maintains that the Divine Being penetrates all space, yet, as he denies the infinity of real space, he also denies the infinite extension of the Divine Being, and by a parity of reason, the infinity of the other properties of his nature: and as many of his thoughts are uncommon, it will not be amiss to subjoin some account of the arguments on both sides.*

Newton's Princ. p. 483. Collib. Inq. p. 141, 142; edit. 3. p. 170, 171. Mrs. Cockburne's Works, vol. i. p. 100—102.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It appears, by the fore-mentioned references to Colliber, that he denies God to be infinite, in our sense of infinity; for to have no bounds, is to be in its own nature incapable of end, which is the explication he gives of positive and absolute infinity. (Vid. Def. 28.) How far he is consistent with himself in denying this, while he grants what he calls a negative infinity, may be afterwards considered. It is, however, apparent, that if he keeps to his own idea, in denying the infinity of God, he in effect asserts that there are certain bounds, beyond which the extension, power, knowledge, &c. of the Divine Being do not exist: and indeed in his late treatise, which he calls The Knowledge of God, he very evidently avows it, when he confesses that the Deity must have some figure; and intimates it may probably be spherical.

Collib. Knowledge of God, p. 22—24.

LECTURE XLVIII.

PROPOSITION XLI.

To propose and examine some of the most considerable arguments, brought to prove the absolute infinity of the Divine Being.

Watts's Ontology, chap. xvii.

LEMMA.

The solution will consist of two parts: in the first, we shall produce the arguments brought to prove that something is actually infinite: and in the second, shall consider the arguments to prove that infinity belongs to the Divine Being.

SOLUTION. PART I.

Arguments to prove that something is actually infinite.

Arg. 1. Some have argued from the nature of

* Collins, and D. Scripture, in a [illegible] Dr. Daniel Godwin [illegible] and [illegible] He was [illegible] by Scripture and [illegible] the Son of Man, [illegible] 8, 9. [illegible] and by Vossius, Dr. [illegible] and Stillingfleet. Dr. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] space, which (supposing it to be, as Mr. Colliber does, a real thing) is certainly infinite, and cannot be bounded so much as in thought. Colliber grants we can have no idea of the end of it, yet maintains there may be an end of universal space, as we know there is of particulars: and if it be asked, What bounds it? he answers, Nothing; but will not allow that it is therefore infinite: but it is plain he can conceive space only as the interstice between bodies; and how this is more real than the void which lies on the other side the remotest body, I cannot imagine; but if Prop. 40. be true, this can be no solid argument; for nothing would be more absurd than to ascribe infinity to nothing, or to a mere abstract idea.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xvii. § 4, 21. Collib. Inq. p. 150—153, edit. 3. p. 185—193.

Arg. 2. It is pleaded that the Divine Being is allowed to be eternal: now eternity, i. e. infinite duration, is as incomprehensible as any other kind of infinity.

Colliber answers, Eternity is not and cannot be an infinite duration, being limited on the one side by the present moment; and he adds, that duration does not belong to God. Yet still, if we consider him as a Being without a beginning, (which surely we must confess him or something to be,) I see not how it is possible to separate duration from our idea of him: and if we cannot, surely here is an infinite in one respect; indeed in that respect in which it is most difficult to conceive of it.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xvii. § 5, 20. Collib. Inq. p. 149, 150, 153, 154; edit. 3. p. 180—185.

Arg. 3. Another argument is taken from the infinite divisibility of matter, since it is certain division can never annihilate.

This Mr. Colliber is obliged to admit, but he pleads, that this infinite divisibility does not imply an infinite number of parts in every particle of matter, but rather the contrary; for else the subject must be of an infinite bulk. Some have replied, these parts may be infinitely small; but he denies that any thing can be so; and if they were, matter could not be infinitely divisible. If it be said that this infinite divisibility proves that there is an infinite distance between the smallest beings and nothing,—he says that creation proves the contrary. Nevertheless, it may be answered, that we maintain the Creator to be omnipotent, and that an almighty power may overcome that infinite distance; or rather, that when we talk of an infinite distance in this sense, we only mean a very great distance; so that nothing certain can be concluded from this argument.

Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xvii. § 12. Collib. Inquiry, p. 161—165, edit. 3. p. 194—200.

Arg. 4. Others have pleaded that no limits can be set by our thoughts to the number and extent of possibilities, but more may be conceived to be produced, and still more without bounds; there must, therefore, be an actual infinity, in proportion to this possible one.

Colliber answers, This only proves that our imaginations may be perpetually going on in their operations; but that there is no reasoning from imagination to fact, without confounding possibilities and realities: and, indeed, it must be confessed, that all the utmost efforts of imagination will always be finite, though they be ever growing.

Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 63, 64, 67. Liv. Temp. part. i. c. iv. § 4. Collib. Inq. p. 176—179; edit. 3. p. 213—216.

LECTURE XLIX.

SOLUTION. PART 2.

Arguments to prove the Infinity of the Divine Being.

Arg. 1. Some have argued, that if God be limited, it must either be by himself, or by another; but no wise being would abridge himself,—and there could be no other being to limit God.

Colliber answers, That no cause can bestow absolute infinity upon its effect; and therefore there needs no cause of the finiteness of any created,—why then of an uncreated being? And further, the argument supposes it to be matter of choice with God, whether he would be finite or infinite, which it is unreasonable to suppose; and would indeed imply (what Plato and Cartesius are said to have maintained) that the Deity produced himself by a proper causality; whereas not to abridge itself, can never make any being infinite. Thus it may be said, that as God did not make himself wise, nor did another being make him wise, yet he is wise; so he may not limit himself, nor be limited by another, and yet he may be limited. If in answer to this it be urged, That as he is wise, so he is also unlimited by the necessity of his nature, which is all that can be replied, this argument thus founded will coincide with the next.

Scott's Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 193, 194, or, apud Opera, vol. i. p. 283. Collib. Inquiry, p. 143—147, edit. 3. p. 175—178.

Arg. 2. Others plead that infinity follows from self-existence; for a necessity that is not universal must depend on some external cause, (Vid. Def. 28. Cor.) which a self existent being does not.—To this Mr. Colliber replies,

1. That though necessary existence has no relation either to place or limit, any more than to variety, yet as there is some sort of variety in God, (Prop. 39. Schol. 2.) so there may be limits.

2. That to be finite is not properly the effect of any cause, and therefore may consist with necessary existence.

That finiteness is in itself necessary; because every being has a complete and positive nature, whereas our idea of infinite is negative.

4. That how absolute soever the necessity of a supposed infinite being can be, that of a finite may be equally so. He adds, We must not argue too much from abstract ideas to things: that may be necessary in its own nature, which we may conceive as not existing, v. g. perfect wisdom; and that may not be necessary in its own nature, which we may not be able to conceive not to exist, v. g. space.

It seems that the third of these answers is inconsistent with the first; that any being should be the less complete, and the less positive, because it is infinite, I own I cannot conceive; though our idea of infinite should be allowed to be a negative idea.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 43. Collib. Inquiry, p. 168—174; edit. 3. p. 203—211. Berry-street Sermons, vol. i. p. 107. second edit. Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xvii. § 12—14.

Arg. 3. It is urged that creation is so great an act of power, that we can imagine nothing impossible to that Being who has performed it, but must therefore ascribe to him infinite power.

Colliber answers, The distance between being and not being may be said to be finite, because it has been passed over; and is indeed no other than between thinking and not thinking, moving and not moving: though they are irreconcilable with each other, there may be a possibility of passing from one to the other, without an infinite degree of power. Yet, he adds, nothing on this side a contradiction can be imagined less possible than a production from nothing, and therefore allows a proper omnipotence in God, which he takes to be infinite power: so that this argument seems to be given up. Prop. 31. Schol. 4.

Collib. Inq. p. 147—149; edit. 3. p. 178—180.

Arg. 4. It is more honourable to the Divine Being to conceive of him as infinite than finite.

To this Colliber answers, by endeavouring to prove, That to conceive of him as infinite, leads us into many absurd and dishonourable notions of him, which will be surveyed in the next proposition: yet he is forced after all to acknowledge a negative infinity, i. e. that there is nothing too great for the power of God; that nothing which can be the object of knowledge is unknown to him, and that no being can bound God, or even human imagination itself. Vid. Prop. 41. Schol. 5.

Collib. Inq. p. 180—183: edit. 3. p. 217—221.

SCHOLIUM 1.

I have not here mentioned the argument taken from the supposed innate idea of infinity, nor from the immensity of matter; both which appear to me so evidently inconclusive, as not to deserve so large a survey as the former.

Collib. Inq. p. 144, 145, 154—161; edit. 3. p. 174, 175, 200—203. Camb. sur l'Exist. p. 191—197. § 50, 51. Bayle's Translation, p. 135—137.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The argument from the fulness of being supposed in God, if it imports any thing at all, must coincide with some of the former arguments, especially the fourth.

Collib. ib. p. 175, 176; edit. 3. p. 212, 213. Howe's Liv. Temp. part i. c. iv. § 2. Scott's Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 344, 345; Works, vol. i. p. 320.

LECTURE L.

PROPOSITION XLIII.

To review and consider the arguments which Mr. Colliber has urged against the Divine Infinity, and by which he has endeavoured to prove it a pernicious doctrine.

SOLUTION.

He asserts it to be attended with pernicious consequences, whether we consider the Deity in himself, or with respect to us.

PART 1.

With respect to the Deity itself, he maintains that it leads us into the following absurdities:—

1. To assert his inextension; for all extension naturally implies bounds, therefore the Platonists, asserting the infinity of God, said he was a Mathematical Point, thereby making him infinitely less than the least grain of sand; yet at the same time, they asserted him to be all in all, and all in every part; than which nothing can be more absurd.

To this it is answered, 1. That many maintain extension does not imply limits.

2. That a mathematical point being only an abstract idea, God cannot properly be represented by it.

3. That when it is said he is all in all, and all in every part, nothing more may be meant than this, that his almighty power can operate in every place, and is the support of all other beings; which Colliber himself allows.

But he replies, If we do not allow this way of speaking, we must go into the scheme of the Nullibists, and affirm that God is nowhere;—and what if it should be asserted, that it is not his property to be present in any place by a diffusive presence'. It will be said that therefore he is not at all, but this pretended axiom will require proof.—Prop. 41. Schol. 2.

Collib. Inq. p. 184—187; edit. 3. p. 222—229.

2. From the doctrine of God's infinity arises that of absolute simplicity; else each attribute would be infinite, whereas it is said there can be but one infinite.

Ans. This objection arises from an absurd confounding the idea of attribute with that of being.—Def. 12. Cor. 1.

Collib. ib. p. 190, 191; edit. 3. p. 229—231.

3. From infinity is inferred absolute omnipotence, which includes a power of working contradictions; but it is sufficient to answer, that this is not properly a power, as has been observed above.—Prop. 31. Sch. 4. Collib. ib. p. 192; edit. 3. p. 231, 232.

4. From infinity follows absolute omniscience, which would establish the doctrine of decrees, inconsistent with liberty, and therefore with virtue.

Ans. We have endeavoured to show that the foreknowledge of God is not inconsistent with liberty.—Prop. 35. Schol. 2.

Collib. ib. p. 193, 194; edit. 3. p. 232—235.

5. Hence some have inferred, that God not only does, but is, all things. This is Spinoza's scheme, who argues that an Infinite Being must comprehend all particular finite beings; but it may be replied, That this argument arises from mistaking the word infinite, which implies, that the being to whom it is ascribed has no bounds; now God is not at all bounded by the existence of creatures, whose natures are entirely different from his own; and how, on Colliber's own scheme, can God be where the creatures are, without a confusion of his being with theirs, if the foundation of Spinoza's argument, even on his own principles, be just?

Collib. ib. p. 198—200; edit. 3. p. 238—241. Hoadly's Works, vol. i. p. 67—72. Lucius Temple, part i. c. iv. § 9. vol. i. p. 216—223. Works of the Learned, for 1738, Jan. Art. iv.

LECTURE LI.

SOLUTION.—PART SECOND.

With respect to ourselves, Mr. Colliber asserts,

1. That the doctrine of the divine infinity discourages our inquiries into the nature of God, because we must for ever despair of attaining to the knowledge of him.

Ans. On Colliber's own principles, we must acknowledge it to be impossible perfectly to know him; nor is it any wonder that it should be so.—Vid. Prop. 18. Cor. But supposing him to be infinite, we may know as much of him as if he were finite, though more will continue unknown.

Collib. Inq. p. 200; edit. 3. p. 241—243.

2. It is said this doctrine raises prejudices against his existence, because it makes it impossible to conceive clearly of him. To this we may reply,

1. There can be no scheme on which there will not be some difficulties: those of Atheism will be still greater than would follow from supposing an infinite Deity.

Gordon at Boyle's Lect. pass. pras. p. 79, 80. Abadie Verit. de la Rel. part. i. c. xvi. xvii. vol. i. p. 117—132.

2. If one finite being could be supposed necessary, why may not any other i. e. Why may not the doctrine of the finiteness of God be a shelter for Atheism, in one view, as well as that of his infinity in another?

Collib. Inq. p. 201—203; edit. 3. p. 243.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Mr. Colliber seems chiefly to have opposed the doctrine of the infinity of God, in order to establish his scheme of denying the divine decrees and foreknowledge, which must indeed suppose him a limited being.

SCHOLIUM 2.

On the most accurate survey and examination of these two last propositions, we may perhaps see reason to remark,

1. That many arguments which have been brought to prove the infinity of God are inconclusive.

2. That to suppose him finite, would not free the mind from all difficulties in conceiving of him, especially those which are the consequences of his eternity; but would plunge us into some new difficulties.

3. That though it be most honourable to the Divine Being to suppose him infinite, yet if we conceive of him only as superior to all other beings, and possessed of perfections beyond the investigation of our minds, there will be a foundation laid for religion and virtue, in the several branches in which we shall afterwards endeavour to open it.

APPENDIX.

CONCERNING DR. BERKLEY'S SCHEME, THAT THERE IS NO MATERIAL WORLD.

In considering this scheme, we shall,

I. Propose the scheme itself, and the arguments by which it is supported.

II. Examine the objections brought against it.

III. Consider how far our inquiries into natural philosophy are affected by it.

Sect. I. The scheme itself is not, that sensible objects have no real existence; or that all is but a waking dream: he disclaims both these: his principle is, that no sensible object exists unperceived; or more plainly, that there is no material world, and that primary, as well as secondary, qualities, do only exist in the mind perceiving them; so that if all minds were annihilated, all bodies would be annihilated too; and the difference between dreaming and perceiving, is only that the latter is more active, regular, and vivid than the former.

The arguments by which the Doctor supports this system are these:—

1. The existence of a material world cannot be demonstrated; because an almighty power can always produce such sensations without any archetype; and it is plain in dreams he does so.

Ans. This will not prove that he has done it. We assert not that matter is a necessary being; but its actual existence may nevertheless be proved, as well as that of a created mind.

2. It is an useless encumbrance; because a Divine influence is necessary to produce ideas from material archetypes.

Ans. The Divine power may be illustrated in such a harmony; and the actual support of bodies seems an act of great power, as well as the union of the soul and body, of great wisdom.

3. The supposition of it is very inconvenient, as it introduces disputes about the production and subsistence of bodies, the infinite divisibility of matter, the union of body and mind, &c.; but it may be replied, That if giving occasion to disputes could disprove the thing disputed about, we must also give up the existence of spiritual and immaterial beings.

4. It implies a contradiction. Sensible objects are the things we perceive by our senses; but we can perceive only our own ideas and sensations: now it is plainly repugnant, that any of our own sensations should exist unperceived, and therefore that sensible objects should so exist.

Ans. This is plainly taking the question for granted; yet he triumphs greatly in this argument, and says, The bare possibility of the existence of any extended movable substance, or in general any idea, or any thing like an idea, but in a thinking mind, is absurd; but this triumph is extremely ill-grounded, because if it were granted him that sensible objects are in fact only the things which our senses immediately perceive, i. e. that they are our own ideas, (which is, as we observed above, begging the question,) it will not follow from thence that it is impossible there should be, or should have been, any external archetypes of them.

Berkley's Princ. § 22.

5. The various appearances of the same object to different persons at the same time, prove that it exists only in a perceiving mind; else the same thing must have different magnitudes, colours, &c.

Ans. The various circumstances in which it is, seems to account for its different appearance; and if the object were material, it must be so.

6. The best philosophers have granted it as to secondary qualities; but the case is the same as to primary.—This is denied.

Sect. II. The objections against it are these:—

1. To deny the possibility of matter, is plainly limiting the power of God.

2. This hypothesis, which supposes us under a continual deception, reflects upon the Divine veracity.—He answers, The same objection will lie against supposing the earth to move about the sun.

3. The senses give us such an evidence, that if it is possible they may be true notices of what passes without us, we must certainly believe they are so.

4. Our ideas can have no parts; but the objects of them have parts: therefore the objects are something different from the ideas themselves.

5. Every thing real is banished out of the world. —This Berkley expressly denies.

6. Things on this supposition are continually annihilated and created anew. He answers, The schoolmen allow a continual creation; but that is a weak reply. If Adam and Eve both slept, the sun for that time was annihilated: if it be said, It existed in the Divine Mind,—it may be answered, So it did from all eternity, and at that rate all creatures must be eternal.

7. It makes all the apparatus of nature, in the organization of plants and animals, vain.

Ans. Not vainer than upon the supposition of a continued Divine concurrence, asserted Prop. 32.; they are rules which God has laid down, according to which he directs his own operations.

8. This doctrine destroys all the evidence of the existence of other created spirits; some also add, of the Divine Existence; but I think not: yet it certainly weakens some proofs of it, especially that taken from the vis inertiæ of matter.

SECT. III. How far our inquiries into natural philosophy are affected by it.

1. It cuts off a great part of our present inquiries.

2. In a strict sense, it would change a great part of our language.

3. Nevertheless, it leaves room for the observation of the phenomena of nature, and the connexion between causes and effects, in many instances. On the whole, it is a scheme destitute of proof. The most we can assert is, that it is possible; and we are led every moment, whether we will or no, into an apprehension of the contrary. If we believe it to be true, we ought to act in every instance, and on every occasion, just as if it were false. We conclude with observing, That as some have denied all material, and others all immaterial, substances, each asserting one or the other only to be real, we may reasonably believe them both to be so.

Berkley's Princ. and Dial. pass. Collier's Immat. World. Baxter on the Soul, vol. ii. § 2. 8vo. Lord Kaims's Ess. on the Princ. of Morality and Nat. Rel. part ii. Ess. iii. p. 237—239.*

* A controversy concerning Berkley's hypothesis was carried on some years since in the Gentleman's Magazine. The answers to those who exerted the particular attention and candour to Dr. Reid and Dr. Beattie. See Dr. Reid's Inquiry, with the Human Mind. See also his Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, Essay ii. ch. 10, 11 p. 180—182; and Beattie on the Immutability of Truth, part ii. ch. ii. § 2. p. 169—191. 4to edit.

PART III.

OF THE NATURE OF MORAL VIRTUE IN GENERAL, AND THE MORAL ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.

OF THE SEVERAL BRANCHES OF VIRTUE, AND THE NATURE OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

LECTURE LII.

AXIOM XIII.

FROM the essences of things (the ideas of which immutably exist in the Divine Mind) arise certain DIFFERENCES, and from the circumstances in which they are placed, certain RELATIONS, inseparable from those essences or circumstances.

AXIOM XIV.

The actions of an intelligent being may agree or disagree with the nature, circumstances, and relations of things; or, in other words, they may with respect to them be FIT or UNFIT: e. g. Evil is as unfit to be returned for good, as a cubical case is unfit exactly to contain a globe.

DEFINITION XXXVI.

The agreement of the actions of any intelligent being with the nature, circumstances, and relation of things, is called the MORAL FITNESS, or the VIRTUE of that action; the disagreement is therefore the MORAL UNFITNESS, or VICE.

COROLLARY.

There is really and necessarily a moral fitness in some actions, and a moral unfitness in others. Vid. Ax. 14.

Wishart's Reform. Serm. p. 5, 6. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 174—179, 181. Letters to Dr. Clarke, p. 5—11. Chand. Ref. Serm. p. 5—7. 14—19. Beason's Sermon, No. II. p. 10—15. Dr. Adams's Sermon on the Nature and Obligation of Virtue, p. 3—6.*

* For a most elaborate and ample vindication of the doctrine of Moral Fitness and Unfitness, see Dr. Price's Review of the principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals.

SCHOLIUM.

To this some have objected the various opinions of learned men, and the difference in the laws of various nations concerning right and wrong.

We answer, That it does indeed from hence follow, that all the moral fitnesses of things are not self-evident; and we readily allow, that in some cases it may be very difficult to pronounce concerning them; and in others, the judgments of men may be so prejudiced by corrupt affections as to err, though the cases themselves are very clear. Nevertheless, there are some things so plain, that they were never denied to be more fit than their opposites: nor was it ever commanded or allowed by any known law, that every man might plunder or murder his fellow-citizens as he pleased; that no faith should be kept, or compacts performed, &c.

Locke's Ess. lib. i. c. iii. § 9—12. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 181—183. *Passeran's Phil. Inq. pass.

AXIOM XV.

The actions of an intelligent being appear to have a BEAUTY or excellency, when they are morally fit; and a TURPITUDE and deformity, when they are morally unfit.

SCHOLIUM 1.

This answers the question, "What are moral fitnesses fit for?" Their mutual congruity and harmony is as fit to gain the approbation of an intelligent mind, as music to please an ear that is rightly formed.

Grove's Wisd. of God, p. 29; vol. iv. of his Works, p. 44. Wishart's Ref. Serm. p. 11—15. Chand. Ref. Serm. p. 27—31. Bens. Serm. No. ii. p. 48—50.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The apprehension of that beauty or deformity which arises in the mind by a kind of natural instinct, previously to any reasoning upon the remoter consequences of actions, has been with great propriety called by many elegant writers, the Moral Sense: but what is peculiar in some of their notions will be afterwards stated and examined.

Hutcheson on the Passions, p. 245—253.

DEFINITION XXXVII.

An intelligent agent is said to be OBLIGED IN REASON, to that which appears to him on an impartial inquiry most honourable and decent; and to be OBLIGED IN INTEREST, to that which on an impartial inquiry shall appear most conducive to his happiness on the whole.

Balguy's Law of Truth, p. 4—14; in the vol. of his Tracts, p. 372—380.

SCHOLIUM.

Though an obligation in reason and interest may seem distinct, yet they are, at least in a great measure, if not entirely, connected; for, on the one hand, the obligations of reason, honour, and decency cannot be broken through, without some uneasiness to a mind conscious of the violation of them; and, on the other, it is a reasonable, decent, and honourable thing to be influenced by a regard to our own happiness.

DEFINITION XXXVIII.

The MORAL RECTITUDE or VIRTUE of any being, consists in acting knowingly and designedly in a manner agreeable to the moral fitnesses of things; and VICE, in acting contrary to them, when they are or might have been known to him.

Balg. Inq. into the Foundation of Moral Goodness, part. i. p. 30, 31; vol. of Tracts, p. 67.

COROLLARY 1.

There is a beauty inseparable from virtue of character, and a deformity from vice.—Compare Ax. 15. and Def. 36.

Shaftesb. Char. vol. ii. p. 28—36.

COROLLARY 2.

Every intelligent being, capable of discerning this beauty and deformity, is in reason obliged to the practice of virtue in every instance.—Compare Def. 37.

Price's Rev. c. vi. Burlamaguy's Elementa, part. i. c. v. vi.; part. ii. c. vii.

COROLLARY 3.

The foundation of virtue and vice cannot depend upon the mere will of any being whatsoever.—Vid. Ax. 13, 14.

Letters to Dr. Clarke, p. 11—15. Grove of Wisdom, p. 23—26, 36—40; vol. iv. of his Works, c. iii. § 1, 2. Mole's Sermon of Moral Virtue, p. 21—24, 27.

LECTURE LIII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Nevertheless, as the circumstances of things vary, the fitness of actions will proportionably vary; and therefore the will of a superior may make some things fit, which otherwise would not be so; (e. g. a general's command to a soldier to march any particular way, or a magistrate appointing an execution, &c.) but while the same circumstances continue, the moral fitness of things will always be the same. Mole on Moral Virtue, p. 27, 28.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To what is said Cor. 3. some have objected, that this is setting up something different from and independent on the Divine Being, to be the rule of

* This objection is particularly considered and answered in Dr Beattie's Essay on the Immutability of Truth.

* The doctrine of the moral fitness of things, as maintained in Dr Price's work, before referred to.

his actions. But it is replied, That as nothing can be prior to God, so nothing distinct from his nature is here asserted to be a law or rule of action to him. We cannot suppose the Divine Mind ever to have been without ideas: (for then God would have been without knowledge, and without volitions, and consequently without action: all which are most inconsistent with what we have before proved concerning him:) now perfectly discerning every idea, (Prop. 33.) he must have perfectly discerned all their relations, and therefore, among the rest, the moral fitness of some, and unfitness of other, actions, in such and such supposed circumstances; so that, on the whole, it is no more injurious to the Divine Being to assert that he cannot alter his own sense of some moral fitnesses, than that he cannot change his nature, or destroy his being.

Limestr. Lect. vol. ii. p. 579—581.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some have thought themselves, on the premises laid down above, authorized to say, That supposing God to change his mind concerning these things, the things themselves would nevertheless continue the same.

But it may be observed, with regard to such a manner of expression, That if we consider God as existing alone and prior to all creation, and by a change of mind mean only a change of will, then, to say the things themselves would nevertheless continue the same, is only saying that God would still continue to discern what is right, though his own actions were contrary to his judgment; which is a trifling proposition, as well as a blasphemous hypothesis. But if the supposition be, that his ideas are likewise changed, this would suppose the former ideas totally destroyed, seeing there would be no other mind in which they could exist; and then all the relations and fitnesses would be destroyed with them. But if we were to consider other minds as existing, and to suppose God either to change his ideas, or to act contrary to rectitude, while any one of his creatures retained this sense of it, it is granted that virtue would still be the same: but if it be hereafter proved, that God is a Being of perfect rectitude, (since we have already demonstrated his immutability,) it will follow, that all those suppositions are in effect no other than that God should cease to be God; and are so unreasonable and indecent, that they ought not to be made.

Letters to Dr. Clarke, p. 14, 15.*

SCHOLIUM 4.

If it should be hereafter proved to be the will of God, that all rational creatures should prosecute virtue; and also proved, that the will of God lays an obligation on his rational creatures,—then from hence it will evidently appear, that no man, capable of knowing God, is obliged to any thing by the moral fitness of things, to which he is not also obliged by the will of God.

SCHOLIUM 5.

If it be further inquired, Whether our obligations arising from the fitness of things be antecedent to those arising from the will of God, we answer,

1. If God will the universal virtue of all his rational creatures, he must will it from the first moment of their existence; and taking the matter in a general view, no obligation in order of time can be prior to that arising from his will, nor reach further, since universal virtue comprehends all moral fitnesses.

2. It must be acknowledged, that our sense of the fitness of some things may be prior to our discovery of the existence and nature of God; and that in proportion to the degree in which that sense is more or less strong, there will be a correspondent degree of obligation: nay, it is hard to say how any one could know that he ought to do a thing which he knew to be the will of God, unless he had some previous sense of obligation in reason or interest, on which such a conviction should be founded.

3. Nevertheless, as children apprehend the ideas of things sooner than they learn the names of complex moral modes, the easiest and best way of forming them to a sense of virtue will be, to give them an early sense of the being and perfections of God, according to their feeble capacities of apprehending them; representing it as his command, that they should do every thing they know to be good, and forbear every thing they know to be evil. But,

4. As to the order of our conception of things, when we come to examine them in riper years, if the rectitude of God should hereafter be proved to us on the one hand, and our obligation to obey him on the other,—then when we know any thing to be fit, we know it to be the will of God; and when we know it to be the will of God, we know it to be fit for us to do in present circumstances: and therefore we need not be very nice in adjusting on which of these things the greatest stress is to be laid; since we should then consider the will of God not merely as an arbitrary thing, but as the will of a wise and a righteous Being. And it is certain, that whatever might be conceived as fit from other abstract considerations, will appear yet more fit, when considered as the will of such a Being: so that a regard to the Divine authority, in doing a thing, can never diminish the degree of virtue in an action, but will always increase the sense of obligation to it. Wright against Male. p. 41—43.

SCHOLIUM 6.

On the whole it is proper to observe, that great care should be taken, especially in popular discourses, that we do not make any false suppositions of God's being changed from what we know him immutably to be; that we do not represent him as under the restraint of something superior to himself; nor ourselves as under greater obligations to something else than we are under to God. It is much more proper to say, (if the rectitude of the Divine Being be proved,) that his unerring judgment is the rule of his actions, and his will, as directed by it, (however that will may be known,) the rule of ours; and the foundation of moral good and evil should be asserted, not to be previous to, or merely consequent upon, but inseparably connected with, the immutable will of God.

* At the time when Dr. Clarke's letters to Dodwell, Leibnitz, and others, on the existence of God, &c. were published, Dr. Wollaston was not acquainted with them; and he has since had no opportunity of seeing them, but in the manner he has here mentioned.

Wright against Mole, p. 27—30, 44—51. Locke's Ess. l. ii. c. xxviii. Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. p. 36—53. Bott's Answer to Warb. p. 228, ad fin. præs. p. 232—239.

LECTURE LIV.

DEFINITION XXXIX.

Moral rectitude is generally called HOLINESS, when applied to God; VIRTUE, when applied to the creature. Jos. Mede's Works, p. 8, 9.*

SCHOLIUM.

Virtue is sometimes taken, in a more limited sense, for the duties we owe to ourselves and our fellow-creatures; and then religion is put to signify the duties we owe more immediately to God.

AXIOM XVI.

Where there is any moral turpitude in the actions of a rational being, it is (cæteris paribus) proportionable to the degree in which such a being understands the relations of things, and is free from temptation to act contrary to them.

PROPOSITION XLIV.

God is a Being of perfect HOLINESS, i. e. of the highest moral rectitude.

DEMONSTRATION

Prop. 33. 1. His infinite understanding must enable him to discern all the relations of things as they really are.

Prop. 31. 2. He is almighty, and therefore has nothing to fear.

Prop. 38. 3. He is perfectly happy, and therefore has nothing to hope.

2, 3. 4. He is infinitely removed from all temptation to act contrary to moral rectitude.

1, 4. Ax. 16. 5. It would be highly dishonourable to the Divine Being to suppose him, in any respect, to deviate from the exactest rectitude in his actions.

6. Without any temptation or advantage, to deviate from moral rectitude, must fill the mind of the Divine Being with uneasy reflections upon it. Def. 37. Schol.

6. 7. It would be inconsistent with the Divine felicity.

5, 7. 8. Valet propositio.

Lett. to Dr. Clarke, p. 15—28. Scott's Christ. Life, vol. ii. p. 361—364; Works, vol. i. p. 327. Tillots. Works, vol. ii. p. 662.

COROLLARY 1.

It is reasonable to believe that it is the will of God, that all created beings that are capable of virtue, should make it the great object of pursuit.

COROLLARY 2.

Since God is a Being of almighty power, and has the final happiness or misery of all creatures in his hands, every creature capable of virtue must be obliged in interest, as well as reason, to cultivate the practice of it (Vid. Cor. 1.); and thus it appears that virtue and self-love can only be perfectly reconciled by religion.—See Dr. Watts's pamphlet on the subject, or his Works, vol. iii. p. 715, &c.

COROLLARY 3.

Whatever shall hereafter be proved a branch of virtue, and does not imply some degree of weakness and dependence in the being by whom it is to be practised, is undoubtedly to be found in God.

COROLLARY 4.

If we see God in fact doing any thing, we may assure ourselves that it is agreeable to the reason of things that it should be done, though we cannot show how it agrees; and though there may be some objections to it, which, in consequence of the imperfection of our views, we are not able to answer.

Butl. Anal. part. i. c. vii.

SCHOLIUM.

It may perhaps be queried, Whether this rectitude of the Divine Being be necessary? i. e. Whether God can do what is morally unfit?

Ans. God has a natural power to do what is most unfit for him to do, if we consider merely the action itself, e. g. to put a period to the existence of the most excellent creature, &c.; but considering all the circumstances of an evil action, which cannot but be known to him, he cannot so oppose and contradict himself as to do it; for it is as impossible for a free agent of perfect immutable rectitude, to act contrary to reason, i. e. to destroy its own rectitude, as for necessary existence to destroy its own being; and if the rectitude of God were not immutable, then he might be changed from a most benevolent to a most malevolent being,—from the most faithful to a most perfidious being; which surely is as inconsistent with self-existence as a change from knowledge to ignorance, or from power to weakness. Nevertheless, God may freely choose this or that action, out of many others equally good and fit.

* Joseph Mede, in the passage referred to, did not mean philosophically to define the moral rectitude of God,—but to describe, in general, his singular greatness and holiness.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 115—119. p. 110—114. 6th edit. Grove on Wisd. p. 30—33. Works, vol. iv. p. 46—49. Male's Found. of Virt. p. 24. Wright against Male, p. 8, 9, 22—25.

LECTURE LV.

DEFINITION XL

That being may be said to be perfectly GOOD or BENEVOLENT, who promotes the happiness of others so far as it is fit to be promoted.

PROPOSITION XLV

God is perfectly good.

DEMONSTRATION

1. We see a great deal of happiness in the creation, of which God is the Author; and, generally speaking, those things which contain displays of Art and Wisdom, are calculated to promote the happiness of his creatures; under which head we are to rank the benevolent instincts which he has implanted in the human mind.

2. We see no mixture of evil from whence good may not proceed; and are sure that, in many instances, good does actually proceed from those things which have the appearance of evil.

3. The greatest part of those evils which we here observe, arise from the abuse of human liberty, and therefore are not directly to be charged upon God. Prop. 16.

1, 2, 3. 4. If we judge by the phenomena of nature, i. e. by the divine works of Creation and Providence obvious to us, it seems that God is a good Being.

5. God is so great, as to have no need of seeking his own happiness in the causeless misery of his creatures; nor is it a conceivable thing how he should take any pleasure in it, or how he could be happy with a supposed malignant disposition.

6. Benevolence is the great glory of a rational being; and without it, no other perfection can appear amiable and honourable.

Cor. 1 and 3. Prop. 38. and Cor. 6. Prop. 27. Dem. 1. Cor. 2. 7. We have reason to believe that God is perfectly good. Q. E. D.

Will. Natural Rel. p. 136—139. p. 119—122. edit. 7. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 113. Collib. Inq. p. 68—71. edit. 3. p. 81—84. Clarke's Post. Works, vol. i. p. 321—327, 337—341. 8vo. Boys on Div. Benev. p. 20—29. Abern. Serm. vol. ii. No. 2.*

SCHOLIUM 1.

The great objection to this, is the mixture of evil in the world, natural evil, i. e. pain, and moral evil, i. e. vice (vid. Def. 38.): and it is questioned, how far the existence and prevalence of it in so great a degree can be reconcilable with what has been said of the Divine goodness, since God has already been proved an Almighty Being.

Ans. 1. We cannot possibly judge as to the proportion there is between the quantity of happiness and misery in the creation, merely from what we observe in this part of it, which is our own abode. There may perhaps be regions incomparably more extensive and populous, in which neither natural nor moral evil are known, at least by experience.

2. It is possible there is no evil of any kind, from which a degree of good may not proceed, more than sufficient to counterbalance it.

3. When moral evil has been introduced, which (as was observed above, gr. 3.) might be by the abuse of liberty in free creatures, then penal evil is on the whole good, and well suited to a state of discipline, which may possibly in those circumstances be intended as a proper introduction to a state of enjoyment.

4. The scheme of things which we now see may perhaps be continually growing better and better; not to say, that for aught certainly appears by the light of nature, the time may come when all natural and moral evil may cease.

Rel. of Nat. p. 71, 72. Baxt. Works, vol. ii. p. 37—39, 90, 91. Scott's Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 245—249; Works, vol. i. p. 283. Balg. on Div. Rect. p. 31—33, 38—40; Tracts, p. 241—243, 249—251. Leibnitz Theod. vol. i. p. 83—85. Mandeville's Free Thoughts, p. 99—102. Maim. More Nevoch. part iii. c. xii. Travels of Cyrus, p. 248—258. 12mo. Hallet on Script. vol. ii. p. 310—318. Abern. Serm. vol. ii. No. 3. S. Clarke on the Orig. of Nat. Evil, pass. p. 60—77, et p. 160, ad fin. Bonet's Contemplation of Nature.

LECTURE LVI.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It will still be demanded, Why was moral evil permitted? To this it is generally answered, That it was the result of natural liberty; and it was fit, that among all the other classes and orders of being, some should be formed possessed of this, as it conduces to the harmony of the universe, and to the beautiful variety of beings in it.

Yet still it is replied, Why did not God prevent this abuse of liberty? One would not willingly say that he is not able to do it, without violating the nature of his creatures; nor is it possible that any should prove this. It is commonly said, That he permitted it in order to extract from thence greater good; but it may be further queried, Could he not have produced that greater good without such a means? Could he not have secured among all his creatures universal good and universal happiness, in full consistency with the liberty he had given them? I acknowledge I see no way of answering this question, but by saying, He had indeed a natural power of doing it, but that he saw it better not to do it, though the reasons upon which it appeared preferable to him are entirely unknown to us.

Pope's Ethic Epist. No. i. ver. 43—60, and 123—172. Foster's Serm. vol. ii. No. i. Clarke on the Orig. of Mor. Evil. præs. p. 122—140, and p. 182—198.*

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some have thought it more for the honour of the Divine Being, to say that the nature of things is such, that the happiness of the whole system will be more effectually promoted by the misery of some part of it; and therefore, that perfect benevolence would induce the Creator to choose such a mixed scheme, rather than another in which there should have been unmixed virtue and happiness.—But granting that there is no evil, from which an equal or greater degree of good may not proceed, (Schol. 1. gr. 2.) yet it may justly be asked, What is here meant by the nature of things? or how can it possibly be imagined or believed, that a greater sum of happiness should arise from the mixture of evil, than Omnipotence could have produced some other way? or how can the view or experience of misery be necessary to give a virtuous being a more exquisite relish of happiness?†

SCHOLIUM 4.

If we still remain dissatisfied with the reply given to the objection, Schol. 1. it seems that the chief reason is, that we are apt to go on the mistaken principle, that God must needs raise the happiness of the universe to the highest possible degree: but we are to remember, on the one hand, that God is a being of infinite power (Prop. 31.); and on the other, that to be created implies to be limited in point of happiness as well as of power; and to be possessed of some limited degree of happiness, necessarily implies a possibility of receiving some higher degrees of it from an almighty power; so that it can never be said that God has done his utmost for the happiness of any particular creature, or of the universe in general: and this is so far from being a reflection on him, that it is indeed his glory. Whatever the number of creatures be, it might have been multiplied to and beyond any given degree; there might have been as many beings of the highest order of all, as there are of them and all the subordinate classes; and whatever were supposed to have been done, there would still have been room for the inquiry, Why was not more done? And if the answer is not to be resolved into mere sovereign pleasure, as perhaps it may, then it must be referred into some reason unknown to us; for the reason cannot be, that the happiness of the whole would have been less, which in this case it is a contradiction to assert.

Bayle on Venerat. p. 88, 89. Bayes on Divine Benev. p. 65—70. Fenelon's Phil. Works, vol. ii. p. 70—82. præs. § 9, 10. p. 72—76. Leibnitz Theod. vol. ii. p. 251, &c.

SCHOLIUM 5.

To this way of stating the Divine Goodness, as pursuing the happiness of the creation so far as it is fit to be pursued, it is objected, that nothing can be fit, but what tends to produce happiness; and that no being can be perfectly good, unless he does all the good he can possibly do; but this last principle cannot, for the reason above mentioned, be allowed, when we speak of an Almighty Agent.

On the whole, it must be owned to be a considerable difficulty. Nevertheless, we are sure there is a mixture of evil in the world; and it becomes us seriously to consider, Whether it be more honourable to God, or decent in us to say, that he could have prevented it, though for some wise but unknown reason he did not choose to do it; or to say, he could not have prevented it, without choosing a scheme, in consequence of which his creation might have been less happy than it now is.

Balg. on Div. Rect. p. 23—30; Tracts, p. 241—248. Bayes on Div. Benev. p. 29—33. Grove on Wisdom, p. 31—80; Works, vol. iv. p. 72—100.

LECTURE LVII.

SCHOLIUM 6.

It may not be improper here to take some notice of the celebrated controversy between Mr. Balguy, Mr. Bayes, and Mr. Grove, concerning the Spring of the Divine Actions. Balguy refers them all to Rectitude, Bayes to Benevolence, and Grove to Wisdom. There is something which well deserves an attentive perusal in their writings on this subject.

* To the writers here referred to may be added Boyle's "Contemplation of Nature." Among the works which exaggerate the evil of mankind, in order to promote atheistical purposes, may be reckoned the "Système de la Nature," ascribed to Mirabeau the father. On the question, Why did not God prevent the abuse of liberty? no one is more sceptically copious than Bayle, in several articles of his Historical Dictionary, and particularly under the heads of Manichæans and Paulicians.

† For the writers who maintain that both the natural and moral evil existing in the world are essential parts of the best possible system, recourse may be had to Hartley, Priestley, Cooper, and Godwin. Some Jesuits may in part be mentioned in this note.

of which we shall give a short abstract in the following scholia, so far as they relate to the present question.*

Balguy maintains, that God always does that which is right and fit, and that all his moral attributes, viz. justice, truth, faithfulness, mercy, patience, &c. are but so many different modifications of rectitude. He thinks it most agreeable to the Divine simplicity, and most honourable to God, to conceive of him as always influenced by this uniform principle; and that this manner of conceiving of him would prevent much confusion in our ideas, which arises from considering his different attributes as having different interests and claims.

Div. Rect. p. 3—8; Tracts, p. 212—217.

He grants that the communication of good is one great and right end of the Creator; but maintains that it is not the only end: he ultimately aims at his own glory, i. e. the complacential approbation of his own actions, arising from a consciousness of having inviolably preserved a due decorum, order, and beauty in his works: and if ever the happiness of any particular creature, or of the whole system, interfere with this, (as he thinks it sometimes may,) it must so far give way to it.

Div. Rect. p. 20—25. Tracts, p. 219—222.

This leads him into some reflections on the nature of beauty and order, in which he maintains that they are real and absolute in themselves, and are not merely relative to our faculties; otherwise, why this wonderful apparatus, this profusion of art and skill in the universe? He contends that Dr. Hutcheson grants this, when he places all beauty in uniformity amidst variety. Now, whatever is beautiful in the universe, the Creator must see it, and have a perfect view of all that is amiable and delightful in it. He concludes this part of his discourse with observing, that to suppose all the beauty, order, and harmony of the universe subservient to the happiness of living creatures, is hardly to be reconciled with the appearance of things; so that, on the whole, the increase of happiness, and love of order, being both agreeable to the rectitude and perfection of the Divine Nature, are joint ends, blended together both in the works of creation and providence.

Div. Rect. p. 16—23. Tracts, p. 223—230.

SCHOLIUM 7.

To this Mr. Bayes objects, That to consider God first in general as doing all that is right, and then to reduce his particular moral attributes, as branches of this universal rectitude of his nature, is going further about than is necessary, and leaves particular attributes entangled in just the same difficulty as before; but if it were otherwise, he says, that as nothing can be fit but what tends to promote happiness, the best idea we can entertain of the rectitude of God, is a disposition in him to promote the general happiness of the universe; and that we may as well consider all the other moral attributes as comprehended in this, and different modifications of it, as to consider them united in Balguy's view of rectitude; but with this advantage, that here we shall have something certain to depend upon; whereas it must throw the mind into perpetual perplexity, if (for aught we know) God may have some ends in his actions and dispensations entirely different from, and perhaps opposite to, the happiness of his creatures.

Bayes on Divine Benevolence, p. 7—19.

As for the ideas of order and beauty, he seems to query, Whether those objects which appear beautiful to us, may appear so to the Divine Mind? He thinks, that the only glory which God can propose as the end of his actions, is the approbation of his own benevolent mind, as acting always in such a manner as shall be most for the happiness of the creation. He urges several objections against Balguy's notion of beauty, which it is not necessary to contract here, lest we deviate too much from the principal question.

Bayes, ib. p. 33—44. Relig. of Nat. p. 116—119.

On the whole, he concludes that the Divine Benevolence is not to be stated as "an unbounded inclination to communicate the highest degree of happiness," which is a contradiction, as it would be to suppose the greatest possible triangle actually described (compare Schol. 4.); but "as a kind affection towards his creatures, inclining him to confer upon that universe which he has made (and which he might have created or not, or have created with inferior or superior capacities for happiness) the greatest happiness of which it is capable:" but if it be asked, Why it was not made capable of more? he supposes that must be referred into the will and pleasure of God. Bayes, ib. p. 70, 71.

LECTURE LVIII

SCHOLIUM 8.

Mr. Grove refers all into the wisdom of God, which he says is "the knowledge that God has of what is fitting or unfit to be chosen in every imaginable circumstance;" and taking it for granted that he is under no wrong bias, concludes that he always chooses according to this fitness. He adds, that nothing can be fit to be chosen by any being, but what has some reference to happiness, either that of the agent or some other; and that beauty and order are nothing any further than as they tend to communicate pleasure to percipient beings: therefore the end of God in the creation must be happiness: as to the degree and manner of attaining it, suited to the faculties, dependences, and freedom of his rational creatures. On the whole, he supposes it must be apparently fit that no reasonable creature should be made miserable before he deserves it. He further adds, that he should be made for happiness; but that he should be obliged, as reasonable and free, to choose reason as his guide to it; and if he will not be persuaded to take the right way, it is fit he should be left to the ill consequences of his own wrong choice. All this, therefore, he supposes God must will.

* [illegible] further [illegible] Mr. Bayes [illegible] Dr. Hutcheson [illegible] Mr. Grove [illegible] Dr. Price [illegible]

Grove on Wisd. p. 1—7; Works, vol. iv. p. 7—13. Rel. of Nat. p. 116.

As Bayes and others have maintained that benevolence is a kind inclination or affection in God, Grove endeavours to prove that, properly speaking, there is no inclination in him; and maintains, that to suppose such an inclination as depends not on the previous act of the divine understanding, will be in effect imputing to him a blind and irrational propensity; and that nothing could be more dishonourable to the Divine Being than universally to assign this reason for his conduct in any instance, "That he was inclined, or had a mind to do it:"—but he further maintained it, as probable at least, that there are no inclinations in God at all distinct from his actual volitions; but that the actings of the Divine Will are immediately and inseparably connected with those of his understanding: to suppose the contrary, he thinks, would in effect be supposing that reason would not be sufficient to determine the Divine Mind. If any determination be said to have proceeded from such inclination, that coincides entirely with the former exploded hypothesis of blind inclination; but if it be said, the action proceeded partly from reason and partly from inclination, he asserts, that it may as well be supposed to proceed entirely from reason.

Grove, ib. p. 14—23; Works, vol. iv. p. 22—31. Balg. Dis. Rect. p. 9, 10; Tracts, p. 217, 218.

Hence Mr. Grove infers, in the process of his discourse, several things relating to the divine liberty, the origin of evil, the divine happiness, and the duties of natural religion, which have been, or will be, referred to, so far as there appears any thing peculiarly remarkable in them.

SCHOLIUM 9.

From the survey we have taken of this controversy, it may be natural to make the following remarks:—

1. That each of these ingenious writers discovers a pious temper, a concern for the honour of the Divine Being, and the advancement of virtue in the world.

2. That they all acknowledge, that God does always what is right and good: nay, that when one thing is on the whole more fit than another, he invariably chooses it.

3. That both Mr. Grove and Mr. Balguy acknowledge the communication of happiness to be a noble and excellent end, which the Deity in some measure has always in view; and which he prosecutes, so far as to bring happiness at least within the reach of all his rational creatures; never inflicting any evil upon them out of caprice, or without some just and important reason.

4. That there is very little difference between the foundation of Grove's discourse and that of Balguy's; wisdom in the former being so stated, that to be always governed by it, coincides with the notion of rectitude maintained by the latter.

5. That Mr. Bayes himself does not assert that it would have been impossible for God to have produced a greater sum of happiness; and by granting the contrary, seems to overturn the foundation of those arguments, by which he attempts to prove that God has made the creation as happy as its present capacity would admit.

6. It seems that a virtuous mind may be as easy, in considering God as a Being of universal rectitude, as if we were to consider him as a Being of unbounded benevolence: nay, it seems, that in some respects the former will have the advantage; as it is impossible for us confidently to say what will be for the greatest happiness of the whole; but, on the other hand, we may naturally conclude, that rectitude will on the whole incline God to treat the virtuous man in a more favourable manner than the wicked.

7. That the scheme of universal benevolence in the highest sense, seems evidently to imply fatality: for if all the sin and misery of the creatures were necessary to produce the greatest possible sum of happiness, and if the perfection of the Divine Nature determined him to produce this greatest sum, then sin and misery would be necessary; whereby the doctrine of liberty is destroyed, and such a seeming reflection thrown on the Divine Character, as few would be able to digest.

8. It seems, therefore, on the whole, best to keep to that in which we all agree and freely acknowledge,—there are depths in the divine counsels unfathomable to us; so that, though we may justly believe God has his reasons for suffering evil to be produced, we cannot certainly determine what those reasons are; and when we go about particularly to explain them, we find it difficult, according to the different schemes we embrace, on the one hand, to vindicate his goodness,—or on the other, his omnipotence.

LECTURE LIX.

PROPOSITION XLVI.

GOD IS INCOMPREHENSIBLE.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. This would follow merely from his being a Spirit, endued with perfections vastly superior to our own. Vid. Prop. 27. Cor. and Prop. 18. Cor. 1.

2. There may be (for any thing we certainly know) attributes and perfections in God, of which we have not the least idea.

3. In those perfections of the Divine Nature, of which we have some idea, there are many things to us inexplicable, and with which, the more deeply and attentively we think of them, the more we find our thoughts swallowed up; v. g. his self-existence, his eternity, his omnipresence, whether it be conceived of as diffusive or not diffusive; his producing effects by mere volition, the creation of matter, or even of spirit; his omniscience, where his knowledge of what is past from the creation of the world, (how long soever you suppose it to have been,) bears no given proportion to the knowledge of what is yet to come, if any creature be supposed immortal: especially, his knowledge of future contingencies; how, being perfectly happy, and consequently having nothing to wish or desire, he was excited to act; how, being perfectly good and omnipotent, he permitted evil to enter into the world; besides many other particulars touched upon in the preceding lectures.

1, 2, and 3. 4. God is incomprehensible. Q. E. D. Abern. Serm. vol. ii. No. 6, 7.

COROLLARY 1.

We have reason to believe, that as the perfections of God are infinite, if there be any orders of intelligent creatures superior to us, these perfections must also be incomprehensible to them.

Tillots. Serm. vol. ii. p. 768. Rel. of Nature, p. 93, 94.

COROLLARY 2.

It certainly becomes us to use great modesty and caution when we are speaking of the Divine perfections. Archbp. King on Predest. 30, 31.

SCHOLIUM.

It ought to be remembered, that the incomprehensible nature of the Divine Being, is no sufficient reason for our allowing ourselves in self-contradictory language, when we are speaking of him; as some of the ancients did, when they spoke of him as more than unknown, without existence, without substance, a super-divine Deformity, and as terminating infinity itself, so that infinite space is but a small corner of his productions, and beyond perfection; which, though probably designed only as strong hyperboles, tend to expose the persons that use them to ridicule, rather than to exalt our ideas of the Divine glory.

Divine Analogy, p. 65, 66. Fraser's Life of Nadir Schah, p. 12—18.

PROPOSITION XLVII.

The passions and affections of human nature are not in any degree to be ascribed to God. Compare Prop. 1. Gr. 3. and Prop. 13.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Many of those passions are grievous and troublesome; as anger, envy, fear, shame, &c. and consequently there can be no room for them in a Being perfectly happy, as God is. Prop. 38.

2. Others of them, which afford more pleasing sensations, are founded on some degree of weakness, and plainly imply a defect of happiness; as desire, hope, &c. and consequently are inconsistent with the omnipotence, as well as the felicity, of God.

3. The workings of the passions in us are always attended with some commotions in animal nature, and therefore imply corporeity; but God being incorporeal, such passions can have no place in him. Prop. 41.

1, 2, and 3. 4. God is free from human passions. Q. E. D.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Nevertheless, in a figurative sense, love and joy, anger and pity, &c. may be ascribed to God; when we mean no more than that God does such acts, as in us would be at least probable indications of such passions in our mind; v. g. supplying the necessitous, relieving the sorrowful, punishing the vicious, &c. Yet, strictly speaking, we are to conceive of all these as performed by him with the utmost calmness and serenity; and even that complacency with which God contemplates his own perfections, and the actions and characters of the best of his creatures, is of a nature very different from, and vastly superior to, those sallies of joy which we perceive in ourselves in the most agreeable situations of life, and when our enjoyments are most refined.

Limb. Theol. l. ii. c. x. § 3. Burn. on the Art. p. 24—27.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It may be proper here to mention the scheme which Mr. Brown advances in his Divine Analogy, as of so great importance, and which is built upon a hint in Archbishop King.

He pretends, that all we know of God is merely by analogy; i. e. from what we see in ourselves and observe in others, compared with events produced by the Divine Being, we conclude, that there is something in God in some degree answerable to those phenomena, though indeed very different from them. This analogy, as he maintains, differs much from metaphor, which is a mere figure; v. g. when we speak of the eye of God, the hand of God, it is a metaphor, God being entirely incorporeal; but when we speak of the knowledge and power of God, it is by analogy.

If he means by this, that the divine manner of knowing and acting is different from ours, or that whatever degree of knowledge and power we possess, bears no proportion to that of the Supreme Being, it is what every one will very readily allow, and has generally been asserted by all who believe the existence and infinite perfections of God; but if he intends any thing else, his meaning seems either very unintelligible, or very absurd; so that the scheme, in either of these views, seems utterly unworthy of that vast parade with which he introduces it, as if the whole of natural and revealed religion depended upon such an explication of the matter.

Archbishop King on Predest. § 3—6, 8, 9, 37. Grove on Wisd. p. 42, 43; Works, vol. iv. p. 48, 49. Proced. of Understanding, p. 3—6, and 132—143. Divine Analogy, c. i. Law's Notes on King, on the Orig. of Evil, p. 67—70. quarto; edit. 3. p. 89—93.

LECTURE LX.

PROPOSITION XLVIII.

To consider some of the most celebrated definitions of virtue, and accounts of the foundation of it, and to compare them with that given, Def. 38.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Dr. Clarke and Mr. Balguy have the same notion with that stated above, as evidently appears from the references to them, Def. 38. and 36. Cor. And those of the ancients, who defined virtue to be living according to nature, seem to have meant much the same.

2. Mr. Wollaston has placed it in a regard to truth; i. e. he supposes that not only our words, but our actions, have a language; when this language is agreeable to the nature of things, then the action is virtuous; but when it implies a false assertion, then it is vicious. This account, though it differs in words, seems entirely to coincide with the former, or evidently to depend upon it.

Rel. of Nat. p. 8—13, and 20—24. Hutches. on the Pass. p. 253—274. Grove's Works, vol. iv. p. 50—54.

3. Dr. Hutcheson defines moral goodness "to be a quality apprehended in some actions, which produces approbation and love towards the actor, from those who receive no benefit from the action;" and supposes what he calls a moral sense implanted in our natures, or an instinct, like that of self-preservation, which, independently on any arguments taken from the reasonableness and advantage of any action, leads us to perform it ourselves, or to approve it when performed by others.

Hutches. Inq. Pref. p. 6—8, and p. 101—106; edit. ii. p. 14—16, 111—116.

That there is indeed such a sense, as to some branches of virtue, though in many persons and instances much impaired, is not to be denied, and is well illustrated and proved in Hutches. Inq. p. 107—124; edit. ii. p. 117—135. Spect. vol. viii. No. 588.

Nor does it imply any innate idea, as some have supposed, any more than the intuitive discerning of self-evident propositions implies the ideas connected with them to have been innate.

Watts's Ess. No. iv. § 5. p. 108—113.

But Dr. Hutcheson has made this instinct to be the very foundation of virtue; and expressly says, that "every good action is supposed to follow from affection to some rational agent;" and that "the true spring of virtue is some instinct, which influences to the love of others, as the moral sense determines us to approve actions flowing from this principle."

Hutches. Inq. p. 143, 153; edit. ii. p. 155—165.

But Mr. Balguy pleads, that this makes virtue an arbitrary thing, which might have been contrary to what it is, had the instinct been contrary: that it implies, that a creature with intelligence, reason, and liberty, could not have performed one good action without this affection: that it makes brutes capable of virtue, since they are capable of affections: that it estimates the excellency of characters by the strength of passions, by no means in our own power; and, on the whole, gives us a much less honourable idea of virtue than the method of stating it, which is taken above: to which we may add, that if we do not conceive of God as an affectionate Being, such an idea of moral goodness as this would be inconsistent with that of the divine rectitude.

It may be observed by the way, that though Lord Shaftesbury uses many expressions which Dr. Hutcheson has adopted, yet it seems that he in the main falls in with the account given above; since he considers virtue as founded on "the eternal measure and immutable relation of things," or, in other words, as consisting "in a certain just disposition of a rational creature towards the moral objects of right and wrong." Shaftesb. Char. vol. ii. p. 36, 40.

We conclude this head with observing, that Dr. Hutcheson's definition is liable to some exception, as there may be room to question what he means by the expression, "Those who receive no advantage from the action." If it be only the generality of mankind, it is evidently a vague, uncertain manner of speaking and for that reason to be declined in so important a definition; but if he means all rational beings, then it will remain to be proved, that all these, or even the human species, do necessarily approve and love virtue in all its branches, and all that practise it.

Baly. Found. of Goodness, part i. p. 7—15. 20—22; Tracts, p. 46—54, 59—62.

LECTURE LXI.

4. Many writers, both ancient and modern, have placed virtue in the imitation of God; and it must be allowed to be a very noble view of it. Now, as it has already been proved, Prop. 44. that God is a Being of perfect rectitude, it follows, that taking virtue on our definition, it will also be an imitation of God; but, on the whole, this definition did not seem preferable, for two reasons: 1. Because it is difficult to prove the moral perfections of the Divine Being, otherwise than by the medium of an immutable difference in actions, the conformity to which shall be honourable, and the contrary dishonourable. 2. Because, when virtue is said to be an imitation of God, great allowance must be made for the different nature and relations of that blessed Being and ourselves; since there are some things in which it would be impossible or impious for us to attempt to imitate him; and others, in which it is impossible that he should be an example to us; i. e. in all those branches of duty which suppose either dependence, corporeity, or guilt. There is indeed in these branches of virtue, a correspondence between the nature of God and our temper and conduct; but that cannot in strict propriety be called a resemblance.

Plato ap. Howe's Blessedness, &c. Tit. Page. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 581. Howe, ib. p. 69—79. Ap. Op. vol. i. p. 471—475. Evans's Christian Temp. vol. i. p. 59—66.

5. Others, and particularly Dr. Cumberland, in his Law of Nature, have placed the whole of virtue, as in men, in the love of God and our fellow-creatures; or, to express it in his own words, "The foundation of all natural law is this: The greatest benevolence of every rational agent towards all, forms the happiest state of every and of all the benevolent, so far as it is in their power; and is necessarily requisite to the happiest state which they can attain,—and therefore the common good is the supreme law."

This is an amiable view of it, and well expresses that principle of gratitude and benevolence whence all true virtue in us must flow; but it nearly coincides with Dr. Hutcheson's notion, gr. 3. and in a great measure with gr. 4.; for to love God, is to regard him as the centre of happiness, whom therefore we must in all things study to resemble and to please; and thus it is an universal principle, of which the love of our neighbour is a very important branch; and when we are required to do to others as we would have them do to us, the meaning is, that we must treat them as we could reasonably desire they should treat us, were they in our circumstances and we in theirs. So that here is a reference to the fitness of things according to present circumstances; which plainly shows that precept to be founded on the definition of virtue which we have advanced.

Cumberl. Law of Nature, c. i. § 4. Hobbes's Leviath. p. 140. sub fin. Evans's Christian Temper, vol. ii. p. 186—194.

6. Aristotle, and other ancient moralists, have placed virtue in a mediocrity, supposing vice to consist in extremes; but it is evident, that merely from this definition none could know what virtue is; nor can it be determined what is an extreme, till we know what is agreeable to the nature of things; besides, there are some branches of virtue which cannot be carried to an extreme, v. g. resignation to the will of God,—belief of his promises, &c.

Aristot. Ethic. l. ii. c. vi. Grot. de Jure Belli et Pacis, Prol. § 43—45. Relig. of Nat. p. 24, 25.

7. Some have placed all virtue in a wise regard to our own interest; which seems to have been the opinion of Dr. Waterland, Mr. Clarke of Hull, and Dr. Rutherford. Concerning which it may be observed, that the question is not Whether virtue be always most for our interest? (vid. Prop. 44. Cor. 2.) nor Whether there be any such thing in nature as disinterested benevolence? (which we shall afterwards examine, Prop. 50. Schol.) or Whether (supposing there is) all virtue consists in it, so that our own interest should be disregarded? but Whether a wise regard to it is the clearest, the most rational, and amiable view of virtue in general?—which, from what has been said above, evidently appears not to be the case.* †

* Dr. John Brown may be added to the number of those who have placed virtue in a wise regard to our own interest.—See the second of his Essays on the Characteristics of the Earl of Shaftesbury.

† Other determinations of virtue, and accounts of the foundation of it, have been given since the Lecture was written. Mr. Hume considers, under the denomination of virtue, whatever is agreeable to ourselves and others; and whatever is useful to ourselves and others. Dr. Adam Smith ascribes it to the principle of sympathy. Mr. Archdeacon Paley defines virtue to be "the doing good to mankind, in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of everlasting happiness."

Hume on the Principles of Morals, as separately printed, passim, or in the Collection of his Essays. Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments, vol. i. p. [illegible] 6th edit. Paley's Prin. of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 61. 5th 7th edit. Dr. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 80—87.

For a view of the different accounts which have been given of the nature of virtue, and of the different systems which have been formed concerning the principle of Approbation, see Dr. Adam Smith who argues well on p. 155—330.

About forty years ago, Mr. Jamieson, a Scottish clergyman, published a treatise, to show that the obligations of virtue is entirely founded upon the reason and fitness of things, the moral sense, and the will of God.

COROLLARY.

From a survey of all these, it may appear that the most considerable writers, whose notions we have examined in the five first steps, have differed from each other, more in expression than in meaning, in the different views they have given of moral virtue.

LECTURE LXII.

PROPOSITION XLIX.

To estimate the degree of virtue in any given action.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. There can be no virtue at all in any action, if the agent by whom it is performed has not some idea of the moral fitness of things.—Vid. Def. 38.

2. There can be no virtue at all in it, if there be not an ultimate purpose of acting agreeably to that fitness, or from an end, which it is upon the whole virtuous to propose; for if the action be designed merely as a means of obtaining an end which it is vicious to desire and pursue, in that connexion it participates of the meanness of the end, how excellent soever it might otherwise have been; and the nobler the motive is, cæt. par. the more virtuous is the action.

Scott's Christian Life, vol. i. c. iv. p. 251—258; Works, vol. i. p. 97—100. Spect. vol. iii. No. 213.

3. The action must, on the whole, be chosen by the agent, in order to its being virtue in him; otherwise it is not so properly his action as the action of some other being, whose instrument or organ he at that time is.—Vid. Def. 10.

4. It is much debated, Whether it be necessary that the being acting should have a liberty of choice, (Def. 22.) i. e. be able to choose otherwise. It must be owned, this does not follow from our definition of virtue; nevertheless, it may be allowed, that the virtue of a being in a state of probation, must be founded in a liberty of choice.

Balguy's Divine Rect. p. 26—28. Grove's Divine Wisdom, p. 61—63.

5. It cannot be necessary that there should be in the general some degree of affection in every agent, to render his actions virtuous: for then the Divine Being, if he be free from affections and passions, would be incapable of virtue, contrary to Prop. 43.; but when passions are wrought into the constitution of any being, as in us, it is indeed very desirable that they should concur with the volition; but if they do not, and a fit action is performed without any passionate impressions at all, from a rational principle of gratitude to God, and regard to the happiness of man, it is still a virtuous action.—Vid. Prop. 48. gr. 3.

Balg. Inq. part i. p. 57—60; Tracts, p. 92—95.

6. Though the degree of virtue in any action is lessened by the degree in which it proceeds, from a regard to any private advantage, distinct from virtue itself (vid. gr. 2.); yet if any be excited to virtuous actions, in hopes thereby of attaining to a state of complete virtue, the degree of virtue in such actions is not thereby lessened: but this is properly loving virtue for virtue's sake.

Shaftesb. Char. vol. ii. p. 58—66. Balg. Lett. to a Deist, No. i. p. 33—36. Balg. Moral Goodness, part ii. p. 33—38; Tracts, p. 129—132.

7. When the passions work in a powerful manner on the side of virtue, the force of virtue is in that case less seen than when they work strongly against it, and a regard to the fitness of things surmounts them. Nevertheless, there may be as great virtue in a being, where there is no struggle at all, as where virtue triumphs over the most violent opposition; otherwise the Deity would be incapable of virtue: nay, there may be virtue where the passions plead strongly on its side; otherwise a man would daily grow less capable of exalted degrees of virtue as he gained a conquest over the irregularities of his passions; all which is most evidently absurd.

Shaftesb. Char. vol. ii. p. 36—38. Balg. of Moral Goodness, part ii. p. 88, 89; Tracts, p. 192, 193.

LECTURE LXIII.

COROLLARY 1.

On nearly the like principles (mutat. mutand.) the degree of vice in any given action may be estimated. The matter is largely stated on both sides in Hutches. Inq. p. 150—168; edit. ii. p. 165—183.

COROLLARY 2.

It is impossible certainly to pronounce on the degree of moral good in any action, unless we exactly knew the heart of the agent, and also knew the whole of his circumstances and relations, so as to be able confidently to determine what he could, and what he could not, have known concerning the moral fitness or unfitness of the thing in question. —Vid. Def. 38.

COROLLARY 3.

God alone can certainly and infallibly judge of the degree of virtue or vice in any given action; much more may this be affirmed concerning the whole of any character.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Dr. Hutcheson has attempted to introduce mathematical calculations into these subjects of morality; of which it may not be improper to give a little specimen. It is to be observed, that he undertakes to show the method of stating the importance of a character, rather than the degree of virtue in any particular action; and his rules are these: Let M signify the moment, or degree of good produced by the person, whose character is under consideration; B the benevolence of his temper; and A his ability: then $M=B\times A$, i. e. in a compound ratio of his benevolence and ability;—when, in any two beings, their abilities are the same, $M=B$;—when their benevolence is equal, $M=A$. On the other hand, it appears from the former view, that $B=\frac{M}{A}$ i. e. directly as the moment of good; and inversely as the ability.

When present interest lies on the side of virtue, if I express it, then $B=\frac{M-I}{A}$; but if it lies against virtue, then $B=\frac{M+I}{A}$. He adds, that it is the perfection of goodness, when $M=A$; for then the virtue of any two beings compared will be equal; i. e. : : 1 : 1 whatever their abilities are. This he supposes the Stoics meant, when they said, The virtue of a wise man was equal to that of the gods:—yet here, by the way, they took it for granted, that a wise man had no regard at all to his own interest, otherwise the assertion on these principles would be false; and if the reasoning in Prop. 45. Sch. 4. be allowed, this canon cannot be applied to the Divine Being; since A expresses an infinite quantity, and M can only express a finite.

To express the degree of moral evil in any character, let μ signify the degree of evil produced, and H hatred or ill-will,—and the former canon (mut. mutand.) may be applied.

Hutch. ib. p. 168—174, 177, 178; second edit. p. 182—188, 191, 192.

SCHOLIUM 2.

How right soever this may be in the general, yet when particular circumstances and characters come to be examined by it, it will be found of little use; since it is hardly possible to express, by proportional numbers, the degree of benevolence, the degree of ability for virtuous actions, and the degree in which interest is apprehended and considered for or against them; which must all be exactly adjusted before the preceding canons can be applied.

LECTURE LXIV.

DEFINITION XLI.

Those branches of virtue which more immediately respect God, are called DIVINE; those which respect our fellow-creatures, are called SOCIAL; and those which respect ourselves, HUMAN or PERSONAL VIRTUES.

PROPOSITION I.

To inquire into the principal branches of Divine Virtue.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. It is fit we should often contemplate the Divine Being, since he appears by the foregoing propositions possessed of such illustrious perfections as well deserve our most attentive thoughts; and since the knowledge of his nature must be of great use to direct us in the methods of pleasing him, and securing our own happiness.

Wright's Great Concern, edit. iii. p. 158—163; edit. i. p. 151—157. Scott's Christian Life, vol. i. p. 85—90.

2. On account of those perfections, it is fit we should humbly adore him, as infinitely superior to all other beings; and that both our souls and bodies should concur in the expression of such adoration.

Wright, ib. edit. iii. p. 182—185; edit. i. p. 174—177. Scott, ib. p. 91—96; Works, vol. i. p. 33—36.

3. Forasmuch as God is the most amiable Being, it is fit we should love him with all our heart; i. e. should think of him with the highest complacency and delight; and, as he is our great Benefactor, that we should cherish the most lively sentiments of gratitude towards him; and that, seeing he is the source of being and happiness, we should consider our own happiness as centred in him.

Wright, ib. edit. iii. p. 200—205; edit. i. p. 194—198. Scott, ib. p. 96—105; Works, vol. i. p. 38—41. Collib. Inq. p. 11—17. Evans's Serm. vol. i. No. viii. p. 167—173. Abernethy's Sermons, vol. ii. No. x.

4. Forasmuch as God is the Author and Disposer of all events, it is fit we should observe, acknowledge, and consider, his providential interposition in all the various occurrences of life.

Wright, ib. edit. iii. p. 163—169; edit. i. p. 157—163.

5. In consequence of this his universal providence, in conjunction with his wisdom and goodness, it is fit we should acquiesce in the determinations of his will, when most contrary to our present interest or natural inclinations.

Wright, ib. edit. iii. p. 196—199; edit. i. p. 189—194. Scott, ib. p. 115—126; Works, vol. i. p. 45—49.

6. Considering on the one hand his power, and on the other his evident and experienced wisdom and goodness, it is fit we should trust ourselves to his providential care, as to what is still before us.

Wright, ib. edit. iii. p. 206—208; edit. i. p.

200, 201. Scott, ib. p. 126—135; Works, vol. i. p. 49—53. Abern. vol. ii. No. xi.

7. Seeing all our happiness does entirely depend upon his favour, it is fit we should make it our highest care to please him, by complying with all the intimations of his will, and by imitating the moral perfections of his nature, so far as we are capable of such imitation; which, as was before observed, implies a regard to all the known branches of virtue (Prop. 48. gr. 4.); nevertheless, when considered in this particular view, it is a branch of that duty which we immediately owe to God, and a regard to it should run through the whole of our lives; that even our minutest actions may, as far as possible, be dignified and sanctified by it.

Wright, ib. edit. iii. p. 192—195; edit. i. p. 185—189. Scott, ib. p. 105—115; Works, p. 41—45.

SCHOLIUM 1.

See also on this subject the following writers:

Amory's Dial. on Devotion. Fordyce's Moral Phil. l. ii. § 4. Grove's Ethics, part ii. c. xix. Butler's Sermons, No. xiii. xiv. Xenoph. Mem. lib. i. c. 4. lib. iv. c. 3. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 78—95. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 29—109.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Faith in the Divine declarations is also a branch of Divine virtue; but cannot so properly be considered here, as we have not yet examined the evidence of the Divine veracity; and we may add, that a diligent inquiry into whatever bears any striking and probable marks of a declaration from Heaven, will be a natural consequence of that veneration for God, that love to him, and that care to please him, which were specified in the 2d, 3d, and 7th steps, as branches of Divine virtue.

COROLLARY 1.

It is vicious to ascribe supreme divine honour to any other than God alone. Vid. Prop. 39.

COROLLARY 2.

It is also vicious to worship God by images, since it tends to sink our conceptions of him, gr. 2, 3.

Limb. Theol. lib. v. c. xxxiii. Crellii Ethic. lib. iii. c. vi. p. 329, 330; vol. iv. among the Fratres Poloni.

COROLLARY 3.

The desire of foreknowing future contingencies, and all such astrological and magical arts, as some pursue, in order to the discovery of them, are to be avoided; as not only tending to vex and disquiet the mind, but also, as in a degree inconsistent with the reverence, submission, and dependence, which we owe to the Divine Being.

Howe's Works, vol. ii. p. 137—144. Turret. loc. v. quæst. 7. § 18. Prid. Connect. vol. ii. p. 329—331. More's Theol. Works, p. 240—255. Welwood's Memoirs, p. 105—107. Horace, book i. ode xi. Jennings's Antiquities, vol. i. p. 381. Limb. Theol. book v. c. xxxv.

COROLLARY 4.

Great care should be taken, that our inquiries into the nature of the blessed God be made with a becoming reverence, and not in as loose and indifferent a manner as if we were examining the properties of a mathematical figure, or a mechanical engine.

Nieuwent. Rel. Phil. vol. i. pref. § 24. Boyle on Veneration, p. 1, 2.

COROLLARY 5.

To blaspheme the name of God, i. e. to speak of him in a manner signifying contempt, or hatred, must be a most horrible degree of wickedness.

Wits. Ægyp. lib. i. c. v. § 4. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 1. Barrow's Works, vol. i. p. 133—135.

COROLLARY 6.

Forasmuch as our obligation to these branches of Divine virtue is plainly founded on the nature of things, it is evident they give a very defective account of virtue who confine it (as the ancients generally did, and those who reject revelation often do) to sobriety and benevolence; and there is great reason to believe that God as indispensably requires those regards to himself before described, as he does social virtue; for though, on account of the infinite perfections of his nature he cannot require them for his own sake, i. e. to advance his own happiness, yet his love to rectitude and order, on the one hand, and his regard to the truest happiness of his rational creatures, on the other, must engage him absolutely to insist upon them.

Leland against Tind. vol. i. p. 236—243; edit. ii. p. 187, &c. Leechm. Serm. on the Duty of a Minister, p. 36—39. Glasg. edit. Leechman's Sermons, vol. i.

LECTURE LXV.

PROPOSITION 11

To take a general survey of social virtue.—Def. 41.

SOLUTION.

The universal rule here is, That virtue obliges us to avoid whatever would be grievous to any of our fellow-creatures, if it be not necessary to procure some greater good; and that we labour to promote the happiness of all about us to the utmost of our power.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Our natures are so constituted, that we cannot but approve of kind and benevolent actions, and abhor those which are malevolent and cruel.

1. 2. Every man by the practice of an ill-natured conduct, must expose himself to the hatred and contempt of others.

1. 3. By an ill-natured conduct, a man would be exposed to the upbraidings of his own mind.

4. Mutual ill offices naturally circulate; and it is exceedingly probable that they will at last come home to the man who allows himself in them.

Lettres Persannes, vol. i. No. viii—xi.

Prop. 45. and Prop. 50. Gr. 7. 5. God is good; and therefore a benevolent conduct is an imitation of him, and consequently a branch of virtue.

Gr. 2, 3, 4, 5. 6. It is reasonable, therefore, and consequently virtuous, to avoid doing what is grievous to others, and to do them all the good that we can, i. e. to be as benevolent as possible. Q. E. D.

Hutches. Inq. Ess. ii. § 5. p. 195—222. Rel. of Nat. p. 128, 129. Puffend. de Off. lib. i. c. viii. § 1—6. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 95—105. Paley's Princ. of Moral and Political Philosophy, p. 231—235, 241—250.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it appears, that the rule of loving our neighbour as ourselves, is a summary view of social virtue; which, at the same time that it gives the rule, suggests the reason,—as it is most apparent that our conduct is to be determined, not by considering who the person is, with regard to whom we act, but what the circumstances of his case are.

Religion of Nature, p. 41. Evans's Christian Temper, vol. ii. p. 168—176. Butler's Serm. No. xi. xii.

COROLLARY 2.

Since life is the foundation of happiness, virtue requires that we should not only forbear taking away the lives of our fellow-creatures, (unless when the good of the whole requires it,) but that we should be ready to preserve their lives, when we can do it without exposing our own,—and in our own, exposing the whole to damage at least equal to the advantage that would arise from the preservation of the life or lives supposed to be secured at the expense of ours.

Cic. de Offic. lib. iii. c. xxiii. p. 167. Tool. edit.

COROLLARY 3.

The law of universal benevolence extends also to ourselves; and consequently obliges us to take care to secure our own lives, and to furnish ourselves with the necessary supports of them, if it lie in our power, that we may not be burthensome to others. It also obliges us to act in such a manner, as to preserve our characters fair and untainted; for if they be damaged, our capacity of being useful to others will be proportionably impaired.

COROLLARY 4.

This law of universal benevolence extends itself even to the brutes, supposing them capable of sensation, and consequently of pleasure and pain; and though there should be reason to suspect that the arguments, Prop. 2. are not conclusive,—yet, since it is difficult, if not impossible, certainly to prove that they are mere machines, a virtuous man would be cautious how he abuses them, (especially since they are generally supposed to have sensation,) lest by any degree of cruelty towards them, a habit of cruelty might be contracted or encouraged; nevertheless, as they are capable of but small degrees of happiness in comparison with man, it is fit that their interests should give way to that of the human species, whenever in any considerable article they come in competition with each other.

Puff. Law of Nature, lib. iv. c. iii. § 6. Hale's Contemplations, vol. i. p. 293—295. Guard. vol. i. No. 61. Fost. Serm. vol. i. No. 3.[a]

SCHOLIUM.

As we here dismiss the consideration of benevolence in general, and proceed to particular branches and effects of it,—this seems to be the proper place to touch upon the celebrated question, Whether, and how far, benevolence is to be conceived as disinterested? With respect to which, the following remarks seem just and rational:—

1. That every man cannot but desire his own happiness, whenever he thinks of it.

2. That this happiness will be more effectually obtained by a due regard to the public, than by seeking a separate interest; as appears by principles laid down above.

3. That when the connexion of self-advantage with benevolent actions is thought of, it seems impossible that it should not also be intended and considered (gr. 1.); and the principle of universal benevolence, instead of forbidding, will require, that some regard should be paid to it, in such a circumstance.

4. That it would be very mean and ungenerous, if it were possible, to seek the happiness of the public without any affection to it, but merely as an instrument of private good.

5. That when a man feels the highest pleasure in doing good to the public, and even sacrificing his own separate interest to it, he must certainly have a real love for it, which may with some considerable propriety be called disinterested, if it be not so in the highest possible sense.

[a] The obligation of mercy to Brute Animals has been elaborately considered by Dr Humphrey Primatt, in an express Treatise on the subject. Mr Granger also published a Sermon on the same subject, which, both on account of its size and price, is better adapted for the instruction of the lower orders of mankind.

6. That as the happiness of one is of little importance, when compared with the happiness of all, it seems reasonable that, so far as it is regarded, it should not be made the chief end of actions profitable to the public, nor considered in any other view than as subordinate to the good of the community, of which each is but one.

7. That the benevolent affections may be so strong, as to prevent any reflection upon the present pleasure, and much more the future advantage, of a benevolent action to ourselves.

8. That the mind is so formed, as to reflect with great pleasure and delight on characters and actions, the consideration of which does not immediately affect our own personal interest; and to say, that our complacency in them arises from an apprehension that the prevalency of such a temper in us would be advantageous to ourselves, seems asserting an evident falsehood.

Hutch. on Pass. p. 13—26. Inq. p. 160—162.*

LECTURE LXVI.

PROPOSITION LII.

It is consistent with benevolence, and therefore with virtue, that brute animals should be slain for the food of men.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. If animal food be used with moderation, it seems that hereby the happiness of mankind is promoted. This more generous kind of food may afford brisker spirits than a vegetable diet used alone; at least, it seems that those who have from their infancy been accustomed to eat flesh, would be exposed to considerable trouble and inconvenience, if not to distempers, by entirely leaving it off.

2. The happiness of the brutes is not on the whole diminished, but rather promoted, by this means; for a violent death does not seem to be nearly so painful as a natural death, coming upon them by the slow advances of a disease: their life, though it be shortened, yet is not imbittered with fear and expectation of death, of which they seem not capable; to which we may add, that out of regard to our own advantage we take care to feed and defend them, which renders their lives much happier than they would otherwise be; whereas, were they not to be used for food, we must either destroy them without eating their carcasses, to prevent their multiplying too fast upon us, or they would destroy each other, consume the vegetable creation, and perhaps grow dangerous to us for want of sufficient food.

It is also to be remembered, that where the custom of eating flesh has long prevailed, it ought not to be laid aside without great and important reasons; considering what great numbers of mankind are subsisted by keeping cattle, and trafficking in them alive or dead.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Whereas some have objected, That it is an invasion of the rights of God, as the great Lord of life, to make such havoc of the lives of brute animals, it may be answered,

1. That by appointing it in the course of his providence, that they should multiply so fast, God has made it necessary that many of them should be slain; from whence we may reasonably argue, that he allows us to kill them for food.

2. That in the various classes of animals, it seems that the greater are generally supported by eating the less; not to say (what yet some have urged) that the teeth and stomachs of men are so formed, as to intimate that they were intended to feed upon flesh.

3. The agreeable variety of tastes which God has given to the flesh of many birds, beasts, and fishes, is a further presumption that he designed them for our food; and consequently meant to give us a liberty of taking away their lives.

4. Most vegetables, when they come to be examined by microscopes, swarm with multitudes of small animals which live in and upon them;—so that a man who should scruple destroying animals, would hardly be able to find a subsistence, at least not without resigning some of the finest vegetables, and so frustrating the kind purpose of Providence in creating them.

Reynolds's Letters to a Deist, No. 1. pass. p. 24—61. Thomson's Spring, line 336—378; Autumn, line 1089—1124. Ovid's Metam. lib. xv. ver. 50—152. Puffen. Law of Nat. lib. iv. c. iii. § 4, 5. Nat. Disp. part. i. p. 44—49. Fitzosb. Lett. No. viii. Clarke's Orig. of Evil, p. 266—295.†

SCHOLIUM 2.

Nevertheless, care should be taken not to add any unnecessary circumstances of terror and pain to their death, nor should we accustom ourselves to sport with their lives.

Doddr. on Educ. p. 22, 23. Delany on Relig. Dut. p. 92. Thom. Autumn, line 360—482.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some have objected, That several of the argu-

* That there is no such thing as disinterested benevolence, is a favourite principle with many writers. See, on this side of the question, Dr. Brown, in his Second Essay on Shaftesbury's Characteristics, and Dr. Rutherforth, in his Moral Writings. On the other side of the question are, Mr Hume, in his Principles of Morals, and, very recently, Dr. Godwin, in his Inquiry concerning Political Justice, book ii. chap. viii. p. 341—361. See also Dr. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. i. p. 244—249.

† Mr Holwell and Mr Oswald, both of whom have resided in the East Indies, have embraced the principles of the Hindoos, and written against the use of animal food. Mr Oswald in a distinct treatise, very lately published.

ments used in the proposition extend not to fish: but it is answered, That if a right of killing terrestrial animals for food be established, there seems little reason for scrupling to use fish in the like manner: it seems a part of the scheme agreeable to the rest; and the instinct which brings them in shoals at certain times to the shore, seems an intimation that they are intended for human use.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It seems an instance of the goodness of the Divine Being, that he has, in the course of his providence, appointed the greater part of animals to die by some sudden violence, rather than by a lingering decay; in which, on the whole, they would suffer a great deal more than they can do in the few painful moments which generally attend their death when slain by men, or when devoured by each other; in which, perhaps, surprise and astonishment take off much of the sense of pain.

LECTURE LXVII.

PROPOSITION LIII.

To inquire, How the parts and fruits of the earth ought to be distributed for the use of its inhabitants, before any mutual agreement is made between them? i. e. considering things in a state of nature.

SOLUTION.

1. If there be enough of each, every one may take what he first lights on.

2. When he has thus taken it, another person ought not to seize upon it without his leave; but should rather take some other part not so occupied.

3. Nevertheless, if there be not enough for each, he who has possessed himself of more than is necessary for his own subsistence, ought to impart some of it to him who is not capable of thus providing for himself. Vid. Prop. 51.

4. If necessary supplies be denied to a person incapable of providing otherwise for himself, he may seize on the possessions of another; nevertheless, with this proviso, that no one shall be destroyed by such a seizure, whose life is of more importance to the whole community than that of the person who makes the seizure. Vid Prop. 51. Cor. 2.

5. Nevertheless, it is not requisite that an equal distribution should be made; since, on the one hand, each has in common cases a right to the fruits of his own industry, on the principles laid down above, gr. 1, 2. and, on the other, it is for the good of society in general that some should be richer than the rest, seeing there are many civil offices to be performed in life, which might become matter of dangerous debate, if some persons were not, by the straitness of their circumstances, induced voluntarily to perform them.

DEMONSTRATION.

The demonstration appears from Prop. 51. Sol. and Cor. 2. for it is evident that these rules will promote the happiness of mankind in general.

Locke on Gov. lib. ii. c. 5. Grot. de Jure Belli et Pac. lib. ii. c. ii. § 2. More's Utopia, p. 78—98.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It seems that usury is not in general to be condemned, provided it be no more than is proportionable to that gain which the person borrowing receives from the loan, especially among men who subsist not merely by agriculture, grazing, and manual arts, but by trade or merchandise; since it is evident that among such, the money might turn to better account to the owners than in the former case; and consequently the owners would have a just claim to some equivalent, for the advantage they forego in favour of the borrower. Nevertheless, in exacting this, virtue requires a compassionate regard to any calamitous circumstances which may render the borrower incapable of paying interest, or perhaps the principal.

Puff. Law of Nature, lib. v. c. vii. § 8—12. Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. xii. § 21.*

SCHOLIUM 2.

Many things continue yet common, and are not become the property of any, there being enough to suffice all; some of them not being capable of occupation by one person alone,—and others such, that the property of them would not be useful to any; v. g. wild beasts and birds, air-insects, sea-water. Whether the sea can come into property has been warmly disputed:—Grotius denies it, in his Mare Liberum; and Selden asserts, in his Mare Clausum; but it would be tedious and unnecessary to give a view of their arguments here.

Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. ii. § 3—5. Puff. ib. lib. iv. c. v. § 5—10.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Property, in any degree, ceases when the thing is abandoned by the former possessor; and the security of mankind seems to require, that when any thing has been long in the possession of a person, family, or nation, it should continue with them, if for a considerable time the original possessor has entered no claim upon it. Perhaps, hereby that former possessor may suffer some damage; yet there would be so much room for fraud and litigation, were antiquated claims often to be revived, that, on the whole, they would undoubtedly occasion greater trouble than advantage to mankind; and it is impossible to lay down any general rules which would not, in some instances, bear hard on the innocent and virtuous.

* Mr. Bentham has lately published a curious Essay on Usury, in which the English laws upon that subject are examined, and the wisdom and propriety of them freely discussed.

Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. iv. § 3—9. Puff. ib. lib. iv. c. xii. § 8.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Perhaps, upon these principles, that kind of theft which was permitted by the Spartan law, might be justified; as by making such a law, the proprietors seemed voluntarily to have relinquished their property to those who could seize it in such circumstances; but how far it was on the whole prudent to do it, is difficult to determine, without stating the matter more largely than would be convenient here.

Rollin Man. vol. iii. p. 340—347.*

LECTURE LXVIII.

DEFINITION XLII.

That verbal proposition is said to be ETHICALLY TRUE, in which we join those relations, attributes, or properties, which seem to us to belong to any idea,—and separate those which seem to us not to belong to it; but it is then LOGICALLY TRUE when we join those that do really agree, and separate those which do not.

COROLLARY 1.

A proposition logically true, may be ethically false, —and vice versa.

COROLLARY 2.

Propositions directly contrary to each other, in the mouths of different persons, may both be ethically, though not logically, true.

SCHOLIUM.

Ethical truth is sometimes divided into veracity, i. e. a conformity of our words to our thoughts; and faithfulness, i. e. a conformity of our actions to our words. The last seems to be limited to words expressing a purpose of doing good to another.

DEFINITION XLIII.

That proposition, in which we culpably violate ethical truth, is said to be A LIE.

Puff. ib. lib. iv. c. 1. § 8.

PROPOSITION LIV.

Virtue requires that ethical truth should be preserved among men, in their discourses with each other.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Speech may be useful in spreading the knowledge of those things which may advance the happiness of mankind.

2. In order to render it thus useful, it is necessary that a person should be believed.

3. If ethical truth be not regarded, the person speaking cannot be believed.

4. The violation of ethical truth has generally been regarded as infamous; and persons who allow themselves in it, do thereby necessarily subject themselves to great contempt, and so greatly impair both their comfort and usefulness.

1, 2, 3, 4. 5. Valet propositio.

Puff. ib. § 7, 10. Watts's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 168—170; Works, vol. i. p. 226. Grot. de Jure, lib. iii. c. i. § 11. Grove's Ethics, vol. ii. part ii. c. xi. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 184—189. 7th edition.

COROLLARY 1.

It is injurious to virtue to allow ourselves to abuse the ambiguity of words in such a manner as thereby to lead others into a mistake, since most of the ill consequences which follow from direct lying, do also follow from such equivocations and mental reservations.

Puff. ib. § 13, 14. Grot. ib. § 10. Burnet's Essay on Queen Mary, p. 63, 64.

COROLLARY 2.

Virtue forbids our deceiving others by actions, as well as by words; since the reasoning of the proposition does not depend upon making use of articulate sounds, or written characters, but upon any method taken to communicate our ideas to each other.—Puff. ib. § 2.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this some have added a further argument, taken from the nature of ethical truth, which, separate from all its effects, seems to imply something in it so sacred, that a violation of it is dishonourable and contemptible, and therefore vicious, though no damage should arise to ourselves or others from such a violation; especially, considering that God is the Witness of every falsehood; and consequently it is a kind of indignity offered to him, to utter any thing in his presence which he knows to be contrary to our own knowledge. This some have expressed, by saying God has given us a sense, by which we unavoidably delight in the truth; nor is it in our own power so far to reconcile ourselves to falsehood, as to approve of a scheme in which any given degree of happiness should be produced by falsehood, so well as one in which it should be produced by truth.

Baly. Law of Truth, p. 4—12; Tracts, p. 373—383. Butler's Anal. p. 316—318. 4to. edit.; 8vo edit. iii. p. 462—464.

SCHOLIUM 2.

From hence arises a question of considerable dif-

* Some singular opinions with regard to property are advanced by Mr. Godwin, in his Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. ii. p. 787—895. The doctrine of Property is particularly considered by Archdeacon Paley, in his Moral and Political Philosophy, b. iii. chap. 1. vol. i. p. 105—122. seventh edition.

ficulty and importance, Whether it may be in any case lawful to speak what is ethically false?

Those who maintain the principles of the former scholium must deny it; but those who place the obligation to ethical truth, merely on the principles laid down in the proposition, affirm, That if, in any case, the happiness of mankind may be more effectually promoted by falsehood than truth, in that case, falsehood ceases to be a vice, and becomes a virtue; and they suppose that many such cases actually occur; and that, on these principles, it is lawful to use falsehood in our discourses with persons that are distracted, with infants and sick men, with a melancholy man, and those who inquire after the truth, with a design of doing that injury by the knowledge of it, which without it they would not have been able to effect.

This must be acknowledged a controversy of very great difficulty. Perhaps, it is not possible for any human or finite understanding to determine, Whether the universal observation of truth would be more for the advantage of the rational creation, than the violation of it in some imaginable particulars? but as it is certain that the generality of mankind are too prone to artifice and deceit, and would be ready to abuse the doctrine of the innocence of falsehood in any case, we should be very cautious of maintaining it; and an honest, generous, and religious man, if he errs at all, would rather choose to err on the side of truth; and perhaps a regard expressed to it, even in circumstances where it could not be maintained, without great danger and seeming ill consequence to ourselves, might make such impressions on the minds of very bad men, as might prove of service to the cause of virtue and the happiness of mankind; especially considering the unlimited power which God has over all the thoughts of men's hearts, and all the circumstances and occurrences of their lives: and it will be seen, when we come to inquire into the evidence of the Divine veracity, that this attribute of the Deity is incapable of being proved, if the opinion which we are here opposing be admitted. To all which we may add, that the supposed lawfulness of speaking falsely in great emergencies for the preservation of life, might also be extremely mischievous to mankind, by depriving them of all instances of martyrdom for religion; and is, indeed, a maxim so dangerous to human society, that it seems that a wise and benevolent man, who firmly believes it, would on his own principles teach the contrary. And, after all, if the principle itself were granted, yet many of the instances mentioned above, seem of too trivial a nature to justify having recourse to a falsehood; and in particular, nothing can be more dangerous to children than to be taught to lie, by the example of their parents and governors.

Puff. ib. § 9, 10, 15, 16, 18. Barbeyrac's Notes, ib. lib. iv. c. i. § 7. Grot. ib. lib. iii. c. i. § 12—14. Watts's Serm. vol. ii.; App. p. 207—219; Works, vol. i. p. 240—245. Rel. of Nat. p. 29, 30. Cambr. Telemach. l. iii. p. 57—59.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, allowance is to be made for the change which custom may have introduced into the signification of words, which has brought some expressions of complaisance and kindness, in most civilized nations, to so loose an import, that a man has no room to imagine they will be interpreted rigorously, according to their utmost literal extent, and therefore need not be scrupulous about the use of them; v. g. as if he could not say "he was at a friend's service," unless he intended thereby to make himself a slave.

Puff. de Jure, l. iv. c. i. § 6. Spect. vol. viii. No. 557. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 5, 6.

LECTURE LXIX.

DEFINITION XLIV.

A PROMISE is any speech, or other sign, by which we signify to another person a present determinate purpose of transferring to him a part of our property or liberty, which nevertheless he is not actually to possess till after some time.

DEFINITION XLV.

A mutual promise, or agreement of two or more persons with each other, may be called A COVENANT, whether the performance of one of the parties be or be not the condition of obliging the other; but it is in the former case called a conditional covenant.

COROLLARY.

There is some foundation for distinguishing between conditional promises, and pacts or covenants; not only, as each party in a covenant may be absolutely bound to the performance of his part, without waiting to see whether the other will perform his,—but also, as there may be a conditional promise, which is not mutual,—whereas every covenant must necessarily be mutual.

Puff. de Jure, l. iii. c. viii. § 8.

PROPOSITION LV.

Virtue requires that promises be fulfilled.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 54. 1. Ethical truth, and therefore virtue, requires, that when I declare a fixed purpose of giving or doing any thing, I should really intend it.

Gr. 1. Def. 44. 2. The promisee, i. e. the person to whom the promise is made, acquires a property in virtue of the promise.

3. The uncertainty of property would evidently be attended with great inconvenience.

4. By failing to fulfil my promise, I either show that I was not sincere in making it, or that I have little constancy or resolution; and either way injure my character, and consequently my usefulness in life.

1, 3, and 4. Prop. 51. Cor. 4. 5. Virtue requires that promises should be fulfilled.

Watts's Serm. vol. ii. p. 146; Works, vol. i. p. 146. Grove's Ethics, vol. ii. part ii. c. xii.*

SCHOLIUM 1.

A man is not bound by a naked assertion, as he is by a promise; nevertheless, when he makes such an assertion, he ought to intend to act according to it (Prop. 54.); and when publicly made, he should not lightly change it, lest his character for wisdom and resolution should thereby suffer.

Grot. de Jure, l. ii. c. xi. § 2—4. Puff. ib. l. iii. c. v. § 5—7.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Nevertheless, there are some excepted cases, in which virtue does not oblige us to fulfil our promises, because the reasons mentioned in the proposition do not extend to them, v. g.

1. If a promise was made by us, before we came to such exercise of reason as to be fit to transact affairs of moment; or if by any distemper, or sudden surprise, we are deprived of the exercise of our reason, at the time when the promise is made.

Puff. ib. l. iii. c. vi. § 5. Grot. de Jure, l. ii. c. xi. § 5—7.

2. If the promise made was on a false presumption, in which the promiser, after the most diligent inquiry, was imposed upon, especially if he were deceived by the fraud of the promisee.

Grot. de Jure, l. ii. c. xi. § 6. l. ii. c. xiii. § 4. Puff. ib. l. iii. c. vi. § 6—8.

3. If the thing itself be vicious; for virtue cannot require that vice should be committed.

Puff. ib. l. iii. c. vii. § 6, 7. Grot. ib. l. ii. c. xi. § 9.

Under this head, we may rank the giving a reward for an evil action.

Grot. ib. l. ii. c. xi. § 8. Puff. ib. l. iii. c. vii. § 8.

4. If the accomplishment of the promise be so hard and intolerable, that there is reason to believe that, had it been foreseen, it would have been an excepted case.

Grot. ib. l. ii. c. xvi. § 27. Cicero de Offic. l. i. c. x.

SCHOLIUM 3.

If the promise be not accepted, or if it depend on conditions not performed, the non-performance of the promise is so evidently justifiable, that it seems hardly worth while to insert this among the catalogue of excepted cases.

Grot. ib. l. ii. c. xi. § 14, 15. l. iii. c. xix. § 14. †

LECTURE LXX.

DEFINITION XLVI.

AN OATH is a solemn appeal to God, as the Witness of the truth of some facts asserted, or of our sincere resolution to perform some promise made, renouncing our claim to the Divine favour, or imprecating his displeasure upon ourselves, either implicitly or explicitly, in case of falsehood.

COROLLARY.

It is vicious to swear by any creature, since that is in effect ascribing to such a creature a degree of knowledge and power, which seems peculiar to God. Nevertheless, if without the express mention of the name of God, there be a secret appeal to him, in that case we swear by him ultimately, and not so much by the creature we mention, v. g. If I swear by my head, or my child,—meaning thereby, "May the Divine vengeance fall on my head, or my child, if I swear falsely!"

Grot. de Jure, l. ii. c. xiii. § 11. Puff. de Offic. Hom. l. i. c. xi. § 3. Puff. de Jure, l. iv. c. ii. § 3. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 190—197. Godwin's Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. ii. p. 631—636.

SCHOLIUM.

A vow is a promise made to God. If any express or implicit imprecation attend it, it is evidently an oath: but as vows are made with different degrees of solemnity, some of them may, and some of them may not, be oaths. Yet, as an address to God is made by them, they necessarily approach nearer to an oath than a promise made to our fellow-creatures.

Paley's Moral and Political Philos. vol. i. p. 141.

DEFINITION XLVII.

PERJURY is the use of an oath in confirmation of an assertion, known, apprehended, or suspected, to be false; or the wilful violation of a promise, which by an oath we had bound ourselves to perform.

COROLLARY.

As when a person swears that a thing is so and so, he is in all reason to be understood to assert that he certainly knows that it is so: the guilt of

* A directly opposite doctrine to what is here advanced, is maintained by Mr. Godwin. See his "Inquiry concerning Political Justice," vol. i. p. 156—166. The deduction is, that it is a part of our duty to make as few promises, or declarations, exciting appropriate expectations, as possible.

† The whole subject of promises, from whence the obligation to perform them arises, in what cases they are to be interpreted, and in what cases they are not binding, is considered by Mr Paley. Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 124—141. 8 vo. ninth edition.

perjury may be contracted, even where a man believes a thing is as he asserts, if he has not a competent and determinate knowledge of the thing.

PROPOSITION LVI.

Perjury is a very heinous crime.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. It is plainly inconsistent with the reverence due to the Divine Being; as it implies, either that we do not believe his omniscience, or fear his displeasure; either of which is contrary to Prop. 51.

2. Mankind have in all ages professed some peculiar reverence for an oath, so that it has been used to determine controversies, and seal the most solemn mutual engagements.

2. 3. Faith among men would be still more injured by perjury, than by a false assertion, or promise uttered without an oath; since, therefore, these have been shown to be detrimental to mankind, (Prop. 54, 55.) this must be yet more so.

4. Perjury has always been considered a very detestable thing; and those who have been proved guilty of it, have been looked upon as the pests of society.

1, 3, and 4. 5. Perjury, being thus dishonourable to God, injurious to others, and to ourselves, is a great crime. Q. E. D.

Occas. Paper, vol. i. No. vii. p. 5—12. Puff. de Jure, l. iv. c. ii. § 2. Barrow's Works, vol. i. Serm. xv. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 197, 198.

COROLLARY 1.

Care should be taken that we do not impair the reverence due to an oath, by using or imposing oaths upon trifling occasions, or administering them in a careless manner. Occas. Paper, ib. p. 22—24.

COROLLARY 2.

The reverence of an oath requires, that we take peculiar care to avoid ambiguous expressions in it, and all equivocation and mental reservation. Vid. Prop. 54. Cor. 1.

Grot. de Jure, l. ii. c. xiii. § 3. Puff. de Jure, l. iv. c. ii. § 12—15. Tully de Offic. l. i. § 13.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Something of this kind may be said of subscription to articles of religion, these being looked upon as solemn actions, and nearly approaching to an oath. Great care ought to be taken that we subscribe nothing that we do not firmly believe. If the signification of the words be dubious, and we believe either sense, and that sense in which we do believe them is as natural as the other, we may consistently with integrity subscribe them; or, if the sense in which we believe them be less natural, and we explain that sense, and that explication be admitted by the person requiring the subscription in his own right, there can be no just foundation for a scruple. Some have added, that if we have reason to believe (though it is not expressly declared) that he who imposes the subscription, does not intend that we should hereby declare our assent to those articles, but only that we should pay a compliment to his authority, and engage ourselves not openly to contradict them, we may in this case subscribe what is most directly contrary to our belief: or, that if we declare our belief in any book, as for instance the Bible, it is to be supposed that we subscribe other articles, only so far as they are consistent with that; because we cannot imagine that the law would require us to profess our belief of contrary propositions at the same time: but subscription upon these principles, seems a very dangerous attack upon sincerity and public virtue, especially in those designed for public offices.*

Burnett on the Art. p. 6—9. Clarke on the Trinity, Introd. edit. 1. p. 20—26; ed. 2. p. 23—29. Conyb. Serm. on Subscript. p. 24—31.

SCHOLIUM 2.

If we have bound ourselves by an oath to do a thing detrimental to our interests, we ought to submit to great inconveniences rather than violate it; but if the nature of the oath be absolutely and evidently unlawful, we are not bound by it: and it is certain, that in some of the cases mentioned above, in which virtue allows the violation of promises, it may also permit our acting contrary to our oaths; with this proviso, that in proportion to the greater solemnity of the latter, the case should be more weighty and urgent

Grot. ib. l. ii. c. xiii. § 4. Bart. Works, vol. i. p. 572. Puff. de Jure, l. iv. c. ii. § 9, 10.

SCHOLIUM 3.

If a conditional covenant (Def. 45.) be mutually confirmed by an oath, the breach of the condition on one side evidently dissolves the other party from his obligation; which by the way justifies the Revolution in England in 1688, though many of the persons principally concerned had sworn allegiance to King James.

Occas. Paper, vol. i. No. vii. p. 12—16.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Grotius is mistaken, if he maintains (as some have asserted he does) that by an oath we always promise something to God; and that for this reason

* The question concerning subscription to articles of religion has of late years occasioned the most ample discussion. It would be almost endless to enumerate the various tracts that have appeared on the subject. The controversy was revived by the publication of the "Confessional," and carried on to a much greater extent, by the different applications made by some of the clergy and the protestant dissenting ministers, for relief in the matter of subscription. The names of Blackburne, Jebb, Disney, Lindsey, Wyvill, Mayhew, Farmery, Powell, Radcliff, Watson, and many others, appear in opposition to human articles of religion. On the contrary side must be mentioned Tucker, Rutherforth, Randolph, Tottie, Powell, and a variety of writers besides. Mr. Paley has recently offered some thoughts on the matter, in his "Moral and Political Philosophy," vol. i. p. 218—220. Still more recently, a very elaborate treatise against subscription has been published by Mr. Dyer.

an oath must in no case be violated. It appears from the definition of an oath, that the former of these propositions is false; and from the second scholium, that if it were true, the inference drawn from it would be inconclusive: but the following passage, which some have quoted to prove this to be his opinion, is far from containing it.

Grot. de Jure, l. ii. c. xiii. § 14, 15.

LECTURE LXXI.

DEFINITION XLVIII.

MARRIAGE is a covenant between man and woman, in which they mutually promise cohabitation, and a continual care to promote the comfort and happiness of each other.

PROPOSITION LVII.

Virtue requires that mankind should only be propagated by marriage.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. A more endearing friendship, and consequently a greater pleasure, arises from continued cohabitation, than could arise from the promiscuous use of women; where there could be little room for a tender, generous, and faithful friendship between the sexes.

2. The promiscuous use of women would naturally produce a great deal of jealousy, bitter mutual contentions, and a variety of other passions, from which marriage, when preserved inviolate, very much secures.

Experience teaches that a promiscuous commerce between the sexes is very unfavourable to propagation, at least for producing a healthful offspring; and would prove the means of spreading to a fatal degree the venereal infection.

4. The weakness and disorders to which women are subject during pregnancy, require that, both out of regard to them and the future race of mankind, they should be tenderly taken care of; and that during their confinement they should be comfortably maintained. Now there is none from whom these offices of friendship can be so reasonably expected, as from the person who apprehends himself the father of the child; but without marriage, no man could ordinarily have the security of being so.

5. The education of children is much better provided for by this means, both with respect to maintenance, instruction, and government, while each knows his own, and the care and authority of both parents concur in the work; to which that of the father is generally, on the whole, of the greatest importance.

6. The regular descent of patrimony being the consequence of fathers knowing their children, is better provided for by marriage than it could be without it; which, by the way, is a great encouragement to industry and frugality.

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6. 7. The happiness both of men and women, and of the rising generation, is on the whole more effectually secured by marriage than it would be by the promiscuous use of women; therefore, mankind ought only to be propagated this way. Q. E. D.

Puff. de Jure, l. vi. c. i. § 5. Wits. Ægypt. l. ii. c. vi. § 13—15. Baxt. Works, vol. i. p. 314, v; vol. ii. p. 31, B. Osterwald of Unclean. § 1. c. i.: § 2. p. 4—10. Fordyce's Mor. Phil. l. ii. § 3. c. ii. Milt. Parad. Lost, l. iv. line 750—770.*

COROLLARY 1.

Those unnatural lusts, commonly known by the names of Bestiality and Sodomy, are to be greatly detested, not only as actions whereby the dignity of human nature is in the most infamous degree debased, but also as alienating the mind from marriage, which is so important a band of society.

COROLLARY 2.

Those who seduce single women to violate their chastity, are guilty of a very great crime; as thereby they discountenance marriage, and bring on persons so debauched, and the families to whom they are related, great calamity and indelible infamy.

Guardian, vol. ii. No. 123.

COROLLARY 3.

All those things which tend to cherish wandering lusts, are for that reason to be avoided; as lascivious actions and unclean words, which generally lead on by a strong impulse to greater irregularities.

Spectator, vol. iv. No. 286. Osterv. of Unclean. Praef. p. 16: ib. sect. 1. c. vii. p. 60—72. Evans's Sermons, vol. ii.

COROLLARY 4.

Since marriage is of so great importance to the happiness of mankind, it is plain that it ought not to be dissolved upon any trifling consideration; since uncertain marriages would be attended with many of the same inconveniences as the promiscuous use of women, and would differ from it little more than in name.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. i. § 20.

LECTURE LXXII.

PROPOSITION LVIII.

To enumerate the principal duties of the married state.

* Some [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

SOLUTION.

1. Virtue requires that both parties preserve their fidelity to each other inviolate.

2. They should study in every instance to promote each other's comfort and happiness.

3. They are to contribute their respective parts towards the maintenance and education of their children.

Delany on Relat. Dut. No. ii. iii. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 339—344. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 124—140.

DEMONSTRATION

The obligation to perform these several duties arises from the nature of the engagements into which the parties have entered (Def. 48.); and from the tendency which such a conduct will have to secure their mutual happiness and that of their families.

PROPOSITION LIX

Virtue requires that no man should at the same time have more than one wife,—and no woman more than one husband.

PART I.

No man should have more than one wife at a time.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The number of females, so far as we can judge by the best computation, is not entirely equal to the number of males, in the human species. Vid. Prop. 27. Dem. 4. gr. 4.

Dorham's Phys. Theol. p. 175, 176. Reflect. on Polyg. p. 4—7.

1. 2. Should polygamy prevail, there would not be females enow to supply all the males; consequently many of them must be deprived of the advantage of marriage,—not to mention how far it might be the occasion of those hateful and destructive practices of Sodomy and Evirration.

Reflect. on Polyg. p. 32—34.

2. 3. Quarrels would probably arise between those men who endeavoured to possess themselves of more women than one, and those who were by this means deprived of partners in life; which might be attended with fatal consequences on both sides, should polygamy very much prevail.

4. The jealousy of the wives would probably make them very unhappy, were several women to share among them the affection and care of the same man; and it would occasion many caballings, and mutual endeavours to supplant each other in his affections, by which the peace of families would be greatly disturbed; not to mention the frequent adulteries that might be expected, if there was not a strict guard. Vid. Gen. xxix. xxx.

5. The discords of the mothers might be communicated to the children; and so not only alienate their hearts from the father, and thereby prevent the efficacy of his care for their education, but also prevent a due harmony between them in riper years, and lay a foundation for quarrels to be transmitted to the next generation.

6. The master of the family would have his part in all this uneasiness; and would find it hardly possible to preserve his own quiet in any tolerable degree, without sacrificing the peculiar pleasure of having one intimate and best beloved friend, with whom to converse with the highest endearment: and if he had any true taste of the sublimest pleasures of friendship, the gratification of appetite with a variety of women must appear but a poor equivalent for such a sacrifice.

7. The practice of polygamy may leave room to a married man to be continually entering upon new amours and treaties with respect to other women; which would keep the mind in an uneasy agitation, and greatly divert him from applying to cares of the greatest importance to the happiness of his family and of the public, and expose him thereby to many obvious inconveniences.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7. 8. Since polygamy is thus pernicious to the interest of the husband, wife, and children, and, if it commonly prevailed, to that of so many single persons, virtue requires that one man should have but one wife at a time. Q. E. D.

Burn. Life of Rochest. p. 112, 113. Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. i. § 16—19. Salm. State of Turkey, p. 411—416. Reflect. on Polyg. p. 13—19. L'Esprit de Loix, vol. i. lib. xvi. c. ii—vii.*

COROLLARY.

It is yet more evidently unlawful for him who has married one wife, with a promise of confinement to her, afterwards to take a second. Vid. Prop. 55.

SCHOLIUM I.

Some have argued in favour of the proposition, That it would prevent the over-stocking the world with inhabitants, which would be the consequence of polygamy; but we have waved that argument,—

1. Because it seems that the contrary is true, i. e. that the number of mankind is lessened rather than increased by polygamy, which is a direct conse-

* The question concerning Polygamy has recently been revived, in consequence of an elaborate treatise in defence of it, written by the late Mr Morton Mutlow, and entitled The Epigamia. To this were many answers appeared during which may be reckoned, Polygamy Unscriptural, by John Travers. Remarks on Polygamy, by Thomas Wood. Polygamy Indefensible, by J. P. Smith. Remarks on Theliphthora, by James Peirce. Reasons of Polygamy displayed, by R. Hill. Examination of Theliphthora, by John Palmer; and Refutation of Polygamy, by T. Bloore. There were, also, several anonymous publications on the subject, of which it may be sufficient to mention Anti-Theliphthora: Marriage and its Vows Defended, by a Female. The Unlawfulness of Polygamy cleared: and the Cobbler's Letter to the Author of Theliphthora. But the most decorous idea that was given to the Theliphthora, was in two articles which occur in the sixty-third volume of the Monthly Review. These articles were written by the late Rev. Samuel Bourne. Some general Reflections on Polygamy may be seen in Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 419—426, and in Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 127—129.

quence from grad. 1.; for it is plain, that ten women, for instance, would be like to have more children by ten men, than by one, especially in some length of years; considering how much the body might be weakened by that luxury with which seraglios are generally attended: and accordingly it is found in fact, that there is the greatest increase of men where polygamy is not used, as the author of the Reflections on that subject has proved, in an accurate and convincing manner. But,

2. If it were fact that polygamy would increase the number of mankind, it would be an argument for it, rather than against it; for it is certain, the earth with proper cultivation would be capable of maintaining a much greater number of inhabitants than at present subsist upon it; and so many general calamities have from age to age interposed to thin their numbers, that it is hardly to be imagined they will ever grow insupportably great. In the mean time, that polygamy lessens the number, is an additional argument that it is contrary to the happiness of the species, and therefore to virtue.

Reflect. on Polyg. Diss. vi. vii.

PART 2.

One woman should have but one husband at a time.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Several of the arguments urged in the preceding demonstration will (mut. mutandis) prevail here; especially those taken from the proportion of the sexes, mutual jealousy, and the want of peculiar endearments arising from one most intimate friend.

2. The offspring would be thereby rendered uncertain, and healthful propagation prevented, by which the main purposes of marriage would be evidently defeated. Prop. 57.

1 and 2. 3. Valet propositio.

Puff. ib. lib. vi. c. i. § 15.

SCHOLIUM.

This has appeared so intolerable a thing, that it has hardly been practised by any nation on earth, unless some very barbarous people are to be excepted. On the contrary, it has almost universally been made a main branch of the marriage covenant, that with regard to matrimonial converse, a wife should be the property of one husband alone; and those women have been accounted infamous who have violated this engagement.

L'Esprit des Loix, vol. i. lib. xvi. c. v. Temple's Hist. of Engl. p. 14—16.

LECTURE LXXIII.

PROPOSITION LX.

To inquire to whom virtue prohibits marriage.

SOLUTION.

1. In general it is not advisable that marriage should be contracted by those who, by reason of their unripe age, or some natural or accidental defect in their understanding, are destitute of reason, and so incapable of making a proper choice, or behaving themselves aright in the conjugal state.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. i. § 26.

2. It is prohibited to those who are evidently incapable of propagation, unless they marry with others in the like condition with themselves: otherwise, by their incapacity, the great end of marriage would be frustrated, and a foundation laid for a perpetual jealousy, and many other irregular passions.

Puff. ib. § 25. Ricaut's Ott. Court, p. 293. Lettres Persannes, No. 41.

3. To those who labour under any distemper of body, or distraction of mind, which would probably be conveyed to their offspring.

4. To those who are already married, and whose consorts are yet living, virtue forbids marriage, upon the principles of the preceding proposition, while the former marriage continues undissolved: and whereas, among us, one man and one woman have been mutually appropriated to each other, it is yet more evidently and universally unlawful for either to marry a third person, without the consent of the other, as it is a breach of the marriage covenant. Whether it may be lawful when such consent is gained, even supposing the preceding proposition to hold good, i. e. whether marriage may be dissolved by mutual consent? will be inquired in the next proposition.

Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 11.

5. It has generally been said, that marriage is unlawful to those who are nearly allied by blood or affinity. The chief reasons assigned against such marriages are,

1. That in some cases, the duties of other relations would be plainly confounded by them,—as in case of a mother's marrying her son.

2. Friendship by this means would be less widely diffused, and covetous parents would hinder their wealth from being communicated, perhaps on these principles even forcing the elder brethren to marry their sisters, however contrary to their inclination; which must be the source of great calamity to them, as well as detriment to others.

3. By prohibiting these marriages, provision is made against some temptations to unchastity, arising from the more frequent converse of near relations.

4. There seems to be something generally in the constitution of our natures abhorring such marriages, if the relations are near,—which has rendered them infamous among most civilized nations: though, it must be owned, the Egyptians and Per-stains with an exception to this rule: however, among the European nations, it prevails in its full force.

Puff. ib. § 28, 32, 34. L'Esprit des Loix, vol. ii. lib. xxvi. c. xiv.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Notwithstanding what has been said, it must be owned very difficult to fix the degrees of affinity, or consanguinity, within which marriage is unlawful; and if mankind ever have been, or should be, in such circumstances, that a brother could have no wife but his own sister, most of the arguments urged above would cease, and the rest must give way to such a necessity."

SCHOLIUM 2.

The argument urged gr. 5. concludes much more strongly against marrying with those nearly related by blood than by affinity. Puff. ib. § 35.

PROPOSITION LXI.

To inquire in what cases marriage may be rightly dissolved.

SOLUTION.

1. It is no doubt dissolved by the adultery of either party; which is an apparent breach of the most fundamental article of the covenant. Def. 48. and Prop. 55.

2. For the same reason, it is dissolved upon the obstinate desertion of one of the parties, since thereby the covenant is also broken.

Life of Galeacius Caracciolus.[1]

3. It is questioned whether marriage may be dissolved, on account of the unkind behaviour of one of the married persons. In one view, it may appear reasonable that it should, since consulting their mutual happiness and comfort is a branch of the marriage covenant: yet, when we consider what damage might arise to the innocent offspring,—how frequently complaints of this kind occur among married people,—how generally in this case both parties are to blame,—and on these accounts how uncertain marriage would be rendered, if the dissolution of it in this case should be allowed,—it seems on the whole more for the happiness of mankind, that some who are in these unhappy circumstances should bear their calamity, than that they should be eased of it on terms so hazardous to the security and happiness of many more. To which we may also add, that the consideration of marriage, as an indissoluble bond, may engage both husband and wife, out of regard to their own peace, to be careful to govern their passions, so as not to make it mutually intolerable; in which exercise of wisdom and virtue, each party may find a very great account.

[illegible] 8

4. Marriage may not be dissolved, as many other covenants may, by the consent of the parties: if it might, marriages might frequently be contracted almost in jest, or merely in some views of present indulgence: and when one party was weary of the bond, very indirect measures might be used to procure the consent of the other to dissolve it; and thus a state of things would probably be introduced into the world, little different from that which marriage was intended to prevent.

5. Neither ought marriage to be dissolved merely on account of barrenness, unless one of the parties evidently appears to have been under some natural incapacity before the contract: otherwise it would be difficult to fix the time when such a dissolution should take place; and great room would be left for fraudulent separations.

6. Neither are marriages to be dissolved on account of any concealed deformity of body, or flaw in estate; though it be allowed very criminal and foolish for any to impose upon another in a matter of so great importance.

Milton's Prose Works, p. 5—12. Puff. lib. vi. c. i. § 20—22, 24. Lettres Persannes, vol. ii. No. 102. Locke on Government, part ii. § 78—81. Reeves's Apol. vol. i. p. 187, 188. More's Utopia, p. 141—144.

COROLLARY.

Since the marriage bond is of so strict a nature, it ought never to be formed without the most mature consideration; nor should any be forced into it by the authority of superiors, contrary to their own inclinations.

LECTURE LXXIV.

DEFINITION XLIX.

CONCUBINAGE is a sort of marriage, in which the woman, by agreement of both parties, is to be considered as a servant in the family; and express provision is made that her children shall not have such a right of possession and inheritance as the children of the primary wife.

SCHOLIUM.

It appears by Prop. 59. part 1. that the taking a concubine during the life of another wife, is generally at least to be avoided; and it seems that he who never marries any woman but as a concubine, neither pays due respect to the female sex, nor sufficiently consults his own happiness, in a free and ingenuous friendship; yet perhaps, in case of a second marriage, where the children by a former wife are living, concubinage is not altogether to be condemned, if the constitution of the country permit it.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. i. § 36. lib. iv. c. xi. § 9. Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 15.

PROPOSITION LXII

Virtue requires that parents should take peculiar care of their own children.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The state of infancy is so feeble, that if tender care were not taken of young children, they would die quickly after their birth.

2. In childhood, on account of the weakness of reason, they are incapable of providing for themselves.

3. It is evidently of importance to themselves and the public, not only that their lives be taken care of, but that their minds be formed to virtuous and pious sentiments, of which they are at first void,—not to say that many at least seem strongly inclined to the contrary.

1, 2, 3. Prop. 51. 4. Virtue requires that some provision should be made for the education of children.

5. Those who have produced them ought not in reason to throw them as a burthen upon others, when they are capable of taking care of them themselves.

6. That στοργη, or natural affection, which parents feel towards their children, will render this task more easy and delightful to them than it would be to others.

6. 7. It is probable (cæt. par.) that children will be better taken care of by their parents than others.

4, 5, 7. 8. Virtue requires that parents should take peculiar care of their own children. Q. E. D.

Rel. of Nature, p. 159, 160. Delany on Rel. Duties, Serm. iv—vii. Fordyce's Mor. Phil. § 3. c. iii. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 345—367. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 139—148.

COROLLARY 1.

Virtue generally requires that those who have children should make them their principal heirs.

Grot. ib. lib. ii. c. vii. § 5. No. ii. L'Esprit des Loix, vol. ii. lib. xxvi. c. vi.

COROLLARY 2.

Virtue requires that remoter ancestors should be careful of grandchildren, or other descendants; especially if the immediate parents be either taken away by death, or any other way rendered incapable of affording them assistance. Grot. ib. § 6.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It does not appear necessary that an equal distribution of goods be made among all the children: some proper regard should be had to the merit of each; yet great care should be taken that the parent does not, by an imprudent distinction, sow such seeds of discord as may counterbalance the advantage accruing to the most deserving child from a larger share.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It seems reasonable that the eldest son should generally have a larger share of his father's possessions than the rest; that so the honour of the family may be supported, and that he may be a refuge to younger children, if they should fall into poverty; especially since (cæt. par.) it may reasonably be expected that he will be more capable of managing what he has for the common good; and the distinction made in his favour will generally be less provoking to the rest than if it were made in favour of any other child.

Puff. de Jure, lib. iv. c. xi. § 8. Fleetw. Rel. Duties, p. 111—113. Paley's Principles of Mor. and Political Philos. vol. i. p. 359, 360.*

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, an elder son, or any other, may be disinherited, or deprived of a part of what he would otherwise have had, upon account of his vicious disposition, if there be reason to believe that he will abuse it to the detriment of others: this the reason of things requires, and the laws of most nations admit of it, though Plato only allows it with the consent of near relations. As for the argument brought against it from Deuteronomy xxi. 15. &c. as a law of God to the Jews, it may be answered, That the Jews had not that power of alienating their estates in general, which all allow to others not under such a peculiar appointment, and therefore no valid argument can be drawn from hence; and it is plain, God often interposed to transfer the inheritance; as in a most memorable instance Jacob did, and that (as all who believe Scripture must suppose) by Divine direction, Gen. xlix. 3. 1 Chron. v. 1, 2. not to mention that power which the law of God gave to Jewish parents to put a wicked child to death; which might render a particular licence to disinherit him needless.—Deut. xxi. 18. &c.

Puff. ib. § 11. Fleetw. ib. p. 113—127. Burn. Life of Sir M. Hale, p. 7, 8.

LECTURE LXXV.

AXIOM XVII.

There is an evident fitness, that when one rational being has received a favour and kindness from

* The doctrine of the Scriptures [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] another, he should have some sense of gratitude, and return good rather than evil.

Puff. de Off. lib. i. c. viii. § 7, 8.

COROLLARY.

Virtue requires gratitude.—Vid. Def. 37.*

PROPOSITION LXIII.

To inquire into the duty of children towards their parents.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Forasmuch as children have received important favours from their parents, gratitude, and therefore virtue, requires that they should love them.—Ax. 17. and Cor.

2. Considering the superiority of age, and the probable superiority of wisdom, which there is on the side of parents, and also how much the satisfaction and comfort of a parent depend on the respect shown him by his children, it is fit that children should reverence their parents.

2. 3. It is fit, that while the parents are living, and the use of their understanding continued, their children should not ordinarily undertake any matter of great importance without advising with them, or without very cogent reasons pursue it contrary to their consent.

4. As young people need some guidance and government in their minority, and as there is (cæt. par.) some peculiar reason to trust the prudence, care, and affection of a parent, preferable to any other person, it is reasonable that children, especially while in their minority, should obey their parents; without which, neither the order of families, nor the happiness of the rising generation, could be secured; nevertheless, still supposing that the commands of the parents are not inconsistent with the will of God.

1, 2. 5. Virtue requires, that if parents come to want, children should take care to furnish them with the necessaries of life, and so far as their ability will permit, with the conveniences of it.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. ii. § 4, 7, 11. Fleetwood on Religious Duties, p. 4—22, 51, 52. Delany, ib. No. viii. ix. Puff. de Off. lib. ii. c. iii. § 12. Rel. of Nature, p. 161, 162. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 368—378. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 118—130.

COROLLARY 1.

The like regards are in some degree due to remoter ancestors, if yet living; though, if they come to want, they fall most properly under the care of their more immediate surviving descendants.

COROLLARY 2.

If any generous and compassionate friend act the part of a parent, in taking care of a helpless child, he may justly expect from him the returns of filial duty.

COROLLARY 3.

When the parent has delegated his authority to some other person, reverence and some degree of obedience are on that account to be paid to him, beyond what would otherwise be his due.

COROLLARY 4.

Different degrees of obedience will be due to parents according to the different age and circumstances of the child, and in some degree according to the capacity and character of the parent.

Puff. de Off. lib. ii. c. iii. § 5—8.

COROLLARY 5.

It is the duty of parents, or of those who sustain their character and place, to behave to the children under their care in such a manner as may most effectually conciliate their reverence and love, and make the yoke of obedience as light as possible; and for this reason all unnecessary severities are to be forborne.

Fleetwood of Relative Duties, p. 73—81.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Many have chosen to build the right of parents to the obedience of the child, wholly or chiefly on their having been the instruments of bringing it into existence, and have hence inferred a sovereign right in the parent to dispose of the life, liberty, and fortune of the child; but it appears from the preceding propositions, that parental authority within moderate bounds may be fixed on a basis less liable to exception.

Grot. lib. ii. c. v. § 7. Filmer of Patr. Government, c. i. § 1—8. Locke of Government, lib. i. § 52—56. Puff. ib. § 1—6. Barbeyrac's Notes on ib. § 10. p. 606, 607.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It appears from the reasoning of the proposition, that both the parents have a right to the duties there mentioned; nevertheless (cæt. par.) the authority of the father is chiefly to be regarded; though Hobbes is of a contrary opinion, and maintains that a sovereign and unlimited power over the children resides in the mother, and that the authority of others over them is derived from her.

Hobbes de Cive, c. ix. Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. ii. § 2, 3. Puff. de Offic. lib. ii. c. iii. § 3. Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 1. note.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Though it appears from Demonstration, gr. 3. that it is an irregular thing for children, generally speaking, to contract marriages without the advice or consent of their parents,—nevertheless, it might be attended with still worse consequences, if marriages so contracted were to be deemed invalid.

Puff. ib. § 14. Grot. ib. § 10.

* Some considerations of a different kind, with respect to the duties and rights of children, are advanced in the first Dissertation prefixed to the Dutch edition of Lord Vaughan, and by Mr Groenvelt, in his Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. i. p. 85—88.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The indigence of human infants seems to have been wisely designed by Providence, on purpose to lay a foundation for those mutual offices of parental and filial duty, on which much of the happiness of life evidently depends.

Cambray on Government, p. 26, 27.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It hence follows that, when the health of the mother and the convenience of the family will admit of it, it is fit that mothers nurse their own children, or take care that they be nourished at home.

Tillots. Serm. vol. i. p. 523—525. Delany of Rel. Dut. Serm. iv. p. 79—88. Spectator, vol. iii. No. 246. *

LECTURE LXXVI.

DEFINITION L.

A COMMUNITY is a company of men who are so associated, that the whole body, either by themselves or their representatives, should judge concerning any disputed rights or properties of each member of it.

Locke of Government, lib. ii. c. vii. § 87.

DEFINITION LI.

Those men are said to be in A STATE OF NATURE who are not by any mutual engagements, implicit or express, entered into communities.

PROPOSITION LXIV.

It is for the happiness of mankind, that men in a state of nature should form themselves into societies.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The happiness of mankind requires that controversies which arise among them should be determined.

2. The prejudices of self-love would lead men to lay down different rules for themselves and others; it is proper, therefore, that there should be some universal rule.

3. When these rules are admitted, prejudice would bias particular persons in the application of them; therefore, it is fit that particular cases should be determined by some other person, rather than by either of the parties, whose interest is in question.

4. Such determinations would often be in vain, if there were not some power to enforce the execution of them.

5. Where men are formed into communities, rules may be laid down, judges appointed, and determinations enforced, by the joint power of the whole body.—Therefore,

1, 2, 3, 4, 5. Prop. 51. 6. The happiness of mankind, and therefore virtue, requires that men should form themselves into communities.

Locke of Gov. lib. ii. c. ii. § 124—126. Puff. de Jure, lib. vii. c. i. § 8—11. Cambray of Gov. p. 36—38 †; Thoms. Seas. Autumn, line 43—144.

SCHOLIUM.

It is queried, Who is to be considered as a member of a community? There can be no doubt as to those who have given their express consent to it; as for those who live under the protection of any community, it is to be taken for granted that while they so continue, they consent to bear the burthen, as some equivalent for sharing the happiness of it; but for aught that yet appears, such may withdraw themselves from it when they shall judge it requisite.

Locke of Gov. lib. ii. c. viii. § 119—122. Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 24. No. ii.

DEFINITION LII.

A LAW is a rule of action, prescribed by some superior, in such a manner as at the same time to declare a purpose of favouring or punishing those under his power, as they shall act agreeably or disagreeably to it.

Puff. de Jure, lib. i. c. vi. § 1—4. Baxter's Works, vol. ii. p. 25, 26. Grot. de Jure, lib. i. c. i. § 9.

COROLLARY.

If it shall appear to us hereafter, that God has given us intimations, not only of his own delight in virtue and aversion to vice, but also that he will reward the one and punish the other, then it may properly be said, that the law of God requires virtue.

DEFINITION LIII.

They are said to have the SUPREME CIVIL GOVERNMENT in any state or community, who have the supreme power of making laws for that community, and executing them in their own persons, or by such officers as they shall appoint.

DEFINITION LIV.

When the supreme civil government is entirely in the hands of one person, it is called A MONARCHY: if in a select number, AN OLIGARCHY, which some have divided into an ARISTOCRACY, which is the government of the nobles, and AN OCHLOCRACY, which is the government of a few of the meanest, appointed and supported in a tumultuous manner; whereas A DEMOCRACY is the government of the whole body of the people: but a constitution of

* On this question, recourse may be had to Dr. Cudgan's Essay on Nursing, and Mr. Nelson's Treatise on the Government of Children.

† The book entitled Cambray on Government, was not written by Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray, but by the Chevalier Ramsay, the principles of that prelate government compounded of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, like the British constitution, is called A MIXED MONARCHY.

SCHOLIUM.

The composition in different governments is so various, that some have thought this distribution not sufficiently accurate, urging that neither Poland nor Holland fall under any of these.

Temple's Ess. vol. i. p. 47, 48. Voltaire's Hist. Charles XII. bb. ii. p. 61—67. Temp. on Neth. c. ii.; Works, vol. i. p. 30—43. Universal History, vol. xxxiv. p. 6—30; ibid. vol. xxxi. p. 3—12.

DEFINITION LV.

Laws made by the supreme civil power of any community, to be observed by all their subjects, are called CIVIL LAWS, and so differ from MUNICIPAL, made for particular towns and corporations.

SCHOLIUM.

The word civil law among us is generally used to signify the laws of the Roman empire, which, on account of their equity, have been generally received in other nations; whereas those which have been established by act of parliament, are commonly called statute, though they be in our sense civil laws. Puff. de Jure, lib. viii. c. i. § 1.*

LECTURE LXXVII.

PROPOSITION LXV.

To inquire into the probable original of civil government, or of communities.

SOLUTION.

1. Considering the natural dependence of children upon their parents, it is certain that government would at first be parental; and it is exceeding probable that it, according to many of the most credible traditions, the human race descended from one pair, so long as the first man lived, and continued in the exercise of reason, he had a considerable influence over the councils and actions of his descendants, and was regarded by them as their common head.

2. From the nature of things, it is not probable that the power he had over his family descended entirely to the eldest son; it is certain, that the reason for being governed by an elder brother, is by no means the same as for being governed by a father; though we may naturally suppose that (cæt. par.) the age and experience of the elder brother, together with the larger share of the inheritance which he probably had, would have given him some superiority,—yet not so great as an elder brother would now generally have; partly, as the world being thinly peopled, each might have as much land as he pleased, and partly, as in proportion to the length of men's lives in those early ages, (if we credit tradition as before,) the difference between the ages of the several elder brethren of a family would be very inconsiderable.

Sidney on Gov. c. i. § 2.

2. 3. Each family would probably on the death of the common parent become a kind of little sovereignty, whose governor would naturally be the father of it during his life; and such sovereignties as these would be greatly multiplied in the third, fourth, or following generations.

4. It is exceedingly probable that, among these lesser communities, disputes would arise; for the determination of which they might judge it proper, on the principles mentioned Prop. 64. to form themselves into larger societies, including several of those domestic communities; and perhaps the form of these might be various according to the various tempers, characters, and circumstances of the persons concerned.

5. As disputes arose between one and another of those larger societies, which no doubt they often did, it was necessary that, on their forcibly opposing each other, the command of their respective armies should centre in one person; and if he were not only remarkable for his valour, but also for his wisdom, humanity, eloquence, piety, good success in affairs,—any of these, but especially the conjunction of them all, would greatly tend to increase his authority in the community, and might engage them to acquiesce in his stated government.

Sidney on Government, c. i. § 16.

6. It is not to be supposed that persons, families, or larger communities, before free and independent, would submit themselves to the government of any one person whatever, without some equivalent; which could probably be no other than that of protecting them in their liberties and properties; so that there was no doubt some original contract between the prince and the people existed, in all those kingdoms where the prince gained his power by a peaceable election.

7. Some ambitious persons, partly by stratagem and partly by force, might possess themselves of power over others; yet even these conquests could not be settled without some agreement between the victor and the vanquished; for till such an agreement was made, there was evidently a state of hostility, and not a community.

* The ablest Civilians have recommended the Roman Law for general use, chiefly as a part of their Learning. It may not be amiss to add, that Heineccius's Elementa Juris Civilis, Gravina's Origines Juris Civilis, and Cunningham's Views of Roman Law, Dr. Taylor's Elements of the Civil Law, the same gentleman's Summary of the Roman Law, and Dr. Ferguson on the Society of Jews, republished, and his History of the Legal Polity of the Roman State, and of the Rise, Progress, and Extent of the Roman Laws.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vii. c. iii. § 1, 5—9. Temple's Misc. vol. i. p. 55—82. Camb. of Govern. c. vii. p. 49—54. Locke of Govern. part ii. c. viii. § 95—112. Roll. Anc. Hist. vol. i. Introd. Lyttelt. Pers. Let. p. 33, &c. Ancient Univ. History, folio, lib. i. p. 108; 8vo, p. 230. Ibid. folio, p. 71, 72; 8vo, p. 385—388. With Baumgarten's Supplement, vol. i. p. 42—69.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it will follow, that though there might be various kinds of governments prevailing, and in monarchies various degrees of liberty in the people, and power in the prince, yet there must always have been some original contract between them, as the foundation of all government, except that of a father over his descendants.

Sidney on Government, c. i. § 20.*

COROLLARY 2.

Hence we may see how far sovereignty may be said to have its original from God. We have reason to believe, that it is the will of God that we should do our utmost to promote the happiness of mankind:—now some government appears necessary for this purpose (vid. Prop. 64.); and when governments are formed, attempts to destroy them might in many instances be pernicious to ourselves and to the public; we have reason therefore to believe, that God wills not only that government in general should be, but that the present form of government should continue in any place, so long as the happiness of the whole may be promoted thereby; but there appears as yet no reason to believe, that God wills it should continue immutable, however it is administered, or that a prince can justly claim a commission from God in attempting the ruin of the community, which it is his business to protect. God's being the Author of government in the sense explained above, will be a great aggravation of the guilt of such a tyrannical sovereign; and any pretence to Divine authority in such outrages, will only be adding impiety to treachery and cruelty: but this will be examined hereafter.

Camb. of Gov. c. vi. Puff. de Jure, lib. vii. c. iii. § 2—4. Roll. Man. vol. i. p. 423, 424. Sidn. on Gov. c. i. § 6. Delany on Rel. Dut. Serm. xiv. p. 276—285. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 141—163, 7th edit.

* In opposition to the notion of an original Contract, or Compact, see Hume's Essays, vol. i. Essay 12. Edinb. edit. of 1764. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 139—141, and Dean Tucker's Treatise on Government. Dr. Tucker has been answered by Dr. Towers, in his Vindication of the Political Principles of Mr. Locke.

LECTURE LXXVIII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The account of the original of civil government here given is illustrated, and something confirmed, by the constitution of several of the most considerable nations which we find in ancient history; particularly by the power of the Ephori and General Assembly amongst the Spartans (a), the Amphictyones of Greece (b), the Suffetes, Senate, and Popular Assembly of Carthage (c), the Senate, Comitia, and Tribunes of Rome (d), the Saxon Wittenagemot (e), which was the original of the British parliament, and the Spanish Cortes (f); not to mention the constitution of many other more modern governments.

Sidney on Government, c. ii. § 16. p. 130, &c.

(a) Stanyan's Gr. Hist. vol. i. lib. iii. c. iv. p. 80—82. Univ. Hist. vol. ii. p. 574.

(b) Potter's Archæol. lib. i. c. xvi. vol. i. p. 83—85. Stanyan, ib. p. 119, 120.

(c) Rollin's Anc. Hist. lib. ii. § 3. vol. i.

(d) Moyle's Works, vol. i. p. 8, 9, 103—108. Vertot's Rom. Rev. vol. i. p. 7—9. Kennet's Rom. Ant. part ii. lib. iii. c. ix. and xvi.

(e) Rapin's Hist. of England, vol. i. p. 152—156. Squire of the Anglo-Saxon Gov.

(f) Geddes's Misc. vol. i. p. 317, &c.†

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some probable conjectures why arbitrary monarchy prevailed more in the northern parts of Asia, and in Africa, than in Europe, may be seen in Temple's Misc. vol. i. p. 50—53; Works, vol. i. p. 390. L'Esprit des Loix, vol. i. lib. xvii. p. 377—385; Eng. Transl. p. 390—395.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The objection against this scheme, from our not having a right over our own lives, and much less over the lives of others, in a state of nature, goes upon a very false principle; for every man, previously to contract, has a right of using all his natural power for the public good, and when that seems to require it, even of taking away the life of another, or forbearing to defend his own: and all that any man promises in this respect, is submission to a sentence of death in certain cases; for no law ever condemns a man to execute himself.

Burn. iv. Disc. p. 10, 11. Locke on Govern. part. ii. c. xi. § 135. Puf. de Jure, lib. viii. c. iii. § 1. Hoadly on Gov. p. 168—188.

† For further and extensive information on these subjects, recourse may be had to M. Mallet's and Dr. Leslie's Histories of Europe, the Travels of Anacharsis the Younger, Spelman's Dissertation on Parliaments, Hooke's Roman History, Ferguson's History of the Roman Republic, Dr. Adams's Roman Antiquities, Dr. Robertson's History of Charles V., Tytler's History of Scotland, Anderson's Britannic Constitution, Sir Thomas Smith's Essay on the Republic, Lacedæmonian Constitution of England, Hurd's Dialogues, vol. ii. p. 80—331, third edit. Dr. Gilbert Stuart's History of English Government, and Lord Lyttleton's History of Henry the Second, vol. iii. p. 267—281, third edit. p. 372—[illegible] edition.

PROPOSITION LXVI.

To propose and confute that other hypothesis of the original of government, which is commonly called the Patriarchal Scheme.

SOLUTION.

1. The foundation of it is, that the first man was absolute sovereign of all his posterity, so as to dispose of their possessions and their lives, without being accountable to any but God.

2. That on his death, his eldest son Cain having been disinherited by God, the supreme power devolved upon Seth, the next eldest son, and passed from him by a lineal succession to Noah.

3. That he, according to the Divine direction, divided the earth, after the Deluge, among seventy of his descendants, heads of so many nations, who were each of them made independent and absolute sovereigns; in whose successors (when they can be discovered) the right of government still continues.

4. That it is to be presumed, that in every country the reigning prince is that successor, and consequently, that such unlimited obedience is to be paid to him, unless it appears that some other person has an hereditary claim better founded than his.

Hoadly on Gov. p. 3, 4. Filmer's Patriarchal Scheme, c. i. § 4—9. p. 12—22.

CONFUTATION.

Admitting the credibility, and, for argument's sake, the inspiration, of the Mosaic History, the following objections seem abundantly sufficient to overthrow this hypothesis:—

1. It can never be proved that Adam had such an unlimited power over his whole race: it is certain, the relation of a father does by no means imply it, (Prop. 63. Schol. 1.) and no text in the writings of Moses is alleged directly to prove it, unless Gen. i. 26—30 and iii. 16.; the first of which was a grant to the human race of the whole animal and vegetable creation for its use; and the second related only to Eve, and at most amounts to no more than that, as woman had abused her husband's tenderness, she should sometimes find herself galled by the yoke of his authority; but this does not imply an absolute power: at least, there is not a shadow of argument for any thing more than Adam's dominion over his own wife, and by no means over their descendants.

Hoadly on Gov. p. 5—35. præs. p. 5—13. Locke on Gov. part. i. c. iv—vi. præs. p. 23—31.

2. Allowing Adam to have been possessed of such a power, it will by no means prove that it was to descend from him, and centre in one of his children. It is certain that the right of a father and of an elder brother are in this respect very different (Prop. 63, 65. gr. 2.); and as for the argument of a supposed Divine appointment, drawn from Gen. iv. 7. though it may prove some pre-eminence in an elder brother, especially during the time that his younger lived with him, it will never prove an absolute power during life, over him and all his remotest descendants.

Hoadly, ib. p. 35—38. Locke, ib. c. viii. Sidney, ib. c. ii. § 4.

3. The distribution of mankind into seventy nations, with an absolute sovereign to each, supposes a contradiction to the right of primogeniture, as before asserted by Filmer, without any apparent reason; and is itself a most chimerical and arbitrary assertion. Gen. x. 32. is a most feeble foundation for such a grand superstructure; and only signifies, that the chief nations among whom the earth was divided sprang from the persons there mentioned. The division, which Filmer supposes, would make the parents subject to their children; besides, that some of those there mentioned were not born when the distribution is supposed to have been made.

Hoadly, ib. p. 49—54. Sidney, ib. c. i. § 7, 8.

4. Had God meant to establish the right of primogeniture in this manner, it is not probable he would so often have chosen younger sons to special favours, dignity, and authority, as we are sure he did, if the truth of the Old Testament be granted.

Sidney, ib. c. i. § 13. Hoadly, ib. p. 55—59.

5. The admission of such an hypothesis, grounded on so slender an evidence, would be attended with great damage to mankind,—as it might destroy the settlement of many very considerable nations, as appears from the genealogy of their royal families. At best, this is an useless scheme, since no one person upon earth can be known to be the true heir; and since the number of sovereigns in the world is so vastly greater than seventy, it would, upon Filmer's hypothesis, be (cæt. par.) a great probability against any one that he was not one of those seventy in whom the right lay.

Locke, ib. c. xi. Sidney, ib. c. i. § 14, 17, 18.

6. The scheme is plainly inconsistent with itself; for if fatherhood give an absolute power over the children, then it rests in all parents; and consequently, had Seth commanded his children to have resisted Adam, they would on this scheme have been obliged to do it, though by another part of it they were obliged to an unlimited obedience to Adam.

Locke, ib. § 68—72. Hoadly, ib. p. 13—15. De Foe's Jus Divin. lib. ii. p. 2—6. Grove's Miscel. p. 42—62.

SCHOLIUM.

Some have argued for what they call indefeasible hereditary right in monarchs, from the right of elder children to succeed to the land of their parents; but it is certain that the elder son has not in equity a right to succeed to the whole paternal inheritance, so that the rest of the children should have no share of it; though it may generally be fit he should have a larger share than the rest (Prop. 62. Schol. 2.); yet he may be disinherited whenever a regard for the common good requires it: besides, that a succession to places of trust, power, and dignity, is a thing of a very different nature from a succession to an estate.

Camb. of Gov. c. ix. Hutch. Syst. 3. viii. 3. 9—11.

LECTURE LXXIX.

PROPOSITION LXVII.

Every man is born in a state of freedom, i. e. he is (so far as appears by the light of nature) no further obliged to support or submit to the form of government in the country where he is born, than he shall judge, upon a view of present circumstances, that a subjection to such government will be for the good of the whole.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. If a person were, by any argument which the light of nature suggests, universally bound to be subject to and support any government further than it appears to him for the public good in present circumstances, such obligation must be built, either on some natural right in the governors to unlimited obedience, or on such a power conferred upon them by some previous contract.

2. The natural right in favour of primogeniture has been considered and confuted above, Prop. 66.

3. A previous contract of parents, binding themselves and their offspring to unlimited subjection, is a thing which can hardly be supposed; but if we were sure that such a contract had been ever so expressly made, as they had no right to dispose of the lives and properties of their children according to their own will, the children could not be bound by such a contract.

1, 2, 3. 4. Valet propositio.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it will evidently appear, that virtue will allow to resist the supreme governor, if any circumstances shall arise in which such resistance shall appear to be most for the public good. Vid. Prop. 65. Cor. 1. and Prop. 56. Schol. 3.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vii. c. viii. § 5. Locke on Gov. part ii. § 202—222. Sidney on Gov. c. iii. § 41.

COROLLARY 2.

Much more may it be allowed in a mixed monarchy, that the other branches of the legislative power should resist the monarch when he goes about to subvert their constitution, in direct violation of that contract on which he is admitted to the crown.* Caermich. Puff. de Off. lib. ii. c. ix. § 4.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Some, waving all pleas from a supposed donation of power from God to kings, assert resistance to be universally unlawful, because it can never promote the public good, but must on the whole be detrimental to mankind. But it may be answered,

1. That cases may occur, in which the affections of the people may be so alienated from the government, that a revolution may be accomplished with very little bloodshed and confusion.

2. That by this means, the civil and religious liberties of a mighty nation may be, and often have been, secured, when even on the brink of ruin.

3. That such an event may contain matter of very wholesome instruction to succeeding princes, in that country and elsewhere, and by preventing future oppressions, may greatly promote the good of mankind.

And whereas it is urged, that the encouragement which the doctrine of resistance might give to insurrections and popular tumults would be an equivalent for all this,—it is to be remembered,

1. That it may be concluded, a virtuous man will, as he certainly ought to do, attentively weigh the reasons and consequences of things before he engages in so important an undertaking.

2. That the apparent danger attending it will deter men of prudence from embarking themselves in it till there be a great prospect of succeeding; which probably there cannot be till the people have been alienated from their governors by long, frequent, and notorious oppressions.

3. That though it is true this doctrine may be abused, and may in some cases be attended with ill consequences,—yet, considering the temptations of royalty, the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance is likely to be much more abused, as it has certainly in fact been; so that, upon the whole, the hazard seems to be abundantly balanced.

Camb. on Gov. c. x. p. 74—76, 84. Locke on Gov. part ii. c. xix. § 223—230. Sacheverel's Trial, p. 88—114. Sidn. on Gov. c. iii. § 40. p. 434—436. The Judgment of whole Kingdoms and Nat. concerning the Rights, Power, &c. of Kings, and the Rights, Privileges, and Properties of the People, printed in 1710. Hutch. Syst. § vii. 3—7.

* That great question concerning the Origin and Design of Government, the Rights of the People, and the Power of Resistance, have lately been amply considered, in consequence of the two general pastoral controversies of the age, occasioned, first, by Dr. Price's Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty, and still more recently, by Mr Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution. It would be endless to attempt to refer to the variety of treatises and pamphlets which have appeared on both sides of the question in agitation. A list of those publications may be collected from the Reviews of the time, and especially from the Monthly Review, which we the rather mention, as being more accessible to the generality of readers. Several years previously to these controversies, Dr. Priestley published an Essay on the First Principles of Government.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Considering the many difficulties to which princes are exposed, how liable they are often to be imposed upon when they design best, and how impossible it is for the bulk of the people to enter into all the reasons of their counsels and actions, we do most readily grant, that men ought to put the most candid interpretation upon the actions of their governors which they can in reason bear; and that they should never have recourse to violent methods, but in cases of very great extremity, and where the probability of promoting the public security and happiness by it is very apparent.

Camb. on Gov. c. x. p. 78—83. Evans's Christ. Temp. vol. ii. p. 308, 309. Sermon 14.

PROPOSITION LXVIII.

To inquire what form of government is to be preferred, as generally most subservient to the happiness of mankind.

LECTURE LXXX.

SOLUTION.

A mixed monarchy, generally to descend by inheritance, seems preferable to the rest.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. An arbitrary monarchy would undoubtedly be most desirable, if the monarch were perfectly wise and good; seeing he would then have much greater opportunities of doing good to his subjects than under a limitation of power he could possibly have; and the unavoidable imperfection of general laws would be greatly remedied by his integrity and wisdom: but considering the degeneracy and imperfection of mankind, it seems unsafe to trust so much power in one man; and it is generally in fact seen, that where this kind of government is admitted, tyranny, cruelty, and oppression, prevail with it.

2. An aristocracy, and much more a democracy, leaves too much room for the cabals of statesmen, makes the despatch of business slower, and there are secrets of state of which it is impossible that the people should be proper judges, and which it is by no means convenient to lay before them; and when discords arise between one part of the people and another, it is much more difficult to compose them when there is no monarch.

1, 2. 3. The chief advantages of all these constitutions are secured, and the chief disadvantages are avoided, by a mixed monarchy; especially in one that consists, like ours, of three states, one of which is to be chosen by the people, and to have the power of granting revenues to be raised on the subjects, while the prince has the power of making peace and war: such a constitution is therefore to be preferred.

4. That a kingdom should be elective, has indeed many advantages; especially as it prevents the succession of an improper person, and moderates the temptation which the sovereign is under to enhance the prerogative of the crown; as also that which the nobles are under to oppress the people, if the people have any share in the election.

5. Yet it proves the occasion of so many factions, and where the kingdom is considerable, of so many destructive civil wars, that the danger seems to be more than equal to the advantage.

4, 5. 6. The proper balance between both seems to be, that the right of succession should generally prevail; but that in case of any evident incapacity or mal-administration, the next heir should be set aside by the other branches of the legislature.

3, 6. 7. Valet propositio.

Camb. of Gov. c. xv. xvi. Puff. de Jure, lib. vii. c. v. § 22. Moyle's Works, vol. i. p. 57—61. Puff. de Off. lib. ii. c. viii. § 4—8. Spect. vol. iv. No. 287. Hobbes's Leviath. c. xix. Sidney on Gov. c. ii. § 16, 24, 27, 30. L'Esprit des Loix, lib. xi. c. vi. lib. xix. c. 27; English Transl. p. 321, 337, 456—458. Preceptor, vol. ii. p. 474—486.*

SCHOLIUM 1.

Notwithstanding these general reasons, so much regard is to be had to the temper and usages of particular nations, that it might often be attended with dangerous consequences to attempt a change from a less to a more perfect form of government.

Temple's Ess. vol. i. p. 16, 17; Works, vol. i. p. 70.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Instances of the oppression and misery which have attended arbitrary governments, are to be seen every where, especially in Addis. Freeholder, No. x. Krowonski's Rev. of Pers. vol. i. pass. Knox's Ceylon, lib. iii. c. iii. iv. Hanway's Trav. vol. ii. p. 339—411.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The Commons of Great Britain have grown up to their present share in the government, by gradual advances. In the earlier reigns, particularly that of Edward I. (A. D. 1290.) the laws were enacted by the king and lords, the commons being only mentioned as suppliants. But what laid the foundation of their growing so considerable, was the grant which, according to Cambray, Henry VII. but indeed Stephen, Henry II. and John, had long before his time made, to empower the lords to

* A most excellent explication of the mixed form of government is given us by Mr. Adams's Defence of the Constitutions of the United States of America, to which the whole work is a very valuable supplement. Some valuable sentiments occur in Gordon's Letters concerning Political Justice, vol. ii. p. 423—483.

alienate their lands; which thus passing into the hands of the commons, who before were only their tenants, they became more considerable than before, as the proprietors of land in a state will always be.

Rapin's Hist. of Eng. p. 155. note. Camb. on Gov. p. 138—140, 147—149. Bacon's Hen. VII. p. 12. Lyttelton's Pers. Lett. No. 59—69. Sidn. on Gov. c. iii. § 10. p. 297, and § 28. Preceptor, vol. ii. on Government, ch. 3, 4. Hurd's Dial. No. 5, and 6. passim.[*]

LECTURE LXXXI.

PROPOSITION LXIX.

Virtue requires that obedience should be paid to civil rulers, in those things in which the authority of God is not apprehended to contradict their commands.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 64. 1. Virtue requires that there should be communities.

2. Affairs cannot be administered in communities, unless some civil rulers are appointed to manage them.

3. This appointment would be vain, unless obedience were to be generally paid to them, as above.

2, 3. 4. The refusal of such obedience to civil power, tends to the ruin of communities.

1, 4. 5. Virtue requires they should be generally obeyed, as above. Q. E. D.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vii. c. viii. § 1. Hutch. Syst. § vii. 2. ix. 17, 18.

COROLLARY 1.

Reverence is to be paid to rulers; and in dubious cases, virtue will require us to put the mildest construction upon their actions which they will reasonably bear. Vid. Prop. 67. Schol. 2.

Puf. ib. § 3.

COROLLARY 2.

Virtue will require us rather to acquiesce in their determinations, even where we imagine ourselves injured, than to disturb the public by taking our revenge into our own hands,—unless it may be the probable means of freeing a country from an intolerable tyranny.

Killing no Murder, pass. Ap. Harleian Miscell. now separately published.

COROLLARY 3.

To choose to determine points by single combat, rather than to refer them to the judgment of the magistrate, is to be condemned,—as being a derogation from his authority, or opposition to his determination, as well as a rash exposing our own lives or that of others; and a probable means of introducing a wrong sense of honour, which may be detrimental to the lives and souls of many, who might otherwise be useful to the commonwealth.

Hale's Gold. Rem. p. 107—115. 8vo. p. 70—96. 4to. Spect. vol. ii. No. 97. Montesq. Spirit of Laws, vol. ii. lib. xxviii. c. xvii. xx. xxiv. xxv. Freethinker, vol. i. No. xv. Delany's Serm. on Duelling, vol. ii. Watts on Self-Murder, § 6, latter part; Works, vol. ii. p. 387, 388.†

SCHOLIUM 1.

Marriages are to be made only as the civil law of any country directs, supposing there is nothing in the ceremony so directed which shall appear unlawful to the parties concerned; and though private contracts are undoubtedly binding in the sight of God, yet they ought to be discouraged, and the offspring of such unauthorized marriages may justly be laid under some incapacities, in order to prevent the prevalency of them, which would be much more to the damage of society: and the same kind of observations and reasons may be applied to divorces and to wills in some degree, where the civil law determines the circumstances with which they shall be attended.

Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. i. § 36. sub fin.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Princes are undoubtedly bound by their covenant with their people; for the reasoning, Prop. 55. Dem. has a peculiar weight when applied to them. Some have questioned, Whether a succeeding prince be bound by any concessions made by his predecessors: but there can be no room for such a debate, when a prince swears, or even promises, to govern according to law; and the concessions made by preceding princes have been, as they generally are, passed into civil laws. To say that such concessions were sometimes forcibly extorted, and therefore are not obligatory, would be to destroy all the faith of treaties, and is bringing the thing back to the exploded scheme of passive obedience.

Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. xiv. § 10, 11.

PROPOSITION LXX.

Briefly to inquire into the mutual duties of masters and servants.

SOLUTION.

1. Servants owe to their masters diligence in

* Much information on this head may be derived from the early volumes of the Parliamentary History, Sullivan's Law Lectures, Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, vol. i. King on the English Constitution, Millar on the English Government, Russel, Ellyss's Essays on Temporal Liberty, tract the fourth, and the several volumes of Dr. Henry's History of Great Britain. For a review of the British Constitution as it now stands, see Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 190—234, and Dr. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 391—441. A still more copious discussion of the subject is presented in Mr De Lolme's Treatise on the Constitution of England.

† Dr. Hey has written a distinct Dissertation upon the practice of Duelling, and Mr. Mac Laurin wrote a considerable part of the first volume of his work on Sermons. Concise views of the subject may be seen in Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 372—376, and in Godwin's Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. i. p. 84—86.

their business, fidelity in any other trusts reposed in them, and such a reverence in their behaviour as may both promote and express their obedience.

2. Masters owe to their hired servants a regular payment of their wages: to all, a proper care of their support during the time of service, and a kind and affable treatment:—they are to see that they be neither unemployed, nor overwhelmed with business beyond what their strength and time will admit, and that their minds be duly cultivated, according to the circumstances of life in which they are placed.

Spect. vol. ii. No. 107 and 137. Delany on Rel. Dut. Serm. x. xi. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. p. 233—235. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. i. p. 150—153.

DEMONSTRATION

The obligation to these duties on both sides is evident, from the nature of the relation, and those mutual covenants which generally attend it, in which these things are either expressly or tacitly stipulated.

Fleetwood on Rel. Dut. p. 279—281. Puff. de Off. lib. ii. c. iv. § 1, 2. Hutch. Syst. § iii. 1. Grove's Ethics, vol. ii. p. 509—511.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is disputed, Whether it be unlawful to buy men as slaves, and forcibly compel them to do service for life, or a term of years? Some have thought the strength of body and stupidity of mind to be found among some parts of the human species, especially the Negroes, intimate that they were designed to be the drudges of the rest; but to admit such an argument might be attended with dangerous usurpations and contentions; for who does not think he has genius enough to command others? Nevertheless, if any case occurs, in which a man may be justly condemned to be a slave by the laws of his country, it seems very allowable to buy him and use him as such; and if purchasing men for slaves out of the hands of their enemies, by whom they are taken prisoners, may be a means of preserving their lives, which in Guinea is often the case, it seems very allowable to purchase them,—unless it prove the means of encouraging unreasonable and destructive wars, and the mischief occasioned thereby be greater than the good arising from the preservation of the lives of those already taken, and the fruit of their labours, which may possibly make the matter a greater difficulty than some imagine. Yet virtue will require, even in this case, that the slaves be treated with as much humanity as may be consistent with the safety of their master, and with a prudent care of his affairs.

Snelgrave's Guin. p. 160, 161. Puff. de Off. lib. § 3, 4 with Caermichael's Notes. Month. Review, vol. xxiv. p. 160. Hutch. Syst. ii. vol. iii. xiv. 3. § iii. 2—5. Grove's Ethics, vol. ii. p. 5, 11—13. Spirit of Laws, lib. xv. c. ii. vol. i. p. 336—357; in another edition, p. 348, 369.*

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is questioned, Whether a father may ever sell his child? Some have argued, but without reason, that fatherhood gives a right universally. It seems he only has it when the constitution of a country appoints him the civil judge of his children; or when his circumstances are such, that the sale of his child in his minority is absolutely necessary for the supporting the lives of either or both of them.—Prop. 51. Cor. 3.

Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 5. Hutch. Syst. c. ii. 5. Puff. de Jure, lib. vi. c. ii. § 9.

LECTURE LXXXII.

LEMMA TO PROPOSITION LXXI.

As the word punishment occurs in the proposition, and is not defined, it may be proper here to give a definition of it as a Lemma, not to alter the number of the succeeding definitions; and it may be taken thus:—PUNISHMENT is an evil inflicted, in consequence of an offence committed against the person by whom it is inflicted or appointed, whether under a public or private character.

PROPOSITION LXXI.

Virtue may permit, or even require, the civil magistrate, not only to execute other heavy punishments upon offenders, but in some cases to take away their lives.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Virtue requires that the civil magistrate endeavour to preserve the public peace and tranquillity,—which is the design of his office.

2. In order to this, it is necessary that effectual methods be taken to deter men from such crimes as are ruinous to society, v. g. murder, treason, theft, &c.

3. The corruption of men is so great, that it evidently appears in fact, that they rush on to the commission of those crimes, even though they are made capital by the laws of their country.

4. There is great reason to believe that if

* The question concerning Negro Slavery has lately received the most ample discussion. It may suffice here to refer to Mr. Ramsay's elaborate controversial tract, to Mr. Clarkson's two judicious and full volumes, and occasionally to the Debates, in the House of Lords, on Mr. Dundas's Resolutions, and to Dr. Beattie's Dissertation on Slavery, vol. iii. p. 156—254. The reader may now have before him a temperate and able work on the same subject, by Mr. Day, and Mr. Bicknell's Dying Negro. Miss Hannah Weston Peckard's Epistle to Mrs. Hannah More's Address to Mr. Wilberforce, and Slavery, a poem, written as is supposed by Mr. Roscoe of Liverpool.

such crimes were not severely punished, and even sometimes with death, they would be much more frequently committed, and the community in time destroyed by them.

1, 2, 4. 5. Valet propositio.

Puff. de Jure, lib. viii. c. iii. § 6, 7. Hutch. Syst. c. ix. p. 10—14. Beccaria on Crimes and Punishments, with Voltaire's Commentary, passim. Principles of Penal Laws, passim. (Understood to have been written by William Eden, Esq. now Lord Auckland.) Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 268—302. Godwin's Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. ii. p. 687—759.

COROLLARY.

A regard to the public good may in some cases require that an innocent person should be given up to calamity, and even to death: v. g. If a man infected with the plague were, in a frenzy, to run up and down to the evident hazard of spreading the contagion; and many add, when an innocent person is demanded by an enemy, against whom the public cannot defend itself. It seems more justifiable to confiscate the estates of traitors, though thereby innocent children are impoverished; both that a regard to their family may prevent their conspiring against the government, and that the children of noble families may be less able to revenge the death of a father.

Puff. ib. § 33. c. ii. § 5. Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. xxv. § 3. Considerations on the Law of Forfeiture, passim.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Considering how precious life is, and how much the fear of violent death would imbitter the enjoyment of it, virtue requires that capital punishments should be sparingly used; for murder, none can doubt the reasonableness of them; but perhaps some methods might be found out, in case of theft, that would strike the offender with so much terror, as to render capital punishments but seldom necessary; and the severity of Draco, in introducing them on the smallest occasions, was greatly to be condemned.

More's Utopia, p. 145, 146. Spirit of Laws, vol. i. lib. vi. p. 16. Whiston's Life, vol. ii. p. 415—470. Stanyan's Gr. Hist. p. 145, 146. Mitford's History of Greece, vol. i. p. 261, 262. Gillies's ditto, vol. i. p. 455. Thoughts on the Extension of Penal Laws, passim.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Public executions ought to be managed with very great solemnity; and it would be prudent to make a difference between the kinds of death inflicted for different crimes,—since perhaps some may be found who would dread the pain and shame of some executions, even more than death itself.

Mandeville on Executions, c. iv. lib. v.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is questioned, Whether a community has a right over its exiles? but that must be determined by the degree of severity attending the sentence; for if the exile possesses the revenues of an estate in that country from whence he is driven, it is evident that community has a right and power over him, more than it would otherwise have had.

Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 25. Warb. Div. Legation, vol. i. p. 16, 17, and notes. Bott against Warburton, p. 73—78.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is questioned, Whether private persons have a right of killing those who invade them by violence? —Civilians generally state it thus:—Where communities are formed, it is to be considered whether it be the intent of the law, barely to permit, or also to require, such executions. In the former case, v. g. If a man find another in adultery with his wife, or if a rape be attempted, or an assault made by a robber, the law, though it permits to kill the aggressor, and thereby frees the slayer from punishment, yet cannot justify the action before God. Yet where the law requires such resistance, as in the case of soldiers invading a country, then it becomes the duty of the subject to endeavour the destruction of such invaders; but it seems, that in the former case it is a person's duty too, when, upon the best views he can form of the consequences, it appears probable that the immediate slaughter of the aggressor will turn to the public good; otherwise it is a vicious indulgence of the passion of revenge; and those who believe a future state ought to be peculiarly solicitous that they do not plunge even an enemy into irrecoverable misery, by cutting him off unnecessarily in the act of his crime.—Prop. 51. Cor. 2.

Grot. ibid. lib. ii. c. xx. § 17. Puff. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 11, 14. Grove's Moral Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 353—364.

LECTURE LXXXIII.

DEFINITION LVI.

Those rules which by a tacit consent are agreed upon among all communities, at least among those who are reckoned the polite and humanized part of mankind, are called the LAWS OF NATIONS.

Grot. ibid. Proleg. § 17. Grove's Moral Phil. vol. ii. p. 96. Spirit of Laws, vol. i. p. 7, 8.

PROPOSITION LXXII.

The laws of nations are to be regarded.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Communities have certain affairs which must of necessity be transacted between them.

1. 2. Disputes may arise upon these, which cannot be determined by the peculiar civil laws of either of the contending parties.

2. 3. Recourse must in that case be had to the laws of nations, to prevent disputes, which might otherwise be very mischievous.

3. 4. Mutual regard must be paid to these laws. Q. E. D.

Hutch. Syst. vol. ii. p. 350, 351. See Vattel's Le Droit de Gens, and his Questions de Droit Naturel. See also the English Translation of the former Work.

DEFINITION LVII.

War is a state wherein men endeavour by open violence to hurt and destroy the persons or possessions of each other.

Grotius de Jure, lib. i. c. i. § 2. Puffend. de Jure, lib. i. c. i. § 8.

COROLLARY.

War is a great evil, and virtue will require us to avoid engaging in it, unless circumstances should arise, in which it should appear necessary for the greater good of mankind. Vid. Prop. 51.

PROPOSITION LXXIII.

Virtue may in some cases permit, and even require, that men should engage in war.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The injustice of some is so great, that men will not be able to secure their possessions and their lives in many cases, unless they oppose force to force.

2. Persons violently oppressing their inoffensive neighbours, without just cause, are so far from being valuable members, that they are the pests of society.

2. 3. By attempting to destroy such invaders, we may not only secure ourselves, but also many others who might afterwards be swallowed up by them, especially if their power of hurting were strengthened by our submission or destruction.

1, 3. 4. Cases may occur, in which opposing force to force may tend to the public good, i. e. in which virtue may allow and require us to engage in war. Vid. Def. 57. Prop. 51. Q. E. D.

Grot. ibid. lib. i. c. ii. § 1—3. Puffend. ibid. lib. viii. c. vi. § 7. Carmich. in Puff. de Off. lib. i. c. v. § 17. p. 123, 124. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 408—426. Godwin's Inquiry concerning Political Justice, vol. ii. p. 511—525.

SCHOLIUM.

The argument urged in this demonstration, only proves it lawful for men to be lawful; it is questioned, Whether it is ever lawful to engage in an offensive war?

Ans. It is certainly inhuman, and therefore vicious, to begin to hurt unprovoked; and considering the many calamities brought on mankind by war, virtue will require us to abhor the thought of increasing our dominions and possessions by the ruin of innocent persons; nevertheless, self-defence will require us to take up arms before we are actually invaded, as it may prevent the intended invasion, and the mutual slaughter which would be consequent upon it; and will indeed be necessary in order to sustain the first shock, which would otherwise be fatal to the party unprepared; nay, a regard to our own safety may require us to invade and subdue the country of the aggressor, and to push on our conquest till he is disabled from doing us further mischief.

As to the question, Whether it is lawful to take up arms, in defence of the injured subjects of another state, to preserve their civil and religious liberties? it must be determined by the prospect of good arising from such a war: if there be an apparent probability that tyrannical power may be reduced, and the happiness of other states, as well as that invaded, may thereby be promoted, it seems lawful on the common principles of humanity.

Puff. ibid. § 3. Burn. on Art. p. 361. Grot. ibid. lib. ii. c. xx. § 41—43.

DEFINITION LVIII.

PUBLIC WAR is that which is undertaken and managed by the authority of the community; PRIVATE is that which is undertaken and managed without it. Grot. ibid. lib. i. c. iii. § 1.

COROLLARY.

Private war may sometimes be necessary, where the assault is too sudden to allow an act of the community to authorize resistance.—Vid. Prop. 71. Schol. 4. But, generally, where the prospect of danger is more remote, it is very unwarrantable for persons to form themselves into military bodies, without commission from the civil magistrate, even though it be on pretence of warding off the enemy. Yet it must be acknowledged, there may be cases of public danger so extreme, that the force of the civil law may seem for that time to be suspended; and it is the business of every good man, conscientiously, to judge for himself when these cases occur; and the business of every wise and good state to indemnify by a law such acts as shall appear to have been so necessitated, though, not being foreseen, they could not have been provided for by laws a priori. Grotius, ibid. § 2.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Subjects may not, even when commanded by their prince, engage in any war which they are fully persuaded is unjust; but if it appears a dubious point to them, the same obligation does not hold; for otherwise, common soldiers could hardly ever engage at all, since they seldom have or can have a full view of all the circumstances of the affair. Nevertheless, officers in the higher ranks are under great obligations to inquire critically into it, both as they have much better opportunity of information than their soldiers, and as the part they are to act in carrying on the war is of much greater importance.

Grot. ibid. lib. ii. c. xxvi. § 3—5. Puff. ibid. § 4. Burn. on Art. p. 362.

SCHOLIUM 2.

He who offered the injury may defend himself, when the party injured has refused an equitable satisfaction proposed: in that case the party injured becomes the aggressor; much more may subjects defend themselves, even when their prince has been to blame, if the enemy endeavour to avenge the quarrel, not on the person of the prince, but on his innocent subjects.

Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. i. § 18. c. xxvi. § 6. Puff. de Jure, lib. ii. c. v. § 19.

LECTURE LXXXIV.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The violence of war is to be attempered, as much as may be consistent with securing the good ends proposed by it. An unnecessary waste of the enemies' goods, (vid. Deut. xx. 19, 20.) and much more of their blood, is to be avoided, and especially rapes, which injure the person by, as well as those upon whom they are committed; nor are women and children to be slaughtered, unless women be found in active war, and then they are to be treated as other soldiers; but it is to be observed, that we here, and in all this part of the work, speak only of war as undertaken on the principles of the common rights of mankind, not pretending to dispute the right which God has to doom any of his creatures to death, in such circumstances as he shall see fit, and to make some of them executioners on others.

Grot. de Jure, lib. iii. c. iv. § 10. c. xiii. § 4. Hutch. Sys. 3. x. 6.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is questioned, How far stratagems in war are lawful?

Ans. It may be lawful to deceive the enemy by dubious actions, which may probably be interpreted wrong; and the rather, as there is a kind of universal agreement to suspect each other, where no treaties are commenced, so that faith among men is not so much injured by these as by other deceits. Yet there is a degree of honour to be observed, even towards an enemy; and a direct lie, especially a false oath, should by no means be allowed.

Grot. de Jure, lib. iii. c. 1. § 17, 20. c. xix. § 1. Puff. de Jure, lib. viii. c. vi. § 6. Telemaque, lib. xx. p. 426—432. Hutch. ib. § 6.

SCHOLIUM 5.

The laws of nations are to be observed in war; and these forbid violating the persons of ambassadors, (seeing this would make wars perpetual, as none would venture to mediate a peace,) hiring soldiers to assassinate their general, or subjects their prince, and poisoning the enemy by weapons, water, or any other method.

Grot. ib. lib. iii. c. iv. § 15—18. lib. ii. c. xviii. § 2, 3, 7. Puff. ib. § 18. More's Utopia, p. 158—164. Hutch. ib. § 12—14.

SCHOLIUM 6.

It is much queried, Whether temples dedicated to God may be spoiled of their treasures by the conqueror?

Ans. Those treasures being in some degree still the property of the state, and therefore used in times of great extremity for its defence, the conqueror may justly seize them; yet care should be taken to avoid any circumstances of rudeness and irreverence, lest by that means religion should be brought into contempt.

Grot. de Jure, lib. iii. c. xii. § 6. Prideaux's Connect. vol. ii. p. 25, 26. Anno Ante Christum, 278. vol. iii. p. 35. Works of the Learned, for March 1738, Art. 16.

PROPOSITION LXXIV.

To inquire how far government may justly be founded in conquest.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. The victor in a just war may see it necessary (in order to repair the expenses and losses sustained, in order to punish those who have been injurious to the public peace, and that he may prevent future assaults from the vanquished) to make himself king of a conquered country, and to model the laws of it in such a manner as he shall on the whole judge fit and he may be justified in doing it. Nevertheless, if the persons so conquered enter themselves into no engagements to him, it may reasonably be expected that they should take the first opportunity to throw off his yoke, and they are not obliged to submit to it so much as that of their natural sovereign: yet virtue will require them to be cautious that they do not make their own condition and that of the public worse, by a precipitate resistance.

2. If a prince, by an unjust war, or any other unrighteous method, have possessed himself of the government, and uses it well, though he gained it ill, virtue will require that he be obeyed; at least till the person to whom it belongs be able and willing to assert his right, with some probable prospect of success: for it is certainly better that an usurper should govern, than that there should be no government at all.

3. It seems reasonable, that if the rightful prince, or at least his immediate successor, be not able to assert his claim, but the government continue for a considerable time in the hands or family of an usurper, long possession should make up the defect of an original title, lest the encouragement of antiquated claims should throw nations into confusion, and, by a parity of reason, private families too.

Puff. de Jure, lib. viii. c. vi. § 24. lib. vii. c. vii. § 3, 4. c. viii. § 9, 10. Locke on Gov. part ii. c. xvi. xvii. Camb. on Gov. c. viii. L'Esprit des Loix, vol. i. lib. x. c. iii—ix. Hutch. Syst. 3. viii. 4—8.

SCHOLIUM.

The rights of hostages and captives are to be settled by the law of nations: but it is plain that neither hostages, when upon public faith, nor slaves, when they have by compact obliged themselves to their masters, may be allowed to desert, unless extreme injury be offered.

Grot. de Jure, lib. iii. c. xiv. § 7. lib. iii. c. xix. § 51.

LECTURE LXXXV.

PROPOSITION LXXV.

To inquire into the principal branches of human or personal virtue.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Since the happiness of a rational creature must chiefly depend upon the state of his own mind, virtue requires that great care be taken of it, particularly to furnish it with such knowledge as may be delightful and useful.

Foster's Serm. vol. iv. i. Grove's Posth. Works, vol. ii. No. 11—13. Abernethy's Disc. vol. ii. No. 5.

2. As we may, by a heedless conduct, be betrayed into numberless evils, virtue requires that we should attentively consider our circumstances in life, and often reflect on our conduct.

Lowther's Counsels of Prudence. Grove's Works, vol. ii. p. 221—242.

3. Since we are compounded of body as well as mind, virtue will require a proper care of the body, that on the one hand, it may not want any thing necessary for its subsistence, health, and vigour; and, on the other, that it may not be indulged in such excesses as, however pleasant at first, might at length enfeeble and destroy it.

Collier's Ess. part ii. No. 17. Stubbes' Dial. on Pleasure. Protest. Syst. vol. ii. No. 12. Fordyce's Serm. on the Love of Pleasure. Abern. Disc. vol. ii. No. 16.

4. As it is impossible to be happy while our minds are the sport of irregular appetites and passions, virtue will require a due guard upon these; that the agreeable things of life may not be objects of excessive desire, hope, or joy; and that the evils of it may not overwhelm us with fear, with grief, or resentment, nor its uncertainty with excessive solicitude.

Watts on the Pass. § 15—24. Grove's Posth. Works, vol. iv. No. 6. Grove's Ethics, p. 257—287.

5. As many disorders of body and mind may take their rise from idleness, virtue will, on the preceding principles, require that we keep ourselves in a series of useful employments and labour, to improve every proportion of our time well; proper allowance being made for such recreation as animal nature requires.

Balguy's Sermons, vol. ii. No. 8. Grove on Recreations, passim.

6. That we may not be led into undertakings disproportioned to our strength, that we may not expect too high regard from others, nor be too keenly impressed with a sense of slights and injuries, as well as for many other important reasons, virtue will require us to moderate our opinion of ourselves, in proportion to the degree and value of our real advantages, whether of mind, of body, or estate.

Coll. Ess. part i. No. 1. Watts on Humility, passim. Scott's Christian Life, vol. i. c. iii. § 1: Part i. Works, vol. i. p. 18—23. Carmich. Suppl. to Puff. de Off. lib. i. c. v. § 2. Wright's Great. Concern, p. 113—125. Fordyce's Moral Phil. lib. ii. § 2. Grove's Ethics, vol. ii. part ii. c. ii—v. Grove's Serm. vol. v. No. 10, 11. Price on Morals, p. 258—263. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 105—123.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It may be observed, that the first and second of these steps comprehend prudence and consideration: the third, temperance, chastity, and mortification: the fourth, fortitude, contentment, meekness, and moderation: the fifth, diligence: the last, humility: and thus the distribution in effect coincides with those of Scott, Wright, &c.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Thoughts tending to vice are no further criminal than as they are approved and indulged by the will. Def. 38.

Osterv. of Unclean. § 1. c. vii. p. 72—74.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Though a constant care should be taken (on the principles laid down gr. 3.) to maintain such moderation in the articles of food, dress, sleep, &c. as may prevent the mind from being enslaved to the body; and though it be prudence in us to inure ourselves to such hardships as may be expected in a worthy and honourable passage through life, it is by no means necessary to deny ourselves in every thing which gives pleasure to the senses; for God has placed us in such circumstances, that some pleasures are unavoidable; (the benevolence of his nature no doubt engaging him to delight in the happiness of his creatures;) it is, therefore, ingratitude to him, as well as injustice to ourselves, to throw back his gifts upon his hands, as if they were snares rather than favours. To which we may add, that in the circumstances in which mankind now are, were all the elegances and ornaments of life to be renounced, many families must be undone, who are now maintained by an honest labour in furnishing them out, and maintained more cheerfully, and indeed more safely, than they could merely by alms.

Philem. to Hydaspes, part ii. præs. p. 26—61. 91, ad fin.

PROPOSITION LXXVI.

To inquire into some of the principal means of promoting virtue in the soul.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Virtue may be promoted by attentive hearing and reading discourses on divine subjects, and seriously meditating upon them; all which may serve to assist us in forming right notions of God, and in judging of our duty, and may awaken us to the practice of it.

2. External acts of adoration and praise may promote as well as express inward veneration.

Atterb. Post. Serm. vol. ii. No. vii. p. 191—203.

3. Earnest and frequent prayers to God may greatly tend to promote virtue; for though they can neither inform nor move him, yet they may bring us to a proper temper for receiving his mercies. And if any object, That God has established such an order of things as he will not alter in compliance with the entreaties of his creatures,—it may be replied, That this order was no doubt established in connexion with and in correspondence to the view which the Divine Being always had of the prayers and temper of his rational creatures; and husbandry, and all the most necessary labours of life, might as reasonably be argued against as prayer, on the force of this objection.

Burn. Life of Roch. p. 52, 53, 60—64. Stubbs. on Div. Rev. p. 36—42. Bens. of Prayer, p. 13—21. Ibbot's Serm. vol. ii. Serm. 10, 11, 12; On the Duty and Benefit of Prayer. Sherlock on Provid. edit. 9. p. 391—402. Dr. Price's Dissertations, Diss. 2. Ogden's Serm. on Prayer. Kippis's Sermons, Serm. 7. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 31—47. 7th ed. Relig. of Nat. p. 103, 104. Leechman's Serm. on Prayer, præs. p. 14, 24, 25. Glasg. edit. Grove on Secret Prayer. Ess. 1. King's Origin of Evil. 5. v. 1. præs. par. 7—13. Abernethy on Attrib. vol. ii. p. 401—415.

4. It is proper that men should meet in religious assemblies, to join in divine worship, as thereby a public honour is done to God; and the hearts of men may be fixed and quickened by beholding the devotion of each other.

Price, ibid. p. 257—267. Protest. Syst. vol. ii. Sermon 8. Collib. on Nat. and Rev. Rel. p. 25. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 84—87.*

4. 5. It is proper that some person should be appointed, whose chief business it should be to preside in these assemblies,—since by this means, religious offices will be performed in a manner most tending to common edification.

4. 6. Lest the civil business of some should interfere with the religious appointment of others, it is proper that some time should be set apart by common consent for religious purposes: besides, that the rest of beasts and servants may require some such appointments; which, therefore, have made a part of the religious constitution of almost all nations.

Watts's Hebr. of Times and Places, p. 3—5; Works, vol. ii. p. 396. Fost. Serm. on the Morality of the Sabbath, 4 vols. 8vo. vol. 4.

7. It may be proper that fasting should sometimes be joined with other acts of divine worship, to promote more intense devotion, to express our humiliation for sin, and to promote that command of the mind over the body, which is suited to the constitution of a rational being.

Lamb. Theol. lib. v. c. lxxv. § 3, 4. Amory's Dial. on Devot.

* The Validity, Property, and Duty of Prayer. W[illiams], occasioned by the Rev. G[eorge] W[illiams]'s [Letter] [illegible] [illegible] Prayer. [illegible] Prayer. [illegible] Prayer.

LECTURE LXXXVI.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Those things are only to be asked of God in prayer which are of some considerable importance, by which our truest happiness may probably be promoted, and which there appears some hope of obtaining; and where it is dubious, as with respect to many temporal enjoyments it is, whether obtaining our petitions will be on the whole for our advantage, we are to ask these things only conditionally, with a becoming submission to the superior wisdom of God.

Juven. Sat. x. Plato's Alcibiades. ii.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is questioned, Whether we may pray for what we are sure God will give or do?

Ans. There can be no doubt of this, if our asking it be the condition of its being bestowed or done: nor can we, without a revelation, be absolutely sure of any future event, how probable soever: and it seems, that if a promise were absolutely given, we might justly plead it with God in prayer, thereby to promote our conformity to the Divine Will, our expectation of the blessing, and fitness to receive it; but such prayers ought to be managed, so as not to intimate any doubt of the Divine veracity, but, on the contrary, to express a firm and joyful reliance upon it.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is allowed that forms of prayer may help the ignorant and weak, and may prevent public devotion from falling into that contempt, of which there might otherwise be danger when such persons are to officiate; as also from being made the vehicle of conveying the errors and irregular passions, which particular persons so officiating might otherwise mingle with them; they may also be useful in secret and family worship, and even to persons of the best capacity, in seasons when they are out of frame for the duty. Yet it is very unreasonable that persons in public or private should be confined to forms, since they cannot suit all circumstances; and a frequent repetition of the same words, tends to deaden those affections which ought to accompany prayer.

The chief objections against extemporary or free prayer are,

1. That the mind cannot, without great disturbance and dissipation of thought, give that attention and examination to it which is necessary to a rational assent and concurrence.

2. That the auditory may be disquieted with the fear lest the person officiating should fall into some impropriety or absurdity of expression inconsistent with the reverence due to the Divine Being, and the improvement of his fellow-worshippers.

To the former we reply, by appealing to experience as an evidence of the quickness of the mind in its operations, to which the quickness of words bears but little proportion. A probable guess may be made at the tendency of a sentence from its beginning, especially when due care is taken that sentences be not drawn out to an immoderate length, and when any book supposed sacred, furnishes out much of the language.—As to the latter, experience also shows, that persons of no extraordinary genius are capable of praying without gross absurdity, or impropriety of expression; so that where the abilities of the person are known, the probability of his running into them is so small, as not at all to affect the mind; and there is a possibility that a reader may mistake.

Bennet's Abridg. of Lond. Cases, p. 72—78. Rel. of Nat. p. 122—124. Pierce's Vind. of Diss. lib. iii. c. iv. p. 398, 399, 404—406. Jacks. on Lord's Prayer, pref. p. 7. Limb. Theol. lib. v. c. xxv. § 28. Halif. Char. of a Trimmer, p. 45, 46. Baxt. Works, vol. i. p. 671. Watts's Miscel. p. 202—213; Works, vol. iv. p. 537—542. Dr. John Taylor's Scripture Account of Prayer. Public Prayer, a Treatise against Forms, in two parts, 12mo, 1766, part i. c. i—iv. p. 13—60. Disquisitions relating to the Dissenters, 12mo, 1767, c. i—iv. for Written Forms. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 58—67.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Where liturgies are established by public authority, great care ought to be taken that there be no phrases in them likely to lead men into hurtful mistakes,—seeing the veneration quickly contracted for such offices, would render it exceeding difficult to eradicate an error so imbibed.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is our duty to pray for others,—since hereby our benevolence for them is expressed and increased; and it is the only way by which we can express it to far the greatest part of our species.

Price's Dissertations, No. 2. p. 221—227, 237—239.

SCHOLIUM 6.

It is the duty of the community to take care that there be able teachers, of a virtuous character, that so virtue may be promoted in it. Nothing therefore should be done to deter fit persons from undertaking the work, by subscriptions, oaths, &c. which would be most likely in some cases to exclude the most valuable men. It is also fit that the community by whom they are employed, should allow them such subsistence that they may pursue their studies without avocation, and may be fitted for performing their office in a manner most honourable to the Divine Being, and most edifying to those among whom they officiate.

Rees of Maintenance. Hutch. Syst. vol. ii. p. 310—312.

SCHOLIUM 7.

Great care ought to be taken that religion be not overburthened with ceremonies; for the mind of man is of so limited a nature, that by an over-exact attendance to these, greater things will probably be neglected; and the diversity of tastes, education, &c. will probably lead men into differences with respect to them, which, if they be too much regarded, will be very detrimental to that benevolence which they ought to maintain for each other.

Tind. Christianity as old, &c. p. 123, 124. Geddes's Tracts, vol. iv. p. 205—225.

SCHOLIUM 8.

Though prayer and praise have been mentioned above, as the means of virtue, yet they are not only to be considered in that view; they are certainly a part of the duty we owe to God, as well as proper means of disposing us to the other branches of virtue; and it would appear unnatural, under a deep sense of our dependence upon and our obligations to the Divine Being, never to express it in any kind of address to him, though we believe him continually present with us. Dr. Price's Second Dissertation.

LECTURE LXXXVII.

PROPOSITION LXXVIII.

Virtue requires that the civil magistrate should not so interpose in matters of religion, or rites of worship, as to inflict any penalties on his subjects upon account of them, so long as nothing is done prejudicial to the peace of the community.

DEMONSTRATION I.

Prop. 49. gr. 23. 1. Virtue, and consequently religion, which is that branch of it that more immediately relates to God, consists not merely in the external performance of an action, but in a correspondent temper and disposition of soul.

2. Compulsion only influences the external actions, and can by no means convince the understanding.

1, 2. 3. Such severities cannot make men religious, but are rather likely to make them hypocrites.

3. 4. Persecution for conscience-sake must be prejudicial to the public, by corrupting the characters of men.

5. The persons persecuted must probably be brought into a very unhappy condition by it; for if they renounce their profession, they subject themselves to great remorse, while they secretly believe it to be true; and if they maintain it, penalties are incurred, by which ruin may be brought on themselves and their families.

6. The minds of men are naturally prejudiced in favour of a religion for which men suffer hardships, though they do nothing injurious to the public peace.

7. Persecutions may promote the cause they are intended to destroy, and by increasing the number of its votaries may occasion insurrections, which may be extremely detrimental to the public tranquillity.

Tert. ad Scap. c. v. ad fin. Apol. c. i. Boyle's Occas. Meditations, p. 145—148, § 5. No. 2.

4, 5, 7. 8. The magistrate, by interposing in these cases, would prejudice the public rather than serve it; and therefore virtue requires him to forbear such interpositions.

Moyle's Post. Works, vol. i. p. 24—26. Warburton's Div. Legation, vol. i. p. 304, 305. Owen's Syn. Pneum. p. 137—139. Tind. Rights of the Chr. Chur. part i. c. i. § 20. Montes. Spirit of Laws, lib. xxv. c. xiii. vol. ii. p. 183—186. Doddridge's Serm. on Persec. Old Whig, vol. i. No. v. vi. viii. ix. x. Fost. Serm. vol. i. No. vi. Watts's Essay on Civil Power in Things Sacred, § 3, 7, 10. Appendix in the last vol. of his Works. Voltaire on Toleration. Fownes's Inquiry into the Principles of Toleration, edit. 3. Furneaux's Essay on Toleration. Ditto's Letters to Mr. Justice Blackstone, edit. 2. Six Letters on Intolerance.

SCHOLIUM.

The history of religion in most countries, and the many calamities which have arisen from persecution, greatly tend to illustrate and confirm the last steps of this demonstration; and perhaps there is no part of history more instructive, though none be more melancholy.

Occas. Pap. vol. i. No. iv. p. 18—22. Temp. Netherl. p. 166—169, 175. Geddes's Account of the Inquisition, Ap. Tracts, vol. i. Geddes's Hist. of the Expulsion of the Moriscoes, ibid. vol. i. New Advent. of Telemachus. Chandler's Hist. of Persecut. pass.

DEMONSTRATION II.

1. There are a variety of religions in the world, which are so inconsistent, that it is impossible they should all be true.

2. If it be the duty of the magistrate to establish and defend any religion by penalties, he must establish and defend that which he takes to be true.

3. There is reason to believe that the generality of men take their own religion to be true.

1, 2. 3. 4. Many magistrates in the world, and perhaps the greatest part of them, would be obliged (if the contrary to the proposition were true) to persecute truth and establish falsehood. Q. E. D.

Old Whig, vol. i. No. xxxiii. Price's Morals, p. 313, 314.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To the whole reasoning in Dem. 1. it is objected, That some errors in opinion and in worship are so displeasing to God, that the toleration of them would quickly bring down his vengeance upon the public, which it is the magistrate's business to endeavour to preserve.

Ans. It seems that opinions and practices so provoking to God must be highly contrary to reason, and therefore that the prevalency of them might be prevented by a rational debate, without having recourse to violence; and if in some few instances they should prevail, there may be danger, lest God should be more provoked by attempting to root them out, by methods so detrimental to human society, and to the cause of truth (Dem. 2.); which this objection itself supposes to be the cause of God. Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged, that if God should give any nation convincing proofs that he would visit it with some extraordinary calamity and judgment, if any particular religion were violated among them, this would indeed alter the case, and justify such a magistrate in fencing it with such penal laws, as in other cases would be unjustifiable; but if a magistrate rashly concludes this to be the case of the people under his government, he is answerable to God for all those injuries which he may do them and religion upon this false supposition; and as for Christianity, it does not treat with nations as such; nor does the New Testament contain declarations of vengeance against the nations rejecting it, however virtuous they may be, but only treats with particular persons, as those who shall be finally happy or miserable as it is received or rejected.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To Dem. 1. gr. 5. it is objected, That it may be kindness to the person suffering, to endeavour by such severity to reclaim him from such notions and practices which (supposing what is generally granted in this debate, the immortality of the soul) may expose him to the danger of eternal ruin.

Ans. It appears by gr. 3. of that Demonstration, That persecution is not the way to prevent it, but rather to bring on further guilt, by adding hypocrisy to error; and if it be said that by this means at least others are preserved,—it is answered, That the evidence itself may be sufficient, without violence, to preserve men from such gross and dangerous errors as the objection supposes. If it be further pleaded, that the corruption of their natures will lead them to error, if human terrors be not employed to restrain them from it,—it may be answered, Persecution tends to beget a suspicion in the minds of the cause to be supported by it;—the magistrate cannot by any means prevent and cure all the secret abominations of the heart, but many of them must be referred to the judgment of God; and upon this principle it might be allowable to persecute any notion whatsoever, which the fury and uncharitableness of the magistrate might call a damnable error.

SCHOLIUM 3.

To gr. 2. Dem. 1. it is objected, That severity may bring men to examine,—and examination may introduce a rational conviction.

Ans. Arguments so offered are not likely to work upon the mind;—and the magistrate seems to have done his part, if he has taken care that the argument should be fairly, clearly, and strongly proposed; nor is it worth while to risk so much evil for the sake of people that will not be persuaded to inquire,—especially since the generality of such people usually go into the prevailing religion, which is that of the magistrate, and rest there.

Grot. de Jure, 2. 20. 44. Shaftesbury's Characteristics, vol. iii. p. 107. Locke's Essay, 4. xvi. 4.

SCHOLIUM 4.

To the argument of Dem. 2. it is generally replied, That none are obliged to use violence in defence of their religion, but those whose religion is true; but then the question returns, Who is that person? Every man will say it is he; and the controversy will be eternal, and all the mischief arising from it perpetual, unless some one person or body of men can give the world convincing proof that they are in the right; and then there will be no further room for persecution, even on the principles of our adversaries.

Bayle's Philos. Commentary on Luke xiv. 23. Compl. Scrm. on Exped. of Rev. p. 17—21.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Many insist upon the right of punishing those who teach false religions, though they confess that men are not to be obliged to profess the true; but seeing a man may think himself obliged in conscience to endeavour the propagation of a religion, as well as himself to believe and practise it, most of the reasonings in both Demonstrations will take place here. Nevertheless, we readily allow that the magistrate, or any religious community, may deprive a teacher of any salary or emolument, given him at first as a teacher of truth, if he appear in the judgment of that person or society to become a teacher of error;—but this by no means comes within the case condemned in the proposition.

Scottish Confess. Pref. p. 52—58. Old Whig, No. iv. p. 37, 38.

SCHOLIUM 6.

The doctrines of Atheism, human sacrifices, and community of women or goods, are so evidently detrimental to society, that many who have in general condemned penal laws in religion, have allowed them with regard to these, as well as to those who deny the essential difference between virtue and vice.

We readily allow, that if by any overt act in consequence of these doctrines, any subjects of the society be injured, the aggressor ought to be severely punished, and his pretences to conscience to be admitted as no excuse in these cases, or any others; but these notions are so notoriously absurd, that there is little danger that upon a free examination they should prevail, especially in a civilized country; and the danger there would be of admitting persecution on any pretence whatsoever, seems an equivalent for the damage the public would sustain, by permitting them to be publicly defended while they reached no further than speculation.

Alliance between Church and State, p. 118—121. Old Whig, vol. i. No. xiii. xiv. xvi. xviii. xxxvi.

SCHOLIUM 7.

If a body of men, as the Papists among us, hold principles which will not allow them to give the government security for their peaceable behaviour, and yet bring them under strong suspicion of being engaged in designs subversive of it, the government may in that case weaken them by heavier taxations than are laid upon other subjects; especially if the probable suspicion of their disaffection puts the public to any additional charge; and it seems only so far as this principle will justify it, that our laws against the Papists can be vindicated, on the foot of natural religion, not now to inquire into any supposed revelation.

Sermons against Popery, at Salters Hall, vol. i. p. 36—38. Locke on Tol. Let. 1. pass. Dod. Serm. on Persec. p. 6—19. 20—28. Old Whig, vol. i. No. xi.

SCHOLIUM 8.

Some have represented all encouragement given to one religious profession in preference to another, as a degree of persecution; but this seems to be carrying the matter into a contrary extreme. Both a regard to the honour of God and the good of society, (which surely the magistrate is not the only person under no obligation to,) must engage him to desire and labour that his people may be instructed in what he takes to be truth; for which purpose it will be necessary that some provision be made for those that so instruct them, preferable to other instructors: that he may maintain such out of his private purse, none can doubt; and if he have a discretionary power with respect to any branch of the public revenue, it seems he may apply it to this purpose, even though most of his people were of a different religious persuasion from himself; and for any who teach different doctrines, or will not submit to the ritual he thinks fit to establish, to claim the same emoluments from him, seems an invasion of that right of private judgment, which the magistrate and others joined with him must be allowed to have, as to the manner in which either his revenue or theirs shall be disposed of; but then it must be allowed that it will be matter of duty and prudence in the magistrate, and those that join with him, to make his establishment as large as he can; that no worthy and good men, who might as established teachers be useful to the public, may unnecessarily be hampered and excluded; and for this he will be answerable to God. If the majority of the people by their representatives join with the magistrate in such establishments, it will be the duty of the minority, though they cannot in conscience conform themselves, yet to be thankful that they are left in the possession of their own liberty, as by the reasoning above they certainly ought to be. If it be asked, Whether such dissenters may regularly be forced by the magistrate and majority to assist in maintaining established teachers whom they do not approve? it is answered, That this will stand upon the same footing with their contributing towards the expense of a war which they think not necessary or prudent. If no such coercive power were admitted, it is probable that covetousness would drive many into dissenting parties, in order to save their tithes or other possessions. So that none can reasonably blame a government for requiring such general contributions; and in this case, it seems fit it should be yielded to, as the determination of those to whose guardianship these dissenters have committed themselves and their possessions; but if the majority disapprove of the conduct of their governor in this respect, it must stand upon the same footing with the right of resistance in any other case, in which the people apprehended themselves to be betrayed by their governor.

Dunlop's Preface to Scottish Confess. Ahorn. Tracts, p. 170—176. Furneaux's Letters to Mr. Justice Blackstone, Let. 1, latter part.

LECTURE LXXXVIII.

PROPOSITION LXXVIII.

Virtue prohibits any man to put a period to his own life.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Self-murder plainly implies a want of reverence for God, and resignation to his will, who is the Lord of life and death, and has assigned to every man his post in life, to be maintained till he shall dismiss him from it.

2. It is generally injurious to the public, in defrauding it of a member who might some way or other be useful to it, and introducing an example which might be very pernicious.

3. It brings great distress, and often great infamy, on surviving relatives and friends.

4. It argues a dishonourable weakness of mind, in not being able to endure the calamities of life, which many others, whose passions are well governed, support with serenity and cheerfulness.

5. If there be a future state (which we shall afterwards prove) it may, in consequence of the preceding arguments, bring irreparable damage on the person himself, who dies in an action highly displeasing to God, and cuts off the possibility of further preparation.

1, 5. 6. Self-murder is contrary to the duty we owe to God, to ourselves, and our fellow-creatures, by the preceding propositions, and therefore contrary to virtue. Q. E. D.

Watts against Self-Murder, p. 4—8, 39—41, 47—52; Works, vol. ii. p. 358, 359, and p. 368, 369. Clarke of Nat. and Rev. Rel. p. 207—211. Puff. de Jure, lib. ii. c. iv. § 19. Cic. Somn. Scip. ap. Off. p. 229. Græv. c. iii. ed. ibid. Tusc. Disp. lib. i. c. xxx. Grotius, p. 1150. Obrect. tom. ii. p. 325—327. Geneva edit. Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 17—28. Spirit of Laws, vol. i. p. 145. vol. ii. p. 29. Grove's Ethics, vol. ii. p. 274—280.*

COROLLARY 1.

All lawful means are to be used to preserve our lives; for not to preserve is to destroy.

COROLLARY 2.

If bringing any temporary disorder upon ourselves may be the probable means of preserving life, virtue will not only permit but require us to do it, though it may be attended with some hazard, provided that hazard be less than would arise from omitting it; and if inoculation for the small-pox be lawful, it is on these principles.

Soame of Inocul. pass. Sowden on ditto, pass.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To Dem. gr. 1. it is objected, 1. That life was given as a benefit; and therefore may be returned when it ceases to be so.

Ans. It was not given as a benefit merely to the person that enjoys it, but as a trust, to be improved for the good of others,—God intending, in the creation of each creature, not merely the happiness of that individual himself, but of the whole system of which he makes a part. This plainly follows from Prop. 45.

2. That we are such inconsiderable creatures, that there is no reason to believe that God will be displeased with what affects the order of nature so little as our death would do.—But this argument would conclude for killing ourselves or each other at pleasure, and, indeed, at once overthrow the basis of all morality and virtue.

3. That we may conclude God gives us leave to retire, when our continuance in life will answer no good purpose;—but to this it is answered, We can never say that this is the case; since we may be sometimes unexpectedly recovered from great calamities,—or even when we lie under them, may be very serviceable to others, by affording them examples of patience and resignation. God alone is capable of judging certainly when our usefulness is quite over, and therefore his orders are to be waited.

4. As for Gildon's observation, That we do not come into life by our own consent, as a soldier does into an army,—the answer is obvious: That God, as our Creator, has a much greater right to our humble obedience, than a general can have to that of a soldier, how willingly soever he may have enlisted himself into his service.

Blount's Orac. of Reas. p. 7—13; In his Life, p. 10, 11. Lettres Persan. vol. ii. No. lxiv. lxvii. Passeran's Phil. Enq. pass. Fitzosb. Lett. No. xxii. Montaigne's Ess. vol. ii. c. iii.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To gr. 2. it is objected, That some people cannot in any respect be serviceable to the public; or that, if they could, they have a right to retire from the community when they see fit.

Ans. This can only be allowed when there may be a prospect of at least equal happiness to mankind by the remove; otherwise the general laws of benevolence oblige them to a continuance, and how this can be the case in self-murder will be hard to show.

Watts, ibid. p. 12—14; Works, vol. ii. p. 360.

SCHOLIUM 3.

To prevent a tormenting death (whether natural or violent) certainly approaching, or the violation of chastity, seems the most plausible excuse for suicide. Yet as to the first of these, it is to be considered, (besides what was hinted Schol. 1.) that to die in torment for the sake of truth, is a glorious example of virtue, which may be exceedingly useful; and humbly to yield to a severe sentence of

* A Treatise on Suicide, in two volumes, octavo, has lately been written by the Rev. Mr. Moir. It may be the smallest volume entered at every quarter sessions in England, and the only remedy for the appalling sin it contemplates is not mentioned, whether sacred or profane, or even slightly referred to or quoted. I have not encouraged it by my subscription, nothing both of the title-page, in Renshaw's New Illustrations death for any crime committed, may deter others from it much more effectually than self-violence could do, and may be on the whole an action the most pious and the most beneficial a man can in these circumstances perform. As to the latter, such violence would not destroy the character and usefulness of the person suffering by it; or if it did, it were to be borne with submission as a trial coming from the hands of Providence.

Watts, ibid. p. 65—69; Works, vol. ii. p. 372, 373.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Nevertheless, it seems that if the magistrate condemns a man to death, and gives him his choice whether he will die by his own hand, or by a more severe execution from the hands of another, he may in that case execute himself. Athen. Oracle.

LECTURE LXXXIX.

PROPOSITION LXXIX.

God is true in all his declarations, and faithful in all his engagements to his creatures, if he enters into any engagements with them.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 54, 55. 1. Virtue requires us to be true to our declarations, and faithful to our promises.

2. Our obligations to truth and fidelity in our converse with our fellow-creatures, does not arise from our own weakness and dependence, but from the general laws of benevolence; and if a being, beyond all possibility of receiving any personal advantage from falsehood and treachery, were to be guilty of it, he would be so much the more inexcusable, and therefore so much the more odious.

1, 2. Prop. 14. Cor. 3. 3. Valet propositio.

Abern. Serm. vol. ii. No. v. p. 229—231; Dublin edit. p. 216—218; London edit. p. 124, 125. Tillots. vol. ii. p. 654; Serm. 87. p. 579, 580. fourth edit. Wilk. Nat. Rel. p. 140—142. seventh edit.

SCHOLIUM 1.

If there be any force in what is said Prop. 54. Schol. 1. to prove that there is a kind of instinct in favour of truth rooted in our nature, that may afford some presumption that God, the Author of our nature, is a Lover of truth, as the benevolent instinct implanted in our nature may be an argument of his benevolence.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Many have questioned whether God, by the veracity and fidelity of his nature, be obliged to fulfil his threatenings. It is urged, that promises give another a right of a claim to what has been promised; but for a person not to accomplish his threatening, is to be better than his word; and consequently it would be no reflection on the Divine Being to suppose it thus with regard to him.

But it seems this question is to be determined by the manner in which the threatening is delivered. If any action be forbidden by God on such a penalty, and no further declaration be added, he does not seem to be bound by it; but if he has in any case added a declaration, that he will in fact make his threatenings as well as his promises the rule of his final proceedings, it seems inconsistent with his veracity, though not his fidelity, to act contrary to them; especially if we consider, that as there is no change in the views and purposes of God, if he fail to act according to such minatory declarations, he must have intended to act contrary to them even at the time he made them;—which seems a mean and dishonourable artifice, infinitely beneath the Majesty of God.

Tillots. vol. i. Serm. xxxv. p. 353, 354; edit. 1704. p. 413, 414. Watts's Serm. vol. ii. p. 146, 147; Works, vol. i. p. 218.

DEFINITION LIX.

That governor is said to administer his government with JUSTICE, who, in proportion to his legal power, distributes good to the virtuous, and evil to the vicious; or, in other words, treats his subjects on the whole according to their characters.

Abern. vol. ii. No. v. p. 180—186. Lond. edit.; p. 193—197. Dublin edit.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Justice sometimes signifies "Giving to every one that which is his own, or that which he has in reason a right to," i. e. which virtue requires he should have; or, in other words, treating him as virtue requires he should be treated. Now, in this sense of it, it is universal rectitude. (Def. 38.) Sometimes it stands distinguished from charity; and then he is said to be a just man who gives to every one that to which he has by law a claim; and he is good or charitable who abounds in such good offices as human laws do not oblige him.

Fost. Serm. vol. i. No. ii. p. 27—35.*

SCHOLIUM 2.

Justice, as it respects men, is often divided into commutative and distributative justice: the former consists in an equal exchange of benefits; the latter in an equal distribution of rewards and punishments.

Bury-street Lect. edit. i. vol. i. p. 82, 83; Serm. iv. p. 71, 72. edit. 2.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It will not follow from the definition given above,

* Mr. Hume, in his Essays, vol. 2. on the Principles of Morals, [illegible] p. 213 &c. founds the rules of [illegible] entirely on [illegible] and others have done before him.

that every governor is unjust who does not carry the execution of the law to its utmost rigour upon offenders; all governments allowing a power of pardoning, in cases in which the governor shall judge it most agreeable to the public good to do it; and as the public good is the supreme law, justice is no further a virtue than as it consists with it: but as injustice is always a term of reproach, it is not to be applied to those instances of favour which, though contrary to the letter of the law, are consistent with and subservient to its general design.

PROPOSITION LXXX.

God is, with respect to his dispensations, on the whole just to all his rational and free creatures.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. All rational and free creatures are the proper subjects of moral government, i. e. are capable of being governed by a law, enforced by the sanction of rewards and punishments.

1. 2. It is in itself highly congruous that they should be treated with favour or severity, as virtue or vice do on the whole prevail in their tempers and conduct.

2. 3. It would be justly accounted an infamous thing, for any created governor to act contrary to the rule of justice, in his treatment of any such creatures committed to his government.

4. The most excellent creatures might in some imaginable instances lie under some temptations of this kind, to which an omnipotent God cannot possibly be exposed.

3. 4. 5. It would be most dishonourable to conceive of the Divine Being as acting contrary to those rules, and dispensing final good and evil without regard to the moral character of his creatures.

Gr. 5. Prop. 44. Cor. 3. 6. Valet propositio.
Abern. Serm. vol. ii. No. v. præs. p. 186—280. Lond. edit.; p. 197—220. Dublin edit.

COROLLARY.

GOD is just in all his dispensations to mankind. Prop. 16.

Tillots. vol. ii. p. 647. Wilk. Nat. of Rel. p. 139, 140. p. 123, 124. seventh edit. Butler's Anal. part i. c. iii. vii. Bourn's Sermons, vol. ii. No. ii. p. 123, 124.

SCHOLIUM.

The only considerable objection against this, arises from the unequal distribution of good and evil observable in the present administration of Providence; but it may be sufficiently answered by considering,

1. That we are often mistaken in the judgment we form concerning the characters and conditions of men.

2. That the interest of particular persons may sometimes clash with that of society, in such a manner as that public justice will require that for the present the former be sacrificed to the latter.

3. That if a future state be admitted, it will solve those phenomena which otherwise would appear the most unaccountable; and perhaps those inequalities may be permitted, to convince us of it:—but of this, more hereafter.

Scott's Christian Life, vol. ii. p. 248—265. vol. i. p. 284—291. Relig. of Nat. p. 110—114. Abern. Serm. No. v. p. 209—216. Dublin edit.; London edit. p. 197—205. Bourn's Sermons, vol. ii. No. iii.

LECTURE XC.

DEFINITION LX.

He is said to REPENT of a vicious action that he has committed, who is so convinced of the folly of it, as heartily to wish that he had not committed it, and stedfastly resolves that he will no more repeat it.

Tillots. Sermons, vol. iii. p. 63—69; Serm. cxiii. p. 61—66. 4th edit.

COROLLARY.

Wherever there is true repentance for an injury offered to another person, the penitent will be ready to make restitution, so far as it is in his power to do it.

Tillots. vol. iii. Serm. cxvi. p. 85—90; p. 80—85. edit. 4. Puff. de Jure, lib. iii. c. i. § 5—11. Grot. de Jure, lib. ii. c. xvii. § 13—17. Granada's Mem. p. 119—121.

SCHOLIUM.

If it be hereafter proved that every man who has committed a vicious action is obliged to repent of it, then he who by an unjust war has deprived any of their rights is obliged to make restitution; and if any possessions came into the hands of a conqueror in a just war, which did not of right belong to the persons from whom he took them, such a conqueror seems obliged to restore them when the claim of the former owner is made and proved; proper allowance being made for the trouble and expense of recovering them.

Grot. de Jure, lib. iii. c. x. § 4—6. c. xvi. § 1—3. Conti's Will. ap. Life, p. 7—14.

DEFINITION LXI.

Those rules of action which a man may discover by the use of his reason to be agreeable to the nature of things, and on which his happiness will appear to him to depend, may be called the LAW OF NATURE; and when these are considered as intimations of the Divine will and purpose, they may be called the NATURAL LAWS OF GOD.—Vid. Def. 52.

Cocceneii. Puff. 1st Suppl. c. i. § 10, 19, 20.

DEFINITION LXII.

That part of the law of nature which a man, by the exercise of his reason, has actually discovered, is to him at that time THE LIGHT OF NATURE.

COROLLARY.

The light of nature and the law of nature may to the same, and yet more evidently to different, persons be different; yet they can in no instance be contradictory to each other.

SCHOLIUM.

If by the law of nature, be meant in general the obligation arising from the nature of things, it can in all its extent be known only to Him to whom the nature of things is universally known, i. e. to God; and with respect to him, it can only improperly and figuratively be called a law, since there is no superior whose will is thereby signified to him.—Vid. Def. 52.

Conyb. against Tind. p. 11, 13—17. Leland against Tind. vol. i. c. ii.

PROPOSITION LXXXI.

The natural law of God requires the practice of universal virtue.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 44. Cor. 1. 1. Since God is a Being of perfect rectitude, it must be his will that creatures capable of virtue should practise it in all its branches.

Prop. 80. 2. As he is the just Governor of the world, he will, on the whole, dispense good or evil as virtue has been cultivated, or as it has been violated.

Gr. 1, 2. Def. 61. 3. Valet propositio.

Cic. de Rep. ap. Lactant. quod vide ap. Middlet. Life of Cic. vol. ii. p. 556—558. 4to edit; vol. iii. p. 351, 352. 8vo edit. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 8—77.

COROLLARY 1.

A due reverence to the Divine Being, as well as a regard to our own happiness, will require us attentively to study the law of nature; especially seeing there are so many cases in which it is exceedingly difficult to determine what it requires.

Sykes's Connect. c. i. ii.

COROLLARY 2.

The natural law of God must require that those who have been guilty of vice should repent of it. Vid. Def. 60.

COROLLARY 3.

This natural and universal law of God is of infinitely greater efficacy to restrain vice and promote virtue than any human laws can be; since, whereas in human laws, punishments are generally the only sanctions, (the magistrate being neither capable of judging of the degree of virtue in any action, (compare Prop. 49. Cor. 2.) nor having a fund out of which he can universally reward men in proportion to it,) the Divine law has the sanction of rewards likewise, and extends itself to what the civilians call duties of imperfect obligation, i. e. those which cannot fall under the cognizance of human governors.

Warb. Divine Legation, vol. i. p. 12—21. Fitzosb. Lett. No. xlvi.

COROLLARY 4.

It is highly for the interest of states that the great principles of natural religion should be believed, viz. the being and providence of God, and the certainty of an exact retribution either here or hereafter; since it is on these principles alone that the efficacy of such supposed laws must depend.

Warb. ibid. p. 22—25. Watts of Civil Power in Rel. p. 27—29; Works, vol. vi. p. 139, 140.

COROLLARY 5.

For any to pour contempt upon this natural law of God, under pretence of extolling any supposed Divine revelation, or intimation of God's will in an extraordinary manner, will appear very absurd;—since our obligation to receive any such supposed extraordinary discoveries made by God, must depend upon our knowledge of his moral perfections; and no discovery can be supposed so particular, as not to need the use of reasoning upon the principles of the law of nature, in explaining and applying it to particular cases.

Hodges's Elihu, Preface, p. 23—25. Dove's Creed, p. 9, 10. 13.

SCHOLIUM 1.

That it will not at all follow from the usefulness of religion to communities, that therefore it is merely an engine of state-policy, is in a most sagacious and conclusive manner shown in Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. lib. iii. § 6. p. 443—471. part ii. p. 253—286.

SCHOLIUM 2.

From the second Corollary arises a most difficult and important question, viz. Whether the justice of God will permit him to forgive the penitent? at least, whether we can have such assurance of it as cheerfully to depend upon pardon, how great soever our offences may have been? Some have asserted the contrary in the strongest terms; and urge that there is an infinite degree of evil in sin, from which it is impossible that any creature should recover himself; and that the infinite goodness of God must make every the least violation of the laws of eternal order and rectitude an incurable evil; but others have universally asserted, that we may on the principles of the light of nature be certain that God will, and must upon repentance, fully and freely pardon every sin; but, on the whole, we must answer in a medium between those two opinions.

1. There seems some probable reason to believe that at least some sins may be forgiven by God, considering the known goodness of the Divine Being, and especially from observing the provision he has made in the world of nature for the necessities and calamities of mankind, even of many which are brought upon men by their own folly; and indeed had God determined to punish every sin without mercy, we can hardly believe that such a benevolent Being would have placed mankind in circumstances of such strong temptation from within and without, that not a person on earth who is arrived at years of understanding should be free from it. Nevertheless,

2. We cannot certainly and universally conclude that sin shall be pardoned on repentance; for the end of punishment is not merely, as some have rashly asserted, the amendment of the offender, (though even some punishments might be inflicted upon repentance, to make him more cautious, and to preserve him from future guilt,) but principally the maintaining the honour of the Divine government, and the admonition of others; now it is impossible for us certainly to say, how far the right of his government and the interest of the whole rational creation may require severity, even against penitents themselves, especially in cases of notorious provocation. So that, on the whole, it seems that unassisted reason could give us at best but a wavering and uncertain hope that all sin was pardonable, though it might show it to be highly probable that some sins were so, or that the penalty inflicted for them might not be the utter destruction of the penitent.

Tind. Christianity as old, &c. c. iv. Conyb. against Tind. p. 114—131. or Leland against Tind. vol. i. c. vi. Balguy on Redempt. Fost. Disc. on Nat. Rel. vol. i. c. viii. Hallet on Script. vol. ii. 326—343. Taylor against Deism, c. i. p. 1, &c. Watts's Strength and Weakness, &c. p. 72—87; Works, vol. ii. p. 236—242. Butler's Anal. part ii. c. v. § 2—4. Howe's Living Temple, part ii. c. vi. § 3. c. vi. § 5, 6, 10. Leibn. Theod. § 73, 74. Sykes on Redem. p. 5—19.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, though it remains dubious how far God will pardon sin upon repentance, yet repentance will appear reasonable,—since, to be sure, if any pardon is to be expected, it must be received in that way; for it would be utterly unbecoming the dignity of the Divine Being, and his character as the Universal Judge, always to spare and always to bless an obstinate and incorrigible rebel; and if any punishment is after all to be expected, it must surely be much better to meet it in a posture of humble submission, than with a vain and obstinate resistance and opposition to a Being infinitely superior to us, and who can continue us in a capacity of feeling punishment as long as he pleases; for some mitigation of which punishment we might at least hope, in consequence of such humble submission as is recommended above.

Collib. of Natural and Revealed Religion, part i. § 8. p. 27—35.

PART IV.

OF THE IMMORTALITY AND IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL; ITS ORIGINAL, THE GENERAL OBLIGATIONS TO VIRTUE, AND STATE OF IT IN THE WORLD.

LECTURE XCI.

DEFINITION LXIII.

THE DEATH of the MAN is the universal cessation both of perception and of animal motion, and particularly respiration, and the circulation of the blood in the human body.

SCHOLIUM.

Though perception and animal motion are not necessarily connected,—yet, so far as our observation reaches, the latter being never found without the former, it seemed not improper to join them as we have done in the definition.

DEFINITION LXIV.

The DEATH of the MIND is the utter destruction of its percipient and thinking powers.

PROPOSITION LXXXII.

The soul does not die with the body, but survives in a state of greater happiness or misery than before, as it has behaved in a virtuous or vicious manner.

DEMONSTRATION I.

Prop. 80. 1. As God is just, he will take care that, on the whole, his creatures shall be more or less happy or miserable, according to the degree in which virtue or vice prevails in their characters.

2. No such distinction is here made correspondent to their characters; but virtuous men are often exposed to the greatest distress, whilst the worst of men live and die in a series of prosperity.

Cic. de Nat. Deor. lib. iii. § 32—35.

1, 2. 3. There must be a future state of retribution. Q. E. D.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 251—257. Rel. of Nat. p. 199—203. Balguy's Six Sermons, p. 81—86. first edit. Balg. Sermons, third edit. p. 396—401. Burlamaqui Elementa Juris Naturalis, part ii. c. xii. § 1—14. c. xiii. § 1, and 11—15. Price on Morals, p. 449—466.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it is objected, That the secret pleasure attending virtue is its own reward, and renders the good man happier in his most calamitous state, than the wicked man is in his greatest prosperity.

Ans. 1. That the support and comfort of a good man in his troubles, greatly depends on the expectation of a future state; and that this expectation being his greatest encouragement to persevere in virtue under its greatest disadvantages, we can hardly suppose that a wise, just, and good God would so order it, that the great foundation and support of virtue should be a false and vain expectation.

2. There are some sufferings of flesh and blood to which good men, even for conscience' sake, have often been brought, so extreme, that without some extraordinary support from God, it is morally impossible the pleasure of rational thought should be enjoyed under them; and this case would be a sufficient answer to the objection, unless such supports were granted; which, if they were, as they arise from views of a future state, the faithfulness of God, as well as those attributes mentioned before, would seem to be injured, by supposing there were no such state.

3. Good men, in calmer seasons of life, often find the inward satisfaction arising from the consciousness of their own virtue interrupted, whilst they labour under disquieting doubts and fears as to the state and prevalency of it; and it is unreasonable to suppose that God would leave their minds under such distresses, if the present pleasure of virtue were its only reward. On the other hand, bad men often outgrow the remorse of conscience; so that those who are the most experienced in wickedness, and so deserve the heaviest punishments, do, so far as we can judge, suffer much less than others not equally criminal, and owe their tranquillity to their wickedness.

4. That all this passes in private, and is little taken notice of; whereas one would naturally expect, that the justice of God should have its public triumphs, especially over those who, being in exalted stations of life, and therefore under the greatest obligation to virtue, have acted a very guilty part without appearing to be in any measure proportionably miserable; and in favour of those who have suffered very hard things for virtue, without any visible retribution, and have perhaps even died in its defence.

Relig. of Nat. p. 203—205. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 257—261. part ii. p. 108—111. Balg. Six Serm. p. 88—91. Baxt. Reas. of Christianity, part i. c. xiv. § 1. ap. Op. vol. ii. p. 46—48. Fost. Disc. on Nat. Rel. vol. i. c. ix. Parker's Law of Nature, part. i. § 31.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Others urge that this goes on a false supposition that there are some good men; whereas the best being but imperfectly virtuous, can claim no future rewards.

Ans. 1. It must be acknowledged that the best of men cannot in strict justice claim any reward from God as a debt, seeing they owe all to him; especially are they destitute of such a claim, when they have in any instance failed of the duty they owe him, as the best here do. Nevertheless,

2. The vast difference there is in the characters of men, will require that there should be some greater difference in the manner of treating them than there is in the present state, where there is no proportion between their suffering and present demerit.

3. That considering the extraordinary progress some make in virtue, and consequently how fit they are for the most sublime and rational happiness, and how unavoidable some degree of imperfection is, considering the constitution of our nature and the temptations of life, there seems some probable though not certain reason to hope, that God will hereafter reward those who are in the main his faithful servants, with some greater degrees of felicity than they have here enjoyed.

Hallet on Script. vol. i. p. 226—229. and p. 236—240. Grove's Thoughts on a Future State, c. vii. p. 340, &c. Kenrick's Poems, p. 148—150.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, it must be confessed, that reason does not certainly assure us that all good men do immediately pass into a state of happiness; least of all could we conclude it in favour of those penitents who have been reclaimed but a little before their death, after a long course of vice, for which they have met with no remarkable calamity. It might seem more probable with regard to such, that they should either suffer an utter extinction of being, or pass through some state of purgation, whereby at least some further honour might also be done to the Divine violated law.

Virg. Æn. lib. vi. ver. 719—748. Plato's Phæd. § 11. E. Cyrus's Trav. vol. ii. p. 110. 8vo. Eschan. Dial. iii. § 19—21. Jortin's Dissertations, No. vi. Pindar's Second Olympiad. by West.

LECTURE XCII.

DEMONSTRATION II.

1. The human mind is framed with capacities for perpetual improvement; whereas brutes soon attain to the utmost perfection of which their natures are capable.

1. 2. It seems not consistent with the Divine Wisdom to form so excellent a being for so short a duration, and such low employments, as are to be found in this mortal life.

1. 3. The human mind is formed with a capacity for far greater happiness than it can enjoy in the present state.

4. Men are necessarily exposed to a great variety of evils, from which even innocent infants are not exempted; and perhaps it may be acknowledged, that were immortality to be absolutely despaired of, the state of brutes would appear less calamitous and pitiable than that of men; at least that it would be so, were the whole human species to disbelieve a future state.

5. There is a strong desire of immortality possessing our natures, and it is strongest in the most virtuous minds.

3, 4, 5. 6. The circumstances of men in the present world are such, as we can hardly reconcile with the Divine Goodness, unless we suppose some other and better state of existence; especially considering that in others and those much inferior things, there is a correspondence between natural desire and the possibility at least of enjoyment.

Gr. 2. 6. Prop. 12. 15. 7. The wisdom and goodness of God join in requiring that there should be a future state, and therefore it is reasonable to expect it. Q. E. D.

Spect. vol. ii. No. cxi. Rel. of Nat. p. 208—211. Clarke at Boyle's Lectures, p. 260. Howe's Vanity of Man, &c. pass prac. ap. Op. vol. i. p. 640—650; 8vo edit. p. 20—46. Hallet on Script. vol. i. p. 256—258, 272—289. Fost. Serm. vol. i. No. xv. p. 406—408. Baly. Ser. Serm. p. 66—69 in Works, vol. i. p. 380—384. Various Prospects of Mankind, Nature, and Providence, No. xi. Grove against Hallet, c. iv. Young's Night Thoughts, No. vii. Kenrick's Poems, p. 161—166.

SCHOLIUM.

Nearly akin to this argument is that which Mr. Balguy draws from the sense of friendship rooted in the human heart; which engages virtuous friends to wish to continue for ever in the enjoyment of each other, and renders the thoughts of a final separation so shocking, that it is not to be imagined the great and benevolent Author of Nature should have implanted such a passion, had he not intended to leave room for the gratification of it; and it may further be observed, that whatever weight there is in this argument is increased, by considering that the notion of the mortality of the soul will be an additional grief to a virtuous mind, when he considers, that, upon this supposition, he must not only be deprived himself of the enjoyment of his friends, but they likewise must entirely perish, and lose all the delight which growing science and virtue have given, and which they seemed fitted for receiving, in yet further and more exalted degrees;—to which we may add, on like principles, that the love of God growing in the virtuous mind, will make the thought of the extinction of being more painful in proportion to that advance,—as all enjoyment of God must of course cease; and the importance of this thought both illustrates Balguy's remark, and is strongly illustrated by it.

Balguy's Ser. Serm. p. 71—75; Works, vol. i. p. 386—390.

DEMONSTRATION III.

1. The lives of men, according to the ordinary course of nature, are continually in the power of themselves and others.

2. If the soul were mortal, a desperate villain might immediately deprive the most virtuous man of his being; and with it, of all the further rewards which his virtue might have expected and received.

1. 3. Such a person might also, upon that supposition, put a period to all further punishment intended for his crimes and due to them, by laying violent hands upon himself.

2, 3. 4. The justice of God might, in a great measure, be frustrated, if the soul were mortal.

Prop. 31, and 80. 5. Seeing God is an omnipotent and just Being, we have reason to conclude that his justice cannot be frustrated.

4, 5. 6. The soul is immortal. Q. E. D.

Watts's Relig. Jud. No. lxxv. p. 334—336; Works, vol. iv. p. 594.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it may be objected, That God will, in an extraordinary manner, interpose, to prevent such deaths as would interfere with the distribution of justice.

Ans. 1. So far as we can judge, many such deaths do in fact happen.

2. It would be unreasonable to expect a course of things to be established, in which, without perpetual extraordinary interpositions, the greatest irregularities must happen: this would reflect as much upon the wisdom, as the other on the justice, of the Divine Being.

Watts, ib. p. 336, 337; Works, vol. iv. p. 595.

SCHOLIUM 2.

What is most solid and important in the argument for a future state, from the impossibility of governing the world without the belief of it, seems to coincide with this argument, or Demonstration 1.

Baxt. Reas. of Christ. part. i. c. xiv. § 5, 6; ap. opt. vol. ii. p. 49—51. Barrow's Works, vol. ii. p. 334—337. Hallet's Notes on Scripture, vol. i. p. 288—297. Grove on a Fut. State, c. v.

DEMONSTRATION IV.

1. There is in man a certain affection of mind, or principle of action, which is commonly called conscience, whereby we are capable of considering ourselves as under a divine law, and accountable to God for our conduct.

1. 2. Hence arises self-approbation, or self-condemnation, in men, as they apprehend their actions have been agreeable or disagreeable to the divine law.

3. The force of this often appears so great, that the worst of men cannot, at least without great difficulty, divest themselves of it; and that even when they are in such circumstances as to have least to fear from their fellow-creatures, and especially in their dying moments.

Juvenal, Satire 13, ver. 192, &c.; Satire 1, ver. 196.

2, 3. 4. It is exceedingly probable that this principle is intended by God to intimate a future state of retribution, since it is chiefly to that it seems to refer.

1, 4. 5. Both the wisdom and truth of God seem to require that there should be a future state, in some respect answerable to this apprehension. Q. E. D.

Tillots. Serm. vol. iii. p. 124, 125; p. 119, 120. 4th edit. Barrow, vol. ii. p. 334, 335. Hallet on Script. vol. i. p. 259—263. Fost. Serm. vol. ii. No. iii. p. 55—68. Balg. Six Serm. p. 75—79. Vol. of Sermons, p. 390—394. Juvenal. Sat. xiii. v. 192, &c.; Sat. i. ver. 196.

DEMONSTRATION V.

1. It appears that most nations, not excepting the most barbarous, have generally believed the doctrine in the proposition; and it is observable that most of their funeral rites, so far as we are informed concerning them, seem to imply some apprehension of it; as that very ancient kind of idolatry, the worship of the dead, (as well as all pretences to the art of necromancy, which were plainly founded on this persuasion,) contains a further and most evident proof of it;—to which we may also add, that the lesser initiation of the ancients seems to have been a sort of machinery, in which, especially in the Eleusinian mysteries, the seats both of the blessed and damned were represented.

Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. l. ii. § 4. Grove on a Future State, c. vi.

1. 2. The doctrine was probably inferred from some arguments level to every capacity, or it would not have been so universally believed. Compare Prop. 17. Dem. 2.

2. 3. It is reasonable to believe it. Q. E. D.

Tillots. vol. iii. p. 116—118; 111—113. 4th ed. Stev. against Pop. Serm. vii. p. 192—194. Bp. Sherlock's Disc. vol. i. No. vi. Customs of the East Ind. and Jews comp. Art. vii. p. 39—42. Balg. Six Serm. p. 70, 71. Vol. of Sermons, p. 384—386.

LECTURE XCIII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is objected, That a great many ancient philosophers disbelieved the immortality of the soul, and some of the ancients tell us, it was first taught by the Egyptians.

Ans. The common people seem to have had a firmer persuasion of it than the philosophers, many of whom do indeed speak dubiously about it; and as for others of them, the accounts they give of it are very low and absurd, and several of the arguments which they bring for the support of it are weak and inconclusive; and it may by the way be observed, that in Plato's Phædon, the argument in the first demonstration, though so proper to the circumstances of Socrates at that time, is strangely omitted; nor do any that I remember mention it before Seneca.

Dr. Warburton has lately stated this matter very particularly; and undertaken to prove, though the philosophers did indeed believe the doctrine of the soul's immortality, they did not believe that of the future state of rewards and punishments; which he proves to be inconsistent with the essential principles, not only of the Epicureans, but also of the Pythagoreans, Peripatetics, Platonists, and Stoics, particularly with the doctrine of the το ἐν, or the refusion of souls into their common eternal principle; and also with that doctrine, which taught the Deity to be incapable of that resentment without which they supposed he could not punish; so that all those passages in which these philosophers inculcate future retribution, are, according to this ingenious author, to be looked upon merely as popular accommodations to doctrines commonly received; or at most, as what the philosophers thought fit to teach, though they did not themselves believe them, in a view to their being useful to society: and he imagines that the distinction between the exoteric and esoteric doctrines is of great importance here. On the contrary, Dr. Sykes and Mr. Bott suppose these philosophers really to have believed a future retribution, and that the difference between the external and internal doctrine, was only in the manner of illustrating the kinds of those rewards and punishments which they asserted in both; and the doctrine of the το ἐν is so explained by Bott as to be consistent with that of retribution.

Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. l. iii. § 1—4. Bott against Warb. § 2. Sykes against Warb. Critical Inquiry into the Principles and Practice of the Philosophers concerning a Fut. State, pass. Tillots. vol. iii. p. 132—134. Plato's Phaed. pass. N. Taylor of Devm. p. 80—110. and p. 119—141. Grot. de Verit. c. i. § 22. c. ii. § 9. Whitby's Certainty of Christ. Faith. c. x. § 11. with Annot. p. 312—315. Cudworth's Intell. Syst. c. i. § 45. Leland on Revelation, vol. ii. part iii. præs. c. ii.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Others account for the phenomenon, by saying that men might wish, and therefore think, themselves immortal.

Ans. Most who held and taught a future state of distinct personal existence, seemed to think it a state of retribution, which, it is to be feared, it was not their interest to desire; and the fears of it are sometimes spoken of as a burthen; and if, notwithstanding these fears, they wished the soul immortal, it is so much the greater confirmation of Dem. 2. pr. 5.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The principal objections against this doctrine are reckoned up by Lucretius: but most of them are so evidently weak as not to deserve a particular examination. The most plausible are those that arise from the sensible decay of the faculties of the mind with those of the body, and the supposed impossibility of action and perception without bodily organs: but to these it is replied,

1. That the soul does sometimes continue in full vigour, even when the body is under the greatest disorder, and death immediately approaching.

2. That it may be a law of nature, that while the spirit is united to the body, it should be so affected with the good or bad state of the bodily health as we often see it is; and that the memory should be impaired with age and sickness will not appear at all strange, considering how much it depends on the brain. Vid. Prop. 8. Dem.

3. That, perhaps, this may be a state of imprisonment to the soul, as many of the philosophers thought; and that when it is set at liberty from the body, it may obtain new and noble ways of perception and action, to us at present unknown.

4. That if a body were necessary, we might more reasonably believe God would give it a new body in the state immediately succeeding this, than suffer its faculties to perish, for the reasons assigned above.

Lucret. l. iii. ver. 418—740. Polignac's Anti-Lucretius. Rel. of Nat. p. 194—199. Cicero's Tusc. Disp. l. i. § 20. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 79—81. Plat. Phaed. § 9, 10. Rochest. Life, p. 65—68, and p. 20, 21, 150. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. § 5. præs. p. 395—400. More's Immort. l. iii. c. xiv. xv. Kenrick's Poems, p. 152—155.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Others attempt to prove the immortality of the soul, from the impossibility of governing the world without such hopes and fears, on the one hand, (vid. Dem. 3, Schol. 2.) or of God's governing it by a lie on the other, as they say it is plain he in fact does, if there be not a future state. They also argue from God's being the Author of those hopes which arise in the mind of a good man; and from the probability there is that there are other worlds inhabited by spiritual beings, to whom therefore the soul may go, and among whom it may dwell, after the dissolution of the body. It is likewise said, That since we see other beings ripening gradually to perfection, and animal life improved from low beginnings to noble heights,—it is, on the principles of analogy, probable that the human soul shall pass by death into some more elevated state of being, or at least may be a candidate for it:* but as where these arguments are distinct from the former, the premises in some of them are liable to much dispute, and perhaps cannot be all sufficiently made out; and as in others, granting the premises, the conclusion may be disputed, we reckon it enough barely to have suggested these considerations without entering into the more particular examination of them.

Baxt. Works, vol. ii. p. 55, 658. Butl. Anal. part. i. c. i. Young's Night Thoughts. No. vi. p. 158, 159. edit. 12mo.

* The argument from the soul's complacential inclination or desire of [illegible] capacity of perceiving and acting after death, may be seen in Spectator, vol. viii. No. 487. Baxter on the Soul, vol. i. p. 230—236. Young's Night Thoughts No. 6. p. 148. Lond. edit. 12mo. p. 194—196. Svo. edit.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It may further be questioned, Whether, allowing a future state, it can be proved eternal and immutable?

Ans. The soul seems originally designed for an eternal duration, on the principles urged in Dem. 2. but that the state on which it shall enter at death shall be eternal, the light of Nature does not discover. There is no reason at all to expect eternal rewards for so short and imperfect a virtue as can here be attained; and as for eternal punishments, though some of the heathens did assert them, and many have undertaken to infer them from natural principles, (all moral evil being a breach of order, and every instance and act of it having a natural tendency to harden the soul, universal and perpetual misery must follow, unless God interpose in an extraordinary manner, either to restore the health of the soul, or to end its being,) yet it seems that our natural apprehensions of the Divine Goodness would rather encourage us to hope that he would leave some room for amendment and recovery of happiness, in a future state, or by annihilation would put an end to men's misery, when they appeared humbled by their punishment. But if it should prove that in a future state of chastisement, the sinner should harden himself against God, and go on still in his crimes, perpetual succeeding sins would justify perpetual succeeding punishments; for it is certain, every new crime committed after severe punishment, is on that account so much the more aggravated. The same may be said concerning a series of eternal happiness, in case of continued virtue, and that very consistently with the preceding observation. Vid. Prop. 81. Schol. 2. Prop. 82. Dem. 1. Schol. 3.

Lucret. lib. i. ver. 108—112. Taylor on Deism, p. 149—167. Joseph. Bell. Judaic. 3. vii. 5. Balguy's Serm. vol. i. p. 409—413.

SCHOLIUM 6.

It may be granted, that the resurrection of the body, whatever change it may be supposed to undergo after death, may be possible to the Divine Power, and may be subservient both to render rewards and punishments the more complete, and the triumphs of Divine Justice more conspicuous than they would otherwise be; but it by no means appears certain by the light of nature.

Lime-str. Lect. vol. ii. p. 376—384. Gale's Court of the Gent. part i. lib. iii. c. vii. p. 81, 82; part ii. lib. ii. c. viii. p. 189. Phocylides, v. 98—101. Pearson on the Creed, p. 365—367; p. 372—374. edit. 11. Boat. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 278—306. Leland on Revelation, vol. ii. p. 436—441. Jackson on Mat. and Spirit, p. 39, 40.

SCHOLIUM 7.

The Atheist cannot be infallibly certain that there shall be no future state, even though he should believe the existence of the soul to depend on that of the body, or thought to be no more than a power resulting from matter so disposed; since that omnipotent chance which according to his principles formed the whole world, may possibly throw together into one body the particles of which he now consists, with such alterations, as to make him capable even of eternal misery, from which no virtue can secure him.

Gurdon at Boyle's Lect. p. 151—163. Fiddes of Mor. Pref. p. 12—16.*

LECTURE XCIV.

DEFINITION LXV.

The MIND may be said to be CONFORMAL, if thought arise from, and be inseparably connected with, a certain system of matter; so that if such system so arranged exist, thought must exist with it, though no distinct being should be produced; or if that system were to be dissolved, or the arrangement of its particles to be altered, thought must immediately and necessarily cease with it, unless God were instantaneously to produce some new being which did not before exist.

PROPOSITION LXXXII.

To inquire into the most considerable arguments brought to prove the immateriality of the soul.

DEMONSTRATION I.

Prop. 23. Cor. 1. Prop. 26 and 41. 1. God is an Immaterial and Almighty Spirit.

1. 2. There is no absurdity in supposing the existence of an immaterial spirit produced by him.

3. If the soul be material, its faculty of thinking must either necessarily arise from the nature and arrangement of its particles, or it must be superadded by God to a system of matter.

Prop. 24. 4. It is in the nature of things entirely inconceivable and incredible that thought should necessarily arise from matter, however figured or moved.

5. To say that a power of thinking is superadded by the Divine Will, is unintelligible, or in effect granting the proposition; for there cannot be a power of thinking where there is not a thinking being, and the superaddition of this to matter is nothing more than the annexing an immaterial being to a body, which none who assert the immateriality of the soul (granting what is here supposed, the real existence of matter) pretend to deny. Def. 6.

* Dr Edward Synge's Attempt to prove the Christian Religion from the Light of Nature only, and Dr Sykes's Essay on the Connection between Natural and Revealed Religion, are both upon the same subject, and the second and third volumes of the latter contain a vindication of the moral arguments made use of in the former. Dr Clarke's Boyle Lectures, Dr Bentley on the Immateriality of the Soul, Ibbot's Posthumous Sermons, Nye's Reason, Dr Sturges's Dissertations, Nye's and Dr Ibbot's Essays, Dr Jackson's Elements of Moral Science, and Dr Balguy's Sermons, are likewise learnedly written upon the same argument. Dr Watson's Apology for Christianity, and Dr Leland's View of the Deistical Writers, are also very useful.

3, 4, 5, 6. There are insuperable difficulties attending the supposition that the soul is corporeal.

2, 6, 7. It is reasonable to believe it incorporeal. Q. E. D.

Dutton on the Res. p. 130—160. Chapin's Prov. of Nat. Rel. c. ii. § 13. p. 36—40. Tillots. vol. iii. p. 127—129, 130. Rel. of Nat. p. 186—189. Abernethy, vol. i. Serm. iv. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 156—160, 186—192. Dr. Price's Sermon at St. Thomas's, Jan. 1, 1766, p. 1—12. Burlamaqui Elementa Juris Naturalis, c. xiii. § 2—10. Collyber on the Soul, Ess. i. § 3, 4. Ramsay's Principles, vol. i. p. 230—233.

SCHOLIUM.

To this it is objected, That it limits the Divine Omnipotence, to say that God cannot make matter think.—It is generally replied, That it is no more so than to say that God cannot make a square circle. God may unite a soul to a system of matter, but then the matter to which it is united can only be said to think, as our body is said to feel, i. e. by the divine appointment, though without any necessary connexion it may become an organ of sensation and motion to that spirit: and it will be difficult to form any scheme by which thought may be supposed to result from matter any how modified and agitated by an Omnipotent Being, on which it might not be asserted to arise from it without the action of such a Being, and consequently by which all religion might not be overthrown.

Locke's Ess. lib. iv. c. iii. § 6, with notes. Rel. of Nat p. 189—193. Howe, vol. i. p. 52, 53. Living Temp. vol. i. c. iii. § 14, 15. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 192—195. Jackson on Matter and Spirit, p. 1—3, 12, 16. Rams. Princ. vol. i. p. 235, 236.

DEMONSTRATION II.

1. Matter is divisible, and consists of parts actually distinct.

1, 2. Whatever system of matter can be supposed to be conscious, it is capable of being divided into several lesser parts; and they will be as really distinct when laid or cemented together, as when separate, and removed to a distance from each other.

2, 3. If any system of matter be conscious, it must either have a distinct consciousness in each lesser particle, or one consciousness resulting from the union of its several parts.

4. There cannot be in each system a number of distinct consciousnesses; for that would suppose a vast and unknown multiplicity of souls in every soul. Q. E. D.

5. An assemblage of various unthinking parts can never be supposed to make one thinking mass, so that thought should arise from the whole, and yet not exist in any given part.

3, 4, 5, 6. The soul is not material. Q. E. D.

Clarke against Dodwell, p. 1—3; p. 73, 74, fifth edit. Jacks. on Mat. and Spirit, p. 4—11, 32—36. Rams. Princ. Prop. 32. Baxt. ib. p. 227—239.

SCHOLIUM.

To the fifth step it is objected, That one indivisible power may reside in a system consisting of divisible parts, as sweetness in a rose; but it is replied, That sweetness is only a secondary power, (Def. 18.) and not, properly speaking, in the rose at all; and as for those primary powers or qualities, they do proportionably reside in every particle.

Clarke, ibid. p. 8—15. Letters between Clarke and Collins.

DEMONSTRATION III.

Prop. 82. 1. The soul is immortal.

2. What is immaterial has no internal tendency to corruption and dissolution; and is incapable of being hurt by a variety of accidents, which may destroy any material system known to us.

3. It is unreasonable to believe that God would make a being, which he intended for an immortal duration, with a tendency to corruption, or obnoxious to dissolving accidents.

1, 2, 3, 4. It is unreasonable to suppose that God has made the soul material; even supposing it possible that matter might think. Q. E. D.

Baxt. ibid. p. 239—247. Law's Theory, Discourse on Death, and Appendix against the Natural Immortality of the Soul.

LECTURE XCV.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it may be replied, That neither is matter obnoxious to dissolution, nor does any immaterial substance tend to continue in existence any otherwise than as God shall act in and upon it (Prop. 32); so that the whole demonstration is founded on a mistake; and it is said, that allowing the soul to be material, does no more disprove its immortality, than owning the body shall be so, after the resurrection which Christians expect, will be a sufficient objection against its perpetual duration.

Locke's Third Letter to Still. p. 420—429. Baxt. Works, vol. ii. p. 176—179. Works.

vol. i. p. 565—568. edit. 3. Reason of Religion, part. ii. Conclusion. Baxt. on the Soul, 2, 5. Jacks. on Mat. and Spirit, p. 11, 12. Rams. Princ. Prop. 18.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Nevertheless, we allow that, if the immateriality of the soul were proved, it would something strengthen our natural argument for its immortality; as it would certainly show us that the destruction of the body does not imply the extinction of the mind; and would be a probable intimation that God intended it for a longer duration; as we have reason to believe, that though marble and freestone be equally dependent upon him, he intended the former should continue in its form longer than the latter.

Grove's Thoughts on a Future State, c. iii. Baxter on the Soul, c. iii. p. 11.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some have argued much to the purpose of Dem. 2. that an indivisible power cannot subsist in a divisible subject: but the power of thinking is an indivisible power, therefore the soul in which it exists is indivisible, and therefore immaterial.—But the foundation of this argument is liable to much dispute, and some attempt to retort it thus: "The idea of two feet is a divisible idea; but it exists in the mind, therefore the mind is divisible." But though we conceive of two feet as divisible, it is not proper to say that the idea of two feet may be divided into two ideas, each of which shall be half the former, as the archetype of it may.

Hallet on Script. vol. i. p. 216—219.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Much of the same kind is that argument taken from the limited nature of bodies, which are incapable of being extended beyond certain degrees; whereas the mind is continually opening itself to receive more and more knowledge, and never complains that an idea is too long, too broad, or too wide; but this goes on the supposition that ideas are material things, otherwise they could not crowd or stretch a material mind.

Serm. de Superville, vol. iii. p. 10, 11.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Some plead that the spirits and particles of the brain are in a continued flux, and therefore cannot be the seat of consciousness, which is a fixed thing. It is answered, That consciousness may inhere in some stable, solid, and unchanged piece of matter, such as the stamina vitæ are by many philosophers supposed to be. Hallet, ibid. p. 215, 216.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Against the proposition it is objected, That if thought infer immateriality, and immateriality immortality, then, as brutes may reasonably be supposed to have perception, (Prop. 2.) which is a species of thought, they must be immortal. It is answered, That we know not what may become of them. God can no doubt put a period to their existence at their death, since immateriality cannot necessarily infer immortality.—Vid. Schol. 1. As for Ramsay's notion, that brutes are degraded intelligences, which were once Seraphim, and are now doing penance in so base a state,—it depends on so many uncertain principles, and is in itself at first appearance so improbable, that we shall not now stay to examine or confute it.*

Ramsay's Princ. part. i. vol. i. p. 374—387. Tillots. vol. iii. p. 127—129. Clarke against Dodwell, p. 26—28; p. 88, 89. edition 5. Burnet on the Art. p. 34. Edwards's Exercitations, part i. p. 125—129. Baxt. on the Soul, ii. 36—38. iii. 11. Reyn. Lett. to the Deist, p. 61—68.

SCHOLIUM 7.

That the faculties of the mind are sometimes impaired by the decay of the body, will no more prove the soul material than mortal.—Prop. 82. Dem. 5. Sch. 3.

Burn. on the Art. p. 35. Baxt. on the Soul, v. 6—20. Rams. Princ. p. 233—235.

SCHOLIUM 8.

From comparing the arguments on both sides, it appears that allowing it not to be demonstrable that the soul is immaterial, it is at least possible it may be so, and even highly probable that it is.—Vid. Dem. 1. gr. 2.

Blount's Orac. of Reas. p. 185, 187—190. Locke's Essay, lib. iv. c. iii.

SCHOLIUM 9.

Should the soul be immaterial, it is nevertheless possible that it may be always united to some vehicle; our not seeing it go off at death can be no argument against it,—since many things known to be corporeal are to us invisible, particularly the air, which is so extremely forcible; and the magnetic and electrical effluvia.

More's Immort. of the Soul, lib. iii. c. i. § 2, 3. Rel. of Nat. p. 197, note. Watts's Essay, No. vii. p. 173, 174. Baxt. on the Soul, ii. 31. iv. 1—9. 17—21. Jacks. on Mat. and Spirit, p. 11—17. 51—56. Clarke on Souls, i. 5. iv. 1, 2. Cheyne's Essay on Regimen. Discourses at the end.

SCHOLIUM 10.

As to the opinion which the Heathen philosophers entertained on this subject, there is considerable debate, but it seems the greater part concluded that the soul consisted of, or was inseparably united to, some system of matter, excepting those who held it to be an ἀποσπασμα from the Divine Substance, and held that substance to be incorporeal.

* [illegible]

Locke's Third Lett. to Still. p. 331—341; Works, vol. i. p. 570, 571. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 263—267. N. Taylor of Deum. p. 131, 132. Plato's Phæd. § 20. Wesl's Demon. Leg. vol. i. book iii. § 4. p. 403, 404, second edit. Campbell's Necessity of Revelation, p. 132—144.

LECTURE XCVI

PROPOSITION LXXXIV.

To inquire, Whether, supposing the soul to be immaterial, there is reason to believe that it is extended? i. e. limited to some certain quantity of space, so that it may be said to fill it?

SOLUTION.

There is no reason to believe that if the soul be immaterial, it is extended.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. If the soul be extended, seeing all acknowledge that extension must be limited, it must be of some shape or figure.

1. 2. If the soul be extended, we may conceive of it as losing a part of its shape; and if it be supposed commensurate either to the whole or to any part of the body, a bullet, sword, or any thing else, which tends or cuts off a part of the body with which the soul is so extended, may, for aught appears, also carry off a part of the soul with it,—unless we are to suppose it, when in such danger, to shrink up into smaller dimensions.

2. 3. This discerption of the soul, on the one hand, or condensation on the other, would imply some degree of solidity, i. e. corporeity, Def. 4. contrary to the hypothesis.

4. If the soul be extended, it may touch the body, or be touched by it; but it is utterly inconceivable that there should be any contact between an immaterial being and matter.

[illegible] Lord Mon[illegible]

[illegible] p. 28—44. [illegible]

[illegible] particular notice.

5. Whatever absurdity could be supposed to follow, from granting the soul, if immaterial, to be unextended, would follow from supposing God to be so; yet, on the other hand, insuperable difficulties would arise from supposing him extended. Prop. 11. Schol. 2.

3, 4, 5. 6. There is no reason to believe that if the soul be immaterial it is extended. Q. E. D.

Watts's Ess. No. vi. § 2. p. 146—152. Rems Princ. vol. i. Prop. 27. King's Original of Evil, p. 31—33.

SCHOLIUM.

To this it is objected, That nothing acts but where it is; therefore, if the soul were not extended, it could not act at all.

Ans. All matter acts upon other matter at a distance by gravitation; and it is inconceivable how the soul should move the nerves inserted in the brain, any better by being near, than by being further off, unless we suppose it material; and we before observed that, in whatever sense it is supposed to be seated there, it is impossible to explain the manner of its perception and action.—Prop. 1. Schol. 2. Prop. 8. Schol. 3. God could no doubt give a soul a power of moving a stone, or even a mountain, at several yards' distance from the body to which it is united, i. e. he might appoint that ordinarily the motion of such a distant body should follow on the volition of that mind (vid. Prop. 32.); which he could not, if the hypothesis in the objection were just; seeing, if such a proximity were necessary, this could not possibly be effected, without such dilatation and contraction as seems inconsistent with immateriality. It is moreover plain, that it is not this proximity which gives the mind a consciousness of bodily motion; since the mind is least conscious of some things, which on that hypothesis must be nearest to it,—being entirely unacquainted, otherwise than by foreign observation and analogy, with the structure of the brain, and the cause of its disorders, and not being able to determine by inspection or consciousness where the common sensorium is.—Vid. Prop. 4. Schol. 1.

Howe's Works, vol. i. p. 45. Living Temple, part. i. c. iii.; 8vo, vol. i. p. 127, 128. Sir Isaac Newton's Third Letter to Dr. Bentley, 8vo. 1756. Watts, ibid. p. 152—161. Essay vi. § 3.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is further objected, That what is not extended is nowhere; and what is nowhere has no existence; but though this has been generally allowed as a maxim, it is not self-evident; and indeed it is no other than taking the whole question for granted.

Watts, ibid. p. 161—164. § 4. Jackson on Matt. and Spirit, p. 3, 4.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, when God has united a spirit to any body, so that it shall be to that spirit an organ of sensation and action, the soul may in a less proper sense be said to be there, where the body is; and spirits in general may be said to be where bodies are on which they are capable of acting.—Vid. Def. 15, 32. Watts, ibid. p. 165—167. § 5.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The objection, That if the soul were not extended, it could have no idea of an extended substance, is taking the matter for granted; and has been considered in the only view in which it is worthy of consideration, i. e. as an objection against its immateriality.—Prop. 83. Schol. 3, 4.

Cudw. Int. Sys. p. 824—826. Ralphi Epist. Misc. 5, ad finem.

LECTURE XCVII.

PROPOSITION LXXXV.

To propose and examine the principal hypotheses relating to the original of the human mind.

SOLUTION.

The three chief hypotheses are those of pre-existence, of existence ex traduce, and of immediate creation.

HYPOTHESIS 1.

Some suppose the human mind existed at first without this gross body in which it now dwells; but whether without any body at all, is not universally agreed. Some of the ancient philosophers, particularly Plato, supposed it eternal, or as the Latins emphatically express it, sempiternal, as being a necessary emanation from the Divine Mind; but most of those who have embraced this doctrine of pre-existence, supposed it to have been created at some far distant period of time; and they all agreed that in some unknown moment between generation and birth, perhaps, say some, the middle space, it was sent to inhabit this body. The principal argument to support this hypothesis, is taken from the justice of God, with which it is supposed to be inconsistent that a pure and innocent spirit should be so incommodiously lodged; they say that this embodied state seems to be an imprisonment, to which it is condemned for crimes committed in some better state of existence.

To this it is answered,

1. That the Divine Justice may admit that an innocent creature in the first stage of its existence should be exposed to some inconveniences, if they be counterbalanced by the advantages of its state, and especially by an opportunity of securing a more perfect happiness hereafter,—which the patrons of this hypothesis allow to be our case.

2. If, as the generality of Christians believe, the first parents of our race were in a happier state of existence, and were also under such a constitution as made them the representatives of their whole posterity, and they in that state offended their Maker,—it is possible that the whole family might fall under some marks of his displeasure, which they would not otherwise have been subjected to; and this may perhaps be the easiest way of accounting for those phenomena on which the hypothesis is built.

3. That Divine Justice seems to require, that if a creature were punished for its own personal offence committed in a former state, it should have some consciousness of its guilt; our present calamities, therefore, not being attended with such consciousness, cannot be a punishment for sins so committed.

SCHOLIUM.

It is a great objection against this hypothesis, That it is merely gratis dictum; forasmuch as no man can remember any such pre-existent state as is pretended, or the adventures that befell him in it.

Bransett's Journal, p. 221—223.

Plato answers, That we have not entirely forgotten them, but that all our knowledge is entirely remembrance; and that without it no knowledge could be obtained; but that is evidently inconclusive, because at this rate the argument might be carried on ad infinitum, and an eternal, immutable, and self-existent Being could know nothing. It is much more reasonably replied, That it is the law of our present state of being that we should remember only by the assistance of the brain, in which it is impossible that any traces of our former adventures should be drawn.

Plato's Phæd. § 16—18. Burn. Theory, vol. ii. lib. iv. Pref. p. 3—5. Phœnix, vol. i. No. i. p. 16—30. Ramsay's Princ. Prop. xlvii. vol. i. p. 147—156. Jenk. of Christian. vol. ii. p. 243—245. Trav. of Cyrus, vol. ii. p. 115—132. 8vo edition; p. 248—282. 12mo. More's Immort. of the Soul, lib. ii. c. xii. xiii. Cudw. Int. Syst. lib. i. c. i. § 31, 32. Watts's Ruin and Recov. quest. ii. p. 94—105. ed. 2.; Works, vol. vi. p. 221—225. New Practice of Piety, 12mo. p. 41—44. Barrow's pre-existent Lapse of Human Souls, passim. Price's Dissertations, No. i. p. 159. Lux Orientalis, præs. c. 5, 6, 10. with Annot. Collibet on Souls, Essay iii. passim. Stonehouse on Univ. Restit. Lett. x. p. 213. No Pre-existence, by E. W. passim.

HYPOTHESIS 2.

The hypothesis of the soul's existence, ex traduce, is this.—From the observations made chiefly by Leuwenhoek of the animalcula existing in semine maris, some have supposed that the first elements of the soul as well as the body were contained there; which gradually grow up to sense with the ripening fœtus, and to reason in the advance of life. Of the patrons of this hypothesis, some suppose that these animalcula are produced from the food of the immediate parent; others, that the elements of them are to be found in the body of an infant, and that all those from whom all mankind have arisen, besides an immensely greater multitude that have perished, were contained in the body of the first man, each generation being enclosed in the former, as the coats of an onion within each other, or, as perhaps it might be better illustrated, the kernel of a nut. The chief arguments to prove this are,

1. The existence of these animalcula.

2. The absurdity of supposing a kind of equivocal generation in the body of the parent.—Prop. 21. Sch. 1.

3. The resemblance between parents and children, which seems to imply such a derivation or traduction of the body, which on principles of analogy may prove that of the soul.

SCHOLIUM.

To this it is replied,

1. That there is some reason to doubt whether there really be such animalcula as Leuwenhoek talks of,—few but himself have ever been able to discover them with his glasses; and it is very possible the motion might arise from some spirituous particles of the fluid, as it was only observed while the fluid was in a degree of gentle warmth, but soon ceased, i. e. as it seems those particles evaporated in the heat.

2. That if it be allowed that animalcula are really seen, it may be questioned whether they are originally in the seed or in the water, since they must be diluted with water before they can be discerned.

3. That if they be in the seed, it may still be questioned whether they be the stamina of the human body; not only as it is doubtful whether they can pass the two teguments of the ova, but also considering how unlike the animal growing in an impregnated egg, as observed and delineated by Malphigi, is to that observed in the seed of the cock.

4. That allowing such animalcula in the seed of every adult male, and also allowing them to be the stamina from whence the next generation proceeds, it is groundless to assert that they contain the stamina of all future generations. It is allowed indeed, that the exquisite smallness of those removed at the greatest distance from the present, is no objection against the possibility of their existence, since Omnipotence could, no doubt, in the compass of a grain of sand, make a system similar to our solar system; but there is no necessity of supposing this to be the fact here, since we are sure that the same Omnipotence can, and perhaps does, by some settled law of nature to us unknown, produce animal bodies from particles of matter before existing under another form; and it is the more probable, as it seems hardly consistent with our views of divine wisdom, to form such multitudes of animal bodies for certain destruction, and to answer no imaginable purpose; for it is evident, that not one of many millions of them is ever born into the world; and if it be true with regard to men, it is so likewise with respect to fishes and insects, where this objection is vastly greater.

5. If such bodies were allowed, it would be unreasonable to suppose them all endued with souls; such low degrees of life as in proportion we must have had at the distance of many generations, being hardly conceivable; nor can we imagine that God would, for so many thousand years, continue human minds in so mean and contemptible a state of existence.

6. This hypothesis is most suitable to the materiality of the soul,—the traduction of one spirit from another being inconceivable, and but poorly illustrated by the simile usually brought,—of lighting one taper by another.

7. The destruction of a multitude of souls to every one that grows up or has life, is a still stronger objection against this doctrine than the destruction of bodies, gr. 4.; and that these subsist in a future state none maintain.

Baker on Microscopes, c. xvi. p. 152–167. Leuwenhoek Epist. vol. i. p. 1–12, 149, &c. Nieuwent. Rel. Phil. vol. i. Contemp. xvi. § 9, 11. p. 341–344, 345–348; p. 305–308, 310–313, in another edit. Lux Orientalis, c. iii. Rel. of Nat. p. 88—91. Watts's Phil. Ess. No. ix. § 2. with Append. p. 201—208, and p. 307–311. Dennes's 2nd Serm. of Veget. Pref. Drake's Anat. vol. i. c. xxiv. Baxt. on the Soul, vol. i. p. 198—202. Chamb. Dict. on the word Generation.

HYPOTHESIS 3.

The hypothesis of immediate creation is, That at a certain time, generally supposed between conception and the birth, perhaps twenty weeks after the former, but some say in the birth itself, the soul is created; and from the first moment of its existence united to the body. The weakness of the former hypothesis seems the principal strength of this. It is indeed objected that this supposes God to be always creating new souls; but it is not easy to see the force of that objection. We are sure he always acts. (Prop. 32.) and acts with infinite ease (Prop. 31.); nor is continual new creation any reflection upon him. What if we should acknowledge that his works may be ever growing, both in number, extent, and perfection? It is difficult to see how it would blemish either his wisdom or power.

Gale's Court of the Gent. part ii. p. 344—346.

§ 3. p. 382—384. 2d edit. Lux Orient. c. ii.

SCHOLIUM.

On the whole, it seems that this last hypothesis is rather the most probable; but it does not become us to be confident in so dark and dubious a matter.

Le Clerc's Pneum. part. i. c. viii.

LECTURE XCVIII.

PROPOSITION LXXXVI.

It is highly probable that there are some created spirits, which were, in the first constitution of their nature, superior to human souls.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. When we consider the vast variety there is in the inanimate, the vegetable, and the animal creation, and how one class and order of beings rises above another, almost by imperceptible degrees, it seems highly probable that we, who are in part allied to the beasts that perish, and who are placed in so imperfect a state of being, are not the highest order of spirits, and the most glorious creatures of our almighty Creator; but rather, that the scale of created beings rises abundantly higher.

Baxter's Matho, vol. i. Conf. v. p. 248—257. 275—290.

2. Astronomers generally grant, and strongly prove, that some of the planets are abundantly larger than the earth. We can hardly think they were made merely to afford us that little light and benefit we derive from them: it is much more probable that they are habitable worlds, especially considering what discoveries have been made of the satellites of Saturn and Jupiter, and those varieties in the face of our moon that seem like seas, land, and mountains; and it is highly probable that some of these inhabitants may be spirits superior to us,—not to mention the possibility there is that the interstellar spaces may be inhabited; not to insist on Wells's conjecture, That there may be more planets than we commonly reckon revolving about our sun.

Swind. of Hell, p. 287. King's Orig. of Evil, 4. i. 1, 2.

3. Most nations have believed the existence of demons, i. e. created spirits superior to human souls; and the accounts that have been given of their intercourse with men might probably have some foundation in fact, though no doubt the greater part of them are fabulous.*

1, 2, and 3. 4. Valet propositio.

Spect. vol. vii. No. 519. Locke's Ess. lib. ii. c. xxiii. § 13; lib. iv. c. iii. § 24, 26; lib. iv. c. xvi. § 12. Wilkins's World in the Moon, Prop. vii—ix. xiii. Matho, vol. ii. p. 55. Baxt. Works, vol. ii. p. 55, 56. Hier. in Pyth. Carm. ver. 3, 4; vid. Dacier's Not. ib. Euseb. Prep. Evan. lib. xv. c. xliii. Voltaire's Misc. Of the Doctrine of the Genii. Night Thoughts, p. 173, 174, 8vo edit.

SCHOLIUM 1.

If it be objected, That perhaps those beings, now superior to us, were at first on a level with us, though perhaps something different,—we answer, That the reasoning of the first step lies strongly against this;—and as for what is objected against the third step (though it must be acknowledged, according to Dr. Sykes's assertion, that many of those, whom the Heathens called both good and bad demons, were supposed to be human souls)—yet it is very evident they had a notion of some demons, who were originally in a state superior to humanity, and never had dwelt in human bodies.—Compare Hierocles and Eusebius, quoted above.

Inq. into Demoniacs, p. 1—4. Twells's Ans. p. 5, 6. Further Inq. p. 2—20. Answer to it, p. 8—24. Pegge of Demon. p. 1—25. Just. Mart. Opera, p. 28. Col. edit. Pope's Iliad, lib. xix. ver. 93. Not. Still. Orig. lib. iii. c. iii. § 17. p. 514—516; fol. edit. p. 322. Euseb. Prep. lib. viii. c. xiv. p. 387; lib. xiii. c. xi. p. 663. Gale's Court of Gent. lib. ii. c. viii. § 11, 12. p. 186—188, and 337. 196—198, 375.

SCHOLIUM 2.

However, it may be granted that the perfection and happiness of those spirits are growing and increasing, as (if we suppose them not subject to forgetfulness, which the extraordinary memory of some men makes probable) it is certain their stock of knowledge must always be; with the increase of which much pleasure is connected.

Locke's Ess. lib. iii. c. x. § 9. Watts's Impr. of the Mind, p. 253, 254.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged, that whatever their perfection be, or can be at any imaginable most distant space of time, with any imaginable degree of continued improvement, they will still continue inferior to the Divine Being in knowledge and in power, and will still be equally dependent on him for their existence, and every degree of their happiness; in which respect the noblest and meanest of his creatures are on a level.

* The various publications of Mr. Farmer and his antagonists, with regard to Demons, will be noticed hereafter. In the mean while, we content ourselves with referring to his Treatise on the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient Heathen Nations, and to Mr. Bell's Idolatry of Greece and Rome, distinguished from that of other Heathen Nations.

and so are to him as nothing; and this, by the way, is a strong argument for the infinity of the Divine Being.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Let it be observed, that the proposition is to be taken only in a general sense: for we have not any assurance by the light of nature, that no human soul shall ever arrive in its improvement to an equality with the most excellent of those superior spirits. On the other hand, that there are some spirits now superior to what those of men are in this imbodied state, is in effect no other than a corollary from Prop. 82.

Republic of Letters, vol. vi. p. 282—284.

LECTURE XCIX.

PROPOSITION LXXXVII.

More fully to prove that it is the interest of every man to cultivate virtue through the whole course of his life, and in every particular action. Vid. Prop. 44. Cor. 2.

DEMONSTRATION.

Ax. 15. Cor. Schol. 1. 1. There is a secret and immediate pleasure attending virtuous actions, especially those of a benevolent kind, or those in which there is any remarkable degree of gratitude and piety towards God; which pleasure is of a very sublime and delightful kind, vastly preferable to any sensual gratification, as those who have tried both experimentally know; and pious philosophers will acknowledge that the immediate pleasures of virtue are superior to those of science.

2. In reflecting upon all virtuous actions, and particularly those which are attended with the greatest difficulty, there is a high satisfaction of mind.

3. Human nature and life are so constituted, that, generally speaking, health, reputation, and interest in the world, and, in a moderate degree, the possessions of it, may be most effectually secured by a virtuous course; at least it is seldom or never injurious to any of these.

4. A good man has or may have a source of happiness distinct from all these, in the present views of the favour of God, a confidence in his care, and the prospect of a future state of happiness after death,—by which he may be delightfully supported under those calamities which are common to all; so that the painful sense of them may sometimes be swallowed up in vastly superior pleasure.

5. On the contrary to all this, a wicked man often finds a great deal of uneasiness in his vicious affections and actions, especially in his reflections upon them: he often brings upon himself diseases, infamy, poverty, and various kinds of distress in life, greatly aggravated by the apprehensions of the divine displeasure, and the fears of future evil to arise from it, in this life and in the next.

1, 5. 6. If we consider only the present life, it appears that virtue does ordinarily, on the whole, tend to promote its happiness.

Prop. 82. 7. Though it be granted that, in some extraordinary cases, it may be otherwise than has been represented in the former steps, (vid. Prop. 82. Sch. 1.) yet the future state will abundantly overbalance all the advantages which there may, in any imaginable circumstances, be on the side of vice; even where the most gloomy fears have clouded the virtuous mind on the one hand, or, on the other, the vainest hopes have been entertained by the bad man, his conscience ever so much deadened and perverted, or where his course of prosperity in life has been ever so great.

6, 7. 8. It is on the whole the interest of every man to cultivate virtue in every action. Q. E. D.

Wishart's Ref. Serm. p. 17—29. Hutch. on the Pass. c. 5. Wilk. Nat. Rel. lib. ii. c. i—viii. Gast. Nat. Relig. p. 129—136. and p. 178—181. Puff. de Jure, lib. ii. c. iii. § 14, 15. Shaft. Inq. after Virtue, part ii. pass. Self-Love and Virtue reconciled by Relig. Pope's Ess. Epis. iv. præs. ver. 309—360. Balg. Serm. vol. i. No. iii. Serm. at Boyle's Lect. on the Certainty and Necessity of Relig. Night Thoughts, vol. ii. p. 95—125. No. viii. Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, vol. ii. p. 8—41.

COROLLARY 1.

It must be the interest of every one to prosecute and cultivate the proper means of virtue.

COROLLARY 2.

It must be the interest of every person heartily to repent of every instance in which he has acted contrary to virtue. Vid. Prop. 81. Cor. 4.

SCHOLIUM.

Some have argued the necessary connexion between virtue and happiness from this consideration, That the Divine Being, who is perfectly virtuous, is perfectly happy; so that in proportion to the degree in which any inferior being resembles him in virtue, he must also resemble him in happiness: but so far as this argument is distinct from that stated in the preceding demonstration, it is inconclusive; for if it would prove any thing, it must be, that every virtuous man is, in every moment of his existence, happier than any vicious man is or can be; which seems evidently contrary to fact.

Clergyman's Letter to Dr. Clarke, pass.

LECTURE C.

PROPOSITION LXXXVIII.

It is on the whole for the benefit of societies to cultivate virtue.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 87. 1. It tends to promote the happiness of every individual member; and therefore by consequence of the whole.

Prop. 51. Schol. 2. Virtue teaches each to consult the good of all, and to be willing to resign any private interest of his own to the interest of the society, when it comes in competition with it; so constituting each man in his sphere the guardian of the public happiness.

Prop. 80, 81. 3. Virtue must ordinarily tend to bring down the favour and blessing of God upon societies, to which they must owe their surest foundation and best prosperity; and his interposition may the more reasonably be expected, since societies, as such, have no existence in a future state.

1, 2, 3. 4. Valet propositio.

Clarke's Serm. vol. vi. No. xiv. p. 207—210. 12mo edit.; Works, vol. i. p. 626, 627. Butler's Anal. part i. article 5. c. iii. p. 85—96. edit. 2d. 8vo.

SCHOLIUM.

To this Mandeville has objected, That private vices are often public benefits; and that an universal reformation would necessarily produce the ruin of multitudes of persons and families, who subsist upon the public luxury and debauchery;—but it may be replied,

1. That though some good may arise to particular persons from the vices of others, it does not thence follow that greater might not arise to the whole from common virtues.

2. That virtue would allow the free use of many things, not absolutely necessary to the support of life, yet tending to make it more agreeable; as wine, tea, &c.

3. That public temperance and reformation would prevent the ruin of multitudes of persons and families, which is often aggravated by former splendour, and the consciousness of those extravagances by which they have been reduced, as well as by the additional infamy attending poverty when occasioned by such means.

4. That, during the time that the prosperity of families continues, we shall judge very wrong if we estimate their happiness by their external circumstances, without allowing for the inward temper of their minds,—the happiness of which virtue would always promote, and thereby be a noble equivalent for rendering them something less opulent and magnificent.

5. That the community would be better defended from foreign and domestic enemies by poorer citizens, that were temperate, generous, and courageous, than by the effeminate, debauched, and mercenary; besides all that extraordinary protection, which an universally virtuous people might justly promise itself from Divine Providence.

6. If the history of the most celebrated ancient or modern states and kingdoms be examined, it will be found they have risen by virtue, and fallen by vice, agreeably to our argument in the proposition above, and contrary to those principles which we here oppose.—See (besides Persian Letters referred to, Prop. 51. gr. 1.)

Fable of the Bees, pass. Warb. Div. Legat. lib. i. § 6. vol. i. p. 76—84. Innes on Virtue, p. 99, &c. Browne's Ess. on the Charact. No. ii. § 5. p. 146—158. Law's Theory, p. 135—239. Pinto's Ess. on Luxury, pass.

PROPOSITION LXXXIX.

To take a survey of the state of virtue in the world.

SOLUTION.

1. A great part of the world is overrun with Pagan idolatry and superstition; many of their rites are impious, obscene, or cruel; and as new countries are discovered, new scenes of wickedness are discovered with them; and it is by the way observable, that several of those writers who speak most favourably of the morals of newly discovered countries, have, in other respects, most of the air of a romance.

2. Though it is to be acknowledged that the religious institutions of Christians, Mahometans, and Jews, contain many excellent lessons of morality in all its branches,—yet it evidently appears that, under all these professions, the greatest part of mankind are strangers to real virtue.

3. Those who cultivate it with the greatest care are, in many respects, defective; and far from that perfection which they themselves desire.

DEMONSTRATION.

The proof of all this is too evident, from all the opportunities we have of knowing the moral characters of our fellow-creatures, by reading, travelling, or observation at home.

Watts's Rom. and Rom. quest. 1. 5. p. 32—41. Barrow on the State of Primitive Christians, c. vi. second edit.*

SCHOLIUM.

That the state of things in former ages, even amongst the most polite, learned, and celebrated nations of antiquity, was generally much the same,

* Great additional light has been thrown upon the condition of [illegible] and of all philological materials, in consequence of the [illegible] of voyages and travels to the Chinese empire, and to the [illegible] which have been made and published within the course of the last thirty years.

appears from all the strain of ancient authors: and further from the known lewdness and cruelty of many of their religious rites, the custom of exposing children, and the public spectacles: besides many other things illustrated in Jenk. on Christ. vol. i. p. 353—364. St. Real, vol. i. England's Morals of the Ancients, c. ult. Leland on Revel. vol. i. particularly c. i. 18. 20; vol. ii. part ii. c. iii. &c. Law on the Theory of Relig. part ii. p. 116—124.

COROLLARY 1.

There is great reason for adoring the divine patience, that the earth is still preserved, and made the seat of so much pleasure, considering the exact and circumstantial manner in which God knows all crimes, and the almighty power with which he is always armed to punish them.

COROLLARY 2.

Those who are themselves truly virtuous, have great reason to exert themselves to the utmost to stem the torrent of vice, and to support the interests of virtue, which, humanly speaking, are so weak.

COROLLARY 3.

There seems a great deal of reason to suspect that mankind is degenerated from some better state, in which it may be supposed the race first came out of the hands of so holy and good a Being as the blessed God is; and accordingly, we may observe, among some ancient as well as modern nations, remarkable traditions on that head; which will be more fully considered hereafter.

Howe, vol. i. p. 150, 151. Living Temp. part ii. c. iv. § 7. Cyr. Trav. part ii. Ap. p. 93—99.

COROLLARY 4.

Some further discoveries from the Divine Being seem very desirable, to lead us into the paths of more perfect virtue and happiness;—but the fuller discussion of this will be the business of the next Part of this work.*

* Though many of the books hereafter mentioned have already been referred to in authorial notes, it may not be amiss to give all those in the Lectures on the several branches of Moral Philosophy, to make a general reference to some which would be useful to the student to become acquainted with as far as they go, in the course of his academical studies, and after it more at his leisure and pleasure. The more diligently to prosecute the best sources of information, the more will it be useful to be directed how to read and what to read: things however of this sort are endless, and vast. It is not of so small importance to be master of what the ancients have written on ethical subjects, as of the Greek Aristotle, Plato, Xenophon, Cicero, Cicero Senior, Epictetus Marcus Antoninus, and Plutarch, will deserve to be closely studied. The great body of Christian writers will furnish a vast fund of information concerning almost every moral question, and every part of human conduct. Among foreign authors, it may be sufficient here to mention Grotius, Puffendorf, Barbeyrac, Bynkershoek, and Vattel. The Lectures produced wherein we are immediately concerned, are to Grotius — Rutger Wes-kius on the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion, Dr. Henry More's Enchiridion, Ralph Cudworth on the Laws of Nature, Shaftesbury's Characteristicks, Wollaston's Religion of Nature delineated, Hartley's Observations on Man, Hutcheson's Compendium, and his System of Moral Philosophy, Fellowes Jacob's Demonstration of Christianity from Grotius's Moral Principles of Puffendorf, Cumberland on Natural Religion and Social Virtue, Turnbull's Treatise of Moral Philosophy, Sermons on Virtue and Happiness, Hume's Principles of Morals, Lord Kaimes's Principles of Morality, Tucker's Light of Nature pursued, Priestley's Institutes of Natural Religion, Hutcheson's Dialogues on Happiness, Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments, Dr. Price on Morals, Beattie's Elements of the Science of Ethics, Paley's Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, Gisborne's Principles of Moral Philosophy investigated, Beattie's Elements of Moral Science, and Dr. Ferguson's Principles of Moral and Political Science.

PART V.

OF THE REASON TO EXPECT AND DESIRE A REVELATION; AND THE INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL EVIDENCE WITH WHICH WE MAY SUPPOSE IT SHOULD BE ATTENDED.

LECTURE CI.

DEFINITION LXVI.

THEOLOGY or DIVINITY is that branch of Pneumatology which relates in general to the knowledge of God, but especially to those extraordinary discoveries which he is supposed to have made of himself to mankind; and considers the probability, the certainty, and the contents of them.

SCHOLIUM.

Forasmuch as miracles are generally urged in proof of such extraordinary discoveries, it seems proper here to inquire into the nature, use, and importance of them.

DEFINITION LXVII.

When such effects are produced as (cæteris paribus) are usually produced, God is said to operate according to the common course of nature; but when such effects are produced as are (cæt. par.) contrary to or different from that common course, they are said to be MIRACULOUS.

Campbeare on Mir. p. 6—12. Fleetw. on Mir.

p. 2—5; 8vo ed. p. 22, 23. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 374—376. Clarke and Leibnitz, p. 89. § 17. p. 113. § 43—46. p. 149.

COROLLARY 1.

Nothing can be known to be miraculous till the course of nature has been observed.

COROLLARY 2.

If two opposite effects (cæt. par.) were to be alternately produced, neither of them would be properly miraculous; but the alternate succession of both would make up the course of nature: v. g. if the sun were to arise one morning in the east, and the next in the west.

COROLLARY 3.

When the course of nature can be but imperfectly known, in particular instances we may be incapable of pronouncing in many respects concerning certain remarkable events, whether they be or be not miraculous.

COROLLARY 4.

A miracle contains no greater exercise of divine power than an operation according to the course of nature. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 371, 372.

COROLLARY 5.

Miracles are possible in general, (Cor. 4.) and possible in any given instance, when the wisdom of God does not require that the course of nature should be preserved; which it is impossible for us to know that it always does.

It has indeed been asserted, that it is most honourable to God to suppose that he at first lays down the best possible laws, from which therefore it would be a defect of wisdom to deviate: but it may be answered, That, at least for any thing we know, the best possible scheme may be that in which there shall be some deviation from the stated rules, provided always that those stated laws be generally so far observed, as that men may know what it is their duty to do, and what consequences are generally to be expected from their actions, which is apparently the case.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 376, 377. Conybeare's Serm. on Mir. p. 12—17. Butler's Anal. part. ii. c. ii. Macknight's Truth of the Gospel History, c. iv. § 2. Campbell on Miracles, against Hume, part. i. Price's Dissert. No. iv. pass. Douglas's Criterion. Hartley on Man, vol. ii. prop. 28. Adams on Miracles, part 1. Hume's Essays, No. x. part. 1.

PROPOSITION XC.

To consider some other definitions which celebrated writers have given of miracles.

SOLUTION.

1. Mr. Locke defines a miracle to be "A sensible operation, which, being above the comprehension of the spectator, is, in his opinion, contrary to the course of nature, and taken by him to be divine."

Locke's Works, vol. ii. p. 270. fol. ed.

But on this account of the matter, every juggling trick which I cannot understand, will, while my ignorance continues, be a miracle to me. In answer to this, Locke urges, that if this definition be not taken, we can never know what a miracle is; because no man is acquainted with the whole course of nature; but though we acknowledge that great part of it is unknown, yet so much may be known, as that some instances may plainly appear to be above it; v. g. recovering the sight of the blind, or the life of the dead, by a word speaking, or multiplying bread, so that one loaf should serve a thousand men, and more be left at last than there was at first. Besides this, the extraordinary works apprehended to be done by evil agents would not be miracles on this definition.

Locke's Post. Pieces, p. 217—220. Chandler of Mir. p. 9—11.

2. Many others define a miracle to be "An extraordinary operation, above the power of all created beings, and performable by God alone."

But this definition either goes on the false supposition of such a proper agency in the creature, as is inconsistent with Prop. 32.; or else supposes, contrary to fact, that we know the utmost limits of the power of created agents, allowing that to be called their power which is usually communicated to them.

Limb. Theol. l. i. c. ii. § 17. Chand. on Mir. p. 11. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 372.

3. Dr. Chandler says, "A miracle is an action done, or an operation visibly performed, by any being, which is really and truly above the reach, natural power, and capacity of that being who does it of himself, and likewise without the assistance of some superior agent to perform."

This definition seems liable to the following objections:—

1. It supposes created beings capable of doing something of themselves, and without the assistance of any superior agent, contrary to Prop. 32.

2. It makes it impossible for God to perform a miracle without the interposition of some creature.

3. It supposes that it would be no miracle for God to send an angel to relieve a starving man, to open the prison doors, or even to roll back the sun in his course, supposing I know the angel so employed to be ordinarily capable of producing such an effect; whereas in truth, here would be a miracle, in suffering an angel in such a manner to act out of his usual sphere, though not beyond his common strength. Chand. of Mir. p. 13—19.

Dr. Hutcheson's definition, "That it is a work far exceeding human power, yet performed by the command or upon the volition of a man," nearly coincides with this of Dr. Chandler's; and is equally liable to the 2d and 3d objection.

Hutch. Mor. Synops. p. 89: p. 222, 223. 2d ed.

1. Dr. Clarke's definition of what he calls a theological miracle, includes several particulars in it, which may more properly be examined hereafter.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 382, 383.

5. According to Dr. Sykes, "A miracle is a designed effect, sensible, unusual in itself, beyond the art and power of man to do;" and he expressly declares against defining it an event contrary to the course of nature: but to this it may be objected,

1. That if he does not by the word unusual, mean as much as beyond the course of nature, its being unusual is of no importance at all to prove any thing miraculous, as in the instance of the first parhelion.

2. If by sensible be meant something made known in consequence of a sensation excited by external objects, distinguished from the inward perception of impressions upon our minds, it is no way essential to constituting a miracle.

3. That the expression of designed is either superfluous or improper, since considering it as the work of God, every thing is designed; and if it might happen without human design, it might still be miraculous; as if health should unexpectedly be restored, while another person was praying for it.

Sykes of Mir. p. 16—28.

6. Dr. Chapman defines it, "An unusual and sensible event, most evidently either in the matter or manner of it, above the power of all natural material causes, and the art of man, to produce."—To this it may be objected,

1. Against the words sensible and unusual, as in the last step, No. i. ii.

2. That an event may really be a true miracle, though it is not most evidently so.

3. That it seems to intimate a distinction between natural and supernatural material causes; not to urge that a material cause can only be a passive power, nor to insist upon it, that it may be questioned whether dreams be not miracles upon this supposition; so that here, as well as in other instances, what is superadded to our definition appears to be an incumbrance rather than an advantage.

Chapman's Essaies, vol. i. p. 72—76.

LECTURE CII.

DEFINITION LXVIII.

A DIVINE REVELATION is a discovery of some proposition to the mind, which came in not by the usual exercise of its faculties, but by some miraculous divine interposition and attestation, either mediate or immediate.

SCHOLIUM.

We shall endeavour in the following proposition to prove that a revelation is possible, (Prop. 91.) that it is desirable, (Prop. 92.) and that there is some reason to hope that God will grant it (Prop. 93.); and then shall more particularly examine with what kind of internal and external evidence we may reasonably suppose that it should be attended.

PROPOSITION XCI.

A divine revelation is a possible thing.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. God may, for any thing we can certainly tell, think proper to make some discovery to his creatures of what they did not before know, or what by the use of their faculties they could not find out.

Prop. 31. 2. Since God is almighty, we may assure ourselves, that he who has given us a power of communicating our ideas to each other, cannot be at a loss for some proper method to make it apparent to his creatures that it is he who speaks to them.

3. The pretences that have from time to time been made to divine revelation, and the ready reception they have many of them met with, plainly show that the greater part of mankind have thought it not impossible.

1, 2, and 3. 4. A divine revelation is at least a possible thing. Q. E. D.

Tillots. vol. iii. p. 441, 442. Conybeare on the Credib. of Rev. p. 17. Leland's Advant. of Rev. vol. i. p. 17—27. Farmer on Miracles, c. i. § 2. p. 24.

SCHOLIUM.

It would be most absurd to object, That God's goodness will oblige him to give his creatures by their natural faculties the knowledge of all that it is necessary for them to know, and that his wisdom will prevent his miraculous interposition to discover unnecessary things; for both these propositions universally taken are false. For since it is as easy for God to communicate knowledge to us by revelation as by the use of our natural faculties, we cannot say universally that he must make man in such circumstances as that no revelation should be necessary; much less, that he can never suffer him to fall into such circumstances. On the contrary, on the first formation of mankind, (when that experience which now instructs us in so many things of the greatest importance could not possibly be our guide,) it seems that some revelation was necessary with relation to his food; for surely, unless human nature were then vastly different from what it is now, appetite would have been but a very uncertain and dangerous rule: and it is certain, that the giving necessary intimations by revelation rather than by reason, would in some views be an additional favour, as it would so much the more sensibly illustrate God's care of his creatures, and inspection over them; which, though it might be solidly reasoned out on principles laid down above, might become more obvious in this case, at least to weaker minds. Nor is it, on the other hand, true that God bestows on his creatures nothing that is unnecessary; if by unnecessary be meant, what in the present connexion it must mean, only something without which they might have enjoyed some considerable degree of happiness sufficient to overbalance the evils to which they are exposed,—nothing is more evident than the contrary, i. e. that God has consulted our convenience and delight in numberless instances.

Delany's Rev. Examined, vol. i. p. 2, 3. Leland against Tind. c. i. ii. iii. Ditto on the Advant. and Necess. of Rev. vol. i. p. 48—51. 4to edit. Hartley on Man, vol. ii. Prop. 27.

LECTURE CIII.

PROPOSITION XCII.

The circumstances of mankind are such, as to render a divine revelation highly expedient and desirable.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. In the generality of mankind we too plainly see such indolence with regard to the things of religion, such strong passions, such early prejudices, and inveterate habits of vice, as render them very unfit for an impartial inquiry after divine truth.

2. The greater part of mankind, even those whose morals are least vitiated, are so entangled in secular cares, that they have little leisure for long and laborious inquiry.

3. It appears by the preceding parts of this work, that it is a very laborious and difficult task to trace out the great principles of natural religion in their due connexion and evidence.

1, 2, 3. 4. It is not to be expected that many will undertake it for themselves, or that if they do, they will succeed in it.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 273—278.

5. There are some points, which the most diligent and impartial inquirer will find it hardly possible to clear up to himself, especially those relating to the pardon of sin, and the complete happiness of a future state. Prop. 82. Schol. 3. Prop. 83. Schol. 5.

6. Of those things which such an inquirer may be able to clear up to himself, there will be many which it will be difficult to communicate to others, considering how abstruse many of his arguments will be, on the one hand, and on the other, that indolence, prejudice, and secular cares, will in their degree hinder the generality from inquiring into truth proposed by others, as well as from discovering it for themselves.—Vid. gr. 1, 2.

7. Could the great doctrines of religion and rules of morality be settled, and proposed, and taught ever so plainly, and inculcated ever so frequently, it would nevertheless be exceedingly difficult to enforce the practice of them. The credit of the person proposing them would do little, considering the pride of the generality of mankind, and the difference which might probably happen among those who should undertake to instruct others: and we have before (Prop. 77.) proved it not to be the business of the civil magistrate to establish religion by force; and it is certain, if he should attempt it, he could not by his secular power produce any single action truly virtuous, considering how much depends upon the temper and intention with which an action is performed. Prop. 49. gr. 1, 2.

4, 5, 6, 7. 8. A revelation seems in theory highly expedient, and in a manner necessary to bring men to the knowledge of natural religion, and the practice of virtue. Comph. Scrm. on Rev. p. 1—28.

Prop. 89. 9. If we consult fact, we shall find the ancient and modern world overrun with error, superstition, and vice.

10. Though there have been in the Heathen world some excellent teachers of morality, yet the number of those who have in good earnest set themselves about it has been but small; and some of those few have been entirely ignorant of some things necessary to be known, and very dubious about others, concerning which they had some glimmering of knowledge: where they appear to have been certain themselves, they have often been unable to advance a clear and distinct proof; and even where proofs have been most clear and distinct, they have wanted authority to enforce their instructions and precepts, so that they have availed but little to reform those parts of the world where they dwelt; of which the remarkable wickedness of Greece, in the age of Socrates and Plato, is a very melancholy instance; as that of Rome, in the days of their best moral philosophers, also was.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 281—302. Jenk. on Christ. vol. i. p. 364—376. 384—389; in edit. 5. part iii. c. v. p. 367—379. 387—392. Duc. Plato, vol. i. Intr. p. 7—9. Fiddes on Mor. Virt. c. xix. Chandler of Mor. p. 65—77. Camph. on the Necess. of Revelation, passim. Leland on Life of Rev. vi. ch. 10. 12. 21. Prov. Syst. vol. i. No. xx. p. 450—464. Leland's View, vol. ii. p. 192—195. Monthly Review, vol. xi. p. 99—105.

8, 9, 10. 11. Experience joins with theory, to prove a revelation so necessary to bring mankind to the knowledge and practice of virtue, that little is to be expected without it.

12. A revelation may make the knowledge of what the light of nature might discover to every man, more plain, easy, certain, and affecting; not to say that there may possibly be some things beyond the discovery of our unassisted reason, which might prove cogent motives to virtue.

Prop. 87, 88. 13. The knowledge and practice of virtue is necessary to the happiness of private persons and societies.

11, 12, 13. 14. A divine revelation is, in the present circumstances of mankind, highly expedient, and therefore greatly desirable. Q. E. D.

Fost. against Tind. p. 12—24. Camph. Necess. of Rev. pass. prax. c. v. vi. Watts's Strength and Weakness of Human Reason: Works, vol. ii. Hodges's Sermons, No. xiv. p. 297—309. Leland's Advant. of Rev. vol. ii. p. 27—39.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The proposition may be illustrated (and especially pr. 10.) by observing, that the most celebrated lawgivers of antiquity have thought it necessary to profess some intercourse with Heaven, in order to enforce their laws, though many of them were armed with secular power; as appears, not only in the instances of Moses, but also of Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Solon, Lycurgus, Seleucus, Numa, Hermes Trismegistus, Orpheus, Suphis the Egyptian, Minos, Zamolxis the Getan, Woden the Saxon, Melesagoras the Eleusinian, Zathraustes the Arismaspian, Mango-Copal the Peruvian, and Phoe the Indian; to which we may also add, Amasis, Mncvis, Radamanthus, Triptolemus, Zaleucus, Lycaon, Romulus, and Sertorius.

Shuckford's Conn. vol. i. p. 319—323. Temple's Misc. part ii. Ess. ii. p. 87—89. Lucas's Inq. vol. i. § 2. c. iii. p. 108, 109; p. 79. 7th edit. Customs of Ind. and Jews compared, p. 56, 57. Collier and Bayle in Nom. Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. p. 101—109.

It may not be improper to observe, by the way, that whereas the rise of superstition is generally ascribed to the priests, it appears in fact, that princes and legislators, under pretence of inspiration, as well as by other methods, were the chief agents in introducing it into the world, as is with great accuracy and learning shown at large by Chand. against Morg. part ii. § 15. vol. i. p. 556—580. Phil. to Hydaspes, part iii. p. 48, 54.

LECTURE CIV.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To the reasoning in the demonstration above, it is objected, by the author of Christianity as old as the Creation, That natural religion is so plain, as to need no explication; and so perfect, as to admit of no addition. Tind. of Christianity, c. ii. vi.

SCHOLIUM 3.

To the first of these assertions it is answered, That the differences there have been between many learned philosophers, about many branches of natural religion, do evidently prove it not to be so plain as is here supposed: and indeed this hypothesis would entirely supersede all human as well as divine teachings: and as to what is said of the perfection of it, we reply, that if natural religion only mean that which in the most extensive sense may be called the law of nature, i. e. the obligation on a rational agent arising from the whole nature of things, (Def. 62. Schol.) though the assertion be true, it is nothing to the present purpose; but if we mean by it merely the light of nature, (Def. 62.) then the assertion is evidently false, being contrary to fact; but if it be a sort of medium between both these, i. e. that rule of life, to the knowledge of which men might attain, if they would in general use their faculties well,—then it seems that it is neither so perfect nor so plain as to supersede the usefulness of a revelation, though it should, on the other hand, be granted not to be so imperfect and obscure as to render it universally of absolute necessity.—On the whole, Tindal is very little consistent with himself, when, shifting between these different ideas, he sometimes insists on such a perfection of it, as is inconsistent with any tolerable degree of plainness; and sometimes on such a plainness as must suppose it very imperfect.

Camph. against Tind. p. 134—138, or Leland against Tind. p. 4—10. vol. i.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is objected further, That it seems injurious to the divine goodness, to suppose that God has suffered mankind to fall into such deplorable circumstances as the proposition represents. We answer,

1. That the proposition does not assert mankind to be left under an absolute impossibility of obtaining virtue and happiness.

2. That to leave men in great danger of error and vice, and that in such a degree, as will in fact, though not necessarily, prove fatal to many, is certainly consistent with the divine perfections, because we plainly see it to be done; and is a difficulty by no means peculiar to those that believe revelation, but common to all that believe the goodness of the Deity; and what Tindal says of the great evil of superstition, which he supposes worse than Atheism, joined to the charge of superstition which he brings against the whole Christian world, serves yet more to illustrate and confirm this reply.

3. To suppose the light of nature ever so perfect, will not infer the circumstances of mankind to be less deplorable: for the degree of wickedness, and consequently misery, prevailing in the world, being in other respects the same, will be aggravated in proportion to the degree in which their light and advantages are supposed perfect.

Tind. Christianity as old, &c. p. 173, 174. Fost. against Tind. p. 64—70, 73—77.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is objected nearly to the same purpose as before, That if a revelation were thus expedient, it must have been universal,—there being no imaginable reason why God should give it to some rather than to others. Reserving this to be more fully considered elsewhere, we here answer,

1. Since, on our principles, God was not obliged in strict justice to give it to any, he could not be obliged to give it to all.

2. That though we cannot tell why one nation should have it rather than another, there is no reason to be surprised at such a distinction, considering in how different, and to us unaccountable, a manner, all must acknowledge the means of virtue and happiness to be dispensed among the children of men.

3. That it is a very supposable case, that if ever God gave a revelation at all, suited to the general use of mankind, it was with such circumstances, that its not having an universal spread, was owing to the folly and wickedness of men: nay, it is a very possible case, that God may already have given an universal revelation; i. e. a revelation made to the human family when very small, the tradition of which has been lost through their own folly, though their happiness might have been greatly promoted by keeping up the memory of it.

Blount's Orac. of Reas. p. 211, 198, 199. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 315—318. Fost. against Tind. c. ii. p. 78—86. Butler's Anal. part. ii. c. vi. Sykes on Mic. p. 217—229. Law's Theory of Religion, part i. Balguy's Tracts, p. 324—334. Second Letter to a Deist.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Those who assert a revelation to be so absolutely necessary, that every man, how well soever he uses his reason, must inevitably perish without it, generally ground that assertion, not on principles of natural religion, but on those passages of Scripture which relate to the necessity of faith in Christ, which cannot here be properly examined.

Jenk. Reas. of Christianity, vol. i. p. 2—14.

LECTURE CV.

PROPOSITION XCII.

There is some reason to hope that God will grant a revelation.

LEMMA.

It is to be observed, that we are far from saying that a man could have any certainty in this point; but a probable hope might be produced by the following considerations.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 92. 1. The circumstances of mankind greatly need it.

1. 2. The general goodness of the Divine Being may lead us to expect it; and it seems probable that God would not have suffered mankind to have fallen into so great apostasy, unless he had intended them such an assistance.

3. The provision which God has made in the natural world for removing bodily disorders, gives us some additional reason to hope that he will not be altogether regardless of the much more dangerous diseases of the mind.

Prop. 92. Schol. 1. 4. The pretences to a Divine Revelation, which have been often made, and one and another of them so readily received, even sometimes upon very slender evidence, plainly show that men have thought a revelation probable; and perhaps we may add, that there would not have been so many counterfeits if there had been no true coin.

5. Some of the ancient philosophers, and especially Socrates and Plato, though they did not believe the pretences to revelation made by their priests, yet hoped that such a favour would be given to mankind, and express their comfortable expectation of it.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6. 1. Ut proposition.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 304—310. Jackson's Chronology, vol. ii. sub finem. Apud Monthly Review, vol. vii. p. 47, 48.

SCHOLIUM.

It may perhaps be objected, That since mankind brought themselves into these deplorable circumstances by their own fault, there is the less reason to expect any extraordinary assistance.

Ans. We allow that no particular person can have any assurance that God will favour him in this manner; but since it is certain that God confers many unmerited favours upon his creatures, and that in the natural world many remedies are provided for evils which men bring upon themselves by their own folly, this objection will not overthrow the preceding argument.

DEFINITION LXIX.

That MIRACLE is said to be UNCONTROLLED, the apparent design of which is not evidently contraducted, either by the absurdity of the thing it is intended to prove, or by some at least equal miracle opposed to it.

Chand. on Mir. c. iii. Sykes on p. 130—134.

SCHOLIUM 8.

A man may be said to perform miracles in proof of a doctrine, when he asserts the doctrine, and then works the miracle as an immediate confirmation of it; or when he does publicly and frequently assert himself to be a teacher sent from God, and appeals to a train of miracles to show that he is so: for in that case such miracles (if they be allowed to be any proof at all) do prove particular facts or doctrines asserted by him, even though no miracle be distinctly applied to such particulars.

Fleetwood of Mir. p. 120, 121, 220—228. Works, p. 144, 159, 160. Farmer on Mir. p. 515—521.

PROPOSITION XCIV.

When a man performs evident and uncontrolled miracles as a proof of any doctrine, virtue requires those who have sufficient evidence of the reality of such miracles, to admit of the doctrine as true.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 91. 1. God may see fit to reveal some things to his creatures, not discoverable by their natural light.

1. 2. God's wisdom will require him to reserve to himself some certain criteria, by which his own testimony may be known and distinguished by us.

Prop. 32. and Def. 67. 3. A miracle cannot be performed without an extraordinary divine interposition, either mediate or immediate.

3. 4. If God would confirm the truth of a proposition to one man, by the testimony of another to whom it was immediately revealed, we can think of no method by which he could do it in so effectual a manner as by giving him a power to work a miracle in confirmation of it.

Def. 69. 5. When a miracle is uncontrolled, we can imagine no circumstance by which it can be distinguished from a miracle wrought to confirm a truth.

4, 5. 6. If God were to suffer an uncontrolled miracle to be wrought in confirmation of a falsehood, it seems he could have no criterion by which his testimony could be distinguished.

2, 6. 7. It is inconsistent with the wisdom of God, to suffer an uncontrolled miracle to be wrought in confirmation of a falsehood.

6. 8. It would also be inconsistent with his goodness,—seeing it would leave his creatures in a perpetual and melancholy uncertainty as to the truth of any pretended revelation from him: an uncertainty that would be most painful to the most virtuous and religious part of mankind.

7, 8. 9. Seeing God is both wise and good, we may depend upon it that a proposition attested by uncontrolled miracles is attested by him.

Prop. 79. 9. 10. Seeing God is true, virtue will require us to admit of a proposition so confirmed. Q. E. D.

Barrow's Works, vol. ii. p. 214—216. Locke's Post. Works, p. 219—222. Works, vol. iii. p. 453. edit. 3. Chand. on Mir. c. ii.

SCHOLIUM 1.

We have not mentioned that additional confirmation which may arise to the proposition, from the regard which men in all ages and nations seem to have paid to miracles, as the surest proof of a Divine Revelation; that fact having been disputed, especially of late, by the learned and ingenious Mr. Weston, though some considerable stress is laid upon it by Bishop Atterbury, in the place quoted below; and Mr. Comber has laboured to show that miracles were greatly regarded by the Gentiles. It is observable, that few of the legislators mentioned above, (Prop. 92. Schol. 1.) though they pretended to revelations, (which by them must have been supposed miracles, see Def. 68.) ventured to prove the truth of them by professing a power to work miracles. Nevertheless, though the pretended miracles of the Heathens were seldom proposed as in proof of any doctrine, (as will be further noted,) yet there was a sort of accidental credit derived to Heathen establishments by such pretensions to them, which occasioned the multiplication of those pretences in opposition to Christianity; and is a proof, after all, that miracles were not disregarded by the Pagans in general; as, considering the constitution of human nature, it would be strange if they were, at least by those who were themselves eye-witnesses of them, and that in instances where the facts could not be disputed. Attack. Post. Serm. vol. i. p. 207—210.*

LECTURE CVI.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To this it is objected, That if we believe the Bible, we shall find that it is not only supposed there that miracles may be wrought in proof of a falsehood, but it is expressly asserted to have been fact in one case, and foretold as what shall certainly be in others. Deut. xiii. 1—5. Matt. xxiv. 24. 2 Thess. ii. 9, 10. Exod. vii. and viii. To these texts it has been answered by some, That they, especially the first, may be only hypothetical by others, That all the wonders here spoken of are tricks, and not real miracles.

* Weston, chapter xiii. on the Cause of the Reverence of the Ancients for Miracles. In the Heathens it was, what can [illegible] the Case of the Egyptians, but in some measure [illegible] The [illegible] were generally esteemed to be [illegible] [illegible] the Egyptian Sorcerers, a book of fables.

which may be true of 2 Thess. ii. 9.; but the justest answer seems to be, That none of these are supposed to be uncontrolled miracles, but to be sufficiently confuted, either by the apparent absurdity of the thing they attempted to prove, or by other more and greater miracles wrought on the contrary side; and it is to be remembered in this view, that Matt. xxiv. 24. refers to the apostolic age; so that all the miracles of those false Christs were directly opposed by the sum of all those wrought in the very same time in proof of Christianity.

Tillots. Serm. vol. iii. p. 499, 500; Serm. 175. edit. 4. p. 476, 477. Limb. Theol. lib. iii. c. xvii. § 2. Electus. of Mir. p. 173—209. Works, p. 152—157. Chapman's Eusebius, vol. i. p. 119—127. Sykes of Mir. p. 170—179. Jortin's Rem. on Eccles. History, vol. ii. p. 32—36.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Bishop Fleetwood's singular solution of the miracles of the Egyptian Magi, may be seen at large in Fleetwood, ib. p. 52—61; Works, p. 134, 135. Shuckf. Connect. vol. ii. p. 412—433.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Others assert that by stating the case as in the proposition above, we fall into a round of proving the doctrine by the miracles, and the miracles by the doctrine; but the contrary is plain: for though we readily allow that nothing apparently contrary to the light of nature can be proved by a miracle, yet we maintain that many doctrines, of which the light of nature could give us no information at all, and in which, even when proposed, we can see no innate mark of truth, may be proved by miracles: it being sufficient in this case to render the proof valid, that no apparent absurdity attend the doctrine to be established by them, where there are no contrary miracles to be compared with them; nor could miracles, according to us, in any imaginable case, be proved by the doctrine, be it ever so apparently true.

Electus. on Mir. p. 169—173. Works, p. 151, 152. Hoadly's Tracts, p. 26—28. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 383—385. Bishop Sherlock's Discourses, vol. i. p. 303, 304.*

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is further pleaded, That any one miracle is as good a proof of Divine interpositions as a thousand; and that all miracles are as to their evidence equal, since no work can to the Divine Power be greater or less than another. We answer, Though all things be equally easy to God, yet there are some of his works which appear to us more grand and magnificent than others, and more indubitably miraculous: and the story of the Egyptian Magi, before referred to, plainly shows there may be circumstances by which one miracle may appear evidently to triumph over another; in which case, it seems that all the evidence arising from the opposite miracle is in a manner even transferred to the victorious side.

Electus. ib. p. 30—37, 81—85, 211—214. Works, p. 131, 132—138, 157, 158. Hoad. Tracts, p. 5—16. Locke on Mir. p. 233—241. Works, vol. iii. p. 453, 454. edit. 3.

SCHOLIUM 6.

It must be granted that the evidence of miracles seems so strong, as to render it highly probable that God will not suffer it to be applied in proof of a falsehood, without appearing by miracle to turn the balance on the side of truth: for should he suffer them often to be profaned, to confirm what is evidently contrary to the principles of natural religion, or common sense, they would gradually grow into such suspicion and contempt, as we can hardly suppose his wisdom would permit; and the more illustrious any miraculous fact in question appears, the stronger will this argument be.

Champ. Euseb. vol. i. p. 89—93, 96—116.

SCHOLIUM 7.

It is further objected, That this method of stating the doctrine of miracles renders them of no use; but not to repeat what was said in answer to the objection in the 4th Schol. which is nearly equivalent to this, it is most evident they may, on this hypothesis, serve to awaken attention: to illustrate the goodness of the Deity, when they are of a benevolent kind, and in all instances, his power, and thereby impress the consciences of men with sentiments of religious reverence and awe; to command respect to the person speaking, who might otherwise, especially if in circumstances of external meanness, appear pragmatical and usurping; to increase the evidence of some things which may be less certainly known by natural light; and to discover many others, which though not contrary to reason, are not discoverable by it, nor capable of receiving immediate evidence from it.

Foster against Tind. p. 56—63. Lardn. Past. Serm. vol. i. p. 210—216. Jortin's Remarks, vol. ii. p. 3.

SCHOLIUM 8.

It appears from the survey we have now been taking, that the question, Whether evil spirits, if such there be, may work miracles? is not of so great importance as some have represented it; since it is certain that, on the principles of the proposition, God will not suffer them to work unconfuted miracles; and if any such should be wrought in proof of a falsehood, changing it upon an evil spirit would by no means remove the difficulty, since such a spirit could act no otherwise than by a divine

* We should here distinguish, says Mr. Mercier, between miracles we perceive by ourselves, viz. those of revelation, and those we hear of, by which we beg miracles, viz. those of natural religion.

energy communicated to him (Prop. 32.) Nevertheless, if a miracle were ever wrought which was controlled by the absurdity and wickedness of the doctrine to be proved by it, or by a series of opposite and greater miracles, in that case, it seems more congruous to the Christian scheme (if there appear to be reason for admitting it) to ascribe such miracles to the power of evil spirits, than to speak of them as the work of God. Vid. 2 Thess. ii. 9. Acts xiii. 10. Job ii. 7. compare Rev. xiii. 2, 14. Vid. Prop. 32. Schol. 3.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 318—322. Jortin's Remarks, vol. ii. p. 3. Farmer on Christ's Temptation, p. 25—27. *

LECTURE CVII.

DEFINITION LXX.

That is called the INTERNAL EVIDENCE of any revelation, which is drawn from the consideration of those declarations and doctrines which are contained in it; and that is called its EXTERNAL EVIDENCE, which arises from some other circumstances referring to it, v. g. predictions concerning it, miracles wrought by those who teach it, its success in the world, &c.

PROPOSITION XCV. †

To inquire what kind of internal evidence we may probably expect to find in a divine revelation. ‡

LEMMA.

Let it be observed, that the divine revelation of which we here speak, is supposed to be one intended for the benefit of mankind in general, and introduced as that in which the whole scheme of revelation terminates; for otherwise it must be acknowledged that there may be particular revelations on different occasions, which may be very credible, though not attended with all those internal evidences: nor could it be expected that every discovery which God makes of himself to any particular person or nation, should answer all these characters.

SOLUTION.

1. We may be sure it can contain nothing apparently contrary to the light of nature,—because that is the law of God, (Def. 61.) and he is too wise and too faithful to contradict himself.

2. It may be expected that it should further confirm some important truths known by the light of nature, and clear up the difficulties which hang on some articles in which our happiness is much concerned; particularly, that it should give us firmer assurance of the pardon of sin in a way consistent with the divine justice, and that it should discover more of a future state of happiness, perhaps also of the entrance of sin and calamity into the world.

3. It may very probably contain a discovery of some doctrines as well as facts, which, though not inconsistent with our natural light, are not discoverable by it.

4. As it is very probable that much of it will relate to the Divine Being and his operations, it is to be expected that, though some additional light may be given us as to many things concerning him, yet these discoveries may be connected with further hints relating to what is yet unknown; so that there may be many things in it beyond our adequate comprehension, or, in other words, some things mysterious. Vid. Prop. 18. Cor. 3.

5. Nevertheless, we may conclude that the most important things will be plainly revealed; so that every honest inquirer may come to a full satisfaction about them.

6. The end of all must be to subserve virtue, and so to promote the happiness of mankind; and those additional discoveries beyond what the light of nature could have found out (supposed gr. 3.) will no doubt centre in this, and not tend merely to amaze our minds and excite our curiosity.

7. Considering how greatly and how universally pride prevails in the minds of men, how detrimental it is to almost all the branches of virtue, and how much it taints and debases many actions which would otherwise be the most excellent, as likewise how ill it becomes any creature, and especially a mortal and a sinful creature, it is exceedingly probable that the whole series of a divine revelation will evidently tend to exalt God and to humble man.

Tillots. vol. iii. p. 442, 443. Dod. x. Serm. No. viii. p. 203—211. Duchal on the Presumptive Evid. of the Christ. Relig. p. 111—118. Butler's Anal. part. ii. c. iii.

* Most of the considerations to which these words refer are amply collected by Mr. Farmer in his Dissertation on Miracles.

† This and the seven following Propositions seem much to illustrate each other. It would, perhaps, have been better to have united them in one discourse; but as I had formed them into distinct lectures before I was aware of the connection, and especially as I thought the subject of Inspiration deserved a more particular consideration than it could have had, if it had been only a part of a discourse, I chose to let them stand as they were originally delivered. I hope that the reader will not think the repetitions which are found in them too frequent, because the same things are often introduced in the illustration of different propositions. Some of the considerations in the following lecture have been taken from Dr. Sykes's Connection of Natural and Revealed Religion, and from Leland's View of the Deistical Writers, and Dr. Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel History; but the greatest part of the whole is entirely my own.

‡ See note on Dr. Sykes's book on the external and the external evidences to be supposed in a divine revelation, with additional observations on Dr. Leland's book on Divine Inspiration, part the second.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is objected, That on these principles a revelation must be needless,—since a man must understand the principles of natural religion before he can judge of a revelation; and if he can judge of these, he does not need a revelation.

To what is said in Prop. 94. Schol. 7. we may here add the following remarks:—

1. We allow that the being and truth of God must be known, before we can judge of the internal evidence of a revelation as above.

2. That nevertheless a revelation may improve what is known, correct mistakes, and excite men by proper motives to the practice of virtue, which they generally need more than merely to be instructed in its nature.

3. That a revelation may be a means of leading a person into the knowledge and belief of those doctrines which must be believed before that revelation can be admitted; v. g. miracles may convince an Atheist of the being of a God.

4. That the report of a revelation, and some probable external evidence of its truth striking the mind, may lead into more attentive reflection on the principles of natural religion; and thereby further promote the knowledge of them, and make way for a rational admission of the revelation itself, with a regard to its internal evidence as now better understood.

5. That the evidence with which a revelation is attended may further convince even a wise and good man of those things which he before believed, and on the belief of which he admitted the revelation as probably true; v. g. remarkable appearances of God may further prove his particular providence; and the accomplishment of prophecies and threatenings may introduce a further and more lively conviction of his truth. To which we may add,

6. That the whole objection is founded upon an evident mistake; since it lies against all methods of instruction whatsoever, and might be applied even to mathematical treatises; as it might be said they cannot improve reason,—since we must by reason judge whether the arguments are conclusive.

Tind. of Christianity, p. 369. edit. 1. p. 77—82; 2nd edit. former part of c. xiv. p. 335. Fost. against Tind. p. 41—51. part i. Leland against Tind. vol. ii. p. 95—100. Butler's Anal. part. ii. c. i.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It may be questioned, Whether a revelation is to be admitted, which commands an action forbidden by the general rules of morality, v. g. to kill an innocent child, or put a whole nation of men to the sword.

Ans. 1. That cannot be a divine revelation which requires any thing which, all things considered, is in present circumstances evil.

2. It is difficult for us to say that such actions as those here mentioned are in all cases and circumstances unlawful, or even that human sacrifices are universally so; because it is possible they may be for the public good; and God, whose views are infinitely more extensive than ours, might see them to be so in circumstances when we could not possibly discern it.

3. Upon the whole, therefore, we must judge by comparing the evidence on both sides; and if, in any given instance, we have a stronger evidence that God requires a thing, than we have, on the other hand, that in present circumstances it is an evil,—we are then to believe it good, and to obey the revelation requiring it; depending upon it that God will, one way or another, interpose, to prevent such an issue of the affair, as it would be contrary to his perfections to permit.

Chubb's Prem. Quest. pass. Butler's Anal. part ii. c. iii. p. 267, 268, 8vo edit.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Considering how liable the human mind is to mistake, great care should be taken that we do not admit any principle as certain which may really be doubtful, with respect to natural religion; lest, trying revelation by this complex notion as a standard, we should reject any thing that is really authentic, and sufficiently proved to be so by external evidence. This therefore is to be diligently attended to upon the principles laid down above, and one part of the internal evidence weighed against another, as well as the sum of both with the external, in order to form a right judgment.—See Prop. 120. § 1. 5.

LECTURE CVIII

PROPOSITION LXXI.

Those are called POSITIVE INSTITUTIONS OR PRECEPTS, which are not founded upon any reasons known to those to whom they are given, or discoverable by them, but which are observed merely because some superior has commanded them.

COROLLARY.

It is plain that positive precepts may be distinguished from arbitrary precepts, i. e. those which are founded upon the mere will of the commander, and for which he himself can see no reason.

Clough against Tind. p. 155—157. Mann 1-9. p. 15, 16. Heliet on Script. vol. iii. p. 187—191.

PROPOSITION LXXII.

There may be positive institutions in a religion of which God is the Author.

OBSERVATIONS.

1. There are various relations of things unknown to us, and beyond the discovery of our natural faculties.

1. 2. It is possible those unknown relations may render some things fit to be done by us, which we cannot see ourselves under any obligation to.

Prop. 33. 3. These are most clearly known to the Divine Mind.

1, 2, 3. 4. God may have sufficient reasons, to us unknown, for appointing such particular actions, which we could not otherwise see ourselves obliged to.

5. There may be, in other instances, a general reason for appointing some test of our obedience, when there is no peculiar reason for preferring one to another.

6. Humility, and consequently virtue, may be, in some circumstances, more effectually promoted, when we are required to obey commands founded on reasons unknown to us, than if those commands carried their own apparent reason along with them; and it may be with this view that God sees fit to conceal from us the foundation of the commands in question.

7. Civil governors may make laws founded on reasons unknown to their subjects, and proper to be concealed from them.

8. God, as our Creator and constant Benefactor, has a right to command us incomparably superior to that of any civil governor.

9. Circumstances of worship will appear more solemn, when considered as matters of divine institution, than merely as matters of human invention; and a greater solemnity may thereby be added to the worship itself; by which means they may have a remoter tendency gradually to promote those several virtues, which such acts of religious worship are intended to subserve.

4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9. 10. There may be positive institutions in a religion of which God is the Author. Q. E. D.

Caugh. p. 158—170. Fost. against Tindal, p. 281—284.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it is objected, That forasmuch as God is unchangeable, (Prop. 30. Cor.) his will and our duty to him must always be the same.

Ans. Our general duty will always be the same; but the particular expressions of it must vary as our circumstances vary: nor is there any change in the divine will implied in such a variety, or in his giving new commands to us, when these new circumstances arise, more than there is in his producing new creatures.

Tind. ib. p. 20. Sect. p. 118. c. x. Caugh. ib. p. 170—174. Fost. ib. c. iv. p. 288, 289.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is also objected, That it is inconsistent with the divine wisdom to command indifferent things as necessary. It is answered, They are not commanded as necessary, i. e. as morally and universally so, though in the present circumstance they may be expedient; and if they could never in any instance be expedient, they would not be indifferent, but universally and morally evil, contrary to the hypothesis.

Tind. ib. p. 131, 132. Caugh. ib. p. 174—177.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is said to be inconsistent with the goodness of God to fetter our liberty, and thereby impair our happiness, by requiring things under certain penalties, which we might else have been excused from; and that this will turn a revelation into a curse instead of a blessing.

To this it is replied,

1. It is not granted that every positive institution as such does necessarily impair our happiness, whether by restraining our liberty, or by multiplying our care in observing them; for the pleasure a pious mind will have in resigning to God's will some of its enjoyments, and in finding itself continually employed in his service, may upon the whole make the observance of such positive precepts more delightful than a freedom from them.

2. The tendency these things may have in their consequences to promote virtue, may, on the whole, be vastly more than an equivalent for present pleasure forborne, and labour and difficulty incurred.

3. If, on the whole, these positive precepts did diminish our happiness, a revelation, of which they are a part, might contain such advantages of another kind, as on the whole to make it a great blessing; nor can it by any means be proved that every thing which God requires of us must immediately promote our happiness, any more than that all he appoints in the course of his providence must have this effect.

Tind. ib. p. 123 and 131. c. xi. Conybeare, ib. p. 177—182. Limb. Collat. ap. Specт. vol. iii. No. 243.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is objected, That it is self-contradictory to suppose God should forbid that by a revelation, which he has allowed by a natural law.

Ans. 1. No natural law allows it in such circumstances, as those in which it is by a revealed law forbidden; i. e. when God has expressly determined a case, in itself indifferent.

2. On the same principles, all those civil laws are to be condemned, by which things are forbidden which are not directly contrary to the law of nature.

Mass. Disc. p. 52. Fost. against Tind. p. 285—288.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is also objected, That positive precepts overcharge the mind, and so lead to the neglect of moral virtue; and that if people come to believe these things good for any thing, they will soon suppose them good for every thing; i. e. place the whole of their religion in them, considering how prone men are to superstition. Prop. 76. Schol. 7.

Ans. 1. There is no arguing against the use of a thing from the possibility of its being abused; for then all the entertainments and supports of human life must be condemned.

2. It is reasonable to believe, that if God gives a revelation in which positive precepts are contained, he will take proper care to distinguish them from the great precepts of moral virtue.

3. A few positive precepts, given in a revelation, declaring the rule of faith and practice, may more effectually prevent the increasing and idolizing such observances, than if none at all had been appointed.

Tind. of Christianity, p. 123, 124. Gough against Tindal, p. 182—193. Mann Arg. p. 48—51. Fost. against Tind. p. 282—303.

COROLLARY.

It appears from this survey of the subject, that the insertion of some positive institutions, in a proper manner moderated, and declared subordinate to the precepts of moral virtue, is so far from being an objection against such a revelation, that it is rather to be considered as an additional part of its internal evidence; especially considering, that as a divinely instituted religion will probably require some association of its professors, there must, in the nature of things, be some form of entering into that association, and of maintaining a profession of continued adherence to it; which will have evident advantages, if supposed of divine appointment.

Butler's Anal. part ii. c. i. p. 215—217. 8vo edit. Lett. to Wallace, p. 8—11. Answer, p. 27—33. Leland against Tindal, vol. i. p. 51—92. Lett. of Posit. Inst. prefixed to Leland, vol. ii.*

LECTURE CIX.

PROPOSITION XCVII.†

To inquire into the external evidence which may probably attend a revelation.

LEMMA.

It is to be observed, That we do by no means limit the Divine Being to all the circumstances here mentioned; but only remark, that if a revelation offered should seem to be attended with such circumstances in conjunction with the above-mentioned internal evidences, each of these circumstances would concur to recommend it to our candid and diligent examination.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. We might reasonably suppose, that at least most of the persons chiefly employed in the first publishing the revelation would be persons of piety and virtue; otherwise, we could neither imagine that God would favour them with such extraordinary discoveries of himself, nor could we depend upon their veracity in reporting them to us: yet we cannot say that it is necessary that all the persons so employed, if there be a considerable number of them, should be good men, and much less that every one of them should be freed from every degree of sin, though perhaps, if any one person is to bear a much greater part in the revelation than the rest, he may be so distinguished.

Tind. ib. p. 8 and 244; 8vo. p. 219. Foster against Tind. p. 113, 114. c. iii. p. 112, 113. Leland, ib. vol. ii. part ii. c. ii. p. 36—38, 42—53; 2d ed. p. 28—31, 39—43.

2. It is possible that some superior spirit (vid. Prop. 86.) may be employed as a messenger from heaven to bring this revelation; and if he should not only make a transient appearance on earth, but take up his abode here for a considerable time in a human form, giving an example of the most perfect virtue, we must acknowledge the circumstance extremely well chosen, and worthy the divine wisdom, though we cannot pretend it to be of absolute necessity.

3. We may reasonably depend upon it, that the chief messenger, if such there be, or others commissioned by him, will, at the first publishing of such a revelation, be endued with a power of working evident, uncontrolled, and probably, most of them beneficial, miracles,—they being not only a very solid proof of a divine mission, (Prop. 94.) but, upon many accounts, the most plain, popular, and convincing, and best suited to the bulk of mankind,—for whose benefit no doubt a revelation would be calculated.

Atterb. Serm. vol. iii. p. 217—222.

4. It is probable that the chief persons employed in opening such a revelation may appear in plain and low circumstances of human life, rather than with princely grandeur; since in this view their testimony might be less suspected of being a political contrivance, and their example would be more instructive to the generality of mankind. Nor is it on the whole incredible that such persons, notwithstanding their own virtue, should be despised and persecuted, and perhaps put to death, for their attempts to reform the world: if this were the case,

* Rather affixed to volume the first, but it is not in the second edition. S

† See the note on Prop. 95.

they would give a most edifying example of suffering virtue, and an evidence of the integrity of their character and testimony to all ages, beyond what we could conceive in other circumstances. And though, for this reason, God might probably leave some of them to die by their enemies' hands, yet it is not unlikely, but in some remarkable instances he might interpose for the delivery of his servants in their extremity, either rescuing some of them by miracle, in order to their further usefulness, or perhaps raising them from the dead.

Plato de Rep. lib. ii. ap. Dod. x. Sermon, p. 206, edit. 1: p. 131, edit. 4. Fost. against Tind. p. 317, 318. Elem. Christol. vol. ii. p. 51—53, 76—85.

5. It is not improbable that a revelation should be gradually introduced, and the expectation of mankind awakened by predictions and previous miracles, before the greatest scene of all be disclosed: this is analogous to the usual method of divine operation in the works of nature, and would lay a foundation for a very convincing additional evidence of the truth of the revelation, if it should appear that a variety of different persons, of different ages, and perhaps different countries, had been led by the providence of God and his influence on their minds, to carry on their proper distinct parts of one harmonious design, the connexion of which was unknown to each of them.

Barrington. Ess. on Div. Disp. Pref. p. 22—28. Butler's Anal. part ii. c. vii.

6. It is probable that God may bear further witness to such a revelation, by giving it at first remarkable success, notwithstanding strong opposition, and though it may be destitute of human support; and by making it visibly effectual for reforming the characters of its professors. Such facts might be capable of most convincing proof to future ages; on which account they seem peculiarly proper.

7. Forasmuch as miracles would lose much of their force, if they were frequently to be repeated for a long succession of ages, it is not reasonable to conclude that such a revelation would always be attended with the same degree of sensible evidence with which it was at first introduced into the world: it is more natural to imagine that God would take care that the first publishers of it should deliver in writing the history, purposes, and contents of the revelation, and that their books should be transmitted to posterity with such kind of evidence as other ancient records have.

8. It is probable, that if this method of transmitting a revelation be taken, Providence may so order it, that the evidence of the main facts on which it is built shall, at least in part, be drawn from the testimony and confession of those by whom it was opposed: at least we must confess that this would be a strong additional medium of proof.

Dod. x. Sermon, No. viii. p. 215—218. edit. 2: p. 206—208, edit. 1.

LECTURE CX.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The principal objections against the preceding solution, are those which affect the seventh step of it: we shall therefore, in the following Scholia, give a view of the chief arguments brought against the supposition of such a traditional revelation, (as Tindal, though with some partial ambiguity, has affected to call it,) and propose the most obvious answers to them.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is objected, That forasmuch as the credibility of any testimony is impaired by passing through a number of hands, all the evidence which any traditional revelation can be supposed to have, must in time be utterly worn out.

Ans. 1. Where the testimony of any traditional witness gives indubitable persuasion, the credibility of the thing testified suffers no diminution by passing through his hands; and the credit universally given to many facts in ancient history, proves that the decrease is exceedingly small, even in a long succession of ages, when the intermediate witnesses are faithful, careful, and knowing.

2. That a tradition preserved by writing, is evidently less liable to corruption than that which is merely oral; since when the facts are once recorded, there is no room left for a failure in memory,—to which alone the mistakes of honest men will be owing in transmitting a testimony.

3. That the agreement of various witnesses, and many of them in separate interests, concerning such a revelation, may be more than an equivalent for the little defects mentioned above.

4. That the success of a revelation, or the accomplishment of some prophecies contained in it, and the illustration of many other branches of internal evidence, relating to the characters of historians, mutual connexion, and correspondence of facts, &c. on the principles of the fifth step, may give it such an increase of evidence as shall abundantly overbalance all that it can be supposed to lose, by being transmitted through many hundred years.

Tind. ibid. p. 185. 4to: 8vo, p. 163. 12mo, p. 165—168. Fost. against Tind. p. 92—96. Leland. ib. vol. ii. p. 113—119. Wash. Div. Leg. p. 1—3. vol. i. Comber against Weston. Append. Jennings Log. Prep. xvii. xviii. Ditt. on Resur. part. ii. Prop. xv. xvi. Elem.

ming's three Monuments, confirming three plain Facts, passim.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is also objected, That there are so many forgeries of books pretended to be ancient, that it is a difficult matter to distinguish the genuine from the spurious; and that since the bulk of the common people have neither leisure nor ability to manage an inquiry of this nature, if they receive a traditional revelation, it must be by an implicit faith in the testimony of those who are the teachers of that religion; so that in reality they believe not GOD, but the priest.

Ans. 1. It is universally allowed, that learned men may have sufficient evidence as to the genuineness of ancient books, and therefore of those which contain the substance of a supposed revelation: and as it is highly probable, in the nature of things, that books of this kind would early pass into many hands, and be examined with the utmost rigour, and preserved with the greatest care, the evidence of their being genuine might (cæt. par.) be much greater than could be obtained as to any other books of equal antiquity.

2. Though the common people cannot of themselves enter minutely into the proofs, yet they may have some opportunity of gaining rational satisfaction, by consulting persons of learning and seeming integrity, not merely among the priests, but the laity; and by reading books that give a view of the argument, in which they may reasonably take it for granted, that especially in a learned and inquisitive age, no man will cite vouchers notoriously false.

3. They may compare writers on both sides, if the revelation be opposed; and perhaps may see, from the manner in which the opposition is made, what may greatly confirm them in the truth opposed.

4. A person that cannot read himself, may get some valuable treatises read over to him, perhaps again and again by different persons, whose partiality he has no reason to suspect, and concerning whom he might be confidently sure they read what was before them.

Tind. ib. p. 232—234. 4to; p. 209—212. 12mo. Fost. ib. p. 171—174, 178—182. Main Arg. p. 67—72. Dodd. First Lett. to the Author of Christ. not founded, &c. p. 52—56. Benson's Reas. of the Christ. Rel. part ii. Dial. 4. pres. p. 144, 145, 153—155.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is objected, That the common people cannot be sufficient judges of the faithfulness of a translation, which yet is necessary in order to their understanding a traditional revelation depending on books, and designed for the use of various nations. We reply,

1. That though we acknowledge they cannot be so entirely satisfied as those who understand the original language, (which should recommend the study of the original to those who can conveniently engage in it,)—yet the unlearned may very cheerfully depend upon the testimony of persons of acknowledged ability and known integrity, who have diligently compared the version with the original, and declare it as a fact on their own knowledge, that it is in the main agreeable to it.

2. Such a testimony acquires a very strong additional degree of evidence, when persons of different parties and sentiments in religion agree in allowing the same version; and when the originals are in the hands of those who are its greatest enemies.

Main Arg. p. 73. Dod. x. Sermon. No. viii. p. 228—231. edit. 1.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is further objected, That there will be difficulties in the most literal and faithful translation of any ancient book, and in the original itself, arising from the different genius of languages; and especially if it be an oriental book, from the strong figures with which it will abound.

Ans. 1. Figurative language is not always obscure.

2. It is reasonable to suppose, that if God sees fit to communicate a revelation by books, he will take care that the most important things shall be expressed in such a manner, as to be very intelligible in a literal translation.

3. The objection here urged would equally affect all ancient books.

Fost. against Tind. p. 186—191, 194. Main Arg. p. 74, 75. Leland against Tind. vol. ii. p. 232—246.

SCHOLIUM 6.

To get clear of all these objections against a traditional revelation, some have asserted, That we may reasonably suppose that, if God communicates a revelation from age to age, every particular person will have the truth of a revelation so proposed immediately discovered to him by some divine agency on his mind; though perhaps this may be an argument only for his own use.

It cannot be denied that such an immediate impulse on the mind of each individual is possible to Divine Power: but this manner of stating the case supposes the revelation to be a personal thing; so that those who have never experienced any thing of this kind, would probably look upon it as an enthusiastical pretence. Yet we may perhaps reasonably admit, that where men lie under great disadvantages for receiving the ordinary proofs, God may by some secret influence so dispose their minds, as that the internal evidence of a revelation, and its visible effects, shall produce a very strong degree of assent, though they are forced to take up with very slender external proofs: to which we may add, that God can, if he pleases, order such a correspondence between certain events in his providence, and certain impressions on the mind made in consequence of the supposed truth of a revelation, as shall greatly confirm the faith of the inquirer, and be almost equivalent to miracles wrought for his conviction; though he may not be able to make these things out fully to another. And if, on the whole, the belief of any revelation produces a virtuous temper, the great end of it is answered, even though the person so influenced and reformed by it may not be able to give a rational account of the grounds of this assent, or may build it upon some weak arguments.

Lett. to Wallace, sub fin. Christianity not founded on Arg. pass. Dod. Ans. No. i. pass. p. 11—32. Law's Theory, p. 18—23.

SCHOLIUM 7.

On a survey of the whole argument, we must confess that a traditional revelation will be attended with some difficulties and some defects; and that those who have it, will not enjoy altogether the same advantages with those to whom the revelation was originally given: nevertheless, it seems reasonable to conclude,

1. That strong degrees of internal evidence, and an experience of the reforming power of any religion upon the minds of its professors, and especially on our own, will make up the deficiency of some degree of external evidence, which might otherwise be very desirable: more especially when, on the one hand, it concurs with some remarkable personal experiences, (as above, Sch. 6.) and, on the other, there are no strong circumstances of suspicion attending what external evidence there is; v. g. the vices of the author of that revelation, its being first introduced by sanguinary methods, its acknowledging the want of miracles, or pretending to such as are palpably ridiculous, &c.

2. That if God gives a traditional revelation, he will give such evidence of one kind or another, as shall be sufficient to convince every honest and candid inquirer.

3. That it by no means becomes us to prescribe to God what further degrees of evidence, beyond what is barely sufficient for this purpose, shall be given to any revelation.

4. That a mixture of obscurity, either in the proof or contents of a revelation, may perhaps have its use; particularly to humble men's minds, and to serve as a touchstone, by which their true character may be distinguished.

Grot. de Verit. lib. ii. c. xix. Dodd. Third Lett. ib. p. 57—59. Butler's Anal. part ii. c. vi. p. 226—235. 4to; 333—344. 8vo.

SCHOLIUM 8.

In this argument, it may be very proper to review that excellent abstract of the controversy between Tindal and his antagonists, which is given in Main Arg. p. 77—86.*

* The Main Argument, (the whole of which I have read and recollect, as I passed that way in my childhood,) is a piece of real merit, and well worthy a careful attendance. The time of its appearance, I do not exactly know; the preface is dated [illegible]. A considerable number of answers were published to it, both in prose and verse, and the controversy was a considerable one. See Biog. Brit. [illegible]

PART VI.

IN WHICH THE GENUINENESS AND CREDIBILITY OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT ARE ASSERTED AND VINDICATED

PROPOSITION XCVIII.

Christianity is not a modern religion; but was maintained and professed by great multitudes quickly after the time in which Christ, its supposed founder, is said to have appeared, i. e. in the days of Tiberius Cæsar.

* See a good view of this argument, and of the various objections to it, in Dr. Jortin's Reflections on Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study of History, p. 102—129. 8vo. Also Jortin's Tracts.

LECTURE CXI

DEMONSTRATION

1. There is a series of books written by Christian authors, who are said to have lived, some in the first, some in the second, century, besides a multitude in those that follow; concerning the genuineness of which we have as much satisfaction as concerning that of any other ancient writers, whether Jewish or Pagan; particularly Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, and Polycarp, in less than a hundred years after the time mentioned; Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus Antiochenus, in less than 200 years; for accounts of whom see any historical dictionary;—not to mention a great many others whose books are now lost, but whose writings are mentioned by Eusebius and other ancients, by whom also some considerable fragments of them are preserved; of whom see Prop. 101.

2. Some of the most ancient Jewish books, said to have been written about these 1700 years, expressly mention the Christians, and bitterly inveigh against them.

Lardner's Jewish and Heathen Test. vol. i. c. vii. § 1; Works, vol. vii. p. 187—189.

3. It plainly appears that Celsus, Porphyry, Hierocles, Julian, and many other heathen writers, assaulted Christianity with great bitterness; and several fragments of their writings are preserved in those of the Christian apologists, by whom they were answered, and whose pieces are allowed to be genuine, though many of the heathen originals are unhappily lost.—Their antagonists were Origen, Methodius, Eusebius, Gregory Nazianzen, and Cyril.

Lardner's Jewish and Heathen Test. vol. ii. c. xvii. vol. iii. c. xxxvii. § 9; Works, vol. viii. p. 1—5, 220—226.

4. Tacitus assures us, that in Nero's days there was a multitude of Christians, not only in Judea, where he tells us that religion began, but in Rome; against whom Nero raised a persecution, attended with such circumstances of ignominy and cruelty, as moved the compassion of their enemies; intimating also that this was not the first attempt to crush that sect.

Tacit. Annal. lib. xv. c. 44. Lardner, ib. c. v. § 2; Works, vol. vii. p. 253—255.

5. Suetonius also expressly mentions the punishment inflicted upon the Christians by Nero.

Sueton. Nero, c. xvi. Pfitsc. Innot. in Loc. Lardner, ib. c. viii. § 3; Works, vol. vii. p. 266—268.

6. Pliny, junior, informs Trajan at large of his proceedings against the Christians in Bithynia; and after having borne a very honourable testimony to the morality and virtue of their character, says, "That multitudes of both sexes of persons of every rank were infected with this superstition, which was got into villages as well as cities; so that, till he began to put the laws in execution against them, the temples of the heathen deities were almost deserted, and few could be found to buy victims for them. Plin. Epist. lib. x. Ep. 97.

To which we may add the answer of the emperor to him, forbidding the Christians to be sought out, —but commanding them to be punished if they presented themselves (ib. Ep. 98.); and also the epistle of Tiberianus, governor of Palæstina Prima to Trajan, on the same subject, and nearly parallel to this of Pliny, which is preserved by John Malala, in the second book of his Chronicles, and published by Archbishop Usher, in his Appendix Tiberiana, to the genuineness of which nothing can be reasonably objected; so that it is strange that so many who collect testimonies of this kind, should have entirely omitted it.*

Nearly akin to this also is the letter of Serrenius Granianus, proconsul of Asia, to Adrian, with the rescript of Adrian himself, in favour of the Christians, mentioned by Justin Martyr, and also by Melito, as quoted by Eusebius.

Bisco at Boyle's Lect. p. 449, 450. Euseb. Hist. lib. iv. c. viii. ix. and xxvi. Just. Mart. Op. p. 99, 100. Lardner, ibid. c. ix. § 3. c. ii. § 2, 3; Works, vol. vii. p. 291—294, 358—364. Jortin's Remarks on Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 82, 83.

7. Lucian expressly mentions the Christians, as performing some extraordinary works, as resolutely bearing some extreme sufferings, as expressing a great contempt of heathen deities, and as remarkable for their mutual charity, as well as for the prophets and the missionaries of their churches; and though the author of the Philopatris be not certainly known, it is undoubtedly a very ancient piece, in which Christians and their affairs are expressly mentioned in a great variety of circumstances.

Moyle's Works, p. 261—263. Powel. Works, vol. i. p. 285, &c. Huet. Dem. Evang. p. 41, 42. Prop. 101. § 20, ad fin. Lucian de Mort. Peregr. ap. Op. vol. ii. p. 365—367. Pseudomant. ib. vol. ii. p. 419—423. Bisco at Boyle's Lect. p. 450, 451. Lardner, ibid. c. xix. passim. Works, vol. viii. p. 60—81.

8. Marcus Antoninus expressly mentions the Christians as examples of an obstinate contempt of death; and in his Constitutions to the Community of Asia (quoted from Melito, who wrote in this emperor's time, by Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. iv. c. xiii.) speaks of the Christians as having for a considerable time been persecuted even to death. See also Justin Martyr's Apology to M. Anton. ap. Op. p. 101, 102. To which we may add, that Epictetus is generally supposed to have referred to them, when he speaks of the fortitude with which the Galilæans endured the severest torments; and Galen, the celebrated physician, in the second century, uses the obstinacy of the Christians in defending their tenets, as a proverbial expression.

* [illegible] Lardner's Works, vol. viii. p. 60—81.

Marc. Antoninus, lib. xi. c. iii. Clerici Hist. Eccles. p. 543. Arr. Epict. lib. iv. c. vii. p. 400. Lard. Heathen Test. vol. ii. c. xxi. c. x. § 6. c. xiv. § 3. c. xv. § 2; Works, vol. viii. p. 90, 91. vol. vii. p. 354—357. 390—393. 398—406. Mosh's Post. Works, vol. ii. p. 93—96. 243—255. Mosh's Discourse, in the Theological Repository, vol. i.

9. Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with Trypho, mentioning the practice of the Jews to curse the Christians in their synagogues, charges it upon them as a known fact, "That after the death of Christ, and while Jerusalem was yet standing, they sent out chosen men from them into all the world, to inform them that the new sect of the Christians was an atheistical sect; expressly to contradict the doctrine of Christ's resurrection and ascension, and to warn them in the most solemn manner against receiving it."

Just. Martyr. Trypho, p. 169—171. and 368. edit. Thirlb. Lardner's Cred. vol. i. lib. i. c. viii. § 2; Works, vol. i. p. 171, 172.

10. The same Justin Martyr, not much above 100 years after the death of Christ, declares it as a notorious fact, "That there was no nation of men, whether Greek or Barbarian, not excepting even those wild stragglers, the Amaxobii, and Nomades, who had no fixed habitation, who had not learned to invoke the One Father and Former of all things, in the name of Jesus who was crucified;" and though one may allow something hyperbolical in the expression, it must undoubtedly contain a most important testimony to the fact asserted in the proposition, parallel to which is a celebrated passage in Tertullian, referred to below.

Justin Martyr, Trypho, p. 388. Thirlb. edit. Tertul. Apol. c. XXXVII. ap. Op p. 30. Lyc. Reeves's Apol. vol. i. p. 323—326. Macknight's Truth of the Gospel History, book iii. c. iv. § 1. p. 189—195.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is observable, that most of these writers, at the same time that they mention the Christians as a body of men then in being, do also mention the persecutions they endured; an important fact, which is also further confirmed by the apologies of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Minucius Felix, Athenagoras, and Origen; which are undoubtedly to be reckoned among the most valuable remains of antiquity.

Dodd. Ten Serm. No. viii. p. 226—230. Cave's Primitive Christianity, p. 17—30. Macknight, ib. § 2. p. 195—209.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It seems exceedingly probable, that when Seneca, Caput Amicat. Cr. Dei vi. 11.; Tacitus, Dio, Nicomatian, and other Pagan writers, speak of the vast increase of the Jewish sect, about their age, and of the severe punishments inflicted upon them for their religion, they do at least include, if not principally refer to, the Christians, whom they looked upon as a branch of the Jews; because the founders and first teachers of Christianity were by birth of that nation.* Huet. Dem. Prop. 3. § 21. p. 42.

LECTURE CXII.

PROPOSITION XCIX.

There was such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, the founder of the Christian Religion; and he was crucified at Jerusalem about seventeen hundred years ago, i. e. during the reign of Tiberius Cæsar.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 98. 1. There were a multitude of men who called themselves by the name of Christ, and professed the religion which he was said to have founded, a little after the time in which we assert that he lived.

2. We can never imagine they would have done this, especially at so great a hazard of their possessions and their lives, (Schol. 1.) if they had not been well assured that he was a real person, and not merely a fictitious name.

3. Tacitus expressly says, "That he was the author of the Christian name, and that he was put to death by Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator for Tiberius Cæsar."—Tacit. Ann. lib. xv. c. 44.

And Pliny, in the passage quoted before (Prop. 98. qr. 6.) asserts, "That the Christians sang a hymn to Christ as to a God."

4. The primitive Christians appeal to the acts of Pilate, as giving an account of the innocence and death of Christ; and though we readily allow those now extant to be spurious, yet we can never think such writers would have made such appeals, especially to the very persons in whose keeping these monuments were, (if they were at all,) had they not been satisfied of their existence and contents.†

Justin Mart. Apol. p. 76. c. 64. e. Tertull. Apol. c. XXI. Dissert. on the Resurrection, p. 416—420. edit. 1732. p. 467—470. p. 354—362. of edit. 1720. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. p. 608—624. Fabricius, Cod. vol. ii. p. 298—301. vol. iii.

* Mr. Mosheim has taken a most [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible] ...

p. 455—465. Addison of Christianity, c. i. § 7. Jortin's Remarks on Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 2—4.

5. It is very probable that Suetonius refers to Christ, when he says, "That Claudius Cæsar expelled all the Jews from Rome, on account of the tumults which they raised, impulsore Christo," i. e. probably, on account of Christ, whom it is certain they often called Christus. – Compare Acts xviii. 2.

Sueton. Claud. c. xxv. No. xii. Pitisc. Not. in Loc. vol. i. p. 689. Vand. de Orac. p. 604—607. Lardner's Cred. vol. i. lib. i. c. ii. § 3; Works, vol. i. p. 246, 247. vol. vii. p. 266, 267. Wits. Melctem. de Vit. Paul, § 7. No. ii. iii. Usher's Ann. Jul. Per. 4767. Dodd. on Acts, ch. 18. ver. 2.

6. Ælius Lampridius assures us that the emperor Alexander Severus entertained such high thoughts of Christ, that he would have admitted him among the number of his deities, and built a temple to him, had not his Pagan subjects vigorously opposed it.

Spart. de Vit. Serv. c. xxix. and xliii. Lardn. Heath. Testimonies, vol. ii. c. ii. § 4. vol. iii. c. xxxv.; Works, vol. vii. p. 361—367.

7. Porphyry also, though an inveterate enemy to Christianity, not only allowed that there was such a person as Christ, but honoured him as a most wise and pious man, translated into Heaven, as being approved by the Gods; and accordingly quotes some oracles, referring both to his sufferings and virtues, with their subsequent rewards.

Euseb. Dem. Evang. lib. iii. p. 134. Lardner's Heath. Test. vol. ii. c. xxxvii. § 10; Works, vol. viii. p. 176—248. præsertim, p. 226—248.

8. Celsus likewise mentions numberless circumstances in the History of Christ, (indeed so many, that an abstract of the Christian History might almost be taken from the very fragments of his book preserved by Origen,) and never pretends to dispute his real existence, or the truth of the facts.

Ancient Univ. Hist. vol. xv. p. 247. 8vo edit. Lardner's Heath. Test. vol. iii. c. xviii. § 4, 5, 12, 13; Works, vol. viii. p. 5—69. præsertim, p. 18—43, 57—69.

9. Hierocles also, under the fictitious name of Philalethes, in a book which Eusebius has expressly quoted and largely answered, speaks of Jesus as extolled by the Christians as a God, for giving sight to the blind, and doing some other wonders of that kind; and also speaks of Peter and Paul, as crying him up in so extraordinary a manner: though he foolishly endeavours to show that Apollonius was equal and even superior to him; of which we shall afterwards treat.

Euseb. Dem. Evang. p. 512. cont. Hier. sub init. Lardner, ib. vol. iii. c. xxxix. § 2, 4. Works, vol. viii. p. 254—266. See Proposition 113. Scholium 5.

10. It is a most notorious fact, that (so far as we can learn) the enemies of Christianity never disputed the existence of such a person as Christ, nor his dying as his followers assert; but, on the contrary, upbraided them with it as their greatest reproach; the Jews calling him, in derision, תלוי, i. e. the crucified person, and his followers צבורי תלוי; and many of the Heathens, particularly Lucian, deriding him as a crucified impostor; and Julian himself, who was one of the most learned as well as the most inveterate enemies against Christianity, though he had himself been educated among the Christians, and therefore probably knew this religion thoroughly, never goes about to dispute this fact; but owns, not only the being, but, as we shall afterwards observe, the miracles, of Christ.

Buxt. Lexic. Tal. in תלה. Lucian de Morte Peregr. ubi supra. Ditton on the Resurrec. part iii. § 3, 8. Chapm. against Mory. vol. i. p. 364, 365. Lightf. Hor. Heb. on Matthew xii. 24. Lightfoot, apud Opera, vol. ii. p. 189. Josephi Antiq. lib. 18. c. iii. § 3.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. 11. Valet propositio.

SCHOLIUM 1.

We do not here argue from that celebrated passage, in which Josephus bears such a remarkable testimony to Christ.

Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. c. iv. § 33; c. iii. § 3, p. 798, Hudson's edition.

It is most certain that it is to be found in all the manuscript copies of Josephus, and that it was very early quoted by the Christian fathers, particularly Eusebius and Jerom. The two chief objections are,

1. That neither Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Cyprian, nor even Photius, in his extracts from Josephus, have cited it; but this negative argument against fact is not much to be regarded, especially considering that Justin argues only out of Scripture, and never mentions Josephus: that Tertullian, in his controversial writings, deals chiefly with Gentiles: that Cyprian does not professedly write in defence of Christianity; and that Photius's extracts from Josephus are very imperfect. It is with more weight objected,

2. That the encomium upon the character and miracles of Christ is so great, that Josephus must have been a Christian, or he could not have written as he did. To this Lardnerus answers, That his words are to be understood comparably, and really contain a severe sarcasm; and Mr. Whiston, that Josephus was a Nazarene, Ebionite, or Jewish Christian, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem; but Mr. Martin maintains that Josephus, being a pensioner of the Roman court, and seeing Domitian some thing alarmed with the prophecy of the Jewish Messiah, for his own security and that of his people, chose rather to represent the matter, as if that Messiah had already appeared, but through the mistake of their priests been rejected: but none of these things seem, upon the whole, a sufficient account of it: so that if he really wrote it, he must have been inwardly convinced of the truth of Christianity; and wanting courage openly to profess it, left this testimony, perhaps in the last copies of his Antiquities, in some measure to quiet his conscience, for not having more generously and faithfully pursued its dictates.

As for the other passages in Josephus, relating to the death of James, the brother of Christ, Antiq. lib. xx. c. viii. it is of much less importance in the present question; but what Origen quotes as from him, concerning the death of that righteous man being the cause of the destruction of the Jews, it is nowhere to be found in Josephus, and seems to have been a slip of Origen's memory.—Vid. Huds. Notes in Loc. p. 896.

Hingt. Prael. ad Jos. Ed. Cal. prim. p. 25, &c. Dutton on the Resurrect. part iii. § 1—7. Huet. Dem. Evang. Prop. iii. § 11—18. p. 31—39. Martin's Diss. pass. Whist. Jos. Diss. i. and vi. Chapman against Morg. vol. i. p. 386—389. Orig. cont. Cels. lib. i. p. 35. Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. ii. c. 23.*

SCHOLIUM 2.

It may be asked, Why facts of so great importance are not more frequently mentioned by ancient historians, whether Jews or Heathens? To this it is answered,

1. That many books written in that age are lost; in which it is very possible some mention of these facts might be made.

2. That of the few remaining historians, who wrote about that age, most of them were by their subject otherwise engaged.

3. That several of those facts relating to Christ and his miracles, coming from the Jews, would be slighted by the Gentile writers as fabulous, especially considering, on the one hand, how common prodigious and magical stories were, and, on the other, how superstitious and credulous the Jews were thought to be.

4. That the first appearance of the Christian scheme would shock them, as seeming so improbable, and so contrary to their received maxims, that it is no wonder if many of them cared but little to inquire into evidences and facts relating to it.

5. Many of those who did inquire, no doubt became Christians: and therefore their testimony is not here reckoned.

6. The facts mentioned above, as recorded by some, are such as on the whole it was most reasonable to expect that they, continuing enemies, should know, observe, and mention.

Addison on Christianity, c. i. § 2—6: c. ii. § 1.

2. Jacks. Cred. vol. i. c. xi. xii. ap. Op. vol. i. p. 38—44. Lardner's Jew. and Heath. Test. vol. ii. c. xxii. § 3; Works, vol. viii. p. 94—97.

LECTURE CXIII.

PROPOSITION 1.

The first publishers of Christianity wrote books containing an account of the life and doctrine of their Master: several of which bore the names of those books which now make the New Testament.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The great importance, of which the primitive Christians at least apprehended the facts and doctrines of their religion to be, (as appears by the extremities they endured for their profession of it.—Vid. Prop. 98. Schol. 1.) would engage them to take the most effectual care they could to transmit the memory of it to future ages.

2. The age in which they lived was one of the most learned ages of antiquity; nor was there any, in which books were more common in the countries where they flourished.

1, 2. 3. It is exceedingly probable, in the nature of things, that there were some such ancient books as the proposition asserts.

West on the Resurrection, p. 308—318.

4. Writers of great antiquity do expressly mention four books, written by the disciples of Christ, whom they call Evangelists, and some of them do particularly name Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John as the four. Jones on the Can. part iv. Introduction.

5. Eusebius, the most accurate historian among the ancient Christian writers, mentions it as a fact well known, and asserted particularly by Origen, a still older writer, that the Four Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, the Epistles of St. Paul, and of Peter, and one of John, were universally received by the church; and he calls them ἀναντίῤῥητα ἀναντιῤῥήτως and ὁμολογούμενα, as not being able to find they had ever been disputed; and though the Acts are not expressly mentioned in this catalogue by Origen, Eusebius himself, in the passage referred to in the next step, declares that he hath no scruple concerning it; and it is certain, from many passages in Origen's works still extant, that he paid the same regard to the Acts as to any other book of the New Testament: nay, in the close of the passage referred to below, he also mentions them incidentally as written by Luke.

Biscoe at Boyle's Lect. vol. ii. p. 507—509. Euseb. Eccles. History, lib. iii. c. xxiv. lib. vi. c. xxv. Lardner's Cred. part ii. vol. iii. p. 234—237. vol. viii. p. 90—96; Works, vol. ii. p. 165—168. vol. iv. p. 224—228.

6. Though the other seven books of the New Testament, i. e. the epistle to the Hebrews, the epistle to James, the 2nd of Peter, the 2nd and 3rd of John, Jude, and the Revelations, were disputed, (and therefore called by Eusebius ἀντιλεγόμενοι,) yet he tells us they were at length introduced into the canon, i. e. into the number of those books which Christians regarded as the rule of their faith and manners, and which they distinguish from other books, written by persons whom they thought less eminently under the divine direction, whatever their sanctity might be.

Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. iii. c. xxv. Jones on the Can. vol. i. p. 23—27. Jenk. on Christ. vol. ii. p. 116—118. Lardner's Cred. vol. viii. p. 97—104; Works, vol. iv. p. 228—234.

7. We shall endeavour to show at large, in the following proposition, that at least all the most important of those books were either expressly quoted by name, or plainly alluded to by a series of primitive writers, several of them much more ancient than Eusebius; and indeed, that there is hardly any writer of Christian antiquity who has not either some express reference or allusion to some of them.

3, 4, 5, 6, 7. 8. Valet propositio.

SCHOLIUM.

Whereas Mr. Toland, in his Amyntor, and several other writers, have taken great pains to show that there were many ancient books; some of which are pretended to be still extant, but are evidently spurious, which yet are quoted by several writers of the primitive church with great regard; whence no doubt he will lead his reader to infer, that little regard is to be had to their opinion on this head; we shall not enter into the particulars here, but leave the reader to judge, by those passages referred to by Toland, compared with those enumerated below, as to the different manner in which they mention confessedly fictitious writers, and those of the New Testament: but the fullest and best account of this matter that I know of, is to be found in Lardn. Cred. of Gosp. Hist. part. ii. vol. i. and ii. pass; Works, vol. ii. p. 11—363. and in Jones's Hist. of the Can. vol. i. and ii. pass. Toland's Amyntor, p. 28—68. Nye on the Canon.

LECTURE CXIV.

PROPOSITION CI.

To take a more particular survey of what the most considerable ancient ecclesiastical writers have delivered concerning the several books of the New Testament; at the same time giving a catalogue of those of the three first centuries, in the order in which they wrote.

SOLUTION.

1. Barnabas, contemporary with the Apostles, who is mentioned in Acts iv. 36, 37; xi. 22—24; xiii. 1—4; 1 Cor. xi. 6. is said to have written a general epistle in Greek; a Latin translation of which is by many maintained to be extant; though I think the arguments against its authority are so strong, as to leave little weight to any thing argued from thence; any further than that so far as we can judge by the manner of the writing, it is indeed very ancient.

Jones on the Can. part iii. c. 37—42. Lardn. Cred. part ii. vol. i. p. 23—30; Works, vol. ii. p. 10—15. Wake's Prelim. Dis. p. 69—72.

In this epistle several words of Christ are quoted, which are recorded by the evangelists; v. g. Matt. xx. 16; ix. 13; xxii. 43. Luke vi. 30. and many of those scriptures quoted from the Old Testament in the New, are likewise cited here. Many of the phrases and arguments used by Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews and elsewhere, are also inserted; v. g. 2 Tim. i. 10; iv. 1. but not in the form of quotations, so that hardly any ancient work gives less assistance in this inquiry.

Lardner, ib. p. 31—48 pass. p. 49, 50. Works, vol. ii. p. 15—22. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. seculum i. § 53. Justin's Remarks on Eccles. Hist. p. 329—332.

2. Clemens Romanus, mentioned Phil. iv. 3. who is said to have been one of the first bishops of Rome, wrote an epistle to the Corinthians, probably about the year 96.

Lardn. ib. p. 51—61; Works, vol. ii. p. 22—28.

He quotes by name no book of the New Testament, excepting the first epistle to the Corinthians, which by the way is one of the most important in the whole volume for proving the truth of Christ-tianity, as will afterwards appear; and it is worth our notice, that it is here quoted by those who were the best judges of its being genuine, and quoted as of an authority acknowledged even by all the different parties among them: it is therefore not improbable that the original might then be in their hands.

Lardn. ibid. p. 61; Works, vol. ii. p. 29.

He evidently refers to some of Christ's words, which are also recorded by Matthew, Mark, and Luke; but we cannot lay much stress upon those passages, to establish the authority of these books, because Clement living so near the apostle's time, might have learned them by oral tradition, and the evangelists are not named. Yet, on the other hand, it may be remarked, that he does not introduce those things as new, but refers to them as well known to the Corinthians; which we could hardly have been so sure they were, unless they had some books among them (commonly also received among other Christians) in which those passages were inserted: nor will Acts xx. 35. invalidate this observation, since it does not appear that Clement had lived among the Corinthians, as Paul had done with the elders of Ephesus, and probably taught them those traditions with his own mouth.

Lard. ib. p. 65—68; Works, vol. ii. p. 29—31.

The following passages are transcribed with very little variation:—Rom. i. 29; xii. 5. 1 Cor. x. 24; xiii. 4, &c. Eph. iv. 4. Phil. i. 10. Col. i. 10. 1 Thess. v. 18. 1 Tim. v. 4. Tit. iii. 1. Heb. i. 3—5, 7—13; iv. 12; xi. 37; xii. 6. 1 Pet. iv. 8. He seems also evidently to allude to the following passages:—Rom. xiv. 1. 1 Cor. xii. 12; xv. 20. 2 Cor. iii. 18; viii. 5; xi. 24. 1 Tim. iii. 13. Heb. vi. 18. James iii. 13. 2 Pet. ii. 5; iii. 4.

Lardn. ibid. c. ii. præs. p. 102—105; Works, vol. ii. p. 34—47.

3. Hermas (mentioned Rom. xvi. 14.) is said to have been the author of several books, under his name: one is called his Pastor, in three parts; the first of visions, the second of commands, the third of similitudes. We have only a Latin translation of it, and a few fragments of the original. It is probably an ancient book; but strong objections are brought against its being genuine.

Wake's Prælim. Diss. c. viii. p. 79—87. Mosheim's Hist. Eccles. p. 51. Sec. i. § 54. Jortin's Rem. on Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 337, 338.

There are no express quotations of any book, either of the Old or New Testament, by name, to be found in him: but there are many allusions to the latter, of which the most considerable are the following passages:—Matt. v. 28; x. 32; xiii. 5, 7, 31; xviii. 3; xxviii. 18. Luke xvi. 18. John xiv. 6. Acts v. 41. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. Eph. iv. 4, 30. Heb. xii. 17. James i. 5; iv. 7, 12. 1 Pet. i. 6; v. 7. 1 John ii. 27. Jude, ver. 21. There are also many visions resembling those of the Revelations; but no mention is made of that book.

Lardn. c. iv. præs. p. 144—146; Works, vol. ii. p. 50—65. Mosheim, ubi supra.

4. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, who was martyred about the year 116, wrote several epistles, mentioned by Eusebius, Irenæus, Jerom, and many others: they are still said to be extant; but there are two different copies of them. Mr. Whiston has contended earnestly that the larger are genuine; but from comparing both, it appears much more probable that the larger are a paraphrase upon the smaller, than the smaller (as some suppose) an abridgment of the larger.

Whist. Prim. Christ. vol. i. Jortin's Rem. vol. i. p. 62—67, 363.

Nor is it at all probable that the epistles to Tarsus, Antioch, and Hiero are genuine, since they are not mentioned by Eusebius, who was so likely to have discovered them, and would no doubt have been glad to quote them. We shall, therefore, only take notice of those quotations and allusions which are to be found in the smaller epistles, and which are as follow. He plainly quotes or alludes to Matt. iii. 15; x. 16; xii. 33; xv. 13; xviii. 19; xix. 12. John iii. 8; viii. 29; x. 9. Acts x. 41. Rom. xv. 7. 1 Cor. i. 10; v. 7; vi. 9; xv. 8. Eph. v. 2, 25. Phil. ii. 3. 1 Thess. v. 17. 2 Tim. ii. 4. Philem. ver. 20. 1 Pet. v. 5.

Lardn. c. v. præs. p. 188—190; Works, vol. ii. p. 65—85. Jortin's Rem. vol. i. p. 51—61.

To which we may add, that he speaks of the Gospel in such a connexion with the Law and the Prophets, as seems to imply that he meant a book.

Lardn. ib. p. 180—184; Works, ib. p. 84, 85. Seed's Serm. vol. ii. p. 294—299.

5. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, thought by some to be the angel of the church there, mentioned in the Revelations, was martyred about the year 169. Eusebius mentions a letter written by him to the Philippians, which probably was that excellent epistle bearing his name, which is now extant in a Latin translation, and most of it in the Greek original. In this epistle he quotes by name 1 Cor. vi. 2. as the words of Paul, and also Eph. iv. 26. as a saying of Scripture, and also mentions Paul's epistle to the Philippians with the highest respect, as written by a wisdom which nothing could equal: he likewise most evidently transcribes the following passages:—Matt. v. 3, &c. vii. 1, 2; v. 44; xxvi. 41. Acts ii. 24. Rom. xii. 9; xiv. 10. 1 Cor. vi. 9. 2 Cor. iv. 5; vi. 7; viii. 21. Gal. iv. 26; vi. 7. Eph. ii. 8, 9. Philip. ii. 10, 16. 1 Thess. v. 17, 22. 2 Thess. iii. 15. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. vi. 7. 2 Tim. ii. 11; iv. 10. 1 Pet. i. 8, 21; ii. 11, 12, 17, 22, 24;

iii. 9; iv. 7; v. 5. 1 John iv. 3. Considering how short this letter is, the transcribing so great a number of passages in it from the New Testament, is an evident proof of the regard he paid to that book.

Lardn. ib. c. vi. præs. p. 202, 203. and 222, 223; Works, vol. ii. p. 86—100.

6. That epistle from the church of Smyrna, giving an account of the martyrdom of Polycarp, evidently refers to 1 Cor. ii. 9. and gives the title of Gospel to the History of Christ written by the Evangelists.

Lardn. ib. c. vii; Works, vol. ii. p. 100—105.

It may be observed, that the writings which have been enumerated under these six first steps, are those which are commonly called the works of the Apostolic Fathers, being published under that title by Cotelerius, in a very celebrated edition of them, and translated into English by Archbishop Wake, whose account of them all it may be convenient to peruse.

LECTURE CXV.

7. Papias, who is said to have been the companion of John, and who flourished about the year 115, wrote five books (now lost) called an Explication of the Oracles of our Lord, in which Eusebius says he often quoted our four Evangelists, and mentions some remarkable particulars both relating to the gospel of Matthew and Mark: Eusebius also says, he brings testimonies out of the first of John, and the first of Peter.

Lardn. ib. c. ix; Works, vol. ii. p. 106—115.

8. Justin Martyr wrote his two Apologies, and his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. He died at the latest about 163. The epistle to Diognetus, and Questions to the Orthodox, though they do not seem to belong to Justin Martyr, (among whose works they are published,) are, however, undoubtedly writings of great antiquity.

There are in his genuine works the following quotations and allusions:—Matt. i. 20, 21; v. 28—32; xi. 27; xxv. 41. Mark viii. 31. Luke i. 31, 35, 38; x. 19. John i. 20; iii. 3; xiv. 24. He quotes also the Memoirs of the Apostles, which he adds are called Gospels, as containing the institution of the Eucharist, and Luke xx. 44. Matt. xxvi. 39. He introduces Trypho the Jew, speaking of the precepts delivered in the Gospel, as what he had read; and expressly declares, that the Written Commentaries, or Memoirs of the Apostles, as well as of the Prophets, were read publicly in all Christian assemblies for divine worship: which is a circumstance of vast importance.

Just. Mart. Apol. § 87. Reeves's Apol. vol. i. p. 111.

He either quotes or refers to Acts vii. 22; xiii. 27. 1 Cor. v. 7, &c.; xi. 18, 19; xii. 8—10. Gal. iv. 12. Eph. ii. 20. Col. i. 15. 2 Thess. ii. 3, 4. Heb. v. 9, 10. 2 Pet. iii. 8. Rev. xx. 4, &c. Luke xx. 35, 36.

Lardn. ib. c. x. præs. p. 286—288; Works, vol. ii. p. 115—129.

9. The epistle to Diognetus, which Mr. Whiston wildly thinks to have been written by the evangelist Timothy, is certainly ancient, though it was not written by Justin; and there are evident quotations or allusions to the following passages:—Matt. vi. 25, &c. John i. 1; xvii. 14. Rom. v. 19. 1 Cor. iv. 12; viii. 1. 2 Cor. x. 3; iv. 8, &c. Phil. iii. 20. 1 Pet. ii. 24. iii. 18. 1 John iv. 19. And he also speaks of the gospels and traditions of the apostles, in such a connexion with the law and the prophets, as seems plainly to intimate that he referred to books of that name.

Lardn. ib. p. 296, 297; Works, vol. ii. p. 129—133. Jortin's Rem. vol. i. p. 342—348.

10. Dionysius of Corinth was a man of an excellent character, who flourished about the year 170. He wrote seven epistles, which are now lost; but in a fragment of one of them, preserved by Eusebius, he mentions the conversion of Dionysius, the Areopagite, by Paul, agreeably to the account given in the Acts of the Apostles; but it does not appear that he speaks of that book.

Lardn. ib. c. xii. p. 300; Works, ib. p. 133—136.

11. Tatian, who flourished about the year 172, wrote an elegant oration against the Greeks, which is still extant; and Eusebius (Eccles. Hist. lib. iv. c. 29.) tells us, he wrote the Harmony of the Four Gospels. In his oration, he quotes Luke vi. 25. John i. 3, 5. 1 Cor. xv. 22. besides some other passages, which Clement and Irenæus say he quoted from the epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians, in a work now lost; and Jerom says he allowed Paul's epistle to Titus.

Lardn. ib. c. xiii; Works, ib. p. 136—140.

12. Hegesippus, a converted Jew, wrote the History of the Christian Church about the year 170, of which only some fragments are remaining; in which the following scriptures seem to be referred to:—Matt. xxvi. 61. Luke xxiii. 34. Matt. xiii. 16.

Lardn. ib. c. xiv; Works, ib. p. 140—145.

13. Melito, bishop of Sardis, in the year 170, wrote an apology to Marcus Antoninus, and many other books, particularly a commentary on the Revelations: and as he expressly speaks of the Old Testament, he seems by that phrase to imply, that there was in his time a collection of books, called the New.

Lardn. ibid. c. xv.; Works, ibid. p. 146—148.

14. There is an epistle of the churches of Vienne and Lyons, preserved in Eus. Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. and written about the year 177, to which there are very express quotations from Luke, 1 Cor. John xvi. 2. Acts vii. 60. Rom. viii. 18. Eph. vi. 5. Phil. ii. 6. 1 Tim. iii. 16. 1 Peter v. 6. 1 John iii. 16. Rev. xiv. 4. Lardn. c. xvi. Works, ibid. p. 184—188.

15. Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, wrote, about the year 178, besides many other books, five of Heresy; which are yet preserved in the Latin translation, and some fragments in the original Greek. In one of these fragments preserved by Eusebius, as well as in the translation, there is express mention of the Four Gospels, under the names of their respective authors, and they are likewise mentioned together. In two other passages of his works, he professedly vindicates the genuineness of each, and sets himself to give an account of the occasion on which they were written. He often expressly quotes the book of the Acts, and in many places the epistles of Paul by name, and mentions all which our New Testament ascribes to him, excepting that to Philemon. He has many passages in sense parallel to several in the Hebrews, but he does not expressly quote that epistle; and Photius says he did not allow it to be St. Paul's. He has also passages in sense parallel to several of James, but no express quotations. The first epistle of Peter is quoted by him, and the first of John, and also the second, though by a mistake he calls it the same with the former. Jude is not quoted, though it would have been peculiarly proper to the occasion of his writing; but the book of the Revelations he very frequently and largely quotes.

Lardn. ibid. c. xvii. prem. p. 381, 382. and Ind. ad Iren.; Works, ibid. p. 153—180.

16. Athenagoras, who, before his conversion, was a philosopher, between 166 and 178, wrote an Apology for Christianity, and quickly after a discourse on The Resurrection; in which he expressly quotes, or evidently alludes to, the following passages:—Matt. v. 28, 44, 45. Luke xvi. 18. John x. 30, 38. Acts xvii. 25. Rom. i. 24, 27. 1 Cor. xv. 32, 54. 2 Cor. v. 10. Gal. iv. 9. 1 Tim. v. 1, 2; vi. 16. He seems also to refer to James iii. 13; v. 7. 2 Pet. i. 21. Rev. xx. 13.

Lardn. ib. c. xviii.; Works, ib. p. 180—187.

LECTURE CXVI

17. Miltiades is supposed to have written about the year 170, an elegant Apology, which is now lost. He is celebrated by Eusebius (Eccles. Hist. v. 17.) for his acquaintance with Scripture; but no fragments remain.

Lardn. ib. c. xix.; Works, ib. p. 188, 189.

18. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, wrote three books to Autolycus, yet extant, published about the year 181. His book against Hermogenes, in which Eusebius says he quoted the Revelations, is lost, as also that against Marcion, and the Harmony of the Evangelists, mentioned by Jerom, Ep. 151. but the Commentary upon them, which goes under his name, is spurious. In those of his genuine works which remain, he quotes Matt. v. 28, 32, 44, 46; vi. 3. Luke xviii. 27. John i. 1, 3. Rom. ii. 6, &c.; xiii. 7, 8. 1 Cor. vi. 9—11. 2 Cor. xi. 19. Eph. ii. 2; iii. 10. Phil. i. 10; iii. 20; iv. 8. Col. i. 17. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. Tit. iii. 5. Heb. xii. 9. 1 Pet. i. 18; ii. 13. Some of these passages he mentions as spoken by a divine word, and he seems to allude to 2 Pet. i. 20. Rev. xii. 19.

Lardn. ib. c. xx. prem. p. 147—149; Works, ib. p. 190—202.

To this work is added, particularly in the Cologn edition, a little tract of Hermias, called Irrisio Gentium, which is written with great elegance and spirit; which begins with an express quotation of 1 Cor. iii. 19. as The words of the blessed apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Corinthians.

Lardn. ib. c. xxv. p. 553, 554; Works. ib. p. 246, 247

19. Pantænus, once a philosopher of the Stoic sect, was President of the Catechetical School of Alexandria about the year 130, as Eusebius (Hist. v. 9, 10.) assures us: he wrote Commentaries on Scripture, which are now entirely lost; so that he is capable of doing no service in the present question, any further than as Jerom testifies, he brought back the Gospel of Matthew, written in Hebrew, from India, whither he was sent by Demetrius, his bishop, to preach the gospel.

Lardn. ib. c. xxi; Works, ib. p. 202—205.

20. Clemens Alexandrinus succeeded Pantænus; and wrote about the end of the second and beginning of the third century. His remaining works are his Pædagogue and Stromata, his Admonition to the Gentiles, and a homily of The Salvation of the Rich. He is mentioned with great honour by the most valuable ancient writers that succeeded him: Eusebius tells us, That he speaks of Mark's Gospel, as written from the account of things he had received from Peter, and in effect at least authorized by that apostle. (Eccles. Hist. ii. 15.) He also speaks of the Epistle to the Hebrews, as written in Hebrew by Paul, but translated by Luke. Ib. vi. 14.

Lard. ib. c. xxii. p. 468—474; Works, ib. p. 210—212.

He expressly mentions the Four Gospels of our Evangelists, the Acts, the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, first and second to the Thessalonians and Corinthians, first and second to Timothy, Titus, Hebrews, the first of Peter, and the first of John, by the name of the Lesser Epistles, and Jude and the Revelations.

but does not expressly mention James nor the second of Peter. We refer not to particular passages, there being great numbers of them from the several books above mentioned. It is true that he also quotes several apocryphal pieces; such as the Gospel according to the Hebrews and the Egyptians, the Preaching of Peter, the Shepherd of Hermas; but not with titles of equal regard, nor in such a manner as to seem to lay any stress upon them.

Lardn. ib. c. xxii. p. 494—515; and Index to Clem. Alex.; Works, ib. p. 206—243.

21. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, about the close of this century, in an epistle of his, of which Jerom has preserved some fragments, refers to Matt. xix. 12. John xxi. 20. Acts v. 29. and speaks of the Scripture as the rule of faith.

Lardn. ib. c. xxiii.; Works, ib. 243—245.

22. Tertullian, presbyter of Carthage, was contemporary with Clemens Alexandrinus, and survived him: his works are known and numerous. In them he expressly quotes all the books of the New Testament but James, the second of Peter, the third of John: Hebrews he supposed to have been written by Barnabas. It is remarkable that there are more quotations from the New Testament in him, than from all the writings of Tully, in all the ancient books in the world. The same may be said of those of Irenæus and Clemens Alexandrinus.

Lardn. ib. c. xxvii.; Works, ib. p. 150—287.

23. Dr. Lardner has also mentioned a great many other Christian writers, of whose works only fragments are preserved, which serve to illustrate the present question, of which we shall not give so particular an account. The chief of them are Serapion, who speaks with great reverence of our Gospels, rejecting that of Peter (ib. c. xxvi.); Quadratus, Aristides, Claudius Apollinaris, and Symmachus, (ib. c. xxviii. pass.) Besides these, he also mentions several supposititious writings, forged in the second century, such as the Acts of Paul and Thecla, the Sibylline Verses, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Recognitions, Homily and Epitome of Clement; but they bring little light to the present question; which is not to be wondered at, considering that most of them pretend to be written before the books of the New Testament: but it is observed, That in the three last of these there are several references to facts recorded in the Evangelists; and that phrases used especially in Paul's writings are introduced in these pieces.

24. The third century produced many famous Christian writers; v. g. Minutius Felix, Origen, Cyprian, and Arnobius; most of whose works abound with a vast many quotations from all the uncontroverted books of the New Testament, especially Novation on the Trinity; and it would be almost an endless task to enumerate them all: much less is it necessary to enter into the particulars of those quotations, brought from Lactantius, Athanasius, Eusebius, Optatus, Basil, Ephraim Syrus, Gregory Nyss, and Nazianzen, Ambrose, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Hilary, Jerom, Augustin, and other authors of less note, who flourished in the fourth century,—of whom see Spanh. Eccles. Hist. Sæc. iii. § 10. Sæc. iv. § 12. Lard. part ii. vol. iii. pass.; Works, vol. ii. p. 247—249; ibid. p. 287—310; ibid. p. 310—363; ibid. p. 364, to the end of the volume.*

COROLLARY 1.

Hence we may easily collect and compare the evidence which there is of each particular book of the New Testament, to prove it genuine.

COROLLARY 2.

Hence we may see great reason to believe what is asserted in Prop. 100. at least concerning the books which are called ὁμολογούμενοι. Vid. ibid. pp. 7.

COROLLARY 3.

Hence it appears that the evidence of those books, which are called ἀντιλεγόμενοι, is comparatively very small, so far as it depends upon the fathers of the two first centuries, especially with regard to James, the second of Peter, and Jude.

COROLLARY 4.

Mr. Dodwell was grossly mistaken in asserting, That the books of the New Testament lay concealed till the year 130; and that there was nothing settled concerning the canon till the fourth century.

Dodw. Dissert. in Iren. p. 61. Jackson on Christian. vol. ii. c. iv. p. 118—128. Lard. Cred. vol. xii. p. 21—28, 30—126. Works, vol. v. p. 382—388. Mashall's Truth of the Gospel Hist. book iii. c. i. § 1, 2, 3.

LECTURE CXVII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It may not be improper here to add, That Amelius, the Platonic philosopher, in the third century, mentions the writings of John,—and Dionysius Longinus, A. D. 250, those of Paul, with considerable applause.

Hist. Dom. Ep. Prov. i. 15. p. 21. Euseb.

* [illegible]

Præp. Evan. l. xi. c. xix. Smith's Life of Longinus, p. 23, 24. Lardner's Test. vol. iii. c. xxxiii. and xxxiv.; Works, vol. iii. p. 160—168.

And it is yet of greater importance to observe, That Celsus, who seems to have lived in the second century, and perhaps not later than the middle of it, (Orig. against Celsus, l. i. p. 3 and 8.) not only brings a great many citations from the New Testament, but founds the main stress of his argument against Christianity upon the supposed absurdity of that book; which is an illustrious testimony, not only to its antiquity, but to its high esteem among Christians in that early age.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It may be added here, That some have thought Luke x. 7. is expressly quoted by Paul (1 Tim. v. 18.); and it is observable, that if it be so, then it is put upon a footing of equal authority with Deut. xxv. 4. quoted in the same passage.

Seed's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 292. Macknight's Truth of the Gosp. Hist. p. 391.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some may perhaps wonder that (considering how much Christianity prevailed, and in how great esteem the writers of the New Testament are supposed to have been in those early ages) there should have been no more quotations from them within the first 150 years. It may be answered,

1. That as most of the first Christians were persons of a low station in life (1 Cor. i. 26—28. James ii. 5.) the number of early Christian writers was small, and of those who did write, many of their works are lost, as evidently appears from Eusebius, Photius, and many more, who have given us some of their names and some account of them, and in part from several steps in the preceding proposition.

2. That several of the remaining pieces are but short.

3. That the subject of many of these was such, as to give little opportunity of quoting the writings of the New Testament; very few of them relating to any controversy of Christians with each other, and in their controversies with the Heathens, it is observed that they are employed more in demonstrating the falsehood of Paganism than the truth of Christianity, as that was the point most necessary to be laboured, considering the sociability of the Heathen superstitions.

4. Several of the writers whom we have mentioned were so early, that it is exceedingly probable they had not an opportunity of seeing some of the epistles; which could not circulate in the world so soon as papers now do by the assistance of printing.

5. Those books not being then divided into chapters and verses as now, quotations from them were not altogether so easy; not to say that, considering to what extraordinary divine assistances many of the primitive Christians pretended, they might not seem to have so much need of a written rule; so that, on the whole, it is wonderful that we can trace so great evidence in such circumstances.

Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. l. ii. § 6. p. 292—284, edit. 2. p. 278—295. edit. 4. vol. i. part ii. p. 36—56. Macknight's Gospel History, p. 408, 409.

PROPOSITION CII.

To inquire more particularly into the evidence there is that the ancient Christians had books among them, which went by the name of those which Eusebius calls ἀντιλεγομενοι. Vid. Prop. 100. qu. 6.

SOLUTION.

1. With regard to the Epistle to the Hebrews, many parallel thoughts and phrases are to be found in Clemens Romanus, Justin Martyr, and Irenæus. Clemens Alexandrinus quotes it as the words of the divine apostle, and elsewhere of Paul. Origen frequently speaks of it as Paul's; and Eusebius mentions it as received with great pleasure by the Hebrews, who were the most capable of judging whether it were genuine or not.

Lardn. Cred. part ii. vol. i. p. 87—95, 368—373; vol. ii. p. 470—472, 501, 502; vol. iii. p. 234—238, 248—261; Works, vol. ii. p. 39—43, 211, 212, 224, 467, 472—478. Whitby's Comment. on Heb. Pref. New Transl. of New Test. p. 838—840. Twells's Exam. part ii. c. ii. § 1. Lardner's Supplement, vol. ii. c. xii. § 3, 4. Works, vol. vi. p. 391—415. Hallet on the Heb. Introd. § 1. Sykes on ditto, Introduction, passim.

2. As for James, passages at least parallel to it are to be found in Clemens Romanus, Irenæus, and Athenagoras, and it is acknowledged by Origen, Eusebius, and Jerom, though the last tells us it was long doubted in the Latin church.

Whitby Comment. on Jam. Pref. Lardn. ib. ye rem. Clem. Ignat. &c. New Translation, p. 873—875. Twells, ib. § 2. Lardner's Suppl. vol. iii. c. xvii.; Works, vol. vi. p. 502—509.

2 The Second of Peter seems to be quoted by Justin Martyr, and is ascribed to Peter by Origen and Clemens Alexandrinus.

Whitby on 2 Pet. Pref. New Trans. p. 903, 904. Twells, ib. § 2. Benson on the Second of Peter, p. 1—9. Lard. Suppl. vol. iii. c. xix. § 1; Works, vol. vi. p. 563—566.

4. The second epistle of John is quoted by Irenæus, and by the Council of Carthage in the year 256. Clemens Alexandrinus speaks by way of distinction of the larger epistle. Origen likewise mentions the second and third epistles, though something dubiously; and Epiphanius has some reference to them, speaking in the plural number of John's epistles.

Whit. in Loc. Benson on the Epistles of John, p. 177, 178. Lardner's Suppl. vol. iii. § 4, 5, 6; Works, vol. vi. p. 593—607.

5. Jude is expressly quoted by Origen, Tertullian, and Cyprian; but by no earlier writers.

Whit. on Jude, ver. 1. New Transl. p. 943. Twells, ib. § 4. Benson on Jude, p. 114. Lardn. Suppl. vol. iii. § 21; Works, vol. vi. p. 607—627.

6. Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clemens Alexandrinus, allow the Revelations to have been an ancient book, and ascribe it to John the apostle; and if we may believe the testimonies of Eusebius and Jerom, who had in their hands the writings of many of the ancients which are now lost, Papias, Melito, Theophilus of Antioch, and Apollonius, all in the second century, received and quoted it; and it appears to have been allowed by Origen, Cyprian, Victorius, Methodius, and Pamphilus, besides Hypolitus, earlier than any of them in the third; though it is certain some rejected it, as the work of an unknown and heretical writer.

New Transl. p. 1019—1022. Mills's Prolog. ad Nov. Testament, p. 24—28. Twell's Ev. part iii. pass. præs. part i. c. i. § 2. c. ii. p. 11—15. Republic of Letters, vol. vii. art. 9.[a]

COROLLARY 1.

It evidently appears, from comparing this demonstration with that of Prop. 101. that the evidence of the genuineness of the six former of these books is not equal to that of the rest; nor are they all equal to each other in this respect.

COROLLARY 2.

Nevertheless, it seems more reasonable to admit than to reject them, if we consider,

1. That several of these epistles, not being written as most of Paul's were, either to particular churches, or even particular persons, whose names and abodes are recorded in them, it could not be so easy to find out the originals.

2. That some of them are so short, and the contents of them so general, that there was (cæt. par.) less reason to expect quotations from them.

3. As they were more inquired into, they came to be generally received; and at last all opposition against them ceased. To which we may add,

4. That the accomplishment of many remarkable prophecies in the Revelations, especially those relating to the Roman and Papal empire, in proportion to the degree in which it appears, must, to those that see it, be one of the strongest demonstrations that can be imagined, not only that the book itself was genuine, but that it was written by some extraordinary assistance and illumination from God; and when this is granted, and the external evidence considered, and compared with that of the rest of these seven pieces, it will further prove that a book not more frequently quoted by the earliest writers than this, may yet be both genuine and divine.

Blackhall at Boyle's Lect. Serm. iii. p. 9—12. Jenk. of Christian. vol. ii. p. 106—116.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Whatever be thought of the preceding arguments, it is to be remembered, that the agreement between these books and others of the New Testament is so great, that we need not be very solicitous about them; nor, if the others should hereafter be proved to be of Divine authority, need we be apprehensive of any dangerous consequences attending our referring to them in public discourses. This is especially observable with regard to those whose external evidence is the weakest; in which number the second and third of John and Jude are to be reckoned.

Fest. against Tind. p. 143—147. Sherlock on Proph. Dissert. i. p. 199, &c.

SCHOLIUM 2.

With relation to the books mentioned by Toland in his Amyntor, (compare Prop. 100. Schol.) such as the Acts of Paul; the Revelation of Peter; the Gospel of Peter, Andrew, and Matthias; the Acts of Peter and John, &c. it is evident that Eusebius, in the place before quoted, (Eccles. Hist. lib. iii. § 25. p. 119.) mentions these as νοθοι; which (though Dr. Twells maintains the contrary) is plainly different from the αντιλεγομενοι as well as the ομολογουμενοι; and it will appear, as was hinted above, that even when they are quoted, which they seldom are, by ancient writers, it is in such a language as plainly to show that the regard to them was far inferior to that which they had for the sacred books; and it is further remarkable, that though Celsus has, one where or another, given us a kind of abridgment of the history of the evangelists, (see Prop. 101. Schol. 1.) yet he has hardly, if ever at all, mentioned a single fact recorded in any of those pieces, though many of them would have afforded matter for much more plausible objections than those which he endeavours to ground upon the facts recorded by the evangelists (compare Evang. Infant. ap. Fabric. Cod. Apocryphus, vol. ii. p. 163—165, 182—185.) which makes it probable that he was not acquainted with those pieces; for his candour was not so great as to have waved any opportunity of aspersing Christianity; and it is highly probable several of [a] M. Abauzit, a learned gentleman of Geneva, but a Freethinker by birth, in a discourse on the Apocalypse, hath strongly denied the authenticity of the book. See his Miscellanies on historical, theological, and critical Subjects, translated by Dr. Harwood, in 1774. p. 283—376. On the other side of the question is Lardner, Suppl. vol. iii. c. xxii., Works, vol. vi. p. 627—638.

those forgeries were later than his time. We may also add, that Tertullian tells us (de Baptis. c. xvii.) that John the apostle discovered the Acts of Paul and Thecla to have been forged by a presbyter, and degraded the author on that account; which, if true, is a very remarkable circumstance.

Seed's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 209—311.

LECTURE CXVIII.

PROPOSITION CIII.

The New Testament, as we now have it in the original, is genuine; i. e. it is in the main such as it came out of the hands of those by whom the several pieces contained in it are said to have been written.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 100. 1. The primitive Christians had books among them said to have been written by those authors whose names are prefixed to those of our New Testament.

2. The primitive Christians had as good opportunities of satisfying themselves as to the genuineness of them, as other ancients had with regard to the genuineness of their books; especially considering that several of those epistles were written to numerous societies of men, or to persons of a very public and sacred character; and those of Paul, if not written by his own hand, were signed by him, to prevent, as far as could be, the very possibility of imposture, 1 Cor. xvi. 21. 2 Thess. iii. 17. comp. Rom. xvi. 22. Gal. vi. 11.

3. The great concern which Christians had in these books, and the high value which they set upon them, (as appears in part already, and will hereafter more fully appear,) would no doubt engage them to be very careful and accurate in this inquiry.

Lardn. Cred. vol. i. p. 384, 385. vol. iii. p. 282—289. vol. viii. p. 197—203; Works, vol. ii. p. 172, 173. ib. p. 488, 492. vol. iv. p. 272—274.

4. We find there were many books, going under the name of the apostles, which were rejected by the primitive Christians; and thus a strict difference was made between those of the New Testament, and other books allowed to have been written by persons of great eminence in the church.—Vid. Prop. 100. Schol. and Prop. 102. Schol. 2.

Lardn. ib. vol. viii. p. 105—124; Works, vol. iv. p. 251—260. Bucklaud's or Bayle's Lectures, Sermon iii. p. 12, 13.

5. We do not find that either the Jews or the Heathens, with whom the Christian apologists were engaged, disputed the genuineness of their records. Julian the apostate, who was so well acquainted with them, and afterwards proved so inveterate an enemy to Christianity, does in some of his writings allow them to be genuine; as we before observed that Celsus doth earlier, especially the Evangelists. See Prop. 101. Schol. 1.

Macknight's Truth of the Gospel Hist. book ii. c. iv. p. 342—348. West on the Resurrec. p. 319—331. Leland's View, vol. ii. p. 335—337.

1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. 6. There is great reason to believe that the books of the same title with those of our New Testament, which were in the hands of the primitive Christians, i. e. those of the two first centuries, were genuine.

7. Considering the zeal which the primitive Christians expressed for the New Testament, and the sufferings which they were ready to undergo rather than they would deliver it up, as the traditores under the Dioclesian persecution did, we can hardly imagine that, if it had been in their power, they would willingly have corrupted it in any important instances; which would indeed have been introducing another religion, different from that for which they suffered such dreadful extremities.

Suic. Thesaur. vol. i. p. 800. Lardn. ib. vol. vii. lib. i. c. 66. p. 210—217; Works, vol. iv. p. 88—91.

8. If they had been ever so desirous of corrupting the New Testament, neither they, nor any in succeeding ages, could have effected such a design; considering how long the originals were preserved, how soon they were transcribed, and translated into various languages, how publicly they were read in their religious assemblies, so that wherever there was a Christian church, there must have been a copy, by which any that attended might examine and correct their own (vid. Prop. 100. gr. 8.); considering also how widely they were dispersed in a very few years after they were written; and what a variety of sects arose very early among Christians, who were all a guard upon each other, to prevent any material alteration in the books which they professed to make the rule of their faith, and from which each pretended to defend his own opinions.

King of the Prim. Church, part ii. c. i. § 2. Tertull. de Præscr. c. 36. Adcock, Wetstein, ap. Bisco at Bagley's Lect. p. 491—493. Lardn. ib. vol. iii. p. 289—293, 300—304. Works, vol. ii. p. 491—493, 495—497.

9. There are numerous quotations from the New Testament in Christian writers of all the latter ages, and even from the beginning of the third century; insomuch that if the books were to be lost, by far the greater part of them might be recovered from such quotations, and from the homilies and commentaries written upon several parts of it; and all these do in the main agree with our present copies.

in sense at least, if not in words. Compare Prop. 101. gr. 22.

7, 8, 9. 10. The New Testament, as we now have it in the original, is in the main agreeable to what it was in the first ages of Christianity.

6, 10. 11. The New Testament, as we have it in the original, is genuine. Q. E. D.

Limborch's Collatio. p. 16. Script. iii. Judex Quæst. iv. No. viii. p. 144—148. Baxter's Works, vol. ii. p. 119, b. 120, a. Reasons of Rel. part ii. c. vii. § 68—94. Ditton on the Resurrec. part iii. § 10—17. Bennet on Script. p. 302—306. Fost. against Tindal, p. 95—105, 161. Wets. New Test. Prol. p. 77—81. Benson's Rems. of Christianity, p. 62—75. Macknight's Truth of the Gosp. Hist. book iii. c. iii. p. 478—488. Jortin's Rem. on Ecclesiastical Hist. vol. i. p. 41—45. Leland, ubi supra.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it appears, that the evidence we have of the genuineness of the writings of the New Testament, is abundantly greater than for that of any other book of equal antiquity; as may be seen by comparing the preceding argument with what could be said in proof of those writings which go under the names of Virgil, Tully, Cæsar, Suetonius, &c.

Blackhall at Boyle's Lect. Serm. iii. p. 6—8.

COROLLARY 2.

From comparing the several steps of the preceding demonstration, particularly gr. 3, 7, 8. it will appear that where the possibility of corrupting the books of the New Testament (if it had been desired) was greatest, i. e. in the time immediately following their being written, we have the strongest evidence of an aversion to do it; considering the known zeal and piety of the first professors and confessors of Christianity, and that as the character of Christians grew worse, the impossibility of changing these books increased; and it may not be unworthy of further remark, that with respect to those epistles, which being written to particular persons, might have been most easily altered, we have peculiar evidence that they were not; partly from the distinguishing piety of those persons, i. e. Timothy and Titus; and partly from the tenor of those epistles as they now appear, which is the very contrary to what dishonest, ambitious, and interested men, who alone would have been likely to have attempted a corruption, would have desired it should have been.

LECTURE CXIX.

SCHOLIUM 1.

If it be objected to gr. 7, 8. That the fathers accused the Heretics of corrupting the Scripture, and that it is possible that all the copies or versions now extant might be thus corrupted by them,—to this we answer,

1. The corruption of Scripture, to which they refer, was either by false interpretations, or at most by the alteration of a few particular passages.

2. The agreement between the doctrines of the fathers in some of those points, and the Scriptures as now extant, shows that we have not corrupt copies of those passages.

3. We may conclude from the reasons urged above, that if the Heretics made any such attempts, they must have been unsuccessful; and the protest of the fathers against them shows it.

4. The copies now extant came from such different parts; and many of the translations, especially the Syriac, Ethiopic, and Vulgate, were so ancient, that the hypothesis proposed in the objection is utterly incredible.—To which we add, that the fathers, who have several of them quoted the same passages of Scripture, lived in very distant countries, at or near the same time; v. g. Justin Martyr and many others in Asia, Irenæus in France, Clemens at Alexandria, Cyprian at Carthage, some of his correspondents at Rome, &c. at all which places Christian churches were founded, long before the time in which these authors respectively lived; yet these authors never in the least intimate any disapprobation of those anciently received copies, which greatly confirms the evidence drawn from this view of them: and whoever considers the alarm taken at the attempt of Pope Celestine I. about the year 425, to impose a forged canon, as established by the Council of Nice, upon the African bishops, whereas it was only a canon of the Council of Sardica, will be yet more sensible of the force of this argument.

Bower's Hist. of the Popes, vol. i. p. 370, &c. Wetst. Prol. to New Test. § 2. p. 29—48. 12mo. edit. Fost. against Tind. p. 149—165.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Nearly akin to this is that objection taken from the passages in Victor's Chronicon, in which it is said, "That when Messala was consul, at the command of the emperor Anastasius, the holy Gospels, as written by Idiotis Evangelistis, were corrected and amended;" which seems only to refer to the correcting a few copies at Constantinople, which were falsified by Macedonius, and were now restored to what the plures emendatiores [illegible]. It is certain no thought could be wilder than a universal corruption of all the copies of the New Testament at such an age, (A. D. 500,) and among so many diversities of opinions, as well as in the vast tract of land, where Anastasius had not the least power.

Collins on Freethink. p. 89, 90, edit. 2; edit. 1, p. 72, 73. Bentley's Rem. part ii. § 32. p. 81. Sir Isaac Newton's 2d Letter to Le Clerc, as cited to Mr. Locke, p. 196.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Many have objected the various readings which Dr. Mills reckons to be more than 30,000: but it may be replied,

1. That considering the bulk of the book, the vast number of copies which have been compared, the ignorance of many transcribers, and the nicety with which the least variations have been observed; and especially considering how many versions and quotations Dr. Mills brings into the account, we are rather to wonder there are no more; since in the few copies of Terence which have been compared, almost as many various readings have been found.

2. There are but very few of these various numerous readings, which at all affect the sense, at least in any important article, as appears by examining not only those of Mills, but those of Wetstein, which are by far the most significant of them.

3. That when copies come to be compared, there is often so great a number on one side against those of the other, that it is easy to settle the true reading, and to see what it was that led the transcriber into a mistake: and this is generally the case where the variation from the received reading is the greatest.

Canones Critici ap. Wets. p. 11—16. and Pref. p. 77, 78. Collins, ibid. p. 87—90. Bent. Rem. part i. p. 60—68, 74—81. Ditton on the Res. part iii. § 18, 19.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is objected, That it is improbable that the whole New Testament should have been written in Greek. We answer,

1. That many great critics allege, chiefly on the authority of Papias, as quoted by Eusebius, † Eccles. Hist. lib. iii. cap. ult.) that the gospel of Matthew and the epistle to the Hebrews were originally written in Hebrew: † but if that should be allowed to be dubious, we may further add,

2. That great numbers of the Christian converts were Grecians born, and others Hellenists, who used the Greek translation of the Old Testament.

3. That the Greek language had spread so much beyond any other in those days, that on the whole it was most convenient for [illegible] for universal use; which also in part appears from the writings of several of the ancients, who though they lived in Asia and Egypt, used this language, as Josephus also did, though he wrote at Rome, and seems to have designed his books principally for the use of the Romans.

Beveridge's Inq. c. i. and vi. Limb. Coll. p. 144, 145, 183, 184. Jones against Whist. c. xvii. &c. Hallet on Heb. Pref. Lardner's Sup. vol. i. c. 5. § 5. ib. vol. ii. c. xii. § 14. Works, vol. vi. p. 60—65. ib. p. 381—415.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Mr. Whiston has endeavoured to prove the evidence of the genuineness of the Apostolic Constitutions to be equal to that of the New Testament. We own there are many curious and valuable articles, among many weak and ridiculous things, in that very miscellaneous collection. Nevertheless, when Whitson's arguments for them come to be compared with those in the proposition, it will immediately appear that they fall vastly short of them: and, indeed, these Constitutions contain many very evident marks of forgery; especially as they expressly determine the two grand controversies relating to the time of Easter, and the re-admission of those who had fallen away after baptism; yet their authority is never pleaded for the decision of these controversies, even when those persons were engaged in them, in whose hands he supposes the originals of these Constitutions to have been lodged: not now to insist upon the great improbability of keeping those things secret at first, which were intended to be a rule to Christians in all succeeding ages; which very ill agrees with the plain and simple genius of Christianity, or that courage in defence of the truth for which its earliest professors were above all mankind so eminent. There are likewise so many things in these Constitutions, different from, and even contrary to, the genius and design of the writers of the New Testament, that no wise man would believe, without the most convincing and irresistible proof, that both could come from the same hand.

Whist. Prim. Christianity, vol. ii. iii. Sawrin's Serm. vol. ii. p. 185—187. Cont. Comm's Pref. p. 3—7. Grabe's Ans. to Whist. passim. Benvatieri Opera. Lardner's Cred. part. ii. vol. viii. & seq. Works, vol. iv. p. 320—366.

† [illegible]

‡ Mr. Mansel has started a new objection to this way. "Concerning the quotations," he says, "from Justin Martyr and others in the genuine remains of the New Testament, there ought to have been a collation of the Arabick and Ethiopick, that were very early, and are now in the Cambridge, and in part in the Bodleian Libraries, &c." Mansel's Serm. vol. ii. p. 363—376. Not having Dr. Bentley's new Introduction to the Study and Knowledge of the New Testament in view, (for which having hitherto waited in order to apprize the learned world of it, and encourage it to the kind, liberal, and generous subscription, which the importance of the New Testament in particular requires, for the use of Students in Divinity) the New Testament in many languages, by Richard Mayer, B. D. vol. i. p. [illegible] to which may be added Mr. Mansel's Notes, p. 345—354. Remarks may likewise be had on Dr. Lardner's Letters to a Prebendary, if the Reverend Author of the same will favour Lardner's Credibility and Supplement, &c. with a complete new edition. Chronology, in the 11th and 12th chapters of the Doctrine and Fall of the Roman Empire. Many other

LECTURE CXX.

PROPOSITION CIV.

The Jewish religion has been of considerable antiquity; and, according to the common chronology, was founded by Moses nearly 1500 years before Christ's time.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. That there was such a people as the Jews about the time of the Christian æra, and that they were a little while after subdued by the Romans under Vespasian and Titus, is so apparent from the history of Tacitus and Suetonius, as well as many other ancient writers and monuments, that it has never been called in question, and therefore needs no more particular proof.

2. Philo and Josephus, the two most considerable writers who lived in that age, as well as a great many others of the same religion before and since, do expressly assert it as a notorious fact, that Moses was the author of their religion and polity, and that he lived about the time mentioned in the proposition.

3. There is reason to believe, that as the Hebrew language is of acknowledged antiquity, and does indeed bear many of the peculiar marks of an original, they had among them some written and credible account of the beginning of their constitution and nation; especially considering how much their laws differ from those of any other people on the face of the earth.

4. Several of the Pagan writers, of whom we shall give a more particular account in the Scholium, do mention Moses as undoubtedly the lawgiver of the Jews.

writers appeared in answer to Mr. Gibbon. A list of those publications is as follows: "Remarks on the Two last Chapters of Mr. Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, in a letter to a friend. An Apology for Christianity, in a Series of Letters addressed to Edward Gibbon, Esq. by Dr. R. Watson, now Bishop of Llandaff, with separate publications and other Appendages to the Reader. Sermons and Tracts. Some Strictures on Mr. Gibbon's Account of Christianity and its First Teachers, by the Rev. W. Shepherd, B. D. in his translation of Bossuet's History of the Variations of Protestantism, compared from Laws, and Hurdis's Poetical Epistle. Bishop Hurd's Reply to the Remarks of Mr. Gibbon. Dr. Apthorp's Observations on a late History of the Decline of the Roman Empire, in the Letters on the Precedence of Christianity, before the Greek Philosophers. Davies's Examination of the Two last Chapters of Mr. Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. A few Remarks on the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Dr. Chelsum's Remarks on the Two last Chapters of Mr. Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Dr. Henry Taylor's Thoughts on the Nature of the Grecian Apostle. Reflections and Observations on the Two last Chapters of Mr. Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. An Inquiry into the Secondary Causes which Mr. Gibbon has assigned for the rapid Progress of Christianity. A most very valuable though but little known.

In answer to Mr. Davis Mr. Gibbon published "Vindications of certain Passages in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters of his History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." In answer to Mr. Davis's strictures, in the publications noticed by, and among the general observations and credibility of the Gospels are vindicated, and several controverted points of no small importance are considered.

The authority of St. Matthew's, St. Mark's, and St. Luke's Gospels has lately been attacked by Mr. Evanson, in his work, entitled "The Dissonance of the four generally received Evangelists, and the Authority of their respective Narratives examined." To this Dr. Priestley has given an answer, in the second part of his Letters to a Young Man. As the controversy is of a very recent date, I will not enter into productive of further publications.

5. We cannot find that there was any contest between the Jews and the neighbouring nations, concerning the antiquity of Moses and the origin of the Jewish religion, though several of them pretended their religious institutions to be much older; as appears especially by those two excellent books which Josephus has written against Appion, expressly on this subject.

1, 5. 6. There is reason to believe that the Jewish religion has been of considerable antiquity, and was founded by Moses about the time mentioned above. Q. E. D.

Grot. de Verit. lib. i. § 16. p. 63—66. Jenk. of Chris. vol. i. p. 95—109.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It may not be improper here to illustrate gr. 4. by giving an account of several ancient authors among the Pagans, by whose testimony it is confirmed.

1. Manetho, Cheremon, Apollonius, and Lysimachus, besides some other ancient Egyptians and Greeks, whose histories are now lost, are expressly quoted by Josephus, as extant in his days; and passages are collected from them, in which they agree that Moses was the leader of the Jews when they departed from Egypt, and the founder of their laws; though some of these writers intermix with their story many ridiculous and infamous circumstances, which the Jews have always denied; but from the quotation of which we may assure ourselves, that the authors quoting the passages in question took them honestly and exactly as they found them.

Jos. against Appion. lib. i. § 26. p. 1352—1354. Ed. Huds. p. 1055, Cologn. Ibid. § 32. p. 1357, 1358; lib. ii. § 34. p. 1370, 1380.

And Eusebius brings passages to the like purpose from Eupolemus and Artapanus; but as for those long quotations he afterwards brings from the tragedies of Ezekiel and Demetrius upon the same subject, as the authors seem to have been Jews, if not Christians, they are placed with less propriety among the testimonies now under examination.

Eus. Præp. Ev. lib. ix. cap. 26—29. Clayton's Vind. of the Old Testament. p. 128.

2. Strabo (Geog. lib. xvi.) gives an account of the Law of Moses as forbidding images, and limiting divine worship to one invisible or rather universal Being; and in consequence of this, bears an honourable testimony to the Jews, as a pious and righteous nation.

Wanb. Div. Leg. vol. i. p. 417, 418. Jackson against Mang. p. 212, 213. edit. 2.

Celsus also refers to this passage of Strabo, and frequently mentions Moses and other persons recorded in the Jewish history, in such a manner as plainly to show he was familiarly acquainted with it.

3. Justin, from Trogus Pompeius, tells us that Moses, whom by mistake he calls the son of Joseph, being driven from Egypt, and leading other exiles, encamped at mount Sinai, and there consecrated the seventh day as a sacred solemnity, or, as he ignorantly expresses it, a perpetual fast.

Just. Hist. lib. xxxvi. c. ii.

4. Pliny the Elder speaks of Moses as eminent among the magicians, probably referring to his power of working miracles.

Plany's Nat. History, lib. xxx. c. i. Lardner's Test. vol. i. p. 339, 340; Works, vol. vii. p. 250.

5. Tacitus mentions Moses as one of the exiles from Egypt, who persuaded the rest of them to commit themselves to him as a celestial guide: and takes further notice of their being conducted by him through the wilderness, relieved in their thirst, and receiving a set of laws from him, of which he gives a large though a very faulty account.

Tacit. Hist. lib. v. c. iii—v. Gord. Tac. vol. iv. p. 476—482. Clayton, ib. p. 132—138.

6. Juvenal mentions Moses as the author of a volume, which was preserved with great care among the Jews, by which the worship of images and eating swine's flesh were forbidden, circumcision and the observation of the Sabbath strictly enjoined.

Juv. Sat. xiv. ver. 96—106.

Before him, Horace has mentioned Judæus Appella, or a circumcised Jew, as a sort of proverb of credulity, probably in reference to their believing so many miraculous events recorded in their sacred books (Hor. Sat. lib. i. § 5. sub fin. comp. Sat. ix. ver. 69, 70.); yet, as he does not expressly mention Moses, (however some have thought he referred to him, Od. ii. ver. 19. which we lay no stress upon, vid. Delph. Not. ib.) we choose not to add him to the catalogue of these writers.

7. Longinus cites Moses as the lawgiver of the Jews, and a person of no inconsiderable character; and adds, that he has given a noble specimen of the true sublime, in his account of the creation of the world.

Long. de Sub. § 9. p. 50. Pearce's edit. 1732. Lardn. Test. vol. iii. p. 105; Works, vol. viii. p. 166—168.

8. Numenius, as quoted by Eusebius and Origen, mentions Musæus, probably Moses, as a leader of the Jews, who, by his prayers, brought dreadful calamities on Egypt, which Jannes and Jambres, those celebrated magicians, were not able to resist: and Eusebius reports it as his saying, that "Plato was only Moses speaking Greek."

Euseb. Præp. Ev. lib. ix. c. viii. Orig. cont. Cels. lib. iv. p. 198, 199. Lardner's Test. vol. iii. c. xxxv. Works, vol. viii. p. 168—172.

9. Chalcidius speaks of Moses as a person of eminent wisdom, more than human eloquence, and as one who pretended to Divine Revelation: but it is much to be doubted whether he were a Pagan, or, as both Eusebius and Fabricius maintain, a Christian Platonist. Vid. Budæi Phil. Hist. c. iv. § 22. note p. 160, 161.

Lardn. ibid. vol. iv. c. xlii.; Works, vol. viii. p. 346—349.

10. Hermippus, an ancient writer of the life of Pythagoras, says that the philosophers did, in many of their rules, imitate the laws of the Jews; but I find not that he expressly mentions Moses as the author of them.

Jos. against Appion. lib. i. § 22. p. 1345. Huds.

11. The Orphic verses, which, though spurious, are generally reckoned of great antiquity, inculcate the worship of one God, as recommended by that law "which was given by him who was drawn out of the water, and received two tables of stone from the hand of God."

Euseb. Præp. Ev. lib. xiii. c. xii. p. 666.

12. Diodorus Siculus, in his catalogue of those lawgivers who pretended to have received the plan of their laws from some deity, mentions Moses, as ascribing his to that God whom he calls Joab, which is probably a corruption of Jehovah.

Diod. Sic. l. i. sub. init. English Trans. p. 49. Gale's Court of the Gent. part i. p. 308.

And in an extract out of his fortieth book, which is preserved by Photius, he gives a large, though in some respects erroneous, account of the Jews; in which he speaks of Moses as a man of illustrious prudence and courage, who settled the Jews in their land, and instituted their religion and laws, forbidding them images, as he pretends, on pantheistic principles, divided them into twelve tribes, established the priesthood among them with a judicial power, and adds several other particulars, which, though mingled with mistakes, are of great importance.

Diod. Sic. ap. Phot. Bib. No. 244. p. 2041. 2052.

13. Dion Cassius (lib. xxxiii.) speaks of the Jews as worshipping a Being of unutterable Majesty and of an invisible nature: but I find not that he mentions Moses as giving them those ideas of him.

14. Varro mentions the Romans as having agreed with the Jewish nation in that first worship of theirs without images, of which he declares his approbation. Var. ap. Aug. de Civ. Dei, iv. 31.

15. Philemon, in the days of Alexander the Great, has some verses which seem to be a kind of translation from part of the Decalogue; so that there can be no reasonable doubt of his being acquainted with it, though he says nothing of Moses. See the verses in Reading on the Spirit. Serm. vii. p. 266.

And if Phocylides were indeed, as is generally thought, a Heathen poet, before Christ's time, he may justly be joined to Philemon, as he has plainly translated many of the Mosaic laws, though he does not expressly mention their author.

16. Justin Martyr expressly says, That most of the historians, poets, lawgivers, and philosophers, of the Greeks, mention Moses as the leader and prince of the Jewish nation; and particularly enumerates Polemon, Appion of Possidon, Ptolemy Mendesius, Hellanicus, Philocorus, Castor, Thallus, and Alexander Polyhistor, besides those taken notice of above; and adds, what it is very important to observe, that they took their account of Moses, not from the Jews, but the Egyptian priests, whence it is well known they collected most of their learning.

Just. Cohortatio ad Gent. p. 9—11. Huet. Dem. Pr. iv. c. ii. p. 49, &c. Calm. Dict. vol. ii. p. 236—238.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It may not be improper here to add, That Josephus has insinuated, that the shepherd kings, whom Manetho mentions as making so great a figure in Egypt, and at length expelled, were Israelites; and Dr. Morgan has grafted a great many false and absurd things relating to the Jewish history upon that supposition: but a late ingenious writer has entirely overthrown the foundation of that notion, as well as justly exposed Morgan's wild superstructure; and has advanced some reasons worthy of consideration, to prove that the shepherd kings were Arabians, and descendants of Ishmael.

Morg. Mor. Phil. vol. iii. p. 73. Theophilus Cantabrigiensis Vind. of Anc. Heb. Hist. pass. præs. Rem. xxv. p. 53—61. Jos. Cont. App. l. i. § 14—16.*

LECTURE CXXI.

PROPOSITION CV.

The ancient Jews, before the time of Christ, had books among them, bearing the titles of those which make up what we Protestants call the Books of the Old Testament; and a catalogue of which may be seen at the beginning of any of our Bibles.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The books of the Old Testament are still extant in the Hebrew and Chaldee languages, with such marks of purity as prove them to be very ancient.

2. There was a Greek translation of them, in the days of Ptolemy Philadelphus, which was laid up in the Alexandrine Library, collected by him.

Prid. Connec. vol. ii. p. 27—47. præs. p. 27—35. 44—47. Jos. Ant. l. xii. c. ii. Eus. Eccles. Hist. lib. v. c. viii. Vales. Not.

3. It is generally thought by learned men, that Onkelos published his Targum, i. e. the Chaldee paraphrase on the law, and Jonathan his on the Prophets, either before or very near the time of Christ, which plainly shows the original Hebrew to have been older.

Calmet Dict. in Onk. and Jonath. Prid. Con. vol. ii. p. 531—538. 542—545.

4. Josephus gives us an obscure kind of catalogue of the sacred books among the Jews, in which he expressly mentions the five books of Moses, thirteen of the Prophets, four of Hymns and Moral Precepts. Now, if we, with many critics, allow that Ruth was added to Judges, and Lamentations to Jeremiah, then this number will agree with those which make up our Old Testament.

Josephus ag. Appion, lib. i. p. 1036. Col. edit. p. 1333. Huds. Prid. Con. vol. i. p. 331, 332. Jennings's Jew. Antiq. vol. ii. p. 373.

5. Both Jews and Christians, from the time of Christ, have generally agreed to receive those books which make up our Old Testament as genuine. As to the attempt that has been made to introduce others, called the Apocrypha, which will hereafter be examined, it does not affect the present question, any further than as the Jews rejecting these books, may be considered as an argument of their care in examining those they admitted.

6. The quotations made from the Old Testament in the New, which we have already proved to be genuine, do evidently infer the existence of those books from whence they were taken; and also show by the way, that the Jews did not only receive them as authentic, but divine,—as Josephus also, in the preceding reference, assures us that they did in the strongest terms; and it is observable, that all the books of the Old Testament are cited in the New, except Judges, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and perhaps Chronicles; insomuch that, on the whole, the express quotations from, or references to, the Old Testament in the whole volume of the New, are computed at about [illegible]. Vid. Index to Mr. Leeser's edition of the New Testament.

7. Melito, Gregory Nazianzen, Origen, Athanasius, Hilary, Epiphanius, Jerom, and several later writers, have given us catalogues of the books of the Old Testament; in which none of ours are omitted, excepting Ruth, which is left out in some, because perhaps included in Judges.

8. The Samaritans, who separated from the Jews

* Much has been said by chronologers concerning the number of kings, and different conclusions have been formed accordingly. The matter is not of great importance. Mr. Jackson [illegible] Lord Gaynsky to the Settlement of the Israelites in [illegible] Newton supposes the shepherds to have been Canaanites, and Mr. Bryant, it may remember, from them and [illegible] Americans. Mr. Brookes, in his Universal Gram. Use of Scripture, [illegible] expressions, coincides in opinion with Thompson. Cantabrigiensis, [illegible] Upon record, was Dr Squire, afterwards Bishop of [illegible] many hundred years before the birth of Christ, have in their language a Pentateuch, in the main exactly agreeing with the Hebrew.

Prid. Con. vol. i. p. 416—418. Dupin on the Can. vol. i. c. i. § 2—5. Calmet's Dict. vol. ii. p. 599, 600. Kennicott's Dissert. on the Hebrew Text, vol. i. p. 337, &c. Kennic. Account of his Collation, p. 145.

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. 9. Valet propositio.

Lowsd. Diss. Phil. p. 54—62. Jenk. on Christianity, vol. ii. p. 84—94.

COROLLARY.

Sir William Temple's insinuation, That there are no Hebrew records now extant, older than the Augustan age, is most wild and arbitrary; and so contrary to strong and direct evidence, and indeed to common sense, that one would believe he intended to except the Old Testament, though he expresses himself in so unguarded a manner.

Temp. Misc. vol. ii. p. 36. 2d edit.

SCHOLIUM.

Nothing is said above of that Jewish chronicle called Seder Olam Rabbah; i. e. the Larger Chronicle, on which some have laid so great a stress, as the authority of it is disputed; but the regard which some very learned men have paid to it, makes one wish that the evidence of its authenticity, and the importance of its contents, may be set in a clearer and easier light than that in which it has hitherto appeared; for if it be indeed true that its author was master to the compilers of the Mishna, it must be worthy an attentive inquiry.

Prid. Con. vol. ii. Pref. p. 20.

PROPOSITION CVI.

The books of the Old Testament, which the ancient Jews had among them in Christ's time, were in the main genuine.*

DEMONSTRATION I.

From external evidence.

Prop. 104. 1. Considering what evidence there is that there was such a person as Moses, and that he was lawgiver of the Jews, there is reason to believe that he would write his institutions, since there was such proper and important occasion for doing it.

Prop. 104. Schol. 1. No. 6, 7, 9, 11. 2. Several of the authors enumerated above speak of Moses as a writer, as well as a lawgiver.

3. In the nature of things, it is very probable that, in a polity so founded as that of Moses appears to have been, occasions of writing histories and laws should have occurred, and that religious teachers, rising in different ages, should, by their writings, as those of other religions have done, endeavour to enforce an institution which they at least supposed to be divine.

4. The persons to whom the books of Moses and the succeeding writers were first proposed, were capable of judging whether they were genuine or no; and there is no reason to believe they would have received them with such extraordinary regard, as it is well known the Jews paid to them, if they had not been well satisfied on that head; and considering how highly those books were regarded by all the pious Jews, and how much even their civil affairs depended upon them, we cannot suppose that an entire change of them could have been attempted, without being discovered and rejected with the utmost indignation.

1—5. Prop. 105. 6. There is reason to believe that the books of the Old Testament, which the ancient Jews had among them, were genuine. Q. E. D.

DEMONSTRATION II.

Taken from internal arguments.

1. Many of the facts recorded in the Old Testament are of so extraordinary a nature, that if the books giving an account of them had been forged, the very circumstance of their being before unknown, would have been a sufficient argument against receiving any books that contained an account of them.

2. Many of the institutions contained in their laws were so burthensome, and some of them, humanly speaking, so hazardous, or rather so certainly ruinous to any nation not secured by an extraordinary providence correspondent to them, (especially those relating to the Sabbatical year, the resort of all the males to Jerusalem, and the prohibition of cavalry,) that forged books, containing such precepts, would probably have been rejected with the greatest abhorrence.

Bennet on Script. p. 72—74. Sherl. on Proph. Diss. iv. Warb. Div. Legat. vol. ii. p. 462, 463. Discourse on the Proofs of the Books of Moses, at the end of Pascal's Thoughts, French edition.

3. The great variety observable in the style of these books, makes it improbable they should have been the work of one, and the unity of design that they should have been the invention of many; for if these supposed inventors lived in different ages, they could not have consulted with each other; and if they lived in the same age, the largeness of their plan would only have subjected them to new difficulties, without being likely to answer any valuable end, and he who could be weak enough to embarrass a scheme with so many unnecessary articles, must probably have wanted a genius capable of managing them all so well.

Jortin's Rem. on Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 41—45.

* As a general reference on this subject see Leland's Answer to Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study of History, p. 41—56. Farmer's Editor. — See also Leland's View of Deistical Writers, vol. ii. p. 38—40. Farmer.

The same remark may also be applied to the New Testament, though the external arguments for the genuineness of it are so strong, that it did not seem necessary to insist upon this hint.

Mill. Prop. vol. i. p. 98.

4. The provision that was made for reading the law publicly every seventh year, at the Feast of Tabernacles, (when it is probable the copies kept in private hands might be compared with that laid up before the Lord,) Deut. xxxi. 9—13. 24—26. and the injunction on the king to transcribe it with his own hand, (Deut. xvii. 18—20.) would be a probable means of preventing corruption; and adds an evidence to the genuineness of these writings, much greater than can be found with regard to others of the most ancient authors.

The charge also given to private persons to make themselves familiarly acquainted with the contents of the law, and to teach it their children, deserves to be mentioned under this head, as an institution of the greatest importance for keeping it uncorrupted (Deut. 6—9, and sim.); and which indeed, according to the remark of Josephus in the preceding reference, had an extraordinary efficacy to this purpose.

1, 2, 3, &c. 4. 5. Valet propositio.

Nich. Conf. vol. iv. p. 17—22, 12mo edit.; 8vo edit. vol. ii. part iv. p. 10, 13. Jenkins on Christ. vol. i. p. 169—187.

LECTURE CXXII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it is objected, That the degeneracy of the Jews, according to their own history, and their disregard to the institutions of Moses, together with the scarcity of books in those early ages, and the various oppressions which they suffered under their enemies, might occasion the loss of authentic copies, and give some designing priests an opportunity of substituting others in their room; especially might this happen when the Book of the Law was said to be found in the reign of Josiah, (2 Kings xxii. 8, &c.) or during the time of the Babylonish captivity; but to this it is answered,

1. This at best is no more than a conjecture, without any positive proof of such a forgery.

2. It is uncertain whether, if such a fraud had been attempted, it could have succeeded at either of the times mentioned, though they are indeed the most probable which can be assigned; for, not to insist upon the possibility there is, that the writing found in Josiah's reign was only the last chapter of Deuteronomy, that awakening passage of Scripture,—were we to suppose it to have been the whole Pentateuch, perhaps Josiah might before have had some copy of the law, though not equally perfect with the original which had been found in the temple; and he might be more powerfully struck with hearing it read in the circumstances there described, though he had not been before an entire stranger to the contents of it, which it is certain he was not, considering the reformation he had before made, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3, &c. There were probably some copies of the law remaining in other hands, as there certainly were during the time of the captivity. See Dan. ix. 11—13. to which may be added Ezra iii. 2—5; vi. 18—21. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22. Ezra i. 1. Neh. viii. 1—8. So that it appears to be an idle tale, which so many of the Christian fathers borrowed from the Jews, that Ezra, by divine inspiration, restored the sacred books, after they had been entirely lost.

Euseb. Eccles. History, v. 8. Vales. Not. Prid. Con. vol. i. p. 329. Jennings's Jewish Antiq. vol. i. p. 172.

3. There is not the least probability that such laws as those which are now to be found in the Old Testament, were forged at any time, especially on such an occasion; since nothing could have been more imprudent, upon the principles of human policy, than such precepts as those mentioned in Prop. 106. Dem. 2. gr. 2. which would have been peculiarly liable to exception, when Israel was so surrounded with enemies, and straitened in their possessions, as they were both in the days of Josiah and Ezra. Nor can we imagine that to these Ezra would have added that precept, on which they were obliged to put away their strange wives, which was so tender a point, and might have produced such fatal divisions; considering how many had married such, and how considerable some of them were both by birth and alliance, and how many foreign families would be made their enemies by such divorces; some of them were also priests and Levites, who must have been privy to the forgery, if there had been any. So that, upon the whole, there is so little reason to suspect Ezra as the inventor of these precepts, that it is an instance of the impartial regard he had for the original, that he would retain them at so great a hazard; Ezra ix. x; Neh. xiii. 23—29. a remark also applicable in some degree to Josiah.

Bacon. on the Art. p. 83. 84. Evans's Chris. Temp. vol. ii. p. 375—377. Millar's Prop. vol. i. p. 88—94. Allix's Refl. vol. i. p. 32. 33. Shuckford's Connexion, vol. ii. p. 337. Leland against Tind. vol. ii. p. 123—142.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is further objected, That it is impossible that Moses should have been the author of the Pentateuch, or Samuel, or Nehemiah, of those books which go under their name: since many circumstances are recorded in them which did not happen till many years after their death. Vid. Gen. xii. 6. xxii. 14. xxxvi. 31. Exod. xvi. 35. (compared with Josh. v. 12.) Numb. xii. 3. Deut. ii. 12: iii. 11. 14. xxxiv. 5. &c. 1 Sam. xv. to the end of the 2d of Samuel. Neh. xii. 10. 11. where the catalogue of high priests is carried down to the time of Alexander the Great.

To that part of this objection which may affect the Pentateuch, some have replied, That Samuel might have been the author of those books which are called The Books of Moses, because they treat of him; as those of Samuel are named after that prophet, because his history made so considerable a part of them. Among others, Sir Isaac Newton and Lord Barrington suppose Genesis, and the other historical books before Moses's time, to have been written by Samuel, and for this purpose quote Acts iii. 21, 24. but this is so directly contrary to many other Scriptures, that it is strange that any should patronize the opinion, especially when comparing 1 Sam. ii. 10. and 2 Sam. xxiii. 3—5. which may afford so easy and beautiful an illustration of the above-mentioned text in Acts, on which Barrington lays his chief stress. (See Grey on the last words of David.) The Scriptures to which this hypothesis is most directly contrary, are 2 Chron. xxiii. 18. Daniel ix. 11. 13. Mal. iv. 4. Mark vii. 10: xii. 19. Luke xvi. 29, 31. xx. 28. 37. xxiv. 27, 44. John i. 45; v. 46, 47.

Berriman. Essays on Divine Dispensations. App. No. iv.; Works, vol. iii. p. 197—208. Newton on Daniel, c. i.

Therefore, waving this, it seems more reasonable to say (as the most ancient Jewish writers since the time of the Old Testament assure us) that Ezra published a new edition of the books of Moses, in which he inclosed those passages as notes, which perhaps afterwards crept into the text, by mistake of the transcribers; although indeed, with regard to many of the passages alleged, it is evident there is no absurdity at all in supposing them to have been written by Moses himself. Perhaps Simon the Just might also make some additions to those books which were written after Ezra's time.

Prideaux. Con. vol. i. p. 342. 345. 573—575. Kidder on the Pent. vol. i. Diss.

SECTION V.

As for Father Simon's hypothesis, That the Pentateuch was formed from some loose writings of the annals of Moses, and that many of the leaves were transposed, the reasons on which it depends are so inconsiderable, that it seems not necessary to give a more particular view of it.

Simon. Crit. Hist. Old Test. p. 86. &c. Dupin on the Can. vol. i. c. iii. § 1. p. 68—75. Du Pin. Crit. vol. iv. p. 26. 46. vol. ii. p. 9. 10. 8vo. Marsh's Publication of the Four Books of Moses examined.

SECTION VI.

Under the second step of the second Demonstration, we might have mentioned the omission of the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, on which Dr. Warburton has insisted so largely in his learned work, called The Divine Legation of Moses; but as that argument is intended to prove not only the genuineness, but also indeed the divine authority, of those books, it may be proper to state it alone elsewhere. We shall only add here, That there is reason to suspect whether, allowing the argument to be valid, it be of so great importance as the ingenious author supposes, seeing it depends upon so many nice questions; v. g. how far it is certain that Moses has omitted it?—how far such an omission is peculiar to him as a legislator?—how far it proves its dependence upon an equal Providence?—what that equal Providence was?—whether personal or national?—and how far the expectation of it, or ground for that expectation, was a thing peculiar to the Jews? On all these accounts, the argument is much more complex, and seems less certain and less striking, than similar arguments, drawn from Moses's having laid it down as a fact certainly to be depended upon, That a treble crop should attend the sixth year of tillage from the Sabbatical (Lev. xxv. 21.) and that the family of Aaron, in its male line, should never be extinct, nor ever want an adult heir free from those blemishes that would have rendered him incapable of service: which nothing but a full consciousness of a divine legation, could have warranted so wise a man in making fundamental to his system.

Warb. Mos. Works, vol. i. p. 381—384.

LECTURE CXXIII.

PROPOSITION CVII.

The Old Testament, as now extant in the Hebrew, is in the main what it originally was.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 106. 1. The Old Testament, as extant in the time of the Jews who were contemporary with Christ, was genuine.

2. Such as it was in the time of Christ, it came early into the hands of the Christians, and has continued in their hands ever since; so that the Jews could not have been able to make any considerable alteration in it, had they been ever so desirous of it while the Christians were such a guard upon them, in a matter on which so much of the evidence of Christianity has at least been supposed to depend; nor, on the other hand, could the Christians corrupt it without the discovery of the Jews, who would never have spared them, could they have proved such an attempt on records which they esteemed so sacred, by persons for whom they had such an implacable aversion.

3. There have been many ancient versions, which are yet extant in the Polyglot Bible, in which there is such an agreement in the main, both with the original and with each other, as we cannot suppose there could have been, had the original been corrupted after the date of those versions, of which some are of considerable age.

The most considerable versions to which we refer above, besides the Seventy, were the Targums, or Chaldee Paraphrases, which, if later than Christ's time, were yet very ancient; the Greek of Theodosian, Aquila, and Symmachus; the Syriac, the Arabic, Ethiopic, and Persian, besides the old Italic: of all which see Jones and Walton, referred to below.

4. In latter ages, the Masorites have expressed a great and even superstitious care in keeping the copy of the Old Testament as incorrupt as possible, numbering even the lines, the words, and the letters, in each book; and though this care may be said to come late, i. e. about the year 500, it is to be remembered, it extends to those ages in which Christians were most ignorant of Hebrew, and the Jews had some learning; so that, perhaps, had they been disposed to corrupt their Scriptures, they might have done it then with the greatest safety; in which view, there seems to be something very providential in this exact scrupulosity of theirs at such a period. See Pref. to Van Hooght's ed. of the Heb. Bib.

1, 2, 3, and 4. 5. The Old Testament, as extant in the Hebrew, is in the main uncorrupted.

Jones's Cri. Acct. v. iv. p. 70—74. c. xiii. xiv. xvi. xvii. xviii. MS. Turret. vol. i. Loc. ii. quæst. x. § 9—13. Wetstein's Prol. to Proleg. Bibl. Dr. Gill's Pref. to his Dissc. on the Heb. Lang. part. i.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this some object the difference which there is in many places between the Seventy and the Hebrew; some of which variations are of great moment, especially in chronology. To this we may reply,

1. That it is reasonable to believe the Seventy may have been altered in some places, or the Hebrew mistaken by the first translators, which may account for several differences.

2. If it be supposed that the Hebrew points were of later invention, a supposed difference in them will account for a vast number of variations in the Seventy; and the similarity of several Hebrew letters will account for many more.

3. The Seventy itself attests the truth and exactness of vastly the greater part of the Hebrew Bible, even if it should be granted that this translation is preferable to the original; which yet is a concession by no means to be made. Now the proposition does not assert, That there are no errors at all in the Hebrew copy; the contrary to which the difference between the Keri and Kethib does evidently show.

Prid. Conn. vol. i. p. 331. Shuckford's Conn. vol. i. p. 28—72. Wonder's Hist. of Kennl. vol. i. c. xvi. Hallet's Notes on Scripture, vol. i. p. 118—120.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is further objected, That many passages quoted in the New Testament, and in the writings of the Christian fathers, are very different from the correspondent passages as they now stand in the Hebrew; and that some words are introduced as quotations, which are nowhere to be found. Now if with some we suppose, that those early Christian writers quoted from the Seventy, the objection will then coincide with the former; but as for reasons to be given elsewhere, we do not grant that:—we answer,

1. Perhaps they quoted from their memory; which is the more probable, as sometimes the same passage is quoted by different authors in very different words, even where the sense agrees.

2. The sense of the passages supposed to be lost is still to be found in the Old Testament, though the words be not, especially Matt. ii. ult. John vii. 38. Yet, if it were to be granted, That some of the verses originally belonging to the Old Testament are lost, it would not be at all inconsistent with the truth of our proposition, which only opposes general, material, and designed corruption.†

Dod. Chris. Exp. in loc. cit.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is further objected, That many of the Christian fathers complain that the Jews had corrupted the Old Testament, in order to weaken the proofs of Christianity from thence.

Ans. Justin Martyr, and some others who advance this charge, were only acquainted with some Greek versions, which, whether it were the Seventy or not, must be hereafter considered; and believing the divine authority of them, they charge all the variations which are to be found in the Hebrew, as the Jews quoted it, to be corruptions of their own; and sometimes they may mean only false interpretations.

† [illegible]

Collins's Grounds, part ii. c. i. ii. v. Whist. Ess. &c. Prop. xii. Carpzovius's Def. &c. c. ix. Jones's Crit. Lect. c. iv. § 75—85. MS. Middleton's Inq. p. 41—43.

SCHOLIUM I.

Nevertheless, we may, consistently with the truth of the proposition, allow, That some alterations have happened in transcribing; many of which were undoubtedly undesigned, because they could answer no imaginable end. Sometimes a very small mistake in a transcriber would greatly alter the sense, as Psal. xxii. 17. and it seems, on comparing all the arguments, we may safely conclude, that if there have been any designed alterations in the Old Testament, they must have been made between the time of Christ and the rise of the Masorites, in the third century; and then the alterations would be of such a kind, as to be prejudicial rather than favourable to Christianity; so that, whatever arguments in proof of Christianity can be brought from the Old Testament, the force of them will not be at all diminished, should we allow some designed variations; but indeed it is not in the nature of things very probable, either that, leaving those important passages which yet remain, they would have corrupted the rest for so little reason, or that, believing (as we are sure they did) the divine original of the Scriptures, they would upon any terms have corrupted them designedly, i. e. have destroyed what they thought divine, so far as in them lay, to substitute something human in its stead. Compare Deut. iv. 2; xii. 32. Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

Hallet on Script. vol. ii. p. 109, 110. Leland's View of Deist. Writ. vol. ii. p. 302—307.

LECTURE CXXIV.

PROPOSITION CVIII.

The history of the New Testament is in the main credible; i. e. there is as great regard to be paid to it as is due to other histories of allowed character and reputation.

LEMMA TO DEMONSTRATION.

It is reasonable to believe that the history recorded in the New Testament is, in the main, agreeable to those facts which were asserted by the first preachers, and received by the first converts of Christianity; for if there had been any remarkable inconsistency between them, those first converts could not have received the books of the New Testament as genuine, which yet we have already proved that they did.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 103. 1. The several books of the New Testament were written by those who were personally concerned in many of the facts they relate, and who had the best opportunities of being informed concerning the most important of those other facts which they have recorded. This especially appears with respect to Matthew, Peter, John, Paul, and Luke, at least so far as he wrote of several of Paul's journeys, in which he himself attended him.

1. 2. The authors of the New Testament were capable of giving us a true account of the facts they have undertaken to record,—and if what they have written were false, it must have been a designed forgery; for there is nothing which looks like lunacy in any of their writings; least of all can we imagine that such a number of madmen could have agreed in so consistent a story!

3. There are the greatest marks of integrity in their writings,—both in the simplicity of their style and the faithful manner they relate circumstances, which might bring reflection on their own character and their Master's.

Roll. Man. d'etud. vol. ii. p. 420—426. West on the Resurr. p. 344—363.

4. There are also in their writings the most genuine traces of a pious and benevolent temper, of a contempt of suffering and death itself, when they might be called to meet it in the cause of truth. Upon the whole, it seems the design of their writings,—to carry virtue in all its branches to the sublimest degree, even beyond what any of the Heathen moralists did or attempted; and, so far as we can judge by their strain and manner, they appear like good men, bringing out of the treasure of their hearts good things.

3, 4. 5. Their character seems, on the whole, such as may give us a probable expectation that they would speak the truth to the best of their knowledge; and there must have been at least some circumstances of strong temptation to engage them knowingly to deviate from it, especially in points of so great importance as those which by their writings they were labouring to carry; nor ought we by any means lightly to believe that persons, whose characters at first view appear so fair and honourable, would engage in a design so much to the dishonour of God and injury of men's souls and bodies, as theirs must have been, if their testimony were false; since they laboured to turn men's devotion into a wrong channel, and to engage the most upright of mankind, and those who were their best friends, in a cause which was likely to ruin both themselves and their families.

6. Considering how incredible their story seemed at the first hearing, and how contrary it was both to the passions and secular interests of mankind, they had no temptation to attempt a fraud of this nature in expectation of any worldly advantage; but might depend upon such persecutions and oppositions as many of the first professors of Christianity appear to have met with, and as they themselves in their writings tell us they both encountered and expected.—See the texts under Sch. 4.

5, 6. 7. There is no reason to believe that they would in this instance attempt to impose upon us.

8. The persons to whom they addressed themselves, would be inclined to do their utmost to discover the fraud, if there were room to suspect any; considering that the doctrines of the first teachers of Christianity evidently tended to fix an odium upon the Jewish rulers, to destroy peculiar privileges and emoluments both of the Jewish and Pagan priests, to oppose all the superstitious regard paid to deified emperors, and the idolatries which mingled themselves in their most pompous games and spectacles: that it poured contempt upon those things for which the Gentile orators and philosophers were ready to value themselves most; and, on the whole, required such eminent degrees of humility and universal virtue, as were exceedingly opposite to that pride and wickedness which so generally prevailed both among Jews and Gentiles. West on the Res. p. 110—128. pras. p. 420—423.

9. A fraud like this, if it were a fraud, might very easily have been detected,—seeing they bore their first testimony in the very place and age in which Christ is said to have been crucified, and to have risen from the dead (as appears from what was observed of the early prevalency of Christianity in Judea, Prop. 98. gr. 4.); and as the persons, whose character and interest were chiefly affected by it, had the civil power in their own hands, no doubt the thing would be thoroughly canvassed; and if it had appeared false, would have been immediately exposed. Besides, wherever they came, they attested facts of such a nature, as might easily have been discovered on the spot; not merely asserting that they had seen Christ and some of his followers work miracles, but that they themselves had such a power; nay, that they communicated extraordinary gifts of the Spirit to their hearers, producing so sensible an effect, as the speaking languages they had never learnt. Paul particularly appeals on this occasion both to the Corinthian and Galatian churches, and argues with them on these facts, even when his interest among them was beginning to decline; so that, on the whole, multitudes must immediately and certainly have known whether the great facts they asserted were true or not.

9. 10. Had the story which the apostles told been a forgery, it would, no doubt, have been quickly discovered, and rejected with the utmost abhorrence.

Prop. 98 and 103. 11. Nevertheless, it gained a very great degree of credit in Judea, Greece, Italy, and other places; and vast numbers of persons, in that very age in which these things are said to have been taught and done, were so fully persuaded of the truth of Christianity, that as it appears from the writings of the apostles to the primitive churches, as well as from other ancient monuments, they cheerfully ventured their estates and lives upon a confidence of the truth of those facts, which the first preachers of the Gospel taught.

2, 7, 10, 11. Lem. 12. Since the writers of the New Testament were neither liable to be deceived themselves in the facts they relate, nor would have been inclined to attempt imposing on the world by such a forgery; and since their history met with that acceptance and success in the world which, without the support of truth, it could never have found, there is abundant reason to believe it is true. Q. E. D.

Dod. Ten Serm. No. ix. per tot. Gastrell's Certainty of Christian Rev. p. 250—272. Bp. Burnet's Four Discour. p. 27—35. Mass. Theol. Works, p. 223—227. Baxter's Works, vol. ii. p. 110—113; part ii. c. vii. § 17—29. Ditton on the Res. part iii. § 21—34. p. 251—278. Barnet on the Art. p. 59—64. Test against Tind. p. 135—137. Barrow's Works, vol. ii. p. 304—312. Sermons on the Creed, No. xxix. Bulkley's Economy of the Gospel, i. 3. Hodges's Serm. No. viii. passim. Macknight on the Truth of the Gosp. Hist book iii. c. ii. p. 421—478.

LECTURE CXXV

SCHOLIUM 1.

To the credibility of the Gospel History, some have objected our Lord's not appearing in public after his resurrection, which might have been the most effectual method of convincing the Jews; but it may be replied,

1. It is not certain the Jews would have been convinced even by this, considering the great obstinacy that people showed in a variety of instances in the Old Testament as well as in the New. Compare John xii. 10, 11.

2. God is not obliged to give the highest possible degrees of evidence to any revelation; and these evidences which the New Testament affirms to have been given, were so considerable, both with respect to the number of witnesses and the confirmation of their testimony by miracles, that there is no room to complain, merely because one may imagine how the evidence might have been carried yet higher; especially if we consider how incapable the enemies of Christianity seem to have been of producing evidence on the contrary side.

3. As the former obstinacy of the Jewish people, and their wicked treatment of Christ, abundantly justifies this conduct of God toward them, so if it were to be granted that they would generally have believed upon Christ's public appearance among them, it is difficult to conceive how the prophecies of their rejection for rejecting Christ could have been fulfilled; or that evidence for the truth of Christianity preserved, which now arises from the existence of the Jews as a distinct people, with the records of the Old Testament in their hands. On the whole, therefore, the conduct of Providence in this affair is to be thankfully adored rather than censured.

Woolston's 6th Disc. p. 26—28. Ditton on the Res. part iii. § 60—67. p. 338—352. § 69, 70. p. 361—368. Bp. Burnet's 4th Disc. p. 52—56. Sykes of Christ. p. 162—170. Elem. Christol. vol. iii. p. 494—498. Blackall at Boyle's Lect. Serm. iv. p. 25, 26. Superv. Serm. vol. iv. p. 9—12. Atterb. Post. Serm. vol. i. p. 182—190. West on the Res. p. 296—304. Macken. Harmony, p. 864—866. Hodges's Serm. No. ix. Leland's View, vol. i. p. 157, 158, and 295—298. Miscell. Sacra. vol. ii. p. 77, 78.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is further objected, That there were but very few of the Jews who believed in Christ: and considering that they were the best judges of his claim to be the Messiah, there is reason to suspect that the evidences of it were not sufficiently convincing.

Ans. 1. According to the account given in the New Testament, there were some considerable numbers of the Jews converted on the first publication of the Gospel, and even some who were priests, and consequently lay under peculiar prejudices (vid. Acts ii. 41; iv. 4; vi. 7; xxi. 20.); and also those texts in the epistles, which evidently refer to the Judaizing Christians, and therefore prove that there were considerable numbers of Jewish converts.

2. That the Jewish nation in general lay under very strong prejudices, especially those arising from their expectation of temporal deliverance and grandeur from their Messiah, the peculiar dignity and privileges of their own nation, the perpetuity of the Mosaic law, and the sanctity of the Scribes and Pharisees, as well as the authority of their dictates in matters of religion, besides those arising from the wickedness and immorality of their own characters in that very corrupt age: so that it is not at all to be wondered at that they had a very strong aversion to that teacher and religion, which seemed so expressly levelled against those prejudices. To which we may add, that the force of the argument arising from Christ's miracles would be much diminished, considering the notion they had of the power of magic, and the supposition they thought they had some reason to make, that a false prophet might possibly work them; of which there also remain many traces in the rabbinical writings.

3. We are not to conclude that all who refused to embrace Christianity remained in their hearts unconvinced; for it is certain that the severity of persecution might engage many, who had not a deep principle of religion, to dissemble the inward conviction of their own mind; as it is expressly declared many did.—John xii. 42, 43, &c.

Woolston's 5th Disc. p. 48. Whitby's Cert. of Christian Faith, c. ix. § 9. ad fin. p. 276—280. Burn. 4th Dis. p. 38—41. 56—58. Whitby on Rom. ii. 1. Note b. Lardn. Test. vol. i. c. i; Works, vol. vii. p. 1—24.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is further objected, That the apostles had nothing to lose, and they might at least gain a subsistence, and the fame of being divine messengers, by such a forgery.

Ans. 1. They had at least their lives to lose,—which the poorest of mankind regard as well as others.

2. That if it could be supposed that persons of such low circumstances and education had the most eager desire of fame, they could not reasonably expect to raise their reputation by such an undertaking; but, on the contrary, to expose it to the greatest infamy, besides that the simplicity with which they refer the honour of all they did to their great Master, most evidently shows how far they were from that vain-glorious temper, which the objection pretends to have been so strong in them.—Acts iii. 12, 13; xiv. 15. 2 Cor. iii. 5; iv. 5. 1 Cor. iii. 5—7.

3. That if they had been actuated by mercenary views, they might much more easily have raised their fortune, by renouncing the cause they had undertaken, and discovering the forgery they had invented.

Baxter's Works, vol. ii. p. 111. b. Limborch's Collat. p. 161—163.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is also objected, That the apostles met with but little persecution among the Gentiles; but we answer,

1. That though we acknowledge that the Romans, whose maxim it was to tolerate conquered nations in their own religion, were often a refuge to them at first, yet the Heathen populace in the several cities of Greece and Asia to which they came, frequently rose up against them in a tumultuous manner, and exposed them to the extremest danger.

2. That considering how absolutely all Pagan superstitions were condemned by Christianity, the first preachers of it had great reason to believe, what was indeed fact, that in proportion to the degree in which their doctrines came to be known among the Heathens, persecutions would be raised by the magistrates, and penal laws enacted against them.—Vid. Prop. 101. Schol. 3. and Warburton, quoted there.

3. That the number and power of the Jews were very great in the apostles' days, not only in Judea, but also in other countries; so that, upon the whole, the persecutions of the primitive Christian preachers and hearers were very grievous; as evidently appears from the whole tenor of the New Testament, especially the following passages:—Acts v. 17, 18, 40; vii. 57—60; viii. 1; ix. 1, 2, 23, 24; xii. 1—4; xiii. 50; xiv. 5, 19; xvi. 22, &c.; xvii. 5, 6; xviii. 12, &c.; xix. 29; xx. 3; xxi. 27, 28; xxii. 22; xxiii. 14; xxvi. 10, 11. Rom. viii. 36. 1 Cor. iv. 9—13; xv. 29—32. 2 Cor. i. 8, 9; iv. 8—11; vi. 4, 5, 8, 9; xi. 23—27. Gal. vi. 17. Phil. i. 27—30. Col. i. 11, 24. 1 Thess. i. 6; ii. 14—16. 2 Thess. i. 4—7. 2 Tim. i. 8; ii. 3, 9, 10; iii. 11, 12. Heb. x. 32—34. James ii. 6; v. 10, 11. 1 Pet. ii. 19—21; iii. 14—17; iv. 1, 12—16. Rev. ii. 10, 13; iii. 10.

Lard. Cred. part i. lib. i. c. viii. præs. p. 225—229, 250—264; Works, vol. i. p. 164—201.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Some may perhaps think that if such miracles as the Christians pretend had really been wrought in proof of their religion, it would have been impossible that it should not have met with an earlier and more general regard in the world. So far as the Jews are concerned in this objection, it has been considered above; and so far as it relates to the Gentiles only, it may be answered,

1. That it evidently appears in fact, that many of the pagans had at that time but a very low opinion of miracles, and paid but little regard to them. Mr. Weston has entered largely into several causes that might contribute to this; especially the many ridiculous pretences that were made to them by the professors of divination, and the pretences to oracles and magic; to all which the multitude and intercommunity of their gods would not a little contribute.

2. That where any regard was paid to them, (though if there had been a fair and candid examination, it must soon have appeared that those which were pretended to as countenancing heathenism, were by no means, in point of evidence, comparable to those by which Christianity was supported,) yet the strong prejudices that would lie against it as a new religion, and especially as a religion so opposite to men's secular interests and sinful passions, would prevent a careful and impartial inquiry; and so would dazzle their eyes, and make them prone to disregard the gospel, notwithstanding its miracles were allowed.

3. That the great discouragements under which Christianity lay, while the empire was in the hands of the Pagans, would no doubt engage many to smother the secret conviction of their minds in its favour; but when Constantine declared himself a Christian, most of the opposition against Christianity ceased; which might in many be owing to the dictates of conscience, as being persuaded of the truth of that religion, though in others it might be only a conformity to an establishment.

Weston's Inq. into the Reject. of Christian Mir. pass. præs. c. iii. p. 17—79.

SCHOLIUM 6.

As for those objections which Dr. Tindal has brought against the moral character of the Apostles, in some instances, they are circumstantially confuted by Dr. Foster, Dr. Leland, and others who have written on the other side the question.

Tind. on Chris. p. 220, 221. Fost. ag. Tind. p. 111—132. Leland, ib. vol. ii. c. ii.

SCHOLIUM 7.

The objections which Mr. Woolston has advanced against several miracles related in the New Testament, in his discourse on the miracles of Christ, have been sufficiently answered by almost all his antagonists; the most valuable of which are Mr. Stephenson, Dr. Lardner, Bp. Pearce, and the author of the Trial of the Witnesses. An abstract of their most curious and important thoughts may be seen in our notes on the Harmony of the Evangelists, on those texts which he has excepted against.

Stinehouse's Account of the Controversy.

LECTURE CXXVI.

PROPOSITION IX.

Many material facts, which are recorded in the Old Testament, are also mentioned by very ancient Heathen writers.

* [illegible] Woolston [illegible] Resurrection [illegible]

DEMONSTRATION

1. The Heathens had a tradition among them concerning the original of the world, which bore some visible resemblance to the account which Moses has given of it; particularly the Phœnicians, Indians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, and though they differ considerably from Moses, as to the time of the Creation, we have formerly shown their accounts to be in this respect extravagant and incredible. Vid. Prop. 21. Dem. gr. 2.

Cumberland's Sanchoniathon, p. 1—23. Burnet's Archæol. lib. i. c. i—vi. lib. ii. c. i. Ray's 3 Disc. No. 1. c. i. Ovid's Met. lib. i. Grot. de Verit. with Le Clerc's Notes, lib. i. c. xvi. p. 26—40. Univ. Hist. vol. i. p. 11—17. fol.; p. 23—34, 8vo edit.

2. The division of time into weeks has long prevailed, not only among the inhabitants of Greece and Italy, as we learn from Josephus, Philo Biblius, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Lucian, but also among the Celtæ and Indians, as Philostratus, Dion Cassius, and Justin Martyr assure us; and which we may further learn from the ancient names of the seven days.

Grot. ibid. p. 41, 42. Roll. Hist. Anc. tom. iv. p. 116, French. Selden de Jure N. et Gent. lib. iii. c. xvi—xxiii. præs. c. xvi. et xix.

3. Diodorus Siculus, Plato, Dicæarchus, Calanus the Indian philosopher, quoted by Strabo, and others quoted by Maimonides, and several other writers, mention a state of innocence, and the fall of man: to which it is probable we are to refer what so many writers say of the Golden Age: nor is it an improbable conjecture that the worship of serpents, which has prevailed among so many Heathen nations, may have some reference to that form, in which Moses tells us the tempter appeared to the first human pair.

Grot. ibid. p. 42, 43. Burn. Arch. lib. ii. c. ii. iii. Bate cruc. with Cand. vol. i. p. 80, 81. Jenk. on Christian. vol. ii. p. 246—248. Stilf. Orig. Sac. p. 316—318. Owen on Serp. Diss. iv. v. p. 216—232.

4. The long lives of men in the early ages of the world, are mentioned by Berosus, Manetho, Hiromus, and Helanicus, as also by Hesiod, and many other writers quoted by Josephus, and afterwards by Servius, in his Notes on Virgil.

Grot. ibid. p. 44. Jos. Ant. lib. i. c. iii. § 9.

5. The account which Pausanius, Philostratus, Pliny, and several other writers, give us of the remains of gigantic bodies which have been found in the earth, serve in some degree to confirm Moses's account of the antediluvian giants.

Grot. ib. p. 45. Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. vii. c. xv. Solinus, c. i. with Salm note. p. 9. Annual Register for 1764, part ii. p. 106, 107.

6. Berosus, the Chaldean historian, quoted by Josephus, and Abidenus by Eusebius, Plutarch, Lucian, Molo, Nicholas Damascenus, as well as many of the Heathen poets, mention the Deluge: and some traditions concerning it are to be found among the Americans and Chinese; not to mention what some modern travellers have fabulously related concerning some ruins of the ark, said to remain on mount Ararat, and to have been seen there but a few centuries ago.

Grot. ib. p. 47—52. Ray's 3 Disc. No. ii. c. i. Saurin's Diss. vol. i. p. 131—134. Stilf. Orig. Sac. lib. iii. c. iv. § 8. Univ. Hist. vol. i. p. 112, fol.*

We may add under this head, (that we may not break the order of all that follow,) that Alexander Polyhistor quotes Artapanus and Eupolemus, as mentioning the Tower of Babel; and the former speaks of it as built by Belus. (Eus. Præp. Evan. lib. ix. c. xviii.) Abydenus likewise (ibid. c. xiv.) and Hestiæus (15.) mention the same building, with something of the circumstances attending the disappointment of that enterprise.

7. Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Tacitus, Pliny, and Solinus agree in giving us an account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbouring cities, in the main agreeable to that of Moses; the truth of which is in some measure confirmed by what modern travellers of the best credit have related concerning the phenomenon of the Dead Sea; and Alexander Trallianus mentions a Heathen form of exorcism, "In the name of the God that turned Lot's wife into a pillar of salt."

Tacit. Hist. lib. v. c. vii. Whitby's Cert. of the Christian Faith, p. 36—39. Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. v. c. xvi. lib. xxxv. c. xv. Solinus, c. xxxvi. with Salm. note. Grot. ib. p. 58, 59. Maundrel's Trav. p. 83—86. Univ. Hist. vol. i. p. 576, 577, fol.

8. Herodotus, Diodorus, Strabo, Philo Biblius, and some others, mention circumcision as a rite used by several of those nations into which, according to Moses, Abraham travelled, or which were descended from him, especially by Hagar and Keturah: and if the hypothesis of a late learned author be admitted, that the Egyptians derived it from the Ishmaelite Shepherd-kings, it will be equally to the present purpose. Vid. Prop. 104. Schol. and the references there.

Grot. ib. p. 59, 60. Saur. Diss. vol. i. p. 246, 247.

9. Berosus, Alexander Polyhistor, (from Eupolemus and Melo, more ancient writers than himself,) Damascenus, Artapanus, and other ancient historians cited by Josephus and Eusebius, make express

* Many curious tracts and evidences of the [illegible] Deluge, [illegible] Hutchinson [illegible] Mr. John Beckett's great work, entitled, A new System, or an Analysis of Ancient Mythology. [illegible] [illegible] and honourable mention of Abraham and some of his family, as some of them do also expressly speak of his interviews with Melchisedek. To which we may add the account given of him by Trogus Pompeius as abridged by Justin; nay, Josephus tells us that Hecataeus wrote a whole book of Abraham's life.

Jos. Ant. lib. i. c. vii. § 2. Just. lib. xxxvi. c. ii. Mill. Prop. on Christian. vol. i. p. 114, 115. Eus. Præp. Evan. lib. ix. c. 17—23.

10. Besides the express testimony concerning Moses, Prop. 104. which may properly be referred to this proposition, there are also many fabulous stories of Thoth, Typhon, Hermes, and others, in which many celebrated writers have endeavoured to prove that such traces of his history are to be found, as show he was the person represented under that variety of names.

Heut. Dem. Evang. Pr. iv. c. iii. p. 19—68. Dacier on Hor. lib. i. Od. x. Mill. Prop. Christian. vol. i. p. 167—169. Wits. Ægypt. lib. iii. c. iv. per tot. Jacks. Cred. part ii. § 2. c. viii. ix. apud Op. vol. i. lib. iii. c. 14, 15. Warb. Div. Leg. vol. i. lib. iii. § 3. p. 354—358. vol. i. part ii. p. 130—135.

11. Eupolemus and Dius, as quoted by Eusebius and Grotius, mention many remarkable circumstances of David and Solomon, agreeing with the Old-Testament story; and Herodotus has a remarkable though much controverted passage, supposed to refer to the destruction of the Assyrians in the reign of Hezekiah, in which he mentions Sennacherib by name.

Eus. Præp. Ev. lib. ix. c. 30—34, and 39—41. Jos. Antiq. lib. viii. c. ii. Contr. App. lib. i. p. 1340. Millar, ibid. vol. i. p. 123—127. Prid. Con. vol. i. p. 25. Herod. Hist. lib. ii. c. 141.

12. As for the mention of Nebuchadnezzar, and some of the succeeding kings of Babylon, as well as of Cyrus and his successors, it is so common in ancient writers, as not to need a more particular view of it.

1—12. 13. Valet propositio.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It would be very easy to prove, that many passages of the Old Testament are mentioned by Celsus, and objections against Christianity formed upon them: but he comes too late to be esteemed a witness to them; and all that can be inferred from those passages is, that he had read the Old Testament, probably in the Greek version of it, and that he knew Christians paid a religious regard to it;—neither of which facts are at present in question.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It may not be improper here to mention the monument which Procopius mentions as found in Africa, testifying "that they had fled from the face of the robber Joshua, the son of Nun; though that coming through the hands of a Christian writer, and of one who lived so very long after Christianity was introduced, it did not seem so convenient to insert it among the preceding testimonies.

LECTURE CXXVII.

PROPOSITION CX.

The History of the Old Testament is in the main worthy of credit.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 106, 107. 1. The books of the Old Testament received by the Reformed, (of which alone we speak,) are genuine.

1. 2. Many of the writers of the Old Testament have given us an account of things, in which they were themselves personally concerned, e. g. Moses, Joshua, Samuel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and several of the minor prophets; and consequently they were capable of giving us a true account of what they represented, as having fallen within their own observation and experience.

3. There are great marks of integrity in their writings, not only as they tell their very amazing story with great simplicity, and without apology, excuse, digression, &c. but as they every where write with the deepest sense of God upon their spirit, regarding him as the Author of all events, whose moral as well as natural perfections they every where celebrate, and in whom they seem to have reposed the confidence of their souls, seeking his favour above all, and referring their actions to his glory: they do also most candidly acknowledge their own faults, and the faults of the greatest heroes of their history;—and as for Moses, whose credibility is of the greatest importance to support all the rest, his leaving his family in the circumstances of common Levites, without entailing any peculiar honours or possessions upon them, is as strong a proof of his uprightness as could well be imagined.

Jacks. Cred. p. 20—38. 4to; apud Op. vol. i. lib. i. c. iv. p. 15—28.

3. 4. There is no reason to believe they would attempt to impose upon us, at least unless we can find that they were under some strong temptation to have attempted it.

5. Considering the time in which their writings were published, and also the public and remarkable nature of many of those events which are there recorded, and how many witnesses there must have been to the falsehood of them, if they had been false, they could expect no advantage by attempting to impose upon the world by such forgeries, nor could they have reaped any thing but contempt from it.

Prop. 104. 6. Nevertheless we find that their writings were received as credible by those who were the most capable of judging in the case, and those institutions submitted to on the authority of these facts which would otherwise have appeared very unreasonable and very grievous.

2, 4, 5, 6. 7. There is reason to believe that the History of the Old Testament is true, so far as the authors wrote it upon their own personal knowledge.

8. As for the history of remoter ages, much might be known of it by tradition, considering the long lives of the first men; at least all that was necessary might be learnt by revelation, to which we well know that Moses pretended; and there is such an evident and close connexion between what was written by Moses and other persons mentioned, pr. 2. upon their own knowledge, and what they or others whose names are not certainly known have written in the Old Testament upon tradition or revelation, that he who believes the former to be credible, will easily admit the latter, especially considering that it is one leading fact of the history, that Moses himself was instructed in so extraordinary a manner by God.

Prop. 109. 9. The agreement there is between many facts recorded in the Old Testament, and the testimony of many Heathen historians of considerable note, is a further evidence in favour of its credibility.

7, 8, and 9. 10. The History of the Old Testament is in the main credible. Q. E. D.

Bonnet on Script. p. 116, 117. Mill. Prop. v. i. p. 87, 88, 94—99. Burnet on the Art. p. 83. Still. Orig. Sac. lib. ii. c. ii. § 1, 2, 7—9. c. iii. § 1. 2. Williams at Bagot's Lect. p. 119—121. Jenkins on Christianity, part ii. c. iii. vi. xi. vol. i. p. 132, &c. 151, &c. 296, &c. Leland against Tind. vol. ii. p. 38—42. chap. ii. p. 30—33. 2d edit.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The great ignorance of those Latin and Greek writers which now remain, as to facts which happened very long before their own time, and the peculiar contempt which several of them had for the Jewish nation, arising from the diversity of its customs and institutions, concur with many other considerations mentioned Prop. 99. Schol. 2. to answer any objection which might be raised against the credibility of the Old-Testament History, from the silence of such writers as to many important articles of it.

Jenkins's Reas. of Christianity, vol. i. p. 95, 96. Leland's View, vol. ii. p. 280—293.

SCHOLIUM 2.

We do not particularly mention the supposed absurdities to be found in some parts of the history, because they do not affect the truth of the whole, and will much more properly be considered as objections against its inspiration.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, as we have before proved that it is no absurd thing that God should make a revelation of some things before unknown (Prop. 93.); and as the main body of the Jewish story is taken up in giving an account of such revelations, the proposition must lay a reasonable foundation for our believing that series of prophecies,—which will be the subject of the two next propositions.

LECTURE CXXVIII.

PROPOSITION CXI.

Many Prophets of the Old Testament foretold a variety of events, which it was impossible they should have foreseen, merely by the force of their natural genius and sagacity.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Immediately after the flood, Noah foretold the infamy and servitude of the descendants of Cainan, and the conversion of several Gentile nations descended from Japhet, i. e. the Europeans, to the worship of the true God, who stood in a peculiar relation to the Jews, as descended from Shem.—Gen. ix. 25—27.

Camb. Orig. Gent. p. 427. Whist. Ser. Proph. p. 104—108. Bp. Newt. Diss. on Proph. vol. i. Diss. i. p. 9—36; Works, vol. i. p. 13—27. Jen. Jew. Ant. vol. i. p. 10, &c.

2. The servitude of the Israelites in Egypt, their deliverance from thence, and the extensive dominion they afterwards obtained, were exactly foretold to Abraham. Gen. xv. 13—21.

3. The character and fate of the Ishmaelites was in the most amazing manner foretold to Hagar, Gen. xvi. 12. which is accomplished even to this day, as the Arabians still remain an unconquered people, remarkable above any other for their fierceness and rapine.

Rev. exam. vol. ii. Diss. iv. p. 144—152. Univ. Hist. vol. xx. Newt. Diss. vol. i. Diss. ii. p. 37—48; Works, vol. i. p. 28—41. Rev. exam. v. ii. Diss. iv. Judic. Tr. of Sect. p. 156—168. ap. Op. vol. i. c. 25. 26. p. 115—124.

4. The contests between the Edomites and the Israelites, with the success of them, were foretold to Rebekah, before her children were born, and afterwards by Isaac to his children themselves, with some further circumstances.—Gen. xxv. 23. xxvii. 39. 40.

Newt. Diss. vol. i. Diss. iii. p. 61—84; Works, vol. i. p. 42—58.

5. Many remarkable events, not only relating to himself and his family, but the whole Egyptian nation, were in a wonderful manner predicted by Joseph.—Gen. xxxix—xli.

6. Various surprising circumstances relating to the settlement of the twelve tribes in Canaan, and the occurrences to befall some of them there, were foretold by Joseph upon his dying bed.—Gen. xlviii. xlix.

Sherl. on Proph. p. 341—343. Vid. Patrick on Pyle in Loc. Univ. Hist. vol. iii. p. 314—325.

7. The obstinacy and ruin of Pharaoh, the deliverance of the Israelites from his kingdom, and their serving God at Mount Sinai, were discovered to Moses, Exod. iii. 11, 12. not to mention the prediction of each of the ten plagues, immediately preceding the execution of them.

8. Many remarkable circumstances relating to Israel and the neighbouring nations were foretold by Balaam.—Numb. xxiv. 15—25.

Newton, ib. Diss. v. p. 114—155; Works, ibid. p. 68—90. Whist. Proph. p. 214—221.

9. The various dispensations of God towards Israel in future ages, as well as the circumstances of their settlement in their own land, though decided by the contingency of lots, were foretold by Moses; and their national revolt from God, their destruction by the Romans, with the calamities afterwards attending them, and continuing upon them in part even to this day, have been, and are, a most remarkable accomplishment of the express predictions of their illustrious prophet.—Deut. xxxi. 16. &c. 28—30; xxxii. xxxiii. xxviii. præs. v. 49.

Jacks. ibid. c. 6, 11, 13. p. 131, &c. 174, &c. Ap. Op. vol. i. lib. i. c. xxiii. p. 92. c. xxvii—xxx. p. 123—136.

10. The calamity of Eli's family, and the transferring the priesthood to the descendants of Eleazar, were foretold by Samuel and other prophets.—1 Sam. ii. 31—36; iii. 11—14.

11. The birth of Solomon, his extraordinary prosperity, and that of the Israelites under him, together with the settlement of the crown on his descendants, was foretold by Nathan to David.—1 Chron. xxii. 8—10.

12. The revolt of the ten tribes from the house of David, was foretold by Abijah to Jeroboam, before there appeared any probability of it, i. e. in the midst of Solomon's prosperity.—1 Kings xi. 29—38.

13. The destruction of Bethel and its idolatrous priests, was foretold as to be accomplished by Josiah, who was named on this occasion 300 years before his birth: as well as the destruction of the family of Jeroboam for his continual idolatry; as also the captivity of Israel beyond the Euphrates, then a very distant and very improbable event.—1 Kings xiii. 2, 3, xiv. 10—16.

14. The famine in Israel, their deliverance from the repeated invasions of the Assyrians, the death of Ahab, and ruin of his family by Jehu, with several other events in the reign of Ahab, were foretold by Elijah and other prophets.—1 Kings xvii—xxii.

15. The relief of Samaria, when pressed by a siege, the exaltation of Jehu and Hazael, and the victory of Israel over the Moabites, besides several private and personal events, were foretold by Elisha. 2 Kings vii—xiii.

LECTURE CXXIX

16. The deliverance of the Jews from the conspiracy of Rezin and Pekah, and afterwards the defeat of Sennacherib, and the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, were all foretold by Isaiah; as the last event was also by Jeremiah, Hosea, and many other prophets.

17. The deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, as to be accomplished by Cyrus, (though an event quite unparalleled in its kind,) was foretold by several of the prophets, and particularly by Isaiah, who named Cyrus many years before he was born; and the very date of that deliverance was fixed by Jeremiah to 70 years from the beginning of the captivity.—Isa. xliv. 24—28; xlv. 1—4. Jer. xxv. 11, 12; xxix. 11. Dan. ix. 2. Zech. vii. 5.

18. The calamities which fell upon the Tyrians, the Sidonians, the Egyptians, the Ethiopians, the Edomites, the Moabites, the Ammonites, the Syrians, the Arabians, and many other nations, were expressly foretold by Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos, and several other prophets; and above all, the destruction of Babylon, with such particular circumstances as are really astonishing, and such a prediction of its utter desolation as, humanly speaking, seemed impossible when the prophecies were delivered, and even long after their publication in the world, considering the greatness and magnificence of that city.

Sykes's Con. c. viii. p. 139. Rev. Inc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 272. Fr.

It may be added under this head, that the easy conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, so beautifully described Jer. xliii. 12 and its final abasement, Ezek. xxx. 13, &c. events, considering the extraordinary grandeur of Egypt at that time, and the great confidence of its princes, extremely wonderful in their correspondence with that prediction.

Roll. ib. vol. i. p. 175.

The exact accomplishment of the above-mentioned predictions is well illustrated by Dr. Pri-deaux in his Connexion, and by Dr. Wells in his notes on the minor prophets, and many other writers.

19. The succession of the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman monarchies, several particular circumstances in the history of the Ptolemaidæ, and Seleucidæ, the persecution of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, and even the erection of the Papal kingdom, are foretold by Daniel, Dan. ii. v. vii. viii. xi. xii.; and that part of them relating to the former article is well illustrated by the writers quoted under the last step, as those relating to the latter are by Sir Isaac Newton, in his book on the prophecies; (on which also see Whiston's remarks;) and in some measure by Lowman on the Revelations. See those passages in the several volumes of Rollin's Ancient History, which particularly relate to these prophecies, vol. vi. p. 270 and 289; vol. viii. p. 417 and 583, Fr.*

20. Those prophecies which relate to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the various circumstances which would attend his appearance, are so considerable, that we shall make them the matter of a distinct proposition, and therefore wave the mention of them here. Sykes's Con. c. viii.

COROLLARY 1.

If the genuineness and credibility of the books of the Old Testament be allowed, we have here a most certain proof of the divine foreknowledge of future contingencies,—since there are some things foretold which depended as much as any thing we can imagine upon the volition of free agents: and if it be said, as it is by Mr. Colliber and some others, that God had determined to render those events necessary, and upon that determination foretold them, it is to be considered that some of the events mentioned above, especially gr. 2. 7. 9. are as criminal as any we can imagine: and in some of those instances are foretold by God as crimes, which he would severely punish on those who were the agents in them; which plainly shows that they were not necessarily determined, nor their accountableness in that instance suspended, as Mr. Colliber supposes. Where considerable bodies of men are concerned in the prediction, which is the case in some instances above, the difficulty on this hypothesis is still greatly increased; and indeed it is difficult to say how God could determine upon such supposed necessitating influences as fit, unless (contrary to this hypothesis) he foresaw those circumstances that would render them so.

* Besides the [illegible] Dr. Newton, Dr. Prideaux, the Port-royal [illegible] Abridgment of Calmet, Mr. Whiston's Essay on the Revelation, vol. i. p. 178, 2d edit. 8vo. Dr. Wells's Hist. vol. i. p. 28. The prophecy [illegible] explained by Mr. Abauzit, [illegible] Dr. Hancock, p. 46. M. Jurieu, in his Letters on the Prophecies, and the Romans, as quoted in Daniel, the [illegible] Calmet, Dr. Prideaux, vol. i. p. 216, and Mede's works [illegible]

Collib. Inq. p. 92. Sauria's Serm. vol. i. p. 199. ed. 3.

COROLLARY 2.

Such a series of prophecies as is here described, is a very evident proof of the peculiar presence of God with the Jewish nation; which is further evidenced by the many signal miracles wrought in confirmation of it.

COROLLARY 3.

The accomplishment of many of these prophecies, and especially of those relating to the Christian religion, and to events which happened after the time of Christ, does evidently prove the genuineness and credibility of the books in which they are contained: and it is to be considered as an argument for them, independently on those urged before, Prop. 107, 108. for none can with the least show of reason pretend they were forged since Christ's appearance; and it is most evident that there is such a connexion between one part of the Old Testament and another, and such a mutual dependence, that the whole history must in the main be credible, if those parts of it are allowed to be true in which these prophecies are to be found, especially the books of Isaiah and of Daniel.

Vid. Sykes ubi sup. Hartley on Man. vol. ii. Prop. 30. p. 150.

SCHOLIUM.

The arguments brought against the genuineness of the book of Daniel, are proposed and fully confuted in the following references.

Cal. Lit. Sch. p. 149. Bullock's Vind. p. 181. Chand. Vind. Dan. pass. Newt. Diss. vol. ii. Introd. p. 1; Works, vol. i. p. 275. Lard. Test. vol. iii. c. xxxvii. § 3, 4; Works, vol. viii. p. 184.

LECTURE CXXX.

PROPOSITION CXII.

To collect the chief of those Old-Testament Prophecies which most evidently relate to the Messiah and his kingdom.

SOLUTION.

1. It was foretold by many of the prophets, that the knowledge of the true God should be extended from Jerusalem over the whole earth; and that Pagan idolatry should be entirely, or in a great measure, suppressed by it.—Psalm xxii. 27; lxxxvi. 9. Isa. ii. 1—5. xi. 9. xlv. 22, 23. Jer. x. 11. Zeph. ii. 11. Mal. i. 11. Bullock's Vind. p. 73.

2. Immediately after the fall, as recorded by Moses, intimation was given of some person to descend from the woman, so as to be called her seed.

who should triumph over the enemy that vanquished them, though he should himself receive some damage comparatively small.—Gen. iii. 15.

Chand. Mir. p. 275. Sherl. on Proph. p. 66. Col. Lit. Sch. p. 231. Rev. ex. with Cand. vol. i. p. 47. Midd. Posth. Works.

3. It was foretold to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that all nations should be blessed in their seed; which may naturally signify, that a person to descend from them should be a blessing to mankind.—Gen. xii. 3; xxii. 18; xxvi. 4; xxxviii. 14.

4. Jacob on his dying bed speaks of some victorious person, unto whom the people should be gathered, whom he calls Shiloh, declaring that he should appear before Judah ceased to be a tribe.—Gen. xlix. 10.

Sherl. on Proph. Diss. iii. pass. Mede's Diat. in Loc. Newt. Diss. vol. i. No. iv. p. 85; Works, v. i. p. 53. Jen. Jew. Ant. v. i. p. 76.

5. Moses speaks of a prophet like unto himself, who should be raised up with such proof of divine authority, that all who rejected him should be rejected and destroyed by God; which could not refer to a succession of prophets, since it is expressly said that none of them were like Moses.—Deut. xviii. 18—20; xxxiv. 10.

Coll. Lit. Sch. p. 239. Jeff. true Gro. p. 128. Harris on Mess. Serm. vii. p. 199. Sherl. on Proph. p. 187. Bullock's Serm. in Loc. p. 220. Jort. Rem. on Eccl. Hist. vol. i. p. 196. Newt. Diss. vol. i. No. vi. p. 156; Works, vol. i. p. 90.

6. David foretells a person, who should be owned by God as his Son, to whom universal dominion over the Heathens should be given, and who should punish with utter destruction all that should refuse to submit to his government. Psa. ii. pass. He speaks also of an illustrious and victorious person, whom he calls his Lord, that should likewise be a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedek, Psal. cx.; and this is probably the same glorious Person whom he elsewhere calls God, and of whom he says much more than could be applied to Solomon, or any other temporal prince, both with regard to the excellency of his character and the extent and perpetuity of his kingdom. Psal. xlv. pass. and lxxii. pass. præs. ver. 7, 8, 11, 13, 14, 17. To which add Psal. xxii. 26—31. which, if it be allowed to refer to the same event, then the former part will also appear a prediction that this glorious person should suffer, with circumstances remarkably fulfilled in the death of Christ. See also 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—7. which relates to the glorious reign of the Just One over men, and expresses the final destruction of those that oppose his kingdom, as well as the blessings given by an everlasting covenant to those that should be his faithful subjects.

Grey's Last Words of Dav. Jort. Rem. vol. i. p. 183.

7. Isaiah speaks of an extraordinary child, who should be born of a virgin, of the house of David, whose name should be called Immanuel, who should grow up from infancy to manhood, who should also bear many other illustrious titles, which speak him to be more than human; who should be most eminent for wisdom and piety; and finally, who should establish a most successful and permanent kingdom by very peaceful and gentle methods.—Isa. vii. 14, &c.; ix. 5—7; xi. 1—10; xlii. 1—7.

Collins on Gro. &c. p. 61. Chand. on Mir. p. 261. Green's Lett. to Coll. No. iv. pass. Dod. Fam. Exp. vol. i. p. 39. note. Kennic. on Isaiah vii. 14. Williams's Obs. on ditto.

8. God foretold his purpose of laying a foundation-stone in Zion, whereby all that trust in him should be saved, when others should find that their shelter was swept away by storms of the divine vengeance.—Isaiah xxviii. 16—18.

9. Isaiah likewise foretold an extraordinary appearance of God, which should be attended with the miraculous cure of the blind, the lame, the deaf, and the dumb, and introductory to a state of extraordinary holiness and everlasting joy.—Isa. xxxv. 3—10.

10. The same prophet also foretold the coming of One, who should from the wilderness prepare the way for an extraordinary divine appearance, and bring tidings of a most gracious and compassionate Shepherd.—Isa. xl. 1—11.

11. Isaiah afterwards, speaking of a person to whom the characters gr. 1, 7, 9. do so evidently agree, that we cannot doubt but it is the same mentioned before, adds, that he should be rejected and abhorred of the Israelites; and afterwards, speaking of a person to whom the same characters do belong, foretells his being rejected and wounded, mentions his silent submission under his sufferings, and at length his death and burial.—Isa. xlix. 1—11; lii. per tot.; liii. 1—9.

Collins's Lit. Sch. c. v. § 12. p. 208. Bp. Chand. on Chris. p. 178, 147, ed. 2. Harris's Rem. pass. Burn. Life of Roch. p. 140. Bullock's Vind. p. 147.

12. Nevertheless, in the same period he prophesies of the exaltation and glory of this remarkable person, and the success of his cause in the world; which evidently implies his resurrection from the dead. Isa. liii. 10, 12.—See writers quoted above. In the following chapter he describes a most gracious and important covenant to be made with Jews and Gentiles by him, and such universal proposals of pardon and grace, as would by multitudes be accepted to their great advantage and complete happiness.—Isa. liv. lv. per tot.

13. He does afterwards, in a very pathetic manner, describe the wickedness and ruin of the Jewish nation, foretells nevertheless its recovery and prosperous state, in the most exalted style, as effected by that servant of God, whom he had for that purpose anointed with his Spirit in an extraordinary manner.—Isa. lix. lx. lxi. and lxv.

14. Jeremiah prophesies of a righteous and victorious prince, to be raised up out of the house of David, whose name should be called the Lord our Righteousness; which most naturally implies that, by means of him, his people should be made righteous by God, through the provision of the divine mercy.—Jer. xxiii. 5, 6; xxxiii. 14—16.

15. The same prophet evidently speaks of a new covenant to be made with Israel, which should contain extraordinary provision for divine instruction and the pardon of sin, beyond what had been made by the Mosaic religion.—Jer. xxxi. 31—34. agreeably to the tenor of which it is elsewhere by this prophet foretold, that a plan of religion should be given to God's people, of which the regard then paid to the ark of God, the great centre of their ceremonial worship, should make no part, when all the nations of the world should be incorporated with the Jews, and a lasting reformation should be introduced.—Jer. iii. 16—18.

16. Ezekiel speaks of one great Shepherd, whom, long after the death of David, he calls by the name of that prince, who should be a means of conferring on his people such blessings as Isaiah and Jeremiah had before described.—Ezek. xxxiv. 23—31; xxxvii. 23—26.

17. Daniel foretells a glorious kingdom, which God would erect on the ruins of the four grand monarchies, under the command of one whom he calls the Son of Man, whose empire, though arising from small beginnings, should be both universal and eternal.—Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44, 45; vii. 13, 14.

Sykes on Chris. c. ii. p. 12.

LECTURE CXXXI.

18. Daniel afterwards foretells that in seventy weeks, i. e. probably 490 years after the going out of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem, which seems to refer to that given in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, reconciliation should be made for iniquity, and an everlasting righteousness brought in by one, whom he calls Messiah the Prince, who should be cut off, i. e. put to death, without any demerits of his own; after which the city of Jerusalem should be destroyed, and the sacrifices made to cease, yet not till he had confirmed his covenant with many of his people.—Dan. ix. 24—27.

Prid. Con. vol. i. p. 262. Bull. Vind. lib. ii. c. iv. § 6. p. 184. &c. præs. p. 246. Cell. Lit. Sch. c. v. § 8. p. 173. More's Theol. Works, p. 204. Mann's Diss. p. 93. Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 427. Sir I. Newt. on Proph. part. i. c. x.*

19. Joel foretells an extraordinary effusion of the Spirit of God in the latter day, in which all that called on the name of the Lord should be saved, and extraordinary deliverance should be wrought out in Mount Zion and Jerusalem.—Joel ii. 28—32.

Chand. on Joel, ib. et Diss.

20. Micah repeats part of Isaiah's prophecy of the glorious and peaceful kingdom that God would erect in the latter day, and afterwards expressly mentions Bethlehem Ephratah, as the place from whence the Ruler should go forth, who should be the illustrious Shepherd not only of the Israelites, but other most distant people.—Micah. iv. 1—5; v. 2—4.

21. Haggai prophesied, that during the time that the second temple was standing, which was not entirely demolished till the Roman captivity, (though in Herod's time gradually rebuilt,) God would shake all nations, i. e. produce surprising revolutions in them; and the desire of all nations should come into his temple; on account of which, the glory of it should be greater than that of the former house, though in external ornaments it was so much inferior.—Hag. ii. 6, 9.

Peirce on Heb. xii. 26. p. 190. Bp. Chand. on Chris. p. 86, 71. ed. 2. Lit. Sch. p. 120. &c. Gill on the Proph. p. 42. L'Enf. Intr. to N. Test. p. 14. Bullock's Vind. p. 177. Berrim. at B. Lec. vol. ii. Ser. xiv. præs. p. 41.

22. Zechariah twice mentions a person whose name was the Branch, i. e. probably who had been foretold by Isaiah and Jeremiah under that character, (vid. Isa. xi. 1. Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15.) on whom the eyes of God should be set with peculiar care, who should build the temple of God, and bear the glory, and remove the iniquity of Israel in one day, and appear as a priest on his throne, (perhaps in allusion to Psal. cx. 4.) restoring under his administration peace and happiness.—Zech. iii. 8—10; vi. 12, 13. Lowth in Loc.

23. The same prophet foretells the appearance of a meek Prince, who, in token of the gentleness of his administration, should, at Jerusalem, ride on an ass: he is described as the person who, taking off the Jews from their forbidden confidence, should speak peace to the Heathen, and erect an universal empire, making a covenant by blood, whereby miserable sinners should be delivered from destruction.—Zech. ix. 9—12.

* Two eminent divines have lately exerted their talents upon the prophecy of the Seventy Weeks. The first is Mr. [illegible] Dissertations on Dan. ix. 24—27. The other is Dr. Prideaux, in the Preface to his Connection. The scheme of Dr. Prideaux, and Dr. Hales's Answer to it, may be seen in the Gentleman's Magazine for the year 1728. In the second month's Magazine Dr. Prideaux's Paraphrase of Seventy Weeks. Dr. Prideaux has made some occasional remarks on Mr. Hales's Letters.

Chand. on Christ. p. 102. Lit. Sch. p. 143. Bull. Vind. p. 175. Sherl. 4th Diss.

24. The same prophet afterwards predicted an extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit upon the Jews, which should bring them in a better manner to lament him whom they had pierced, and should be attended with ample provision made by divine grace for their pardon.—Zech. xii. 10—14; xiii. 1.

Chand. ib. p. 107, 88. ed. 2. Lit. Sch. p. 146.

25. Malachi speaks of a Messenger of the covenant, who should bring the Jews to a strict trial; of a Sun of Righteousness, who should arise, and whose appearance should be introduced by a person, who, in the language of prophecy, is called Elijah, i. e. probably one in whom his spirit should eminently appear.—Mal. iii. 1—4; iv. 2—6.

Chand. ib. p. 63. Lit. Sch. p. 113. Bul. Vind. p. 180. Jeffr. on Chris. p. 351.

26. From comparing these prophecies one with another, it appears that they all centre in one illustrious Person; both as the language in which the deliverance is foretold by several of them is so much the same, and as there is no mention made of a succession of such deliverers, or a plurality, whose kingdom should be extensive and perpetual; to which we add, what we shall more largely show in the Scholium, that there was a very universal expectation of a Messiah, raised in consequence of these predictions.

1—26. 27. The sum of the whole is this. The prophecies of the Old Testament foretell that there should be a glorious Person, descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, who should be born at Bethlehem, of a virgin, of the family of David then in its decline, before the Jews ceased to be a people, while the second temple was standing, and about 500 years after Ezra's time; who, though appearing in mean circumstances, should be introduced by a remarkable forerunner, whose business it should be to awaken the attention and expectation of the people: He (i. e. this illustrious Person so to be introduced) should himself be eminent both for the piety, wisdom, and benevolence of his character, and the miraculous works he should perform; yet that, notwithstanding all this, he should be rejected, and put to death by the Jews, but should afterwards be raised from the dead, and exalted to a glorious throne, on which he should, through all generations, continue to rule, at the same time making intercession for sinners; that great calamities should for the present be brought on the Jews for rejecting him, whereas the kingdom of God should by his means be erected among the Gentiles, and diffuse itself even to the ends of the earth, wherever it came, destroying idolatry, and establishing true religion and righteousness. In a word, that this great Person should be regarded by all who believe in him as a Divine Teacher, an atoning sacrifice, and a royal governor, by means of whom God would make a covenant with his people very different from that made with Israel of old, in consequence of which they should be restored to, and established in, the divine favour, and fixed in a state of complete and perpetual happiness.

Clarke at Boyle's Lect. p. 390. Butl. Anal. part ii. c. vii. p. 250. Euseb. Dem. Evang. lib. viii. ix. Jortin's Rem. vol. i. p. 170. Hodges's Serm. No. 18.*

LECTURE CXXXII.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it evidently appears that there was in the Divine Mind a purpose of raising up a glorious Prince, called the Messiah, to reign over mankind, and likewise of exciting a great expectation concerning him before he appeared in the world.

Hurd on Proph. No. ii. p. 41, ad fin.

COROLLARY 2.

Hence it will appear probable, considering the nature of prophecy in general, together with those express predictions mentioned above, that there might likewise be a reference to the Messiah in some of those passages, in which the prophets speak in their own person, and describe extraordinary distress or glory in terms literally applicable to the Messiah, (comparing other prophecies,) and only figuratively to themselves; and it might be the wisdom of Providence so to order matters, that many eminent persons in the Jewish state should in some matters resemble the Messiah, and many deliverances granted to the Jews should represent the great deliverance expected from him. This may be the foundation of types, and for what may seem a double sense of some prophecies; which double sense is not to be understood, as if a prophecy equally and indifferently referred to many persons or events; or, as if literally referring to a lower person, it was only figuratively and allegorically to be interpreted of the Messiah (for a passage only capable of being accommodated to him is not by any means a prediction of him), but it is to be so explained, as that it may appear the Messiah was principally intended, and the prophecy literally referred to him, though it might in part be applied to that other person that typified him; and might have been understood as referring to that inferior person alone, if further light had not been thrown upon it, by comparing other prophecies, or by the testimony of those whom, on other accounts, we have reason to regard as authentic interpreters. Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged that, though tracing the Messiah in such prophecies as these, may serve to illustrate the unity of design, which (as we before observed, Prop. 97. gr. 5.) is a considerable additional proof of the truth of a revelation, yet the main stress is to be laid upon such prophecies as those mentioned in the proposition, rather than on those in which the prophets personate him. Yet, when some of these (as Psal. xvi. xxii. xl. lxix. Zech. xi. 12, 13, &c.) are compared with parallel places in the Old Testament, and correspondent facts recorded in the New, it is more reasonable to own that the sufferings and death, resurrection and exaltation, of the Messiah were chiefly designed in them, than to consider the appeal made to them in the New Testament, as an objection against the truth of Christianity; how far they are an objection against the inspiration of the New Testament, is a distinct point, and will afterwards be considered in Prop. 116. Schol. 7.

* Dr. [illegible] Sherlock [illegible] Dr. [illegible] Dr. [illegible] Dr.

Bar. Works, vol. ii. p. 205. Jeff. Rev. p. 97. Chand. on Mir. part ii. c. viii. p. 255. Har. Crit. Rem. 4to. p. 80. Whist. on Proph. at B. Lect. p. 13. Mudge's Pref. to Psalms. Hurd's Serm. on the Prophecies, No. iii. Jort. Rem. vol. i. p. 183.*

COROLLARY 3.

That so many prophecies looking to the Messiah, and centring in him, and which at least seem to be fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth, and so naturally tend to promote the Christian cause, should yet be extant in the Old Testament, is a plain argument that it is a book of an extraordinary character, and likewise that it has in the main been kept uncorrupted by the Jews, though, through negligence or design, some few passages should be altered; for had they allowed themselves any great liberty with it, they would probably have taken care to destroy or change such passages as have been quoted in the proposition.

* Dr. Hurd is a vindicator of the middle sense of prophecy; and Bishop Lowth endeavours to establish the same thing in his Lectures and Dissertations. But see Bishop Hare's Three Letters to Dr. Warburton. Middleton, p. 120, 121. Dr. Sykes (and many others) considered the literal interpretation of the prophecies, in his Essay on the Truth of the Christian Religion, and in his Principles and Connexion of Natural and Revealed Religion. Dr. Benson, in his Essay concerning the Unity of Sense, has endeavoured to show, at large, that the text of Scripture has many times no other sense.—Benson on the Epistles, vol. i. Introd. p. xxv—xlv. 2d edit.

COROLLARY 4.

It further appears, especially from the Scriptures enumerated in the first step, when compared with several passages in those that follow, that the Messiah is not in Scripture represented as a temporal deliverer of the Jews alone, by whom the Gentile nations were to be enslaved and destroyed, —but as a universal friend, teacher, and benefactor, by whom they were to be brought to true religion and happiness.

Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 328, &c. Chapm. ag. Morg. vol. i. p. 485.

COROLLARY 5.

It further appears, as above, that in order to reconcile those prophecies with each other, some of the expressions must be taken in a figurative sense; or that what is said of the conquests of the Messiah, or the destruction of the enemies of the Jews, must be understood of the punishments to be inflicted upon those who, when the Jews become subjects to him, should rise up against them.

Chapm. ib. p. 500.

SCHOLIUM 1.

For the illustration of what has been hinted at, Dem. gr. 26. it may be observed, that there are several texts in the New Testament, whence it evidently appears that there was among the Jews, about Christ's time, an actual expectation of the speedy appearance of the Messiah, though too many of them regarded him as a temporal deliverer, Matt. ii. 2—6. Luke ii. 25, 26, 38; iii. 15. John i. 19—25; vi. 14, 15; x. 24. Luke xix. 11. Acts xxvi. 7. Some have thought that some traces of such an expectation are also to be found in earlier ages, 1 Mac. iv. 46; xiv. 35, 41, 48. Eccles. xxxvi. 6, 8, 12—17. (compare Luke i. 68—73.) xliv. 21, 22. Tobit xiv. 5—7. Baruch iv. 22. As to the express references to the Messiah in the second book of Esdras, (ii. 42—47; vii. 28, 29.) we wave them, because it is certain that book was either entirely forged, or interpolated long after the Christian æra. The many insurrections of the Jews about Christ's time, under impostors professing themselves the Messiah, do further show that there was such an expectation among them, which was also common to the Samaritans, who apprehended he would be a prophet as well as a king.—Compare John iv. 25, 29, 42.

There are also some remarkable passages in Josephus, Philo, Tacitus, Suetonius, and Celsus, which show that such an expectation prevailed in some degree even among Heathen nations: and many have supposed there is a reference to the fourth Eclogue of Virgil, where there are indeed many things nearly parallel to those of the prophets, in which the glorious reign of the Messiah is described. Such expectations might possibly arise from the dispersion of Greek translations of the Old Testament.*

As for those prophecies of Christ, which are pretended to have been found in the books of Zerdusht, (of which none is more memorable than that quoted by Abulpharagius,) there is little dependence to be had upon them, considering the uncertainty of the oldest Persian manuscripts from whence they are said to be taken, as well as the late date of Abulpharagius. Neither can we much depend upon Confucius's pretended prophecy of him among the Chinese; nevertheless, it seemed not improper to mention them here.

Bp. Chand. Def. Chris. p. 3. Trav. of Cyrus, vol. ii. Appen. part. ii. pass. and p. 127. 8vo; p. 300, &c. 12mo. Lard. Cred. part i. lib. i. c. v. p. 280; Works, vol. i. p. 131. Col. Lit. Sch. c. i—iv. Hyde Rel. Pers. c. xxxi. p. 382. Tavern. Voy. vol. i. p. 484. lib. iv. c. viii. Conf. Scien. Sinica, Pref. p. 120. Jort. Rem. vol. i. p. 294. Lampe's Syn. Eccl. Hist. lib. iv. ad ult.

SCHOLIUM 2.

As for the Sybilline Oracles, which are said to have been preserved among the Romans with so much care, there is great reason to believe they were political forgeries; and it is certain that those which are now extant were forged by some Christian writer, after the events there foretold had happened,—since those events are much more plainly described there than in any Jewish prophet, which we can hardly imagine, especially since the apostle tells us, Rom. iii. 2. that the oracles of God were committed to the Jews, and never made any appeal at all to the Sybilline oracles for the conviction of the Gentiles. Yet we allow it very possible, that among the collections which were made after the first copies were burnt, some passages might be inserted from Jewish writings, (from whom it is certain many things were borrowed by the heathens,) and probably it is to such passages as these that the earliest of those Christian writers alluded, when they mentioned the Sybilline oracles, before the time in which we can suppose those now extant to have been invented.

Whist. Vin. Sib. Or. pass. Prid. Con. vol. ii. p. 620. Edw. on Scr. vol. i. p. 317. Bp. Chand. Def. p. 10. Obsop. Sib. Orac. p. 186. Jort. Rem. ib. p. 283.

SCHOLIUM 3.

As to the endeavours which have been used to enervate the argument in favour of Christianity, drawn from the prophecies mentioned in the proposition, by showing that they are capable of other senses from which the Messiah may be excluded, see the places referred to as glossed upon by Collins in his Grounds and Reasons, &c. and the Literal Scheme, and the Commentaries of White, and Grotius, who have studied to strain almost all these to some other sense; and some of them in so unnatural a manner, as greatly to establish the interpretation they would oppose.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The most considerable objection brought against applying these prophecies to the Messiah is, that the prosperity of the Jews, and their return to their own land, is foretold as an event to be accomplished by him, whereas no such event is yet accomplished. See, amongst many other places, Ezek. xx. 34—44; xxxvi. 24, 28; xxxvii. 21—28. Amos ix. 11—15. Zech. xiv. 9—11.

To this (besides what is said Cor. 5.) it is answered,

1. That their being rejected for a time is likewise foretold, and their being delivered over to the hands of their enemies. Vid. gr. 13, 18.

2. That Christians expect a restoration of the Jews in the latter days, upon their believing in Christ, Rom. xi. 11, &c.; and none can reasonably pretend that their restoration is to precede their faith in him.

3. That the preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, notwithstanding all their dispersions, leaves evident room for the accomplishment of these prophecies; and is so remarkable a fact, especially when their moral character is considered, and so well agrees with the predictions of the Old Testament and the New, as to lay a reasonable foundation for expecting their fullest restoration in God's appointed time.

Clarke at B. Lect. p. 431. Limb. Coll. cum Jud. p. 70. Berrim. at B. Lect. vol. i. Serm. xi. p. 326.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Whereas some think it strange that the prophecies which seem most expressly to fix the time of the Messiah's coming, (such as Gen. xlix. 10. Hag. ii. 6. Dan. ix. 26.) are nowhere urged in the New Testament, it may be answered,

1. That it could not have been made appear that the period marked out by them was entirely elapsed, during the time in which most of the apostles wrote, the sceptre not being quite departed, nor the temple or city destroyed.

2. That it might have exposed the apostles to additional inconveniences in their work, to have entered nicely into the discussion of some of these prophecies; as some would have engaged them in tedious calculations, of which the common people were not capable judges, and others in civil controversies between them and the Romans, which it was prudent as far as possible to decline. Yet it is to be remembered that Christ, when quoting a part of Daniel's prophecy of the seventy weeks strongly intimates that the whole of it was worthy of special regard.—Matt. xxiv. 15.

* Some ingenious observations concerning the Pollio of Virgil, may be seen in Lowth's Lectures, before referred to, p. 289.

Sykes's Christ. c. xvi. p. 297.

LECTURE CXXXIII.

PROPOSITION XIII.

JESUS is worthy of being received as a teacher sent from God, with entire credit to all his declarations, and obedience to all his commands.

Emlyn's Life, p. lxxvii. lxxviii.

DEMONSTRATION.

